

START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER

Andover, MA 01810

OCTOBER 1993

Camera Operator: Kathy Wilder

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by
THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A COOPERATIVE PROJECT BETWEEN THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARCHIVES AND THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
(AUGUST 1993 - APRIL 1994)

This microfilming project includes two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection in the Music Department of the Boston Public Library (BPL). Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives' Press Clippings collection. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repositories.

Music Department
Boston Public Library
P. O. Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

*M.125

.5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SCRAPBOOKS

1881-1882 TO 1959-1960

1181-18 to 1915-16 compiled by Allen A. Brown

1916-17 to 1937-38 compiled by Mary A. Brown

1938-39 to 1959-60 compiled by the Music Department

These scrapbooks contain reviews of concerts, articles concerning the Symphony, its players and conductors, interviews with soloists and composers, occasional letters and notes, an occasional autograph, ticket stubs, pictures of conductors, the Symphony, soloists and composers, and caricatures.

In the scrapbooks compiled by Mr. Brown, it is possible to find articles or reviews pasted on a program which does not have the same date. Mr. Brown used multiple copies of programs for his scrapbook "fillers;" the fillers have no relation to the articles pasted on them. The fillers may be partially to completely covered.

These scrapbooks do not contain the complete programs. For the complete program, the researcher must consult either the hard copies found in either the Boston Symphony Archives or the Boston Public Library's Music Department or the microfilm of programs published by KTO Microform (Millwood, New York) and dating from the 1881-82 season through the 1974-75 season.

Generally, one volume represents one Symphony season; the volume and season should therefore match. Depending upon the compiler and the clippings available, some reviews and articles may be found concerning the Promenade Concerts, Boston Pops, the Berkshire Music Festival and Tanglewood.

The Music Department of the Boston Public Library does maintain other materials concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra in other scrapbooks and files. Please consult with the Music Librarian for these materials.

VOLUMES 26-28

1906-07 TO 1908-09

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 1.2X

FILM STOCK:

1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 26

1906-1907

MMES

ON

207

ON

ONY

TRA

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION.

★★M 125.5.26

Dr. Karl Muck
Boston, 6-III-07.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
* 1906-1907 *

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L.S. Johnson del.

Dr. Karl Muck
Boston, U.S.A. 1907

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

* 1906-1907 *

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

ADDRESS
P.O. Box 1802 - Boston

NAME
Allen J. Brown

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Composers	Name of Works	Concert	Date of Performance
Bach J.S.	Suite No. 2 in B min: Flute & Strings Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 } for 3 v ^{ns} 3 flts 3 celli + Bass	II XVII	Oct 20. 06 Mch 9. 07
Beethoven	Symphony No 3 op 55 " " 5 " 67 " " 7 " 92 " " 8 " 93 Overture "Leonora" No 3. op 72 " " "Egmont" Concerto Piano + Orch No 4. op 58 } Dr. Otto Neitzel	XXIV I IX XVII VII VIII IX	May 4. 07 Oct 15. 06 Dec 22. 06 Mch 9. 07 Dec 1. 06 " 22. 06 Dec 22. 06
Bendix V.	Symphony No 4 op 30	XXIII	Apr 27. 07
Berlioz H.	Symphony "Harold in Italy" op 16 Overture "Roman Carnival" op 9 Minuet to the Dismutation of Faust Melody "The Captive" op 12 } Mrs Bertha Cushing Child	XIII XVI III XIX	Jan 26. 07 Mch 2. 07 Oct 27. 06 Mch 30. 07
Brahms J.	Symphony No 1. C min: op 68 Academic Fest overture op 80 Variations on a theme by J. Haydn op 56 a Concerto No 2 op 83 Piano + orch. } Orcefr Gabrielowitz ch	III XV X XV	Oct 27. 06 Feb 16. 07 Dec 29. 06 Feb 16. 07
Brockway H.	Symphony in D maj: op 12	XX	Apr 6. 07
Bruckner A.	Symphony No. 7 E maj:	VII	Dec 1. 06
Chabrier E.	"España" Rhapsody for orch.	XXIII	Apr 27. 07
Chadwick G.W.	Symphonic Poem "Cleopatra"	VIII	Dec 15. 06

Cherubini	Orch. "The Abencerrages"	XIX	Mar 30.07
Chopin	Concerto E min: No. 1. op. 11. } "Mina Ant. Szumowska" }	V	Nov 17.06
Comera F.S.	Orch. Fantasy "The Mystic Trumpets" op. 19	XIII	Jan 26.07
Debussy	Three Orch. Sketches "The Sea"	XVI	Mar 2.07
	" " "	XXII	Apr 20. "
Dukas, Paul	Scherzo "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"	XIV	Feb 9.07
Dvorak	Orch. "Heuristics" op. 16	XVIII	Mar 16.07
Elgar Ed.	Concert Orch. "In the South"	XII	Dec 15.06
Fried, Oskar	Prelude & Double Fugue for Strings Op. 10	XIX	Mar 30.07
Glazounoff	Symphony No. 5. B flat op. 55	VI	Nov 24.06
Goldmark E.	Orch. "Jaktatala" op. 13	XI	Jan 5.07
Grieg, Ed.	"In Autumn" op. 11 Concerto Piano & orch op. 16 } Katherine Goodson }	XXII	Apr 20.07
		XX	Jan 19.07
Hadley, H.	"Salome" Tone Poem for Orch.	XXI	Apr 13.07
Haydn	Symphony Br. H. No. 2 D maj: " " " 13	XXVII	Mar 9.07
		II	Oct 20.06
Liszt F.	Symphonic Poem No. 11. "Bataille d'Arménie"	XXIV	May 4.07
	Concerto No. 1. E flat Piano & orch. } Moritz Rosenthal }	VII	Dec. 06
	Shepherd's Song } from "Christus"
	March 3 Holy Kings } for orch.	X	Dec 29.06
	Mephisto Waltz " "	XXVI	Mar 2.07

MacDowell E.T.	Orch. Suite No. 2 op. 48. "Indian"	XX	Apr 6.07
Mendelssohn	Orch. "Midsummer Night's Dream" op. 24	XXII	Jan 19.07
Mozart	Symphony C maj: K. 551 Orch. "Magic Flute" Aria: "L'amore, saro costante" } "Mad. Melba with orchestra" }	II XXII	Oct 20.06 Mar 9.07
		XXIII	Jan 26.07
Noskovsky	Symphonic Poem op. 66. "The Steppes"	XXVII	Mar 16.07
Rame J.K.	Prelude "Oedipus Tyrannus"	XXII	Apr 20.07
Rega, Max	Lament for Orch. op. 95	XXI	Apr 13.07
Rimsky-Korsakoff	Orch. "The Betrothed of the Czar"	VI	Nov 24.06
Richter, Alex.	"Clara's Wedding Dance" op. 22	XVI	Mar 2.07
Rossini, Fran.	Air from "Mithras" "M. Bertha Cushing Child" }	XIX	Mar 30.07
Saint-Saens C.	Symphony No. 3. C min op. 78 Orch. "Les Barbares" for orch. Concerto Piano & orch. No. 2. op. 22 "Valse Nonchalante" } "Mignonne" } Piano Solos "Canariote" }		Nov 26.06
	Conducted by Dr. Muck: Saint-Saens played the Concerto and Valses
Schubert F.	Symphony No. 7 in C maj: Unfinished Symphony in B min: "Erl König" with Piano acct } "Mad. Olive Fremsted" }	XXII IV	Jan 19.07 Nov 3.06
		IV	Nov 3.06
Schumann, G.	Variations & Double Fugue for orch	XXIII	Dec 15.06

Scheemann R.	Symphony No. 1. B flat op. 38	IV	Nov 3. 06
	{ Ich groesse nicht } with Piano	IV	Nov 3. 06 { Mondnacht }
	Mme Olive Fromstad
Sibelius	Symphony No. 1. E min:	XI	Jan 5. 07
	Concerto D min: Violin + Orch op. 47	XII	Apr 20. 07
	Mme Maud Powell
Linding	Symphony No. 1 D min. op. 21	V	Nov 17. 06
Metana F.	Symphonic Poem 'Vysehrad'	XVII	Nov 16. 07
	Ouv. 'The Sold Bride'	XIII	Apr 27. 07
Spohr W.	Concerto D min: No. 2 V ^{tr} + Orch	II	Oct 20. 06
	Willy Hers
Strauss R.	'Don Juan' op. 20	III	Oct 27. 06
	'Symphonica Domestica' op. 53	XV	Feb 16. 07
	" "	XIX	Mar 30. "
Strube	Concerto No. 2 in F ^{tr} min: 7 ^{tr} + Orch	X	Dec 29. 06
	Timothée Adamowski
Tinel, Edgar	'Three Symphonic Pictures' op. 21	XIV	Feb 9. 07
Tschaiikowsky	Symphony No. 6 in D min: op. 74	XVIII	Mar 16. 07
	Ouv. Fant. 'Romeo u. Juliet'	XII	Apr 13. "
	Concerto No. 1. B flat Piano + Orch op. 23	XIV	Feb 9. 07
	Mme Olga Samaroff
	Concerto Violin + Orch D min: op. 35	VI	Nov 24. 06
	Alex. Petschnikeff
Verdi G.	Aria 'Ah fors' è lui' from Traviata	XIII	Jan 26. 07
	Mad. Melba with orch:
Volkman R.	Ouv. Richard III' op. 68	XIV	May 4. 07
	Concerto A min 'Cello + Orch. op. 33	XI	Jan 5. 07
	Heinrich Wamke

Wagner R.	"A Faust Overture"	}	I	Oct 13. 06
	"Siegfried Idyll"		"	" " "
	Prelude "Meistersingers"		"	" " "
	Overture "Rienzi"		VIII	Dec 15. "
	" "		Pennia Fund	" 36. "
	" "
	" "Flying Dutchman"		}	Penna Fund	Apr 28. 07
	" "Tannhauser"
	Vorspiel "Lohengrin"
	" "Tristan u. Isolde"
" "Parsifal"
	Funeral March "Gottterdammerung"
Weber, C. M. v.	Ouv. "Der Freischütz"	}	IV	Nov 3. 06
	" "Oberon"		V	" 17 "
	" "Euryanthe"		XX	Apr 6. 07
	Scene & Aria "Wie Nacht mir" with orch		IV	Nov 3. 06
	Mme Olive Fromstad
<hr/>
Soloists
Piano	Gabrilowitsch, Ossip		Feb 16. 07
	Goodson Mad. Katherine		Jan 19. "
	Heitzel, Dr. Otto		Dec 22. 06
	Rosenthal, Moritz		" 1 "
	Tamaroff, Max. Olga		Feb 9. 07
	Izumowska Mad. Antoinette		Nov 17. 06
Violinists	Adamowski, Timothée		Dec 29. 06
	Hess, Willy		Oct 20. "
	Petschnikoff, Alexander		Nov 24. "
	Powell, Maud		Apr 20. 07
Violoncello	Wamke, Heinrich		Jan 5. 07

Vocalists

Child, Mrs Bertha Cushing Fremstad, Mme Olive Melba, Mme Nellie

Conductor

Dr Karl Muck

Mar 30. 07
Nov 3. 06
Jan 26. 07

14

15

SYMPHONY HALL

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

TWENTY-SIXTH SEASON, 1906-1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

96 Performers

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor
(Of the Royal Opera, Berlin)

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS on consecutive SATURDAY
EVENINGS from October 13, 1906, to May 4, 1907, omitting
November 10, December 8, 1906, January 12, February 2 and
23, and March 23, 1907, and TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC RE-HEARSALS on consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from October 12, 1906, to May 3, 1907, omitting November 9, December 7, 1906, January 11, February 1 and 22, and March 22, 1907.

SOLOISTS

Mesdames	Messrs.
Melba	Paderewski
Olive Fremstad	Rosenthal
Bertha Child	Gabrilowitsch
Katharine Goodson	César Thomson
Olga Radecki	Petschnikoff
Olga Samaroff	Hess
Germaine Schnitzer	Adamowski
Antoinette Szumowska	Warnke
and others

¶ TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS and for the series of REHEARSALS, $18 and $10, according to location.

¶ The $18 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, MONDAY, October 1, at 10 a.m.

¶ The $10 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, TUESDAY, October 2, at 10 a.m.

¶ The $18 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY, October 4, at 10 a.m.
 ¶ The $10 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, October 5, at 10 a.m.
 ¶ Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD
 (OVER)

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

TTS AVENUE CORRIDOR

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PERSONNEL

TWENTY-SIXTH SEASON, 1906-1907

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

WILLY HESS, Concertmeister,
 and the Members of the Orchestra in alphabetical order.

Adamowski, J.
 Adamowski, T.
 Akeroyd, J.

Bak, A.
 Bareither, G.
 Barleben, C.
 Barth, C.
 Berger, H.
 Bower, H.
 Brenton, H. E.
 Brooke, A.
 Burkhardt, H.
 Butler, H.

Debuchy, A.
 Dworak, J. F.

Eichheim, H.
 Eichler, J. Edw.
 Elkind, S.

Ferir, E.
 Fiedler, B.
 Fiedler, E.
 Fiumara, P.
 Fox, P.
 Fritzsche, O.

Gerhardt, G.
 Gietzen, A.
 Goldstein, S.
 Grisez, G.

Hackebarth, A.
 Hadley, A.
 Hain, F.

Hampe, C.
 Heberlein, H.
 Heindl, A.
 Heindl, H.
 Helleberg, J.
 Hess, M.
 Hoffmann, J.
 Hoyer, H.

Keller, J.
 Keller, K.
 Kenfield, L. S.
 Kloepfel, L.
 Kluge, M.
 Kolster, A.
 Krafft, W.
 Krauss, O. H.
 Kuntz, A.
 Kuntz, D.
 Kunze, M.
 Kurth, R.

Lenom, C.
 Loeffler, E.
 Longy, G.
 Lorbeer, H.
 Ludwig, C. F.
 Ludwig, C. R.

Mahn, F.
 Mann, J. F.
 Maquarre, A.
 Maquarre, D.
 Marble, E. B.
 Mausebach, A.
 Merrill, C.
 Mimart, P.

Moldauer, A.
 Mullaly, J. L.
 Müller, F.

Nagel, R.
 Nast, L.

Phair, J.

Regestein, E.
 Rettberg, A.
 Rissland, K.
 Roth, O.

Sadoni, P.
 Sauer, G. F.
 Sauerquell, J.
 Sautet, A.
 Schuchmann, F. E.
 Schuëcker, H.
 Schumann, C.
 Schurig, R.

Senia, T.
 Seydel, T.
 Sokoloff, N.
 Strube, G.
 Swornsbourne, W. W.

Tischer-Zeit, H.
 Traupe, W.

Vannini, A.

Warnke, H.

Zach, M.
 Zahn, F.

SYMPHONY TICKETS FOR SALE
 IN ALL PARTS OF THE HALL
 40 STATE STREET. Room 47
 Telephone Main 4840-5.
 (A):

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY
 First Balcony facing stage, third row, two good aisle seats, $30 each, Saturday concert.
 Address F. E. M., Boston Transcript.
 2t(A): 05

SYMPHONY TICKETS
 At cost, 2 aisle seats, floor, 7 and 8 D., $28 per seat, Saturdays. Address G. D. D., Boston
 Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS
 Rehearsals, Concerts—Choice locations.
 HARDING, 70 Kilby St. 2t(A): 06

Wanted—One Symphony Rehearsal Seat
 For alternate Fridays. Address, with price and location, W.F.S., Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony
 After filling orders we have a few seats for sale for the season; may be rented for this week.
CONNELLY'S Ticket Office, ADAMS HOUSE
 6t(A) 08

HALLS
 For Concerts, Recitals
 Dancing, Lectures, Whist
 200 HUNTINGTON AVE.
 MB7t(A) 08

Symphony Concert Tickets
 Two good seats for sale at cost, $53 each.
 Address B.T.C., Boston Transcript.
 2t(A): 08

SYMPHONY—TWO FIRST BALCONY SEATS
 For Saturday Concerts for sale; reasonable price. Address R.L.J., Boston Transcript.
 (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS
 Evenings only. Aisle seats only.
 010 2t(A): HARDING, 70 Kilby St.

¶ The $18 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY, October 4, at 10 a.m.
 ¶ The $10 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, October 5, at 10 a.m.
 ¶ Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD
 (OVER)

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON.

SYMPHONY
TICKETS FOR SALE
 IN ALL PARTS OF THE HALL
 40 STATE STREET. Room 47
 Telephone Main 4846-5.
 (A):

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY
 First Balcony facing stage, third row, two good aisle seats, $30 each, Saturday concerts.
 Address F. E. M., Boston Transcript.
 2t(A): o 5

SYMPHONY TICKETS
 At cost, 2 aisle seats, floor, 7 and 8 D, $28 per seat, Saturdays. Address G. D. D., Boston
 Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS
 Rehearsals, Concerts—Choice locations.
 HARDING, 70 Kilby St. 2t(A): o 6

Wanted—One Symphony Rehearsal Seat
 For alternate Fridays. Address, with price and location, W.F.S., Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony After filling orders we have a few seats for sale for the season; may be rented
 for this week.
CONNELLY'S Ticket Office, ADAMS HOUSE
 6t(A) o 8

HALLS For Concerts, Recitals
 Dancing, Lectures, Whist
 200 HUNTINGTON AVE.
 MS7t(A) o 8

Symphony Concert Tickets
 Two good seats for sale at cost, $53 each.
 Address B.T.C., Boston Transcript.
 2t(A): o 8

SYMPHONY—TWO FIRST BALCONY SEATS
 For Saturday Concerts for sale; reasonable price. Address R.L.J., Boston Transcript.
 (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS
 Evenings only. Aisle seats only.
 o 10 2t(A): HARDING, 70 Kilby St.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PERSONNEL

TWENTY-SIXTH SEASON, 1906-1907

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

WILLY HESS, Concertmeister,
 and the Members of the Orchestra in alphabetical order.

Adamowski, J.
 Adamowski, T.
 Akeroyd, J.

Bak, A.
 Bareither, G.
 Barleben, C.
 Barth, C.
 Berger, H.
 Bower, H.
 Brenton, H. E.
 Brooke, A.
 Burkhardt, H.
 Butler, H.

Debuchy, A.
 Dworak, J. F.
 Eichheim, H.
 Eichler, J. Edw.
 Elkind, S.

Ferir, E.
 Fiedler, B.
 Fiedler, E.
 Fiumara, P.
 Fox, P.
 Fritzsche, O.

Gerhardt, G.
 Gietzen, A.
 Goldstein, S.
 Grisez, G.

Hackebarth, A.
 Hadley, A.
 Hain, F.

Hampe, C.
 Heberlein, H.
 Heindl, A.
 Heindl, H.
 Helleberg, J.
 Hess, M.
 Hoffmann, J.
 Hoyer, H.

Keller, J.
 Keller, K.
 Kenfield, L. S.
 Kloepfel, L.
 Kluge, M.
 Kolster, A.
 Krafft, W.
 Krauss, O. H.
 Kuntz, A.
 Kuntz, D.
 Kunze, M.
 Kurth, R.

Lenom, C.
 Loeffler, E.
 Longy, G.
 Lorbeer, H.
 Ludwig, C. F.
 Ludwig, C. R.

Mahn, F.
 Mann, J. F.
 Maquarre, A.
 Maquarre, D.
 Marble, E. B.
 Mäusebach, A.
 Merrill, C.
 Mimart, P.

Moldauer, A.
 Mullaly, J. L.
 Müller, F.

Nagel, R.
 Nast, L.

Phair, J.

Regestein, E.
 Rettberg, A.
 Rissland, K.
 Roth, O.

Sadoni, P.
 Sauer, G. F.
 Sauerquell, J.
 Sautet, A.
 Schuchmann, F. E.
 Schuëcker, H.
 Schumann, C.
 Schurig, R.

Senia, T.
 Seydel, T.
 Sokoloff, N.
 Strube, G.
 Swornsbourn, W. W.

Tischer-Zeit, H.
 Traupe, W.

Vannini, A.

Warnke, H.

Zach, M.
 Zahn, F.

DR. MUCK WINS SY

Boston American Oct 14, 1906

Drawn by Boston American staff artist.
"MONSIEUR LE DIRECTEUR" MUCK IN ACTION.

CONDUCTOR MUCK AND THE LIST OF SOLOISTS The Twenty-Sixth Season Promises to Be One of Unusual Interest.

The 26th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will open Oct. 12, 12, promises to be one of unusual interest. First of all there is the engagement of a new conductor. The engagement of Dr. Karl Muck is a radical departure from the traditions. He is the first conductor of an established, widely recognized reputation who has been engaged to conduct the concerts of the Symphony orchestra. The others, Messrs. Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch and Paur, were at the time of their assuming the leadership comparatively unknown men as concert conductors. Mr. Henschel was known only as a singer, pianist, composer; Mr. Gericke was one of the conductors of the Vienna Court Opera; Mr. Nikisch was the first conductor at the Leipzig Stadt Theatre, and Mr. Paur, after serving as opera conductor in Cassel, Koenigsberg and Mannheim, succeeded Mr. Nikisch at Leipzig and then at Boston. Only one of these four conductors had had much experience as a conductor of symphony concerts: Mr. Paur had led the subscription concerts at Mannheim. No one of them was then ranked among the great virtuoso conductors. They all had their reputation to make, and much of their reputation today is founded on their work with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Nor should the respective service of each one in turn to the orchestra and to the community be forgotten. Mr. Henschel, as the first in order, had an unenviable task, but the catholicity of his programmes and the fine taste displayed in making them broadened the knowledge of the public and raised its level of appreciation. Mr. Gericke made the orchestra a virtuoso instrument, on which Mr. Nikisch played romantically and poetically. Memorable performances were given by Mr. Henschel's successors: Performances of Schumann's symphony in D minor and Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" under Mr. Nikisch; of Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and the entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" under Mr. Paur; of symphonies by d'Indy, Franck and Mahler, and of Strauss' "Don Juan" and "Don Quixote" under Mr. Gericke—we name at random, for the history of the orchestra is full of brilliant, glorious deeds.

But the connection of Dr. Muck with the important opera houses of Berlin and Prague, with the Vienna Philharmonic orchestra, with the Wagner festivals at Bayreuth, and his many appearances as a "guest" in the opera houses and concert halls of Europe have made his name familiar to all who follow the news of the musical world. They know him as a virtuoso conductor, one of the "stars" who now rival famous prima donnas, tenors, violinists and pianists in exciting attention, applause, and hot and long-continued discussion.

Natural Curiosity.

No matter how greatly the departure of any conductor may be deplored, as soon as he is gone there is great curiosity concerning his successor. Nor should the sensitive regret this attitude of the public, the willingness, the desire to welcome a new man and a new order of things. As soon as The Herald made the announcement last spring of Mr. Gericke's departure—news that was announced authoritatively for the first time by The Herald—the question was immediately asked even by Mr. Gericke's warmest admirers: "Who will be his successor?" During the three months in which Mr. Ellis was carrying on his negotiations in Berlin, the rumor-monger was indefatigable. Hardly a man who wields a baton from Land's End to the Golden Horn, from the White Sea to the Boot of Italy escaped him. One after another was engaged at a salary incredible even in these days of extravagant incomes. Yet the problem had been solved for some time so far as Dr. Muck and Mr. Ellis were concerned. The question of his coming rested wholly with the Emperor of Germany, who was loath to lose his conductor at the Royal Opera House. At last Dr. Muck received a leave of absence from his duties in Berlin for one year. It is not too much to say that only the Boston Symphony orchestra with its reputation in Europe could have brought about this result.

Even then the rumor-monger was not discouraged. The contract was signed and sealed; Dr. Muck was at work on his programmes and making preparations for his departure; lo, the rumor-monger magnified an attack of laryngitis into a mortal sickness, long after the patient had recovered.

Dr. Muck will sail for New York from Bremen the day after tomorrow on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. He will arrive in Boston at the end of 10 days, and will have some little time to acquaint himself with his surroundings before he begins rehearsals for the first concerts.

Nature of 26th Season.

The orchestra will be away from Boston six weeks instead of five in the course of its 26th season. The change is due to the placing of the western tour of one week in the middle of the season instead of at the beginning, as it was last year. The artistic and financial success of the tour in the middle West the first week of October, 1905, was so great that arrangements were at once made for a repetition of an early October tour this year, but the date of the Worcester festival was changed to the first week of next month, and as the orchestra, or at least a large part of it, will play in this festival, the western trip at this time is out of the question.

It has therefore been decided that the orchestra should go West in the last week of January. It will leave Boston on Sunday evening, Jan. 27. Concerts will be given as follows: Rochester on the following Monday evening, Cleveland on Tuesday evening, Detroit on Thursday evening, Indianapolis on Friday evening, Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon. The orchestra will return to Boston on Sunday, Feb. 3.

Boston will not lose by this. The 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts will be given as in past years on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings respectively, but the last pair will come on May 3, 4 instead of on April 26, 27.

The first public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and the first concert on Saturday evening, Oct. 13. Until May 3 the public rehearsals and concerts will be given on successive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings except Nov. 9-10, Dec. 8-9, Jan. 11-12, Feb. 1-2, Feb. 22-23 and March 22-23. According to the established custom the public rehearsal which would come ordinarily on Friday afternoon, March 29, Good Friday, will be given on the afternoon of the preceding day, Thursday, the 28th.

Auction Sale of Seats.

There will be an advance, but one more apparent than real, in the required prices of seats; an advance from $7.50 to $10 and from $12 to $18.

The purpose of this change in the nominal prices of the seats is to shorten and to simplify the auction sale. Several years have passed since any seats, either for the public rehearsals or for the concerts, have sold for less than a premium of $2.50 on the $7.50 seats, and records show that in the past few seasons only an insignificant number of seats brought a premium of less than $6. The sale by auction of over 5000 seats is at its best a long and tedious process. By increasing the required price to a figure which is still most reasonable, viewed in any light whatever, the time consumed in selling the seats should be much shortened.

The auction sale of seats will begin on Monday, Oct. 1, at 10 o'clock, when the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday morning, at 10 o'clock. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday morning, Oct. 4, at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the concerts at the same hour on Friday morning.

Who Dr. Muck Is.

And now a few words about the new conductor, the soloists, and the programmes.

Dr. Muck has been described as "a man of medium height, of slender and graceful build, who wears his clothes with distinction. His pictures show a well-shaped head, covered with short, black hair, which is brushed back from a high forehead, strongly lined by finely cut features; his eyes are dark, yet bright. An attractive face, decidedly the face of a cultured gentleman, keen, alert and with markings of a sense of humor."

He comes of good stock. His father, Dr. J. Muck, was a Bavarian councillor, who lived in Wuerzburg, where the son was born on Oct. 22, 1859. The father, a lawyer, and a gifted amateur musician, planned that his son should follow in his footsteps, but the latter decided at an early age to subordinate law to music and he finally devoted his life to the preferred art.

His musical education began with lessons on the piano and the violin and in counterpoint. These lessons were given by his father, and they continued while he was in the gymnasium at Wuerzburg. His first appearance in public was at the age of 11, as a pianist. In the succeeding years he played often, usually in chamber music. He also played the violin in a symphony orchestra. In 1876 he went to the University of Heidelberg, where he remained a year. He then went to Leipzig, where he worked for his degree in the university in philosophy, classical philology and the history of music. At the same time he studied in the Leipzig Conservatory, under E. F. Richter and Karl Reinecke. In 1880 he received his degree of Ph. D. from the university and he made his debut in the Gewandhaus as a pianist.

Although he was successful as a pianist, he had long determined to be a conductor. He therefore left Leipzig to act as chorus master of the Zurich opera (1880-81). He conducted at Salzburg (1881-82), and for two years (1882-84) he led the opera at Bruenn. As opera conductor at Graz (1884-86), he led the first performance in Austria of "The Mastersingers" (1886). In Graz he also conducted the concerts of the Styrian Music Society, and produced, for the first time in Austria, the seventh symphony of Bruckner, in the presence of the composer. From 1886 to 1892 he led the opera in the German Theatre of Prag, under the management of Angelo Neumann, and also the Philharmonic concerts. In 1889 he conducted for Neumann in St. Petersburg and Moscow performances of the "Ring," and in 1891 he visited Berlin with Neumann's company, and at the Lessing Theatre produced for the first time in that city "Cavalleria Rusticana," Weber-Mahler's "Drei Pintos" and Cornelius' "Barber of Bagdad."

Since 1892 he has been conductor at the Berlin Royal Opera House. He has also led in Berlin the oratorio concerts of the Royal Opera chorus and concerts of the Wagner Society. He has conducted the Silesian Music festivals since 1894, and in 1901, '2, '4, '6, he conducted "Parsifal" in Bayreuth.

As a "guest" he has conducted at St. Petersburg and Moscow (Philharmonic concerts of the Imperial orchestra); at Bremen (1895, eight stage performances of Rubinstein's "Christus"), Copenhagen (Philharmonic concerts); Madrid (concerts of the Royal court orchestra); Paris (Philharmonic concerts), Budapest (concerts of the Court orchestra), London (Philharmonic concerts and German opera).

Facts and Rumors.

Although Dr. Muck has never visited America, it has not been for lack of opportunity. As long ago as 1893 he was considered as a possible conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It will be remembered that after the sudden departure of Mr. Nikisch a contract was made with Dr. Hans Richter whereby he was to become the successor of Mr. Nikisch, but Dr. Richter, for some reason that has not been explained, broke this contract. When Mr. Ellis was in Berlin last spring Dr. Muck showed him a letter which Richter had sent him at the time, in which he urged Dr. Muck to go to Boston as his substitute. Dr. Muck, who had just completed his first season in Berlin with great success, would not listen to any proposition for him to leave the city and his position.

In the last year of Mr. Maurice Grau's direction of the Metropolitan Opera House of New York, Mr. Grau endeavored to persuade Dr. Muck to come to New York for the opera season, and he made him an offer of a salary which was unquestionably the largest that had been offered to a conductor. Dr. Muck refused to consider this offer. Since that time at least one other attempt has been made, but in vain, to induce him to come to this country.

One of the many absurd statements which have been published in this country and in Europe since Dr. Muck's engagement is that he will come to Boston "on trial." A man of his reputation does not go anywhere "on trial." His position in Berlin is one of the most desirable and the most coveted in Europe. His services are constantly demanded by leading opera houses and orchestras of the continent. And what counts even more than this in Germany—he has for years enjoyed the personal friendship of Emperor William.

That Dr. Muck has engaged himself in Boston for only one year is due to his own desire. His leave of absence from his duties had to come directly from the Emperor. His first request met with a refusal. Only when it was pointed out to the Emperor that his consent to the engagement would be accepted in America as another token of his undoubtedly kindly feeling toward this country and that the Boston Symphony orchestra was wholly an artistic and not commercial enterprise did William decide to grant a leave of absence.

List of Soloists.

Aside from the first four programmes, which are given below, little is known of Dr. Muck's plans for the season, what his general scheme will be, what unfamiliar compositions he will introduce. All this will be learned after his arrival.

In the mean time, an unusually strong list of soloists has been prepared. Several of the engagements have not yet been confirmed, pending the arrival of Dr. Muck, so that the following list is incomplete.

At the head of the list of singers stand the names of Mmes. Melba and Fremstad. Mme. Melba will come to the United States in January to be the leading lyric soprano of the new Manhattan Opera House, directed by Mr. Hammerstein. She will sing in a few concerts while in this country. One of them will be in Boston with the Symphony orchestra, and this will be her only appearance in the city. Mme. Fremstad, one of the most talented of the younger singers, will return to the Metropolitan Opera House for this season, and she will impersonate the part of Salome in Richard Strauss' opera. She, too, will sing in a few concerts.

In the list of pianists are, among the women, the names of Mmes. Samaroff, Szumowska, Katherine Goodson and Olga Radecki. Mme. Samaroff, it will be remembered, played with the orchestra last year. She is one of the best liked and most admired of the younger pianists. Mme. Szumowska needs no introduction, for she has long had an admiring audience in the city where she lives. Katherine Goodson, an Englishwoman, will make her first appearance in America with the Symphony orchestra. She is highly recommended. Olga Radecki, once well known to Symphony audiences, will return after a long absence.

Messrs. Paderewski, Rosenthal and Gabrilowitsch are in the list of the pianists. Mr. Paderewski will come to this country late in December or early in January for seven performances with the Symphony orchestra in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. His new symphony will be produced by the orchestra. Mr. Rosenthal, one of the most distinguished pianists now living, will return to America after an absence of several years. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, an excellent artist, who is said to have grown greatly in musical stature since he last visited Boston, will be warmly welcomed.

Messrs. Cesar Thomson and Alexander Petschnikoff are among the violinists announced. Mr. Thomson is reckoned as one of the greatest living masters of the violin, and Mr. Petschnikoff is said to have gained in artistry since he was in this country.

Messrs. Willy Hess, Timothee Adamowski and Heinrich Warnke, members of the orchestra, will also play as soloists. Mr. Warnke has brought with him from Europe a new violoncello which is said to be an extraordinarily fine instrument.

Other names will be announced immediately after the arrival of Dr. Muck.

First Four Programmes.

The first four programmes, as sent by Dr. Muck, are as follows:

I.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5....Beethoven
A Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"....Wagner

II.
Suite for flute and strings.....Bach
Symphony in G minor, No. 13.....Haydn
Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"....Mozart
Soloist, Mr. Willy Hess.

III.
Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Strauss
Three movements from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz

IV.
Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.Schumann
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"....Schubert
Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber Soloist, Mme. Fremstad.

These programmes were made by Dr. Muck in the early summer. They are naturally subject to change after his arrival, when the titles of the solo numbers will be announced.

Symphony Orchestra

Orders for season tickets are respectfully solicited, and all such will be executed with utmost care and for a small commission. Diagram of Symphony Hall and all information sent on request.

CONNELLY'S THEATRE TICKET OFFICE
Adams House, Phone Oxford 942

Symphony's Opening Will Be 2400th Concert

Dr. Karl Muck, the Distinguished Conductor,
Is Due To Arrive Oct. 2—Season Starts
Ten Days Later—New Price Scale.

Journal Sept. 22, 1906

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, the Symphony Orchestra will give its first public rehearsal of the year. It will mark the beginning of the second quarter century of the orchestra, and it will be counted as the twenty-four-hundredth concert, for when the orchestra ended its season last spring it had played in public just twenty-three hundred and ninety-nine times, since its first concert on Oct. 21, 1881. It begins the second quarter of its century life with most glowing prospects, for not only is the orchestra in a higher state of discipline and efficiency than it has ever been before, but it will have as conductor Dr. Karl Muck, who is one of the most distinguished musicians in the world.

The prospectus for the season of 1906-1907 necessarily shows much that is familiar, but there are two or three innovations which will strike the eye immediately. The first is, of course, the new conductor. The second is the absence of the orchestra from Boston six weeks during the winter, instead of the usual five, and the third—more apparent than real—is the increase in the up-set prices of seats for the public rehearsals and for the concerts.

New Scale of Prices.

This increase was made only after long and careful consideration. Its object is to shorten and simplify the auction sales. Investigation has shown that in the last several years none of the $7.50 seats has brought a premium of less than $2.50, and that only an insignificant number of the $12 seats has brought a premium of less than $6. For this reason, the management has decided to raise the prices of the $7.50 seats to $10, and the price of the $12 seats to $18. It is needless to say that these prices are still nominal in every sense of the word. By this means, starting at a higher figure, the time of the long and tedious auction sale should be materially lessened.

The auction sales will begin Monday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M., and the sale of the $18 seats for the public rehearsals. On Tuesday, the $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold. On Thursday the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts, all sales beginning precisely at 10 o'clock in the morning.

Annual Tour to West.

For the past twenty years the orchestra has been absent five weeks during the season, while it made its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia and the other cities where it gives a series of concerts. Another interim of a week will be added this year, when the orchestra goes West. It will leave Boston on Sunday, Jan. 27, and give concerts in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati, returning Feb. 3. This Western trip has now become an annual fixture in the schedule of the orchestra, and instead of having it the first week in October, has been placed in the middle of the season, primarily because the Worcester Festival is now given in the first week of October, and the orchestra for that event is supplied by the Symphony.

The first public rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13, respectively. The orchestra will not be here on Nov. 9 and 10, Dec. 7 and 8, Jan. 11 and 12, Feb. 1 and 2, Feb. 22 and 23 and March 22 and 23. There will be, as always, twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts, but the last pair will fall on May 3 and 4 instead of on April 26 and 27, as would have happened without this Western trip. As is always the custom, the public rehearsal which would fall on March 29, which is Good Friday, will be given on the afternoon of the preceding day, Thursday, March 28.

Dr. Muck Arrives Oct. 2.

Unquestionably the chief interest of the season centers in the coming of Dr. Karl Muck, who is to sail from Bremen day after tomorrow on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and will arrive in New York on Oct. 2. In a way, the engagement of Dr. Muck is a radical departure in the policy of the orchestra. He is the first conductor of established reputation it has brought to America, for all the other conductors, Henschel, Gerlicke, Nikisch and Paur were comparatively unknown men when they came to Boston, and, indeed, the greater part of their reputation today is based on their work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two different applications had to be made to the German emperor to secure Dr. Muck. He was most unwilling to lose his favorite conductor, and that his consent was finally secured is due entirely to his kindly feelings toward this country and especially toward Boston, which is so intimately connected with Harvard University, in which, in the past, he has taken a great interest.

Melba and Fremstad.

At the head of the list of singers come Melba and Fremstad. Melba comes to America in January to be at the head of the new Hammerstein Opera Company, and while there she will have a few concert appearances of which one will be with the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Boston. Olive Fremstad, one of the most talented of the younger generation of singers, comes to America to "create" the name part in Strauss' new opera "Salome," which is announced by Mr. Conried as one of his novelties.

In the list of pianists, among the women are the names of Samaroff, Szumowska, Katherine Goodson and Olga Radecki. Samaroff is one of the most talented and popular of the younger pianists, and is more than well liked in Boston. Mme. Szumowska is a resident of this city and needs no introduction, as she has long had an admiring public here. Katherine Goodson is a young English pianist, who is coming to America for the first time, and Olga Radecki has played several times with the orchestra, but not in recent years. Among the men are the names of Paderewski, Rosenthal and Gabrilowitsch. Paderewski comes to America in January for several appearances with the orchestra and to hear his new symphony played.

He will give no recitals. Rosenthal, one of the giants of the piano, returns after an absence of several years, and his appearance should be one of the most important events of the season. Gabrilowitsch, the young Russian, whose exquisite art has so fascinated us in the past, returns this year with the name of having greatly increased his artistic stature.

Two names appear in the list of foreign violinists, those of Cesar Thomson and Petschnikoff. Thomson, it need hardly be said, is one of the great living masters of the violin. Petschnikoff, the young Russian, returns to America with an increased reputation as an artist.

Of the Boston virtuosi, there will appear Professor Willy Hess, Timothee Adamowski and Heinrich Warnke. It will be interesting to Mr. Warnke's friends to know that he has brought from Europe this year a magnificent new 'cello.

Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck

After Mr. Gericke left Boston last May he spent a few days in Paris and then went for the summer to Switzerland. Later still he paid a visit to Schwanberg, in the Tyrol, the little town in which he was born. Now he is settled "permanently" in Vienna at VI. Hötterlgasse, 5. Concerning the appointment of Dr. Muck as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, he writes to a friend: "I am greatly rejoiced that after so long a search the question of who should be my successor was so happily solved. Dr. Muck is a capable musician and a fine conductor."

The Change in the Symphony Prices

It was a very modest little advertisement in the newspapers of Saturday and of Sunday that disclosed the fact that the fixed prices for seats at the Symphony concerts had been increased. At the auctions for the new season, two weeks hence, the bidding for the more costly seats, that has hitherto started from $12, will begin from $18; and the bidding for the less costly will rise from $10 instead of from $7.50, the "upset" price at previous sales. The change from such long-established charges was a surprise that has already fluttered many households and provoked much gossip, some of which is neither just nor well-informed. Therefore it seems only fair to say at once, before mistaken impressions proceed farther, that the records of the sales show that it is several years since any of the seats formerly priced at $7.50 have been sold for less than $10, and that only an insignificant number of the seats formerly valued at $12 have ever been sold for less than $18. Thus there is no real increase in the prices from which the bidding starts. The buyers at previous sales, through many years, by the prices from which they began their bidding have practically made themselves the scale that the management of the orchestra has now adopted officially. The change was very carefully considered for many weeks, and one element in the decision was the increasing necessity of shortening and simplifying the long and tedious process of the sale of 5000 seats in what auctioneers would call four "sessions." Moreover, as everyone knows, $18 and $10 will be in practice as nominal prices as were the former $12 and $7.50. Trans. Sept. 17, 1906.

Now let's see to what extent the bidding for tickets at the Symphony auctions will be expedited by the advance in the fixed prices. That is one of the reasons given for the lift, we believe. The success of the experiment will depend a good deal upon whether the premiums are to be larger. Quite likely the new conductor and general prosperity may have a bearing on this.

SYMPHONY HALL

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

96
PERFORMERS

DR. KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR
(OF THE ROYAL OPERA, BERLIN)

TWENTY-SIXTH
SEASON, 1906-'07

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from Oct. 12, 1906, to May 3, 1907, Omitting Nov. 9, Dec. 7, 1906, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22 and March 22, 1907.

24 CONCERTS

On CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS from Oct. 13, 1906, to May 4, 1907, Omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 8, 1906, Jan. 12, Feb. 2, Feb. 23, and March 23, 1907, and

Mesdames

MELBA
OLIVE FREMSTAD
BERTHA CUSHING CHILD
KATHERINE GOODSON
OLGA RADECKI
OLGA SAMAROFF
GERMAINE SCHNITZER
ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA

SOLOISTS

PADEREWSKI
ROSENTHAL
GABRILOWITSCH
CÉSAR THOMSON
PETSCHIKOFF
HESS

Messrs

ADAMOWSKI
WARNKE and others

Tickets for the Series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals

$18.00 and $10.00

According to location

The $18 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Monday, Oct 1, at 10 A. M.
The $10 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Oct. 2, at 10 A. M.
The $18 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, on Thursday, Oct. 4, at 10 A. M.
The $10 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Oct. 5, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must Be Paid for as Soon as Bought or They Will Be Immediately Resold.

HIGHEST PREMIUM $83

At Opening Sale Today of Seats for Symphony Orchestra Rehearsals Excellent Prices Were Paid

Trans. Oct. 1, 1906

Advance in the regular prices for seats for the public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this season, the twenty-sixth in the history of this organization, did not lessen the interest in these performances nor the eagerness which people showed, as in past seasons, to purchase seats.

This morning at Symphony Hall the opening auction sale for the coming season took place, to be continued tomorrow and also on Thursday and Friday. Today's sale was of seats for the series of twenty-four public rehearsals, to take place as usual on Friday afternoons, except on stated dates which the management have announced, when the orchestra is engaged to appear in other cities. As in other seasons, there are two regular prices for seats, according to location. Heretofore the corresponding prices have been $12 and $7.50 for the series of twenty-four concerts and like number of public rehearsals.

It has been found in past years that when seats have been sold at auction, following the adopted custom, the opening bids above the stated price of $12 have been such as to make the rate equal to at least $18, and usually more; so it was felt that much time could be saved by making this the fixed or minimum price from which premiums should start this season.

This plan worked with success this morning, yet the sale did not progress as rapidly as it has in some other years and by noon time not as many seats had been sold as at that hour last year, in comparison. Bidding was fully as brisk as ever, and to just what the loss in time was due would be difficult to say. The attendance was large, ladies predominating among those present.

The highest premium paid this morning was $83, which was for No. 19, a centre end seat, in Row I. Competition on this began at $25 and was quickly run up by dollar bids to $60, ticket brokers in the front seats being the bidders. Then one of these jumped his bid from $60 to $71, from which the price rapidly rose to $83. Added to the regular price of $18, the seat stands at a cost of $101. This, for twenty-four rehearsals, figures the holder at a fraction of a cent less than $4.21 for each performance. Yet the owner of the ticket, even at this comparatively high price, will be enabled to hear to good advantage such world-famous soloists as Paderewski, Melba, Rosenthal, César Thomson, Olive Fremstad, Olga Radecki, Gabrilowitsch, Petschnikoff and other artists. Last year, it is recalled, the highest premium paid was $91.

The sale opened with bids for seat 1 in row A and the next seats in regular order were then disposed of, and this plan was followed as usual, with row after row. There was no skipping about with selection of seats at will. The opening bid of the sale was $5 and the first sale was at a premium of $13.50 for four seats, the limit that one buyer could take on a single bid. Other seats in this row sold at $14, $10.50, $11.50, then $25.50 and back to $17, and down to $10. In row B the opening and lowest premium paid was $10 and the highest $22.50. Row C ranged all the way from premiums of $10.50 to $30, ticket brokers buying several. In D, as high as $39.50 was obtained, falling back to $18.

When row E was reached there were spirited starts at $25, with sharp competition for centre end seats. Prices ranged in this row at from $15.50 to $46 for two seats in the middle, yet not on the end. The row behind F brought on the whole less premiums than did E, and $33 was the highest premium. When G was reached there was a lively spurt among brokers, some of whom paid as high as $63 for desirable end seats. Mr. Herrick of Copley square was active about this time and secured many fine seats hereabout at from $34 up. He was one of the largest buyers of the sale and the seats he secured would be viewed as perhaps among the very choicest in the hall. It is known that he acts for many prominent people just now abroad or still at their country places and not able personally to attend the sale.

There was another lively effort to secure seats when row H was put up. Around $30 was the lowest premium paid here, and in the middle of the row, when the bid had reached $55, someone jumped from that figure up to $70 and the seats were sold at $71 premium. Next adjoining seats, practically as good yet not on the end, sold for $37. Then in row I, in which the record price of the morning, $83 was reached, prices were high all through, ranging up from $27. Some other premiums were $44, $51, $60, $71, and $75. In the next row, J, the rates paid ranged from $29.50 up to $61, and fell back to $25. In K $61 was again reached.

The ladies present were quick with their bids, so much so that frequently the auctioneer failed to see them, if seated ten or fifteen rows back, and in several instances while seats were knocked down to bidders directly in front, some woman would be standing and waving frantically from another part of the hall and offering a dollar more than the price at which the bid was closed. One woman, who finally bought excellent seats at about $60 premium, had this experience at least twice. Other ladies who failed to make themselves seen or heard later moved toward the front to receive recognition from the auctioneer.

A little amusement was afforded the crowd when one woman, after much spirited bidding, was granted two good seats in Row B for $12.50 apiece, and then refused to take them, saying that she had made a mistake and wanted the seats on the other side, as she wanted "to sit on the piano side." Auctioneer Walter Jackson began all over again, and sold the two seats with a third one for $1 more than the previous bids.

Taken all in all, the opening sale brought higher premiums than those paid last season, and the readiness with which people paid good prices indicates as deep, if not deeper, interest in these performances as in other years. On Tuesday the $10 seats for public rehearsals go on sale.

SYMPHONY PRICES STILL HIGH

Record Price Today for Rehearsals Was $26.50, Against $23.50 Last Year

Trans. — Oct. 2, 1906
There were many disappointed persons at the auction sale of Symphony Rehearsal tickets this morning, due to the fact that those who had come prepared to purchase seats at approximately the same premiums they paid last year, found desirable places, even to the very last seats sold, soaring above their limit. This practically was the same story told yesterday, and if the same thing holds good for the two remaining auction sales for the Saturday evening concerts the ultimate financial returns will be considerably in excess of last year. Incidentally it should be borne in mind in figuring out results that the basic price was $10 against $7.50 last year, which helps to swell the total returns.

The highest price of the morning was for two seats in row KK, which brought $26.50. Last year places in this same row, the front one in the $10 section on the floor, brought $23.50, and the year before $20. A number of seats in the second row brought $26, and this price gradually descended until any number of seats towards the rear of the floor were disposed of at an average of $15. As the last row of the floor was reached, prospective purchasers, those, perhaps, who had sat on the floor for years, became uneasy. This augured well for prices, and the bidding advanced several dollars. Following some seats disposed of at $14 there were several single places which brought $17.

For the $10 section of the first balcony there was spirited bidding. The end seats at the right of the first row brought $19.50; others in the same line brought first $20.50, and later $23.50, at which price three seats toward the centre were sold. Those who anticipated that that would be the highest price of the morning for balcony places were disappointed, for while the next seats went for $23, and still others for $22.50 and $21.50, other seats off toward the left in this same row brought $24.50.

In the second row the first seat at the right brought $20.50, but better than that price was obtained for other seats, one aisle seat selling for $23.50. Between this price and $20 a number of seats were disposed of.

In the last full row the lowest price obtained was $17.50 and in the broken row the places were disposed of for $17, $16, $15.50 and $16.50, these being for the six seats at the extreme right back. The seats in the corresponding place at the left brought $16.50 and $16, at which figure the last seat in the hall was sold. Thus the premiums of the morning ran from $26.50 to $16, as against $23.50 to $15.50 last year.

The auction sale of the $18 seats for the Saturday night concerts will take place on Thursday morning; that of the $10 seats on Friday morning.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of the series of auction sales of seats for the coming series of public rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be held tomorrow in Symphony Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock. The sale tomorrow will be confined to the $18 seats for the public rehearsals. On Tuesday, beginning at the same hour, the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. The $18 seats for the concerts will be sold on Thursday and the $10 seats on Friday.

Intending bidders should be mindful of the fact that the sales this year are likely to progress much more rapidly than they have in the past. Starting at a higher figure, it is calculated that the seats will be disposed of in very considerably less time than has heretofore been the case. In former years bidders have known about what hour the seats they wanted would come up for sale and, instead of waiting from the beginning, have come at that time. Under the new system it will be well for them to make ample allowance for the increased speed in the disposal of the seats, else they may fail to get those which they want.

Dr. Muck is on the ocean and will arrive in New York some time next Tuesday. He will come direct to Boston. Practically all the members of the orchestra are back in town and have reported for duty. A few who have been abroad will not get back until the end of the week.

There seems to be little doubt that the coming sales will show a general increase. Last year's sales showed a considerable increase over those of 1904. As the general tendency of prices has been upward for several years past, it is only fair to suppose that 1906 will be no exception to the rule.

The prospects for the season are very bright, not merely in Boston, but everywhere the orchestra gives concerts. Naturally there is much interest in Dr. Muck's coming and the announcement of his plans for the season, which will probably be made next Sunday, is awaited with great curiosity. It is fair to believe that he will be ready to announce his novelties shortly after his arrival.

SYMPHONY TICKETS—Good seats, moderate prices, personal attention given orders. For information and diagram address Clement Ryder, 55 Hawthorn St., Chelsea. Tel. 155-5.
6t(A): 24

NEW CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Orchestra, of Berlin, Ger., Who Has Been Granted One Year's Leave of Absence by Emperor William, Will Come to Boston's Famous Organization for Season of 1906-07.

DR. KARL MUCK COMES TO LEAD SYMPHONY

DR. KARL MUCK COMES TO LEAD SYMPHONY

Conductor of Royal Orchestra,
Berlin, to Be in Boston
During 1906-07.

Herald June 3, 1906

Mr. Henry L. Higginson received a cablegram yesterday afternoon from Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is in Berlin.

The cablegram stated that Dr. Karl Muck, a conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin, by special permission of Emperor William, has received leave of absence for one year from Oct. 1, and that Dr. Muck will come to Boston to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season, viz.: 1906-07.

Dr. Muck, then, will make his first appearance in the United States as a conductor at Boston and at the public rehearsal of Oct. 12.

Mr. Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April in search of a successor to Mr. Gericke. The names of three or four conductors have been mentioned "authoritatively," each as that of Mr. Gericke's successor; Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Steinbach, Mr. Mottl, Mr. Mahler, and the names of lesser men have been mentioned significantly. It was stated on May 23 that Dr. Muck would be the man. There were negotiations with him at that time, but he was not engaged until yesterday.

The Herald on May 24 published a portrait of Dr. Muck seated at a piano, and it then published a sketch of his life, stating that there were contradictory accounts of his early career. Thus it is said that his father was a conductor at Darmstadt, and it is also said that he was a clerk in a Bavarian government office. It is said that the degree of doctor of philosophy was given to Mr. Muck by Heidelberg University. Others say he received it from Leipsic University.

Dr. Muck was born at Darmstadt, Oct. 22, 1859. After he had completed his course at the gymnasium and studied for a year at Heidelberg University he went to Leipsic and studied at the Conservatory of Music under Richter and Reinecke. He also pursued his philosophical studies at Heidelberg and received his degree. Early in 1880 he appeared for the first time in public as a pianist at the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, but in spite of his success he preferred the career of an opera conductor and began it at Zurich. He afterward conducted at the opera houses in Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz, and in 1886 he was appointed first conductor of the opera house at Prague. There he remained six years and conducted the Philharmonic concerts.

He also was the leader of Neumann's company when it went to Russia to give performances of the "Ring." In 1891 he conducted at the Lessing Theatre, Berlin, performances of the Prague company, and was so successful that in 1892 he was called to the Royal Opera of Berlin, where Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner have been his colleagues. The latter has announced his intention of devoting his time to rest and composition. Dr. Muck's contract with the Intendent of the Opera House would have expired in 1907.

Dr. Muck is highly esteemed as a conductor, not only in Berlin but in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Paris, London, Madrid and Vienna. He has been praised for the "phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry." He does not seek sensational effects, and although he has a marked individuality, he does not court the limelight. He is said to be an excellent disciplinarian and a believer in thorough preparation, whether the work be old or new. He enjoys a great reputation as an interpreter of Wagner's music dramas and at Bayreuth for his reading of "Parsifal" he was hailed as the successor of Levi.

His engagement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is for one year. Whether this engagement will be extended at the expiration of that time will undoubtedly depend on whether the public will like him and whether he will like the work and the life in this country.

It is not generally known, even in Boston, that Dr. Muck was considered as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra 13 years ago. In the spring of 1893, when Mr. Nikisch left so suddenly, negotiations were begun with Hans Richter with a result that a contract was signed by him whereby he was to come to Boston for five years. At the last moment he begged off, pleading that he was afraid to cross the Atlantic, although, as a matter of fact, the very considerable inducements offered him in Vienna to stay there were more likely the reason of his not coming. In the correspondence which followed he urgently recommended young Muck of Berlin, as one of the coming men of Germany. It was learned, however, that Dr. Muck would not at that time consider an offer from America. He had been in Berlin but two years and had extraordinary success there. So it was that the final choice settled on Emil Paur, who had succeeded Nikisch in Leipsic. This is all the more interesting in that Muck is classified by European critics as belonging to the school of which Richter has been the chief exponent rather than to that of which Nikisch is so brilliant an ornament.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Trans. Sept. 22, 06
A NEW CONDUCTOR, NEW PRICES AND A NEW SEASON

Dr. Muck as Berlin and Baireuth Know Him—Four Examples of His Programme-Making—The Soloists of the Winter—
The Reasons for the New Prices—Changes in Routine

A week from next Monday, the auctions of the seats for the twenty-sixth series of symphony concerts by our orchestra begins at Symphony Hall. The sales continue there through the ensuing Friday. One week from that day comes the first afternoon concert of the new season; the first evening concert follows on the next night. Thereafter, with the exception of the monthly absences of the orchestra from November to March, there will be a pair of Symphony concerts here each week through the first Saturday of next May. For the first time within recent memory there is to be a change in the price of tickets; for the first time the orchestra is to make a Western journey in the full tide of the season; for the first time, owing to unavoidable delays and difficulties, fewer assisting singers and virtuosi are announced in advance. Most important and interesting of all, for the first time in thirteen years a conductor new to Boston and to all America is to take the orchestra, and unlike any of his predecessors when they first came to Boston, he is a conductor of established eminence in Europe. Dr. Muck has been engaged for a single season. He could indeed obtain no longer leave from his regular position of chief conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin. It is carelessly—or deliberately—insulting to him and to our orchestra to suggest that he is coming "on trial." Conductors of Dr. Muck's standing do not leave Germany for "trial" in America or anywhere else. Orchestras of the prestige of ours do not so invite them to leadership.

ROUTINE CHANGES

As heretofore, the orchestra is to give twenty-four afternoon concerts, still officially called public rehearsals, and twenty-four evening concerts in Boston. The first afternoon concert falls on Friday, Oct. 12, and they continue on each succeeding Friday through May 3, except on Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, Feb. 22, March 22 and March 29. On all these dates, except the last given, the orchestra will be absent on a journey to other cities. March 29 happens to be Good Friday; therefore, by one of those delicate distinctions so dear to the managerial mind and so hard for the layman to appreciate, the concert is shifted to the preceding afternoon of Holy Thursday. The evening concerts begin on Saturday, Oct. 14, and continue through May 4, except on Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 2, Feb. 23 and March 23. Presumably the afternoon concerts will begin at 2.30, and the evening at 8, as hitherto, and Dr. Muck is as prompt a man as was Mr. Gericke. Presumably, also, the orchestra will give two concerts, one near the beginning and the other toward the end of the season, for the increase of its pension fund. In other cities, the orchestra is to play each month from November through March, in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, as it has for many years. This season, too, it will repeat its successful experiment of last autumn—a journey of a week to cities of the nearer West. It will not, however, begin the little tour until the week of Jan. 28. Then it will play in succession in Rochester, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Indianapolis and Cincinnati. It will continue also its series of concerts in Saunders Theatre at Harvard, and its occasional visits to cities in New England and elsewhere that are within easy distance of Boston. In all, between the middle of October and the beginning of May, it will give 125 concerts, rather more than it has attempted in any previous musical year.

THE NEW PRICES

The method of the sale of seats and the prices of them vary among the chief orchestras, like the Chicago band, the Philharmonic Society and Mr. Damrosch's orchestra in New York, Mr. Scheel's in Philadelphia or Mr. Paur's in Pittsburgh. Some dispose of their seats at fixed prices, usually determined, in the phrase of the railways, by what "the traffic will bear." Some make the fixed charge nominal and rely for their revenue upon the premiums of an auction. From the first our orchestra has followed the second method, and it will continue it this season. The higher priced seats for the afternoon concerts, or "public rehearsals," will be sold by auction at Symphony Hall on Monday, Oct. 1, beginning at ten o'clock. The lower priced seats for the afternoon concerts will be sold under the same conditions and at the same place and hour on Tuesday, Oct. 2. The auction for the higher priced seats for the evening concerts follows at ten o'clock on the morning of Thursday, Oct. 4, at Symphony Hall, and at the same hour and place on Friday, Oct. 5, the lower priced seats for the evening concerts will be sold. As usual, for the afternoon concerts the 505 seats in the second balcony—the "rush" seats of our local speech—will be reserved for sale at the door on each Friday, presumably at the same price that has long prevailed.

Hitherto the fixed price of the more costly seats for both the afternoon and the evening concerts has been $12; for the less costly $7.50. From these figures the bidding began and ran as high as the buyers' desires counselled and their purses permitted. For the new season, for the afternoon and for the evening concerts alike, the fixed prices are to be $18 for the more costly places and $10 for the less costly. In the one case the increase is of fifty per cent; in the other of twenty-three and a third. This advance in prices slipped into public knowledge a week ago. Straightway it fluttered many households—where daughters abound, for example—and let loose many tongues—not always with informed speeches. The simple facts in the matter as the management of the orchestra weighed them during the summer are these: $18 and $10 are no less nominal prices than were $12 and $7.50—mere bases, so to say, from which the bidding that determines the actual price begins. Very rarely in the sales of many years have the seats now to be sold from the fixed price of $18 failed to command that sum, and usually much more. None at all of the seats for which bidding will now begin from $10 has failed to sell for that sum in many seasons. The sale of some five thousand seats by auction is a slow process. With our native prudence bids advance slowly. Much time has been lost in previous sales in the raising of prices to sums, like the new charges, from which genuine bidding began. The auctions dragged out their slow length of many hours. With the new prices the selling should be more expeditious.

THE SOLOISTS

Dr. Muck is leaving Germany next Tuesday, and his ship will hardly reach New York before the following Tuesday, Oct. 2. The following Monday, he begins rehearsals for the first pair of concerts, and his own discovery of his men and his training of them to his ways and desires is likely to occupy him for some weeks to come. Since he accepted his new post, last June, he has been busy with work at Madam Cosima's Wagner theatre at Baireuth and at sundry musical festivals. A passing illness, curiously exaggerated in despatches from abroad and baseless rumor at home, persuaded him to a few weeks of rest. It is not easy to arrange programmes for twenty-four pairs of concerts by correspondence between Boston and a little Styrian village. It is no easier to choose or approve, under these conditions, the singers and the virtuosi who are to assist the orchestra at its concerts. Consequently fewer soloists than usual appear as yet in the official announcements for the new season, and the selection of the rest awaits Dr. Muck's arrival, wishes and counsel. The chief singers already engaged, each for a pair of concerts are Mme. Melba of the opera in London and Miss Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Mme. Melba comes to America in January for a few appearances at the new Manhattan Opera House in New York. She continues there for a month and in that time, she is to sing at a pair of our Symphony concerts. Last summer, in Covent Garden, where she was singing twice a week, the quality of her voice showed no decline in purity, roundness or delicate undulation. Her phrasing was as curving and as spontaneous as ever; her ornaments of song as sparkling. The volume of her tones may have a little abated. Their distiguishing qualities have not. Miss Fremstad, as she proved a season or two ago here, is one of the rare dramatic singers of the theatre who can carry her salient qualities of voice and imagination little diminished, to the concert room. Of singers of local note, Mrs. Child will attain the distinction her artistry deserves by appearances at a pair of concerts.

Three virtuosos of the first rank, Paderewski and Rosenthal, the pianists, and César Thomson, the Belgian violinist, come to America in the course of the new season and each is to play at the Symphony concerts. Paderewski, indeed, is practically paying a visit to the orchestra to hear it play the symphony he has lately finished. He arrives at the end of the year; he stays for only three weeks; and he plays here or elsewhere only with our band. Rosenthal, who has been long absent from America, returns in the fulness of his reputation in Europe, a reputation that now credits him with finer and larger imagination and expression and no less technical power. César Thomson, who last played her ten years or more ago, stands with Ysaye as the most eminent of the elder violinists. (Poor old Joachim is but a tuneless shadow of himself and Sarasate has always been more virtuoso than musician.) Even after so long an interval it is easy to recall the mastery, the masculinity, and the grave imagination of César Thomson's playing. Less distinguished virtuosos from Europe who are to play with the orchestra are Gabrilowitsch, the pianist of delicate intuitions and delicate expression; Petschnikoff, the young Russian violinist, whom German audiences applauded last winter; Olga von Radecki, the German pianist, who belongs almost to an elder generation of Symphony audiences, and Katherine Goodson, a young English pianist who has found favor with both the London Symphony and the Queen's Hall orchestras there. Mme. Szumowska, who plays at a pair of concerts, is a pianist of our own, and Mme. Samaroff, who is also engaged, outranks in achievement and promise any of the younger American virtuosos. From the string choir of the orchestra itself, Mr. Hess and Mr. Adamowski, the violinists, and Mr. Warnke, the cellist, are each to have a concerto.

THE PROGRAMMES

Early last summer, at the request of the management of the orchestra here, Dr. Muck sketched tentative programmes for the first four pairs of concerts for the new season. As yet he has sent no word altering them, though naturally they are subject to change as soon as he arrives. As they stand they are:

OCT. 12 AND 13

Beethoven: Symphony in C-minor, No. 5.
Wagner: A Faust Overture; Siegfried Idyll; Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

OCT. 19 AND 20

Bach: Suite for Flute and Strings.
Haydn: Symphony in G-minor, No. 13.
Mozart: Symphony in C-minor, "Jupiter."
(Soloist: Mr. Hess.)

OCT. 26 AND 27

Brahms: Symphony in C-minor, No. 1.
R. Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Berlioz: Three Fragments from "The Damnation of Faust."

NOV. 2 AND 3

Schumann: Symphony in B-flat-major, No. 1.
Schubert: Symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished."
Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."
(Soloist: Miss Fremstad.)

What do these provisional programmes plainly signify or fairly imply? First and foremost that Dr. Muck seems to have no particular fondness for the music of his generation and ours, since out of thirteen compositions, only one, Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" is distinctly of our time. This very summer in Baireuth, he lamented to one of his assistants there who was questioning him about his plans for Boston, "that he failed to find much excellence in ultra-modern music of any school"; and that "the general musical sterility since Wagner's death was deplorable." By these tokens it may not be well to expect too much of the catholicity of view, the desire to keep his audiences musically informed and the cultivation of the music of the "new" Frenchmen, the busy Russians, and the younger Germans that distinguished Mr. Gerlicke. Dr. Muck has sent to Boston no list of the new or unfamiliar music that he intends to put on his other twenty programmes. Presumably he will tell us when he arrives. Meantime the official prospectus hints at one new composition "of the largest dimensions?" Shall we say a symphony with choruses by Mahler or, more probably, one of Bruckner's?

Certainly the four announced programmes are reasonably "stiff." Two symphonies in a single programme have been rather unusual here, and a whole programme, except the solo number, of the music of the eighteenth century is still more strange. Is Dr. Muck seeking to give his second pair of concerts a distinctive "atmosphere," which is creditable to his imagination, or would he turn pedagogue like the makers of "historical programmes," no great necessity in Boston after a quarter of a century of orchestral concerts? Clearly Dr. Muck would have us try him at the very start as a conductor of Wagner, but only one of the three Wagnerian numbers on the first programme is operative. Willing, too, he seems to mount the stalking horses of many conductors—Beethoven's fifth symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter," Brahms's first and Schumann's first. Apparently he has no overmastering ardor for the tone-poem, or for the freer modern forms generally. Distinctly the four programmes are the programmes of a classicist.

DR. MUCK HIMSELF

Dr. Muck, as he sits in the orchestra pit of the Royal Opera House at Berlin, or in the semi-darkness of the Baireuth sanctuary, is a man in his forties, clean-shaven, dark-skinned, dark-haired, strong of jaw, sharply cut of feature, short-sighted to the need of glasses, but with eyes sparkling brightly through them; slim as a boy, lithe, buoyant, alert and nervous in all that he does. In his leisure he talks much (and he smokes much) with a humorous vivacity and recurring touches of sarcasm that long ago commended his society to his emperor at Berlin. Distinctly he is a man of clear and critical intellect—qualities that have a just place, along with many others of many sorts, in a conductor. At his work, either in rehearsal or in public performance, in the concert-room or at the opera house, Dr. Muck is all for the task in hand. His diligence is as unflagging, his conscientiousness as persistent, as Mr. Gerlicke's own. His beat is precision itself, and his sense of rhythm of the keenest. For twenty years and more he has been studying his scores and playing the music that they contain with unwearying acuteness. He knows it to the last detail; he insists that each detail shall have its due place in the whole tonal fabric; and yet he does not lose the larger proportions of the web. His ear is as acute as his mind, and he has a keen sense for beautiful, delicately graduated and entirely euphonic tone such as for years has been the characteristic virtue of our orchestra. He has studied the secrets of instruments and voices.

Birth and youth in a household of the cultivated German middle class gave Dr. Muck intellectual and artistic tastes and bent. His training at the universities of Leipzig and Heidelberg—he is a doctor of philosophy by degree earned, and not a doctor of music by honorary title—confirmed and strengthened them. He labored as a chorus master at Zurich, as a conductor at minor Austrian opera houses, with a travelling opera company, before the call to the Opera in Berlin gave him an established position. At first he was fain to be a wandering virtuoso of the piano. His father insisted upon the prosaic work at Zurich. The chance illness of the regular conductor there disclosed the young Muck's aptitude for conducting. It was Angelo Neumann, discoverer of musicians of promise, that commended him to the Berlin Opera. There he has worked for fourteen years. Henschel, Gerlicke, Nikisch and Paur all came first to our orchestra comparatively untried and unpractised, with their finer skill to gain, their fuller way to make. Dr. Muck comes with a career achieved, with long-standing reputation earned and with entire mastery of the technique and the routine of his art. Every orchestra that has played under him, if only for a single concert, has respected the man and the conductor. His players at Berlin have added personal devotion. His assistants at Baireuth are loyalty itself.

The duties of the chief conductor at the Berlin Opera are confining, but from time to time Dr. Muck has visited the musical capitals of Europe, in the new fashion of the "star" conductor. He has taken a Wagner "cycle" or two at Covent Garden; Paris has heard him; he has wandered as far East as Moscow; and the Philharmonic Society of Vienna—an orchestra more akin to ours than any other band in Europe—has cherished him. Why, then—not to burke the question that has been raised steadily in Boston since Dr. Muck was chosen to succeed Mr. Gericke—why then has he not attained the celebrity of Weingartner, Nikisch, Mahler or Strauss as a "virtuoso" conductor? The answer is the simplest to those that know Dr. Muck's temperament, traits, and standards. Half the stock in trade of the glorified "virtuoso" conductor is his personality. Display it he must, if he would keep his standing and his following. He cannot be impersonal, if he would. Whether he smokes a cigarette or "interprets" a huge tone-poem, whether he conducts a Wagner cycle or buys a new cravat, he must be subjective. If he unfolds a handkerchief or a principal theme, he must do it in an individual way. Of intense and unflagging subjectivity, "virtuoso" conductors, with all their great qualities, are really made. In contrast, Dr. Muck has the objective temperament, an objective mind, and objective standards. No man of his eminence is more averse to personal exploitation. No conductor of his rank is less for himself or more for the work in hand. Dr. Muck is all fidelity to the music before him, all zeal to impart fully and faithfully the form and the substance of it, the design that the composer purposed in it, the mood in which he wrote, the emotions he would summon. The conductor is but the guiding medium; his band but the means; the rest is all the composer's. Yet this objective and intellectual temperament has some of the defects of its virtues. "If only he would calculate a little less coolly," said one of his companions at Beiruth, this summer, "if only he pursued absolute accuracy a little less passionately, if only"—and he ended abruptly—"but Muck has always proved equal to the occasion and he will to yours in Boston." H. T. P.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor

SIX CONCERTS

On THURSDAY evenings, Oct. 25, Dec. 13, Jan. 24, Feb. 28, April 4, May 2. Soloists: MISS ORMOND, MISS SNELLING, MME. SZUMOWSKA, MISS RADECKI, PROF. WILLY HESS and others to be announced.

Season tickets for the series, $5. Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats on application to George H. Kent, University Book Store, Harvard sq., on or before Oct. 18. The unclaimed seats will be on sale Saturday morning, Oct. 20, at 8 A. M. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Symphony Concerts Begin This Week.

Dr Muck Announces an Interesting First Program.

Guilbert and Chevalier Recital—Notes.

Globe — Oct. 7, 1906
With Dr Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor.

The auction sales testified to the fact that interest in the concerts this year is keener than it has ever been before, and this, naturally, is due largely to the curiosity which the coming of Dr Muck has excited.

Because interest centers in Dr Muck, there will be no soloist in this first program which Dr Muck arranged last spring when Mr Ellis was in Berlin. He has chosen for his introductory work the C minor Symphony No. 5 of Beethoven, which is generally regarded as a final test of the conductor's knowledge of the traditions of the great classics.

As Dr Muck has been so closely identified with the Wagner movement for the last 20 years it is but natural that Wagner's works should find representation in his first program, but he has chosen works which are complete in themselves, not excerpts from operas, unless the prelude to "The Mastersingers" is regarded as such.

The program for the first concert is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony in C minor No. 5
Wagner.....A Faust Overture
Wagner.....Siegfried Idyll
Wagner, Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.

This is the way in which the Tageblatt announced the engagement of Dr. Muck:

"While it is still uncertain whether the Royal Opera can retain Felix Weingartner as conductor of its orchestra's concerts, another hard blow has fallen on this institution: Dr. Karl Muck, who is, by the side of Richard Strauss, the most prominent and competent conductor of our royal stage, and one of the best in Germany, leaves us to conduct the symphony concerts in Boston. It is true that Dr. Muck has taken the Boston position only for one year, and has been allowed leave of absence by the kaiser for the remainder of the period covered by his Berlin contract. But as this contract expires in the autumn of 1907, and the Bostonians will doubtless make great efforts to win the distinguished conductor for their orchestra permanently, we must, alas! count on his absolute loss to Berlin. It is an exceptionally heavy loss that the Royal Opera is thus to suffer, and it is doubly painful because it is an open secret that it is not for artistic reasons that Dr. Muck leaves Berlin, but solely because the material advantages he enjoys here are inferior to those offered him in Boston. The dollar has once more won a victory."

DR. KARL MUCK TO BE CONDUCTOR

Noted German Musician Engaged to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra

Trans. — June 4, 1906
Through the efforts of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck has accepted the position of conductor of this musical organization, in which position he succeeds Wilhelm Gericke. Henry L. Higginson confirms the selection of Dr. Muck as the new conductor of the orchestra. It was necessary to get permission of the German emperor before the matter could be completed. Dr. Muck recently has been conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin.

The new conductor is one of the most prominent men in his chosen profession in Europe, and has never appeared before an American audience. He was born in Darmstadt Oct. 22, 1859. After obtaining the degree of doctor of philosophy he began the study of music at Leipzig Conservatory. Subsequently he received an appointment as conductor of the opera at Zurich. He went to Salzburg in 1881, to Brunn the following year, and in 1884 to Graz, where he became conductor of the Styrian Musical Society.

Dr. Muck is considered one of the leading directors in the musical world. For a number of years he has enjoyed the warm friendship and admiration of Emperor William. All his work is notable for its large dimensions and convincing power. While a man of broad musicianship and versatile style, he occupies a unique position as an interpreter of Wagner's works, which he renders with imposing authority. For this reason, his services as a Wagnerian conductor are much in demand, and he is regularly engaged for the Beireuth festivals. His leave of absence will extend from Oct. 6, 1906, to Oct. 6, 1907, one year only. He will make his first public appearance in this city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, at a public rehearsal.

DR MUCK ACCEPTS.

Conductor of Royal Opera, Berlin, Will Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra for One Year.

BERLIN, June 23—Dr Karl Muck, one of the conductors of the Royal opera,

DR. CARL MUCK

Of the Royal Opera in Berlin, Who Will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for One Year.

Berlin, has accepted the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for one year.

The New Conductor

Journal — June 5, 1906
As The Journal some little time ago announced was a strong probability, Dr. Carl Muck of the Berlin Royal Opera House is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the ensuing season, having obtained leave of absence from the Kaiser for the purpose. Essentially and mainly a man of grand opera, he has also made his mark in purely orchestral leadership, and there is no question of his high rank in the world of music. We do not understand that he is a "virtuoso" conductor, in the sense that Nikisch, Strauss and Weingartner are, but neither was Mr. Gericke, and few men in the world could have duplicated his splendid services for our great organization. Dr. Muck will have the incalculable advantage of finding here ready to his hand and brain a superb musical instrument created and perfected by his predecessor. His knowledge and temperament should be able to accomplish noble results.

Dr. Muck's contract, it will be noted, is but for a year, and that, it is announced, necessarily means that he is a stop-gap, employed to bridge over the time while Maj. Higginson shall find another and perhaps a greater man. But even under these conditions, Dr. Muck will be received with great interest and sincere wishes for a season's success.

Conductor Muck

Journal — Oct. 5, 1906

Carl Muck, the man who is to lead the cohorts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season, has been in the city but a little while, yet he has already made an excellent impression by his good nature, his modesty and his quite evident desire to please the patrons of the concerts. No flamboyant blast of trumpets heralded his entrance into town, nor did he at once dictate a long and impassioned statement telling Bostonians what they needed in the way of musical pabulum. Instead, Dr. Muck merely said that he had formulated no plan of action, had no crusade to further and would prefer to find out what his audiences wanted before making up his future programs. As we said the other day, that is not easy to ascertain, for there are half a dozen schools among Symphony-goers, and no conductor on earth could ever satisfy all of them at once. The remark is valuable, however, as showing that the new leader does not regard us as wholly unable to know what is good for us.

We hope Dr. Muck will swing into the Symphonic arena and let out all the fire and originality there is in him. Having but one year to serve, no considerations of place and favor need trouble him, even were he disposed to think of them at all. The orchestra is in a high state of technical perfection; let it so remain, but let also more strength and verve be infused into it. That, we take it, is Dr. Muck's task, and if he performs it well, he will do an everlasting service to the band and to its supporters. Wilhelm Gericke has left him the opportunity to produce as magnificent effects as are known to the world of music.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.

I. Allegro con brio.

II. Andante con moto.

III. Allegro: Trio.

IV. Allegro.

WAGNER.

A "FAUST" OVERTURE.

WAGNER.

A SIEGFRIED IDYL.

WAGNER.

PRELUDE to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

rank in the world of music. We do not understand that he is a "virtuoso" conductor, in the sense that Nikisch, Strauss and Weingartner are, but neither was Mr. Gericke, and few men in the world could have duplicated his splendid services for our great organization. Dr. Muck will have the incalculable advantage of finding here ready to his hand and brain a superb musical instrument created and perfected by his predecessor. His knowledge and temperament should be able to accomplish noble results.

Dr. Muck's contract, it will be noted, is but for a year, and that, it is announced, necessarily means that he is a stop-gap, employed to bridge over the time while Maj. Higginson shall find another and perhaps a greater man. But even under these conditions, Dr. Muck will be received with great interest and sincere wishes for a season's success.

Conductor Muck

Journal ——— Oct. 5, 1906

Carl Muck, the man who is to lead the cohorts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season, has been in the city but a little while, yet he has already made an excellent impression by his good nature, his modesty and his quite evident desire to please the patrons of the concerts. No flamboyant blast of trumpets heralded his entrance into town, nor did he at once dictate a long and impassioned statement telling Bostonians what they needed in the way of musical pabulum. Instead, Dr. Muck merely said that he had formulated no plan of action, had no crusade to further and would prefer to find out what his audiences wanted before making up his future programs. As we said the other day, that is not easy to ascertain, for there are half a dozen schools among Symphony-goers, and no conductor on earth could ever satisfy all of them at once. The remark is valuable, however, as showing that the new leader does not regard us as wholly unable to know what is good for us.

We hope Dr. Muck will swing into the Symphonic arena and let out all the fire and originality there is in him. Having but one year to serve, no considerations of place and favor need trouble him, even were he disposed to think of them at all. The orchestra is in a high state of technical perfection; let it so remain, but let also more strength and verve be infused into it. That, we take it, is Dr. Muck's task, and if he performs it well, he will do an everlasting service to the band and to its supporters. Wilhelm Gericke has left him the opportunity to produce as magnificent effects as are known to the world of music.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.

I. Allegro con brio.

II. Andante con moto.

III. Allegro: Trio.

IV. Allegro.

WAGNER.

A "FAUST" OVERTURE.

WAGNER.

A SIEGFRIED IDYL.

WAGNER.

PRELUDE to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Oct. 15, 1906
 Adm.
 Beethoven—Symphony No 5, in C minor.
 Wagner—Faust Overture.
 Wagner—Siegfried Idylle.
 Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

There is no question but that the orchestra is continuing in safe hands; that much was established before the end of the performance of the Beethoven symphony. Dr. Muck was greeted cordially by both audience and orchestra, the latter paying him the unusual compliment of rising at his entrance. It was an odd coincidence (and a purely accidental one) that the work which ended last season should have begun the present one, the last work directed here by Mr. Gericke was the first conducted by Dr. Muck.

It would be a thankless task to make comparisons. Given a great work, and two eminent conductors, and there are sure to be noticeable differences of detail and even of result. In even the first four measures there was exhibited a difference of reading. There was no long pause separating the two first figures. "Beethoven wrote the hold over the chord, not over the eighth rest," says Dr. Muck, and the interpretation is an effective one, yet it is a reading that we have not had in Boston for a generation.

It was at once evident that, like Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck is a true musician and not a "poseur." There was no frantic beat no sensational distortion of the composer's meaning to draw attention to the conductor's great powers of discovery, no looking too deeply into the millstone; yet with the minimum of gesture and without any excited action on the part of the conductor, the men were evidently under entire control.

Beyond the point noted above it is impossible to give any new impression in the first movement, yet one may mention that the struggle of the chief and subordinate theme with each other was commendably balanced. The second movement was sung in broad and beautiful style,—a trifle slower than we are accustomed to hear it, but very effective in this tempo. But the glory of the performance was in the Scherzo and Finale. The mysterious character of the chief theme, and the mock heroics that follow it, were finely contrasted, and the contrabasses were not overdriven in the Trio. The bassoon work was more audible than usual and we liked this "nuance." The transition to the Finale was most effectively mysterious, and the last movement was triumphantly powerful.

In short, without searching for any startling devices, without injecting too much "personality" into the reading (the vice of many a modern conductor) Dr. Muck brought out all the poetry of the old work and aroused the audience to much enthusiasm.

Mr. Gericke has given us the acme of Wagner orchestral interpretation, and there were no such revelations in the later part of the programme as could be found in the symphony. Yet the Faust overture was given a most dramatic reading. The Siegfried Idylle was less effective. We begin to doubt the fitness of this work for a large concert hall, although it was interesting to contrast the discontented Wagner of "Faust" with the happy composer of the Idylle.

We have had many great performances of the "Meistersinger" prelude. It would be exaggeration to say that Dr. Muck surpassed them, but he certainly equalled the standard that has been set. Every point of the work told; every one of the sharp contrasts was properly caught up, and a thoroughly enjoyable performance given. If one bears in mind that this was not only the first concert after a long vacation, but the first stage of the acquaintance of Dr. Muck with the great instrument upon which he is to play, the result may be considered as triumphant.

It remains to be seen how conservative the new conductor is going to be. Dr. Muck will soon discover that the average Boston concert-goer is impatient of further education in the early classics and demands more excitement than Mozart and Haydn can furnish. The next programme is to be entirely on the staid and conservative lines. There has not been such a programme given in Boston in 25 years as the one of this week. Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Spohr, two simple symphonies (for even the fugue of the "Jupiter" is no longer intricate to the symphonic auditor) and not one measure of modern puzzles or pepper. We shall watch the result of this innovation with the keenest interest. Dr. Muck says that he does not believe in sudden jumps into dissimilar schools. There will certainly be no such jumps in the next concert.

Louis C. Elson.

TOP PREMIUM, $83, ON SYMPHONY SEAT

Auction of Chairs for Rehearsals Held—Average Is Maintained.

SALE LARGELY ATTENDED BY WOMEN AND AGENTS

Latter Bid Briskly in Behalf of Prominent Boston Society People.

Herald Oct. 2, 1906

From 10 o'clock A. M. until nearly 7 o'clock last evening, with only an intermission of one-half hour for luncheon, the auction of the $18 seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was carried on yesterday in Symphony Hall. Walter Jackson was auctioneer up to lunch time and John Leonard in the afternoon.

From the start the bidding was lively. Several hundred men and women, the later in the majority, attended. The men were principally ticket agents and others delegated to secure seats. The public rehearsals of the orchestra on Friday afternoon are mainly attended by women.

Only the $18 seats for the rehearsals were sold yesterday, which included all those on the floor as far back as row JJ inclusive, the three rows on both sides of the balcony and the first four rows in the centre of the balcony.

The rehearsals will number 24, and will be held on every Friday afternoon beginning Oct. 12 and continuing to May 3, 1907, omitting Nov. 9 and Dec. 7, this year, Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22, and March 22, 1907.

The highest bid made was $83 for seat 19 in row I, while seat 20, in the same row, sold for $75. No premium paid yesterday, however, was as high as last year, when $91 was paid for a single seat; about two dozen seats went at premiums over $80.

Next Highest Was $76.

The next highest premium to the $83 seat was $76, for seats 23 and 24 in row A in the right-hand balcony. Floor seat 20 in row I brought $75.

The names of the bidders would not be given for publication, but at least from 70 to 75 per cent. of the seats were sold to ticket agents employed by prominent society Bostonians.

It was exactly 10 o'clock when Mr. Jackson mounted the stage and faced the large crowd seated on the floor. A large diagram of the floor and balcony stood behind him, and as the seats were auctioned an attendant marked them off on the diagram.

The bidding started with seat No. 1 in row A and continued until all the seats in the row had been sold. This order continued with each row. The first bid was $5 for seat 1 in A, but the apparent readiness of people on the floor to secure front seats moved this price up considerably. It was finally sold to Herrick with three others at a premium of $13.50. Not more than four seats were sold to one bidder, but it seemed as though only the ticket agents went the limit in purchasing.

This is the first year that the price of the seats for public rehearsals has been placed at $18, the former figure being $12.

From the bids yesterday, however, the increase in the upset price did not make any apparent difference, for the average premiums bid were just the same as a year ago.

The first three rows on the floor did not bring the fancy premiums paid for seats farther back from the stage. The highest premium paid for a seat in the first five rows was $46, which was paid for seats 14 and 15 in row E. From this figure the prices ranged to as low as $10 for end seats under the balconies.

Refused the Seats.

A little amusement was afforded the crowd when one woman, after much spirited bidding, was granted two good seats for $12.50 apiece, and then refused to take them, saying that she had made a mistake and wanted the seats on the other side, as she did "not want to be under the piano." Auctioneer Jackson began all over again, and sold the two seats with a third one for $1 more than the previous bid.

From the fourth to the 20th row back from the stage on the floor, centre seats, and especially those nearest the aisles, brought fancy premiums, on an average, $50 to $60. Seats from the end toward the centre in these rows brought from $30 to $40 premiums.

The seats in the last three rows, divided into four sections, went a little lower, the average premium for centre and aisle seats being $45, and for seats nearer and at the end of the rows about $25 to $30 apiece. Seats in the rows up to GG were still a little lower, some in the centre going for $25 and $30, and at the end for $20. From there back to row JJ, the last row of the $18 seats, premiums were placed about $18, $17 and $16 for centre seats and $15 for seats under the balconies.

Balcony Seats.

The sale of balcony seats began about 4:30, and was not finished until very near 7 o'clock. Those on the front row brought high premium, the one of $76 mentioned above being the largest. Some of the premiums paid were $73, $52, $51, $49.50, $47, $41, $36, and from that figure down to about $28. The seats in back rows did not bring as large premiums as a rule, but some of the aisle seats went for $53, $52, $44 and $41, much larger figures than were paid for some of the centre seats on the floor.

There were many lively tilts during the bidding, but every one was good natured, and those who did not secure just the seats they had picked out sat back contented and waited for another chance.

This morning at 10 o'clock the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals, which sold at an upset price of $7.50 last year, will be auctioned off in Symphony Hall, but as the number of seats are not near as large as those sold yesterday, it is expected that all will be sold before afternoon. These will include all those on the floor back of row JJ and in the centre balcony back or row D.

Auctions Thursday and Friday.

The $18 seats for the concerts will be auctioned off on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats for the concerts will be bid on on Friday morning at the same hour.

The concerts will be held on consecutive Saturday evenings from Oct. 13 to May 4, 1907, omitting Nov. 10 and Dec. 8, this year, and Jan. 12, Feb. 2 and 23 and March 23, 1907.

There will be no auction of the 505 seats in the second balcony for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals, as the general public will be afforded an opportunity to buy these seats on the afternoon of the rehearsals for 25 cents apiece, and to avoid the possibility of speculators buying them up in advance, they will be sold only individually as the people pass into the hall.

PAYS $83 FOR SEAT AT SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Eighty-three dollars was the highest bid for a seat for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which were sold at auction yesterday in Symphony Hall. Only the $18 seats were placed on sale, these seats having been listed at $12 in previous years. The $10 seats, formerly $7.50, will be auctioned off today.

The seat which brought $83 was No. 19 in row I. Seat 20 in the same row brought $75. The $18 seats included all as far back as row JJ inclusive, the three rows on each side of the balcony and the four rows in the center of the balcony.

About 75 per cent. of the seats were sold to ticket agents who cater to prominent society folks. Walter Jackson acted as auctioneer.

—Mr Wilhelm Gericke, former leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with his wife and young daughter, has taken up his residence in Vienna permanently, where he is occupying a house on the Mostlergasse, No. 5. Mr and Mrs Gericke have been summering in Switzerland. They visited Mr Gericke's native place, Schwanberg, in the Tyrol.

GOOD PRICES WERE PAID.

Auction Sale of $10 Seats for Symphony Orchestra Friday Afternoon Rehearsals Opened.

Yesterday morning the sale by auction of the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra opened in Symphony hall. These seats sold at an upset price of $7.50 last year, and included all those of the floor back of row JJ and in the center balcony back of row D. The bidding was brisk. There was very little irregularity in the prices paid for premiums, those in the balcony ranging from $19.50 to $23.50 for the best seats, while the lowest bid for the rear seats was $16.50.

Considering the stated price of tickets added to the premiums paid, the average cost of tickets is about $2 for each concert, in many instances a little less.

There were a great many bids of $14 on the $10 seats, which showed a willingness on the part of many people to pay $1 for a seat for each concert. However, the seats sold readily even at premiums higher than last year.

PAYS $26.50 FOR $10 SEATS AT SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

The $10 seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were sold at auction yesterday. The majority of those who attended the sale were women. Only four tickets were sold to any one person. The highest premium paid was $26.50, which seats twenty-five and twenty-six in Row KK and seat nineteen in Row LL brought. There will be twenty-four rehearsals this season, on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 12 and continuing to May 3, omitting Nov. 9 and Dec. 7, 1906, and Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22 and March 22, 1907. The $18 seats for the Saturday night concerts will be sold at auction Thursday morning and the auction of the $10 seats for the Saturday night concerts will be held Friday morning at 10 o'clock.

PREMIUMS RANGED LOWER

At Sale of Symphony Concert Tickets

Good Seats Could Be Had for Much Less Than Prices Paid for Rehearsals

As compared with $83 as the highest premium paid on Monday forenoon at the opening auction sale of seats for the Friday public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, $31.50 was the highest premium paid this morning at Symphony Hall, when the sale of seats for the Saturday evening concerts opened. Today, the higher-priced seats the fixed price of which is $18, from which premiums started, went on sale. These included rows back as far as, and including, JJ, or thirty-six rows in all. Except for the first row, A, which has only twenty-six seats, most of the others have thirty-four or thirty-six seats to the row.

This morning there seemed to be fewer people at the sale than was the case on Monday for the sale of rehearsal tickets. Bidding, however, was brisker and the sale progressed far more rapidly by rows than it did earlier in the week. The top-price premium of $31.50 was paid by Mr. Herrick of Copley square for two centre seats, one an end, in row L. It was in row I, centre, that $83 was paid on Monday. Mr. Herrick was also the buyer of other high-priced seats today, paying for several in occasional pairs or for groups of four, $26.50 premium. The first bid of the day, $2, was made by him, and at $3.50 premium he secured the first pair of seats sold, taking the four next seats in order at $3 premium.

After this the premiums began to run up by half-dollar bids to $7 and $7.50, and in the next row, B, the prices ranged from $4.50 at the start up to $11.50, and back to $3, for the extreme left end of the row. The third row opened with sales at $2 and good seats were sold at that figure and around $3.50, $5.50 and $6, while $19.50 was paid for two middle end seats, while the next adjoining two aisle seats brought only $11.

Then bids began at only a dollar, and many good seats sold in Row D for $2.50, $4 and $5, with $14 as the top price. In following rows excellent seats on the right-hand end of the aisle sold at $3, $3.50 and thereabout, with advance in price as the middle of each row was reached. In several rows, including D, E, F, G, H, I, J, etc., the choicest seats went for from $8 to about $12 premium, making at this latter price, with the fixed price of $18 added, seats stand the buyers at $30 for the twenty-four concerts. Many people are to enjoy the concerts this season at no greater, and in not a few instances lesser, cost for the series.

It was noticeable that when ticket brokers secured seats, they many times made the initial bid on the next sale, and at a figure near the previous purchase. This plan stimulated bidding to some extent. When the middle of row H was reached there were sales at $26 and people then began to sit up and take notice. In the following row, I, there was sharp competition for the pair of seats in the centre, directly behind those previously sold at $26 and finally the seats were sold at that same figure. It was one of these which brought $83 on Monday morning.

In the next few rows half a dollar better, or $26.50, premium was obtained by the auctioneer, Walter Jackson. Following a sale at that price he failed for the moment to get any bid, and invited someone, anybody with courage, to offer $1, and with the laugh that followed came also a bid of $10, with a sale at $12. Once in a while a broker by buying at modest cost a single end seat on the extreme left of the hall would exercise his privilege of securing four and would then take three seats at the same price on the right hand end of the next row.

In Row M, bidding was very lively and rates ranged from $6.50 to $14. The same thing took place in Row N, with prices running from $8 to $17. There were many inveterate Symphony Concert goers who year after year have occupied the same seats, as they were overheard saying, and which this year they could not secure, as the premiums and added cost of the advanced regular price of tickets made the entire cost beyond the figures they have been accustomed to pay in past seasons, prices beyond their purses. These people saw their favorite seats disappear into the hands of others, and then watched furtively for opportunity to secure, if possible, something nearly as good and within their means.

Tomorrow, the auction sale of the lower-priced, or $10 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will take place at the hall. This includes rows on the floor from and including KK to SS, and in the rear of the first balcony back of Row D, and including Row I. It includes also the entire second balcony, which for Friday afternoons is set apart for those having "rush tickets," with privilege of occupying the best seat available after they have rushed up the long flights of stairs, when the doors have been opened.

The new conductor for the Symphony Orchestra not having been forewarned of Mr. H. G. Wells's diagnosis of our staidness due to plethora in culture is proceeding to pack down in our musical consciousness some more very solid classical culture in his opening programmes. A resident musician of Boston who was a fellow student with Dr. Carl Muck at Leipzig, from 1878-9, where they were the devoted pupils of Professor E. F. Wenzel, one of the great appointees of Mendelssohn, tells the Listener that when they last met, it was at one of the "Abend Unterhaltungen," at the Conservatory in the spring of 1879. They played Rubinstein's Fantasia in F minor, for two pianos, before the pupils. Mr. Muck was even then a most able and interesting figure and much loved. It is most gratifying now to his contemporaries to see him embodying both the great musician and the distinguished recipient of rare royal favors. These Friday evenings were instituted by Mendelssohn as a means of accustoming students to the ordeal of public appearances. Mendelssohn's music is now smiled at in a superior way by the crazy-quilt cult of composition and its claue. It is not yet certain, however, whether the new men have as much to say that will live and interest the succeeding generation as he had.

Trans. Dr. Muck's Policy Oct. 3, 1906

Dr. Muck, who landed at New York from Germany yesterday morning, arrived in Boston at ten o'clock last evening. To the assembled reporters he paid the usual compliments to the quality of our Symphony Orchestra and to the reputation of this town for artistic discrimination. He then said in substance, according to all the reports of the occasion: "No, I have no new music; so little of any value or real merit is composed now, and we conductors have to rely upon the old masters for really beautiful and expressive music." Fortunately the conductor also said: "I am absolutely without plans as to the conduct of the orchestra, and none will be made until I have looked through its library and learned what it has played and something as to the public taste. I have come with an entirely open mind." There are many kinds of public taste even in so homogeneous a body, comparatively, as the audiences at the Symphony concerts, but for a quarter of a century every one of the conductors at them, from Mr. Henschel through Mr. Gericke, has put more or less new music on his programmes, and his hearers have shown no signs of rebellion at it. One of the chief glories, indeed, of our concerts has been their hospitality to the music of new men. No audiences in America and few in Europe have been kept better informed musically, and none have shown a warmer interest in new compositions. Strauss is established on our programmes; the less known Russians have their place there; we have cultivated the "new" Frenchmen more than has any musical capital outside France; one after another we have heard Elgar's purely orchestral music; our American composers have not lacked a hearing. So long as Strauss and Mahler, d'Indy and Debussy, Elgar and Loeffler are writing, it will not be easy to persuade a considerable part of our public that "little of any value or real merit is composed now." Certainly some very interesting music is still written. We in Boston have been able to hear much of this, and the best of it more than once, without depriving one "old master" of his just place in our long annual series of concerts. The very catholicity of the programmes and of the policy of our orchestra has made the position of both classics and ultra-modern music with our public the surer. Each has gained in interest by association with the other. The wisdom that has persuaded Dr. Muck to make no plans until he can examine musical conditions here with his own eyes can hardly lead him to exclude new or very modern music from his programmes. To do that would be to lack the "openness of mind" of which he himself was speaking.

DR. CARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, ARRIVES

DR. CARL MUCK AND WIFE ARRIVE IN BOSTON

New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Says He Comes Without Plans—Must Learn First What People Demand.

Journal Oct. 3, 1906
Accompanied by his wife, Dr. Carl Muck of Berlin, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived from New York late last night and immediately drove to the Hotel Empire on Commonwealth avenue, where they will be temporarily located. Both were met in Providence by Mr. Walters of Symphony Hall.

The doctor and his wife were very tired, having landed in New York from Europe about noon, and refused to give any extended interviews. To newspaper men who were on hand, however, at the Back Bay station when the party arrived, through an interpreter, Dr. Muck stated that he came to Boston utterly without any plans and should not form any regarding the musical program to be undertaken by the orchestra the coming year until he had a chance to find out what the orchestra had done and what the taste of the Boston public demanded.

Intellectual Countenance.

Dr. Muck has a highly intellectual stamp of countenance. He is smooth shaven, with dark hair and eyes, and of medium height. His face lights up wonderfully when he talks, and a distinguishing characteristic of the famous German composer and conductor is the manner in which he betrays his affection for his wife. He unconsciously defers to her invariably.

Though Mrs. Muck speaks English, her husband does not, which, he stated, was a matter of regret to him. "It is quite impossible," said Dr. Muck, "to give out any statement what I shall attempt. I have formed nothing in the line of plans. I shall first consult the library of the orchestra, have many conferences with Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, and naturally in many ways will be guided by the advice of the latter."

"Both my wife and myself are extremely glad to be here in Boston, for you know it is the first time either of us has been in this country. Later, when I have looked around a bit, I may be ready to say something more definite."

Dr. Muck and his wife said they had a most enjoyable trip across the Atlantic aboard the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, their traveling companions being Leon Cavallo, the Italian composer, Arturo Vigna, the Italian conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and Yvette Guilbert. On Monday night Dr. Muck took charge of the steamer's orchestra for the usual final concert, and the doctor incidentally paid a compliment to the musical ability of that particular North German Lloyd band.

Mrs. Muck Literary.

Mrs. Muck, who is a woman of much literary reputation in Germany, stated to the reporters that she saw time to see very little of New York as they came through and had not yet seen anything of Boston. She did say, however, that she saw far less difference between Berlin and New York than between Berlin and London. Mrs. Muck is considerably younger than her distinguished husband, being apparently not a day over 30. She has light hair and eyes and in appearance is in every way a direct contrast to the doctor.

Mrs. Muck said she was sure she would be charmed with Boston when she and her husband became acquainted. This will not be long, undoubtedly, as in accordance with plans already made, society women will take her in hand today and make her one of themselves.

DR. MUCK HERE TO CONDUCT ORCHESTRA

Great German Musician Looks with Pleasure to Boston Symphony Concerts.

DUE TO KAISER THAT HE CAME TO AMERICA

Reputation of Local Organization in Europe Is Second to None in World.

Herald Oct. 3, 1906
Herr Dr. Carl Muck, one of the conductors of the Royal Opera at Berlin, who comes to Boston to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York yesterday on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and took the "Merchants Limited" for Boston. Herr Muck, accompanied by his wife, arrived in this city shortly after 10 o'clock last evening. On arriving at the Back Bay station, C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who met him at New York, accompanied him to the Hotel Empire on Commonwealth avenue, where he will reside during his year's sojourn in Boston.

At Providence a Herald reporter boarded the train, and as the new conductor of the orchestra does not converse in English, the interview was held in the German language. Dr. Muck is of striking appearance. His dark, piercing eyes flashed as he spoke of his coming work with America's greatest orchestra, and his nervous temperament and unbounded enthusiasm was very evident as he chatted with the reporter. He is democratic and pleasant in his manner, though his bearing is dignified and somewhat reserved. Dr. Muck had this to say: "It is certainly quite too soon for me to say what my plans are. I know how great the Boston Symphony Orchestra is. Its reputation in Germany and throughout the musical world of Europe is second to none, and I know its possibilities, yet I must first meet the members, look through the orchestra's library, and then decide what kind of a programme I shall select. You must realize that it is quite a different problem to conduct an orchestra from conducting a great chorus, yet I am looking forward with pleasure and much anticipation to the time when I shall lead the Symphony."

"I have had many offers, and good ones, too, to come to America, yet I could never manage to come, and when I first received the kind invitation of the Symphony Orchestra of Boston, it was hard to resist the temptation to say yes. So many tried to prevent me from coming, I had a personal interview with Kaiser Wilhelm, and it was through his influence that I was finally able to sign the contract. The Kaiser was very much in favor of my coming here. It was he who encouraged me to make my decision, and it was through his own personal influence that the barriers which seemed to hinder my acceptance were overcome. He knew all about the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he was delighted that I should have the honor of receiving the invitation to come."

It was apparent that Dr. Muck was highly pleased with the prospects of the coming season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When asked if he had brought any new compositions, he said: "No, I have no new music; so little of any value or real merit is composed now, and we conductors have to rely on the old masters for really beautiful and expressive music. I have not arranged any programme. I must first see, then I will plan."

"I have always been anxious to visit Boston, I understand it is so cultured and its atmosphere is so artistic, I hope I won't be disappointed."

Further, Dr. Muck did not care to discuss his coming work, but mentioned that he had just got through conducting the great musical festival at Bayreuth, where Wagner's "Parsifal" was given. For six years he has been conductor there. From there he went to Goerlitz in Silesia where an annual music festival was held. There he conducted a chorus of 980 men and women and an orchestra of 140 musicians. Singing societies from all over that part of Germany attended. Having finished there he returned to Berlin, where he had a few days to prepare for his advent to new and what promise to be successful fields.

Conducts Ship's Orchestra.

Dr. Muck's trip over on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse was a delightful one. Among his fellow-passengers were a number of celebrities such as Parkina, Leonecavallo, Pagliacci and Yvete Guilbert, who arranged a concert in which Dr. Muck conducted the ship's orchestra to the delight of all the passengers. Dr. Muck said it was a great contrast, conducting an orchestra of 14 musicians after leaving Goerlitz, where he had 140 men to whom to swing his baton.

Through the special permission of the German Emperor, Dr. Muck has been granted a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera at Berlin, beginning Oct. 1. He will make his first appearance in the United States as a conductor in Boston at the first public rehearsal on Oct. 12.

Dr. Muck has had a most successful career, extending over 25 years. Like many other musicians who have won fame, he was at first intended for a professional career, so he studied at the University of Heidelberg for the degree in philosophy. After a year there he transferred his activity to the University of Leipzig, after the manner of German students, but something more than the university attracted him to the Saxon city, for besides his studies he began work also at the Leipzig conservatory, and soon after he got his Ph. D. from Heidelberg he made a public appearance in Leipzig as a pianist in the Gewandhaus. It was a successful appearance, but instead of devoting himself to the piano he turned conductor.

Beginning with minor posts in small municipal opera houses—Zurich, Salzburg and Gratz—he finally won an important position in the opera at Prague, where he was conductor for six years, from 1886 to 1892. One of his engagements at this period was as conductor for Anglo Neumann's travelling opera company, a post in which Anton Seidl was his predecessor. His first appearance in Berlin was at the Lessing theatre as visiting conductor. In 1892 he was engaged as conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin and has been there ever since.

He has frequently appeared as conductor of orchestral concerts in most of the musical capitals of Europe. One of his most important engagements of this sort was in Vienna, where he conducted the famous Vienna Philharmonic Society, after that organization, like its New York namesake, having lost Hans Richter, took up the plan of having visiting conductors appear in rotation.

Dr. Muck is highly esteemed as a conductor not only in Berlin, but in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Paris, London, Madrid and Vienna. He has been praised for the "phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry." He does not seek sensational effects, and although he has marked individuality he does not court the limelight. He is said to be an excellent disciplinarian, and a believer in thorough preparation whether the work be old or new. He enjoys a great reputation as an interpreter of Wagner's music dramas and at Bayreuth, for his reading of "Parsifal," he was hailed as a successor of Levi.

NEW LEADER OF SYMPHONY

Dr Carl Muck Arrives
From Berlin.

Got Year's Leave of Absence from the Emperor.

Brilliant Concert Season Looked For.

Globe — Oct. 3, 1906

Dr Carl Muck, the new leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and his wife, in company with Charles A. Ellis, arrived from New York at 10 o'clock last night at the Back Bay station and were driven to the Empire hotel on Commonwealth av, which will be their permanent quarters.

Dr and Mrs Muck arrived yesterday forenoon in New York on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and were met by Mr Ellis, who engaged Dr Muck last May in Berlin. Emperor William at the time rather reluctantly gave his consent to Dr Muck's taking a year's leave of absence from his post as conductor of the royal opera.

PROF CARL MUCK,
New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr Muck, it is understood, will at once begin rehearsals.

In recent years Dr Muck has conducted symphony concerts in London, Paris, St Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels and Madrid, while last winter he shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

The task of securing Dr Muck as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra was no easy one. When Charles A. Ellis went abroad in early April to secure a successor to Mr Gerlicke he carried with him a list of some 20 men. Very near the top of this list was Dr Muck, and Mr Ellis had not been in Germany very long before he decided that Dr Muck was the man for Boston. But Dr Muck was not particularly anxious to give up one of the two most desirable places on the continent to come to America. It was not with him a question of money. Finally, however, he was persuaded to come for a year, if he could get a leave of absence for that length of time.

Then followed the task of getting the emperor to allow the conductor to leave Germany, even for one winter. But in the end the emperor's consent was secured, although it is a well-known fact that no other orchestra in America than the Boston Symphony could have got Dr Muck.

Although he has never before been in this country, it has not been for lack of opportunities. When Hans Richter broke his contract with Maj Higginson in 1893 he wrote to Dr Muck, urging him to come in his place, saying that he was the only one that he (Richter) would recommend. But Dr Muck, who had just finished his first successful year in Berlin, would not think of it.

Maurice Grau also tried to get Dr Muck to come to New York to be the conductor at the Metropolitan opera house, offering him, it is understood, the largest sum ever offered a conductor. This offer he refused, as well as two others since then.

With Dr Muck and the splendid list of soloists the Symphony concerts this season are expected to be the most brilliant of any yet held.

DR. MUCK IN BOSTON

From — Oct 6, 1906
A GLIMPSE OF THE MAN AT THE OUTSET OF HIS WORK

A Conductor That Seems Unconscious of Himself—The Simplicity, Sincerity and Candor That Make His Charm—The Intellectual Acuteness and the Quick Feeling That Are in Him—A Musician Who Works Rather Than Talks and Sets Small Store by Musical Psychology—His Anticipations of His Audiences Here—Humorous Eagerness for Each New American Thing—The Traits and Incidents That a Little Conversation Disclosed

Across our broadest avenue, in the clearness of an autumn noon, the sun was pouring into the room, and Dr. Muck was sitting in the full warmth and brightness of it. He has his prepossessions in favor of America and of Boston, and he believed that by such a day he could fairly judge our climate and our weather. It was warmer and brighter than autumn usually goes in Berlin, which is a cold and rather cloudy northern city. It was promising for the winter. The meanest of cynics could not have the heart to disillusion him, and only experience, after all, really discovers our New England climate. Dr. Muck has been going often to Vienna, and there, in winter, are days of as many sorts as our Boston days. So, perhaps, he is forearmed. The conductor was working swiftly at his table; a score lay open before him; a pile of "parts"—that the players use in rehearsal and performance—stood beside it; a little farther away were the solace and stimulus of a green box of German cigarettes. Dr. Muck was busy with a task that is characteristic. He was correcting the players' parts from the full score, and inserting missing marks of expression. There is nothing harder to copy accurately than a manuscript of music; with the clearest of copies, the most careful of printers make many errors. Mr. Hertz, at the Metropolitan Opera House, discovered 1100, for example, in the sheets of "Parsifal" that his band was using. Little by little he has corrected them all, and in the same way Dr. Muck was correcting the parts of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl." It is not work that any conductor does eagerly; most of them, indeed, shun it, and take their chances on the accuracy of copyists and printers. But Dr. Muck believes that the composer and the audience deserve the score, to the smallest chromatic inflection, to the minutest mark of expression, as it came from the hand that wrote it. In the library of the Opera at Berlin there are scores that are monuments to his industry and patience, and when he has been conducting, listeners with fine and discriminating ears have heard notes and whole phrases that they never heard before. He loves the middle-voices and the under-voices in an orchestral ensemble. After all, the composer did write his minutest note in his most subordinate parts that it might be heard. Nothing daunted, though at least twenty-four programmes and 125 concerts stretch before him, Dr. Muck has begun the correction of our orchestra's scores. He loves work in the quiet of the small hours, and the student's habit is still in him.

In a moment Dr. Muck had shut the score, pushed the parts backward and the cigarettes forward, and with the action the charm of the man began. The relentless biographical handbooks have done him injustice. They put him far forward in the forties. To see and to hear, he might hardly be at the beginning of them. His is still the alert spare figure of young manhood, unweighted with middle-age. Years of work over the conductor's desk in opera houses and concert halls and over his writing table at home have not bent his thin square shoulders. A youth in the twenties, in the days when our American type did not cultivate a gross and clumsy heaviness, could not move more lightly and surely. Elasticity is still in him. Eyes and features, hands and voice are all "springy." The dark eyes danced or deepened to the word that was on his lips; in the clear tone was the mood behind; the lithe fingers enforced it; the mobile features commented on it. Plainly here was a man of highly receptive, pliant and sensitive temperament, who felt quickly and brought those feelings to quick utterance. Yet he was altogether simple and altogether unaffected, and above the chin that is will and the eyes that are vitality is the forehead of a scholar, that no tan of a mountain holiday and an Atlantic voyage and no boyish shock of dark hair may hide.

It is good for a conductor to be scholarly, for then he will love the score that the composer has written better than his own reading of it. Will is as good; for with it he will hold his men in the discipline that ninety musicians in one body need more than any other ninety men—unless they happen to be painters—in the world. Sensitiveness and pliancy are essential qualities; and the quick power to feel and to impart is the most essential of all. There is an intellectual content and design in music, though the emotionalists are always depreciating it. There is an emotional content that give tones their beauty, and their power, though the pedants are always minimizing it. To summon both and to fuse both, as the composer wrought and felt them, is the real task of the conductor. The secrets of his art may not be written in his physiognomy, run in his manner, or speak in his voice. Yet in all that Dr. Muck says and does there is mingled suggestion of the man of alert intellect and warm feeling. A conductor's musical knowledge goes for granted. Out of the balancing in him of these less tangible qualities of mind, imagination and expression come his individuality and his distinction.

It is the conductor's self, after all, that he is imparting to the band before him and to the audience behind him. He may be doubly loyal to the score that is under his eyes; he may fancy himself altogether impersonal, but it is he that is commanding his orchestra to do and his hearers to understand and to feel. In that power lies the psychological mystery of his art and his work. His men and his listeners respond to him, but how and why? Some conductors, like Weingartner, will speculate by the hour upon these things and write a book besides. Dr. Muck has less taste for baffling psychology and minute introspection. His design is clear before him; he contrives usually to achieve it with his band and with his audience. With that he is content; the means serve; why chase a will-o'-the-wisp and try to fix it on the pin of analysis? He is all for the result, and though he comes with an artist's zest of spirit for the conquest of a new audience, he knows that the process must be gradual. As he explains, he even turns musical psychologist. His audiences in Berlin have known him long; acquaintance has brought understanding and understanding responsive sympathy. There is no finer reward for the conductor than such an established bond between him and his audiences, and here in Boston he must begin at the beginning to weave it. He was eager for the work, but it was an honestly anxious eagerness.

One element in that understanding Dr. Muck as honestly and unaffectedly ignored. In all his talk—and it was sincerity itself—there was not a hint of it. Interest is the mother of understanding, and charm stimulates both. Dr. Muck, by every sign, will be interesting to his audiences and they will feel the charm of the candor and earnestness that are in him. There have been conductors here in Boston that kept all their interesting qualities hid under an exterior that was measured gravity itself. There have been others who heaped idiosyncrasy upon idiosyncrasy until their hearers were cloyed. Dr. Muck's interesting qualities shine transparently through him. He could not conceal them if he would. He would not obtrude them if he could, and in such simplicity and sincerity lie his charm. The work, he will say, is everything, but he forgets that an audience may not separate the work and the worker. As week by week it follows the one, it comes to know and to like the other. Not only as a new conductor, but as a different conductor, with a persuasive individuality of his own, Dr. Muck will interest his audiences.

It is hard for Dr. Muck to speak of music. He has been no wandering virtuoso conductor, glib in six languages to as many interviewers. His work formulates his ideas, methods, convictions, preferences. Through it and by it they may speak clearest for him. Besides, he is spending his first days in a new America and a new city; he is dabbling for the first time in a new language; he is touching a little gingerly new manners, customs, society. A sedulous clipping agency piles his table with every scrap of newspaper on which his name is printed. "Ah! you have them in America, too! They used to tell me in the morning at Berlin that I was to conduct at night." For the first time he catches the distinctive odor of a cigarette of Virginia tobacco. "American tobacco," and his eyes brighten with quick eagerness, "you must let me try one." Someone has sent him a stylographic pen. It promptly sheds its ink, after the manner of its uncertain kind. He springs for blotting paper, and then he is all alert to understand its mechanism. Machinery, it seems, has always interested him. He likes to visit factories. Ought he to take lessons in English, or will he pick up enough in the ordinary intercourse of his new life? Moreover, he knows a little already, and as gayly as a boy he scribbles his first English sentence with the new pen on the back of a chance envelope. His mind and his talk dart back and forth spontaneously, unaffectedly, humorously. A word about the younger Krupp and his despatch of the Philharmonic Orchestra from Vienna to London last summer leaps into inquiry about the American Steel Trust, for Dr. Muck is no man of purely professional interests. He is glad to escape for a time the heavier burden of operatic conducting—

"there are singers, you know, that are never sure of their parts"—but then there is the haunting thought of the new audiences to conquer. A passing motor brushes the anxiety away, and then in the smiling recital of an adventure in a hotel intractably regular in its hours for meals, it quite disappears. A very eminent conductor, it seems, newly come to strange lands and customs, may go supperless to bed—and see the humor of it next day.

And in Germany there are strange tales of our America and our Boston. The returning virtuoso or the reminiscent singer likes to tell them in the café at Berlin or under the trees at Baireuth. It is his plain duty to bring back "experiences" more piquant with flavor than rigid with truth. Usually he tells them to gravely receptive hearers. But to Dr. Muck he has told them to a man with a keen and duly sceptical sense of humor. He smiled at the inherent improbability when he heard them. He smiles now at the actual impossibility when he is seeing the things of America and of Boston face to face. Long before any thought of a year's work here came to him he knew the just note of our orchestra, and from that knowledge he inferred the musical intelligence and the musical discrimination of the public that maintains it. In a week he will meet band and audience face to face, and the anticipation warms him to honest eagerness and his fullest mettle. H. T. P.

The First Symphony Concerts

The first Symphony Concerts for the new season take place next Friday afternoon at 2.30 and next Saturday evening at eight in Symphony Hall, and at them Dr. Muck, the new conductor, makes his first appearances here and in all America. Mr. Gericke ended the final concert of last spring with Beethoven's fifth symphony, and with it Dr. Muck begins the first concert of the new year. Wagner's music makes the rest of the programme, but in no case has he chosen any of the "excerpts" from actual scenes in the music-dramas that are usually misplaced and limping in the concert room. The group comprises the "Faust" overture, which is Wagner in his stormy youth; the "Siegfried Idyl," which is Wagner playful; and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which is Wagner in the fulness of his powers. Needless to say, with Dr. Muck appearing for the first time in Boston, there is no soloist. The test and the honors will be all the conductor's own.

2 SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Seats for sale in Balcony, C 26, 27, right. Price $70 each. Address V.W.A., Boston Transcript. 3t(A) 04

SYMPHONY TICKETS FOR SALE
In all parts of the hall. 40 State Street, Room 47. Telephone Main 4846-5. 4t(A): 02

DR. KARL MUCK, BERLIN OPERA

Court Conductor Who Is Being Discussed as Possible Candidate for Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Succeed Wilhelm Gericke.

MAY 28, 1906.

DR. KARL MUCK. Journal

Celebrated German musician whom Musical Courier says has been selected to lead Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henry L. Higginson denies the statement.

DR. MUCK TO TRY SYMPHONY ONE YEAR

Journal — June 4, 1906

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season will be Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera of Berlin. Whether Dr. Muck will remain as the permanent conductor depends on how Bostonians like his work and how he likes his position.

The information that Dr. Muck had accepted the terms of Henry L. Higginson was contained in a recent cablegram from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who for several weeks has been scouring Europe for the best conductor he could find that was available for the position.

The new conductor will make his first appearance in America at the public rehearsal of the orchestra on Oct. 12.

CIGARETTES CAUSE DR. KARL MUCK'S ILLNESS

Berlin, Sept. 13.—It is reported that Dr. Muck, conductor of the Royal Opera, Berlin, is suffering from an affection of the throat of such a serious nature as is likely to prevent him from fulfilling his engagement to conduct the Symphony concerts in Boston. His malady is attributed to excessive indulgence in cigarettes.

DR. MUCK HIMSELF SAYS HE IS WELL

Cables to C. A. Ellis That He Has Recovered and Will Lead Orchestra Oct. 12.

The persistent story that Dr. Carl Muck, the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is seriously ill in consequence of a surgical operation has been definitely set at rest by the receipt of a cablegram sent by Dr. Muck himself to Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, in which he says that he has fully recovered from an attack of laryngitis.

Dr. Muck stated that there had been nothing in his condition at any time to occasion any doubt of his coming to Boston and assuming his duties as director of the Symphony orchestra.

Dr. Muck will sail for this country Sept. 25, and will arrive in New York the first week of October. He will probably assume his duties on Monday, Oct. 8. His first appearances in public with the orchestra will be on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 12 and 13. He has been spending his holidays at Tobelbod, near Gratz, Austria-Hungary, where the attack of laryngitis occurred.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The interest which has been excited among the patrons of the symphony concerts by the coming of the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, already finds evidence in the unusual number of inquiries that are being made concerning the date of the auction sale of seats. The sale will take place, as usual, in the first week of October, Monday and Tuesday, the first and second being given to the sale of seats for the rehearsals, and Thursday and Friday, the fourth and fifth, to the sale of seats for the concerts. The first rehearsal and concert will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13, respectively. In addition to the potent attraction of a new conductor, who ranks among the few great men of his kind in the world, Mr. Ellis is preparing an extraordinary strong list of solo artists. Chief among them will be Paderewski and Melba, their only appearances in Boston next year; Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch, Petschnikoff and Cesar Thomson. Dr. Muck sails from Bremen on Sept. 25. He has been spending his summer in Bayreuth, where he was one of the conductors of the Mozart festival. Early this month he will conduct a few performances of the opera in Berlin.

DR. KARL MUCK NOT ENGAGED

Denial of Report That Berlin Conductor Had Been Engaged to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra

The report from New York today that Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin had been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra entirely lacks confirmation from Major Henry L. Higginson, who emphatically denied that any conductor had as yet been selected.

Dr. Muck, who has been referred to, undoubtedly is one of several conductors who are under consideration for the conductorship of the local orchestra. He was born at Darmstadt, Oct. 22, 1859, and was a student of philosophy at Leipzig and Heidelberg, receiving the degree of Ph. D. from the latter university. He was conductor at Zurich, Salzburg, in 1881, the following year occupying the same position at Brunn, two years later at Graz, and in 1886 conducting at Prague. Since 1892 he has been conductor of the Royal Opera, in Berlin.

Dr Carl Muck Coming From Berlin.

Will Conduct for One Year, Beginning Oct 1.

Gets Leave of Absence From Emperor William.

Globe June 3, 1906
Henry L. Higginson received a cable dispatch yesterday afternoon from Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, announcing that by special permission of the German emperor, Dr Carl Muck of the royal opera, Berlin, had received a leave of absence of one year from Oct 1, 1906, and would come to Boston to be the conductor of the symphony orchestra. His first appearance in this city will be at the first public rehearsal next season, on Friday afternoon, Oct 12.

DR CARL MUCK

Of the Royal Opera in Berlin, Who Will Conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for One Year.

Mr Ellis has been in Europe since the middle of April, his mission having been to secure a successor to Mr Gerike, who retired from the conductorship of the orchestra at the end of last season. Negotiations with Dr Muck have been in progress for some time, but his engagement was made uncertain by the unwillingness of Emperor William to give him a leave of absence from his important duties in Berlin. This permission was not received from the emperor until yesterday morning, when the contract was closed.

The coming of Dr Muck to Boston will bring to America one of the great conductors of Europe, a man who stands in the same class with Mottl, Nikisch, Richter and Weingartner. Now in the prime of life, his musical career has been one of uninterrupted successes, and in Berlin he is the most popular conductor that city has had in many years.

He was born in Darmstadt Oct 22, 1859. His father was a government clerk and intended him for a mercantile career. After leaving the gymnasium in Darmstadt, he went to Heidelberg for a course of philosophy in 1877. After a year's residence there he went to Leipzig and entered the musical conservatory, studying under Richter and Reinecke. He continued, however, his university studies, which brought him, in due time the degree of doctor of philosophy from Heidelberg.

Determined to be a musician, he made his debut in 1880 as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipzig. His success was one of the features of the season, but instead of pursuing the career of a pianist, he immediately prepared himself to become a conductor. His first post was in Zurich, whence he went to Salzburg and afterward to Graz, all of which posts were in line of promotion. His first important post was the opera in Prague, where he went in 1886 and stayed for six years.

His first appearance in Berlin was in 1891, when he was a "guest" conductor at the Lessing theatre. So deep was the impression he made then that he was offered the post of conductor of the royal opera. His contract with Prague having still a year to run, he was unable to accept this until the following year, when he went to Berlin. He has since been there, his colleagues having been Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner.

In the early 90s Dr Muck was invited to conduct "Parsifal" at Bayreuth, where his success was such that he was called "the real successor of Levi." Levi was the great Wagnerian conductor who had charge of the production of "Parsifal" in 1882. In recent years Dr Muck has conducted at the royal opera at Covent Garden, and as "guest" has conducted symphony concerts in London, Paris, St Petersburg, Moscow, Brussels and Madrid, while last winter he shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the Philharmonic concerts in Vienna.

Dr Muck is described as thoroughly a man of the world, in addition to being a great artist. He has enjoyed for many years the personal friendship of Emperor William, with whom he has been a favorite. He is not a sensationalist in his methods. He is known as an "objective" conductor, and yet in his work there is found a very distinct individuality. He is credited with being a very strict disciplinarian and an advocate of many rehearsals. His musical taste is broad and catholic. A profound admirer of the classics, he is in sympathetic touch with the most modern movements in the art of music.

DR. MUCK RUMORED TO LEAD SYMPHONY

Berlin Court Conductor of Opera Named by Musical Journal.

Herald May 24, 1906

The Musical Currier of New York stated yesterday, according to a dispatch from that city, that Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin will be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. Mr. H. L. Higginson was asked yesterday afternoon whether the report were true or merely one of many rumors. He replied through his secretary that he knew nothing about the matter.

Mr. Charles A. Ellis has now been in Europe for some weeks as the representative of Mr. Higginson. Mr. Ellis has been in several cities, Munich and Vienna among them, and he is now in Berlin. It was said lately on excellent authority that he would not return to Boston till the middle of June. It is commonly understood that there were negotiations with Mr. Nikisch, which were broken off in consequence of his exorbitant demands; that Mr. Mottl was favorably considered; that less famous conductors, Messrs. Schneevolgt and Raabe of the Kaim Orchestra, Munich, and Fiedler of Hamburg were also considered. Other names have been mentioned, and there have been many idle rumors.

From the information given by Mr. Higginson's secretary, it is apparent that if there are at present negotiations between his representative and Dr. Muck, no contract has yet been signed. Dr. Muck is certainly a man who is highly respected in the music world of Europe. He was born at Darmstadt, Oct. 22, 1859. According to Spemann's Lexicon, his father, Dr. J. Muck, was a conductor, and his son's first teacher, but Riemann's Musik Lexicon says that the father was a head clerk of a Bavarian ministerial department. The son studied music with Kissner at Wuerzburg and at the Leipzig Conservatory, but he also attended diligently the university courses at Leipzig and at Heidelberg, or at Zurich, for here again there are contradictory statements.

In 1880 he received the degree Dr. Phil. in Leipzig, and in that year he made his debut at the Gewandhaus as a pianist. Spemann says that he first resolved to be a professional musician when he was at the university in Zurich. He was engaged at the opera house of that city as chorus director, but the conductor suddenly fell sick and Muck was obliged to take his place. He then showed so much ability that he determined to follow the career of an opera conductor, and as such he won fame at Salzburg, Bruenn, Graz, and in 1886 as first conductor at Prague. He had been the conductor of Neumann's travelling company and showed his talent in Berlin before he was called to that city as Court conductor of the opera, a position that he now holds with Richard Strauss. He has also conducted Symphony concerts of the Royal Orchestra in Berlin, and has been successful as a "guest conductor" in St. Petersburg, Madrid, London, Vienna and other cities. He has been praised for "the phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry."

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR NOT YET SELECTED

Journal — May 24, 1906
The report from New York that Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is emphatically denied by Maj. Henry L. Higginson. Mr. Higginson says no conductor has so far been selected.

RUMOR ABOUT DR. MUCK

Nothing Heard by Management of Symphony Orchestra About Reported Illness of New Leader

Trans. — Sept. 6, 1906
The New York Sun of this morning prints the following:
"Karl Muck, the first conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin, who was to come to this country for one season as successor to Wilhelm Gericke at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is ill in Germany as the result of an operation performed two days ago. Mr. Muck was to sail for this country on Sept. 24, and if his illness should be as serious as the latest reports from Germany indicate, this plan will probably be impossible." The Associated Press, in a despatch dated from New York today, repeats almost word for word the Sun's statements.

On the other hand, the management of the Symphony Orchestra here has received no word from Dr. Muck as to any operation or any illness resulting from it. So far as it knows, he will sail for America on Sept. 24, to enter upon his work here, according to the arrangements made last summer. It is natural to suppose that if sickness or any other circumstances had modified them, he would at once notify the orchestra here. At the hour of going to press, no reply has been received to cables of inquiry sent to Berlin.

Dr. Muck in Boston.

The Pall Mall Gazette published this curiously misinforming paragraph: "Boston is forever doing its best to make its reputation for culture, and for the encouragement of art, more and more secure. We all know how well the powers that be have worked in that notable city to advance the cause of art and of real originality in thought. It is, therefore, one thinks, something of a pity that Nikisch cannot be lured back to the city of American culture, and that his refusal has now been definitely published. Nevertheless, the name of Carl Muck, who is the Hof-Kapellmeister at Berlin, is in future to be associated with the Boston Symphony Concerts. Boston has a somewhat eccentric method of doing its business, and Dr. Muck's engagement, so one hears, is at the present moment for one year only. One of the most humorous points, however, is the fact that if he gives satisfaction his engagement will last for 10 years. Of course, we have nothing whatever to do with the sense of dignity as compared to the desire for work which naturally should attach to so great a conductor as Dr. Muck; but we are fain to confess that his attitude is something lacking in dignity. Nevertheless, it is much in favor of Dr. Muck's record that he has conducted at Zurich, Salzburg and Prague. The remaining details as to whether he will or will not go to Boston seem now to be finally settled, and we trust that he will make a great success."

Is not this a delightful instance of the foreigner's condescension that moved Lowell to write his famous essay.

How has Boston shown eccentricity in its method of doing business?

The statement that if Dr. Muck gives satisfaction, "his engagement will last for 10 years" is, indeed, humorous. The humor lies in the misstatement.

And why is it "much in favor" of Dr. Muck's record that he has conducted at Zurich, Salzburg and Prague? Would Mr. Blackburn feel surer of the conductor's ability if he had exercised his skill in Eisleben, Chemnitz, Manchester and Glasgow?

It is reassuring to know that the Pall Mall Gazette at last, though with a cautious "seem," admits the engagement of Dr. Muck in Boston. Not long ago the Pall Mall Gazette discovered that Tchaikowsky had written an opera "Pique Dame"—it was produced over 15 years ago—and that the composed Borodin was a distinguished chemist.

Musical America publishes a rumor from Berlin that should Dr. Muck "prove satisfactory" in Boston, "he will obtain a cancellation of his contract with the Imperial Opera, of course with the sanction of Emperor William." We suppose the reference is to the "Royal" opera.

Dr. Muck has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1906-07, and for that season only. He has signed a contract to conduct after this engagement at the Royal Opera for a term of years. Contracts with royalty are solemn things, as singers who have broken them have found out to their cost.

It may also be remarked that doubtful things are "mighty onartin."

A SOUVENIR OF DR. MUCK'S STUDENT DAYS AT LEIPSIC

DR. KARL MUCK AND MR. JOHN LUND.

The Herald publishes today an interesting picture of Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, from a photograph taken in his student days at the Leipsic Conservatory of Music in 1879, when he was 20 years old. Dr. Muck is seated at the piano. The student standing is Mr. John Lund, who is now the conductor of Fritz Scheff's operetta company. Mr. Lund while at Leipsic composed a piano sonata which was played by Dr. Muck at the gradua-son exercises. The sonata is on the piano rack in the photograph.

Mr. Lund came to the United States with Dr. Damrosch. He went to Buffalo, where he did much for the development of music in that city as conductor of the Buffalo Orchestra Association, of the Orpheus Society, and of festivals of the Musical Association. He has been the conductor of Mme. Scheff's company since she established her operetta company.

New Orchestra Leader Captivates Great Throng at First Concert by Charm of Manner and Ability. Oct. 17. 06

By Kent Perkins.

The King is dead! Long live the King! It seemed in Symphony Hall last night, when the great assemblage of Boston's fashion and music culture showered its plaudits on Dr. Carl Muck, the new king of the Symphony baton, that only a few minutes before the hall was ringing with the farewell tributes to the departing Gerike.

If there were any lingering regrets for the vanished monarch, they were wholly submerged by the flood of welcome that was poured upon the new ruler.

Coming straight from Berlin and Bayreuth, with the glamor of the Kaiser's patronage upon him, Dr. Muck was the centre of chief interest. The music was secondary—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust" overture and "Meistersinger" prelude. That was all familiar. But the personality of the new conductor was something new. That was the thing to think about.

2,500 Question Marks.

As every seat in the hall was occupied, there were something like 2,500 human interrogation points waiting for the Herr Doctor, when the bell rang and the moment of the twenty-sixth Symphony season's opening was at hand. Dr. Muck appeared, walked with quick, springy step across the stage to his stand, took his baton and turned to bow his acknowledgment of the cordial applause that greeted him.

You would never suspect by any outward sign that here was the favorite of the German Emperor, the most famous orchestra conductor of Europe, of the "virtuoso" sort, with whom one associates long, flying hair and fearsome gyrations of arms and head and, sometimes even, of legs.

"A Gentleman and a Scholar."

Of slight, pleasing figure and medium height, Dr. Muck was the embodiment of ease and grace; of artistic attainment; of savoir faire; of restrained, fully-mastered, skilfully directed nervous energy—the very figure of a gentlemanly, scholarly, musician who knew himself and his work thoroughly. There was no humbleness, no assertiveness—just modest consciousness of power.

These were the characteristics of all his efforts last night—superb poise, repose that might be called "aristocratic," vitalizing energy always ready, always well in hand, vividness of imagination, clearness of thought and lively sensitiveness to the intent of the composer.

Dr. Muck led; he did not command. The splendid orchestra rejoiced to follow him with enthusiastic loyalty. His few easy gestures, gently made, were mere suggestions, but were given with an authority that could not be questioned.

Orchestra Responsive

Playing upon the wonderful instrument of the Symphony Orchestra, the leader sought for more vivid contrasts than we have been accustomed to, a gentler touch where softness and pure beauty of tone are called for, a mightier swell of sound where great emphasis is required, and he obtained results with a readiness and a responsiveness that was delightful.

The greater sharpness of contrast and more vitalized life in expression were produced with no suddenness or shock and with entire lack of sensationalism. They seemed to flow from the baton of Dr. Muck in quick, energizing electric waves or to slip from the illuminating gestures of his ever ready left hand straight to the instruments of the players.

At the close of the Symphony the new leader was recalled repeatedly, amid great applause and shouts of "Bravo!" He bowed modestly. The nature of the man was revealed when he waved the plaudits of the people from himself to the standing orchestra. "The credit is theirs," he said without speaking.

And that was one of the main reasons for the feeling that pervaded the throng: "The King is dead! Long live the King!"

INTERMEZZO SINFONICO

"The hall was thronged to overflowing. In its reception and recognition of the new man, the decorous Friday afternoon audience expended what is here considered as enthusiasm." Thus the special correspondent of the New York Times, despatched to Boston for Dr. Muck's first appearance yesterday as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. But it was enthusiasm, and it would be "considered" enthusiasm anywhere—even in New York. Moreover, it was exactly the kind of enthusiasm that actors, singers and conductors usually tell us they like best. It waited results, and then testified to them. It began in a hush of expectancy. Everyone had come early, and everyone seemed to be keeping curiously silent. The door at the right of the stage opened noiselessly and Dr. Muck, seemingly seeing nothing and hearing nothing, was half way across the platform before the audience discovered him. The whole hall seemed to buzz with "There he is!" then rattle with applause; then fall into quick silence. The hush was tense through the symphony, which is the most flattering of enthusiasms, and at the end came applause such as no one but a few petted singers has been able to draw from the calm self-possession of an afternoon audience at the Symphony concerts. Once, twice, thrice it recalled the conductor, and each time it meant what it was trying to say.

In a word half the public of the Symphony concerts has seen Dr. Muck and liked him and heard the band under his conducting and liked him the more. And it is thirteen years since it has had a really new conductor to see and to give it agreeable sensations for the moment and for subsequent talk. Moreover, the new conductor was "different." He seemed so quiet, even so stiff, yet as anyone with a discriminating eye could see, he was tense with nervous energy. He made no show of commanding his men; he seemed simply at work with them. Yet the understanding between him and them was perfect, and he had more of his will and way with them than the domineering conductors often get with their orchestras. He seemed shy with his audience—not indifferent, and its applause only made him the more taut with nervous pleasure. At the start he was likable, and to an audience that is hard to please and to win. Before the concert was half over he had begun the winning. In all probability Dr. Muck will remain with the orchestra only a single musical year. His stay promises to make an exceptional and agreeable interlude in our musical calendar—a sort of intermezzo sinfonico, since all musical terms should be in Italian.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the 26th of the Symphony orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor. The auction sales testified to the fact that interest in the concerts this year is keener than it has ever been before.

There will be no soloist in this first programme which Dr. Muck arranged last spring when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin. He has chosen for his introductory work the C minor Symphony No. 5 of Beethoven, which is generally regarded as a test of the conductor's knowledge of the tradition of the great classics. As Dr. Muck has been so closely identified with the Wagner movement for the last 20 years, it is but natural that Wagner's works should find representation in his first programme; but he has chosen works which are complete in themselves, not excerpts from operas, unless the prelude to "The Mastersingers" is regarded as such. The programme for the first concert is as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5....Beethoven
A Faust Overture.....Wagner
Siegfried Idyll.....Wagner
Prelude to "The Mastersingers" of Nuremberg.....Wagner

Mrs. Karl Muck Is Parisian In Gowning

I met Mrs. Karl Muck yesterday at close range in her handsome apartments in the Empire, overlooking Commonwealth avenue, and found her charming. She is decidedly Parisian in her manner of gowning and most artistic in taste, besides being an excellent conversationalist. One scarcely realizes that a bare fortnight has passed since she arrived here a stranger, so readily does she adapt herself to her new surroundings. They went by auto to Lincoln early Monday as the guest of the Storrows at their country seat, returning late Tuesday, and expressed great delight over the place and its hospitality. Mrs. Muck wore yesterday to the Vendome a black broadcloth with a touch of white satin and a bit of ermine on the bodice and a fetching toque. She will be a great social success here and elsewhere.

DR. MUCK'S LEADING — MASTERLY —

NOTABLE PLATING OF BEETHOVEN'S 5TH

Large Part of Programme
Also Devoted to Wagner Numbers.

The first concert of the 26th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor, made his first appearance at an evening concert in America.

The Herald described yesterday morning the personal bearing of Dr. Muck as a conductor at the public rehearsal of the day before. We have now to do with the character of the programme and the performance.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, C minor.....Beethoven
A "Faust" overture.....Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl.....Wagner
Prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner

A conductor who leads, for the first time in a strange city, an orchestra with which he has little acquaintance, naturally chooses compositions to make, as he fondly thinks, a strong impression. Mr. Nikisch's first programme in 1889 was as follows: Prelude to "The Mastersingers"; Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus"; entr'acte from ballet music of Schubert's "Rosamunde"; Schumann's symphony in D minor. Mr. Paur's first programme in 1893, included Beethoven's fifth symphony, Tchaikowsky's serenade in C major, for strings; Wagner's overture to "Tannhaeuser." Mr. Gericke, entering on his second term in 1898, chose the overture to "Euryanthe"; Bach's prelude, Adagio and Gavotte for strings; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn; and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

It will be seen that three conductors in the history of the orchestra chose Beethoven's fifth symphony for their first appearance. There are house decorators who say to a mistress, sorely perplexed: "You can go wrong with yellow." There are conductors who believe this of the fifth symphony. The immortal work will make its way if the conductor only lets it alone, if he is not afire with the longing to show his own originality.

Dr. Muck did not attempt to be sensational in his interpretation. His treatment of the much discussed initial motive reassured those who were timorous, fearing lest their Beethoven might be Wagnerized. He did not indulge in gross liberties to prove his affection. But his interpretation was conspicuous for clarity, proportion and rhythmic

BY PHILIP HALE.

FAVORITE WAR HORSES
RIDDEN BY NEW LEADER

Strong Tone Gradations Noted Feature of the First Evening Concert.

flow. The purely melodic passages were sung as by an accomplished and emotional singer. When there were such passages for solo instruments the players were allowed their liberty. The dynamic gradations of tone were finely observed and climaxes were skilfully prepared without too deliberate contrivance. The andante which is hurried by some for fear of sentimentalism was nobly sung.

The mysterious pages that connect the scherzo with the finale were effective and the performance of the finale itself was memorable. Too often the interest of the hearer flags after the first triumphal burst, and there is the thought of inability to sustain the musical enthusiasm at the high pitch. Last night the peroration was overwhelming and all that is in the magnificent finale led up to it.

Dr. Muck is reputed to be one of the leading conductors of Wagner's music dramas; he is said to have few rivals. It was natural that he should put on the first programme compositions by Wagner. Although only the prelude to the "Mastersingers" came from the opera house, the "Faust" overture is dramatic in both the earlier and the later operatic spirit of the composer. It is not necessary to speak at length of the familiar pieces. Criticism of the performance of them would be chiefly glowing eulogy. It was not the conductor's fault that the "Siegfried Idyl" seemed intolerably long-winded and too often idle chatter. Garrulity was the besetting sin of Wagner in his music dramas, his literary work, his letters and his conversation.

The performance of the "Faust" overture was the crowning glory of a concert which, with the exception just noted, was of engrossing interest. Never has the middle section seemed more beautiful. Never has the overture seemed so firmly knit and poetically logical. The prelude to the "Mastersingers" was taken at a little faster pace than that to which we have been accustomed, but the breadth and the square-toed dignity were preserved; the lyrical portions were read with peculiar charm; and there was a spirit, a vitality, a gusto that carried everything before it.

The orchestral performance was far superior to that at the public rehearsal. That players who have been scattered during the summer and have had only a few rehearsals with a new conductor whose methods of expression are necessarily unfamiliar should so often give evidences of consummate artistry is a proof of the rare technical proficiency of the organization. In a few weeks the conductor and the men will undoubtedly understand each other perfectly and be in full sympathy.

Dr. Muck was greeted warmly and there was a steady crescendo of spontaneous applause which culminated in genuine enthusiasm.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings (von Bülow's edition); Haydn's symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13); Spohr's violin concerto in D minor, No. 9 (Mr. Willy Hess); Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony.

MUSICAL Globe MATTERS.

First of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Program Splendidly Interpreted Under Dr Muck's Direction.

Recitals and Other Events of the Week.

Dr Carl Muck, on leave given by the German emperor from the Royal opera house in Berlin, last night opened the 26th season of the Boston symphony orchestra, making his first appearance on the conductor's stand in this city. His program—Beethoven's No. 5 symphony, Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," was not one which made for the display of individuality, and except for a sharper attack, a bolder reading, a more explosive enunciation than is often given, especially by the polite traditions of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr Muck's performance was not very markedly different from those of preceding conductors. Two of the Wagner numbers are comparatively unfamiliar; none of the music is heard for the first time here.

Dr Muck's conducting is somewhat peculiar; none of the broad, sweeping strokes of the baton which characterized Mr Gericke; he beats time from his elbow, often poking his baton at the players. He beats with swift strokes, vehement or light, but describing an astonishingly small arc, and illustrated last night what he said in an interview shortly after landing, that he believes a good conductor needs no stick. During the finale of the Beethoven number, when the time and the volume ran along evenly in the score, he stopped beating altogether, and stood for some 20 bars motionless, leaning the tip of his stick on the open score before him. Occasionally the vehemence of his beating caused him to beat with his whole body, rising to his toes and coming down again with his knees bending in his effort.

The C minor symphony he attacked, in the savage grief of its first movement, with heavy tone, and somewhat faster than former leaders have taken it. And all the drama of what Berlioz called "the painting of disordered sentiments which overthrow a great soul" the orchestra thrilled out with awe-inspiring earnestness.

The second movement—andante con moto—was so exactly as Mr Gericke would have had it, that it brought the reflection that after all Dr Muck cannot in the few days since his arrival have done much with the orchestra. Added to that was an apparent modesty in the conductor, who seemed desirous of sinking his personality so far as possible. His smooth-shaven face was serious, immobile; his gestures were few, and only the tense, electric beat of his baton showed any feeling.

And this immobility but made the terrible, sinister music of the scherzo movement the more threatening. And at the last, as the great burst of the finale mounted up in an explosion, the little conductor seemed actually to grow smaller and slighter before the majesty of it.

The "Faust" overture, which Wagner himself said should bear the title, "Faust in Solitude," or "The Solitary Faust; a Tone Poem for Orchestra," made an admirable contrast to the symphony, and was placed exactly right in the program. It is a work about which there has been some dispute, comparatively little interest, and a good deal of misunderstanding. It is "Faust without the woman," as Wagner himself said, though Faust's individuality in the operatic versions of the story shapes itself only when the woman appears.

The overture tells of the world-weary man driven forever by his indwelling demon to engage anew in life's endeavors. The fierce, aching and roaring insistence, deep in the bass, the cry of the rebellious and tortured soul, the fancies that draw the man away toward rest, all in the subtle phrase of Wagner make the overture, though in form, a thing to be remembered apart from all formal works of the name.

The "Siegfried Idyl," which Wagner wrote for a birthday gift to his wife Cosima, is a weaving of recollections of Siegfried and Die Walkure, with all the sensuous spell of the gentler motives of Siegfried developed to quite other phases than in the opera. Not lacking in spirit, it has little of the wrenching, shouting Wagner about it, nor does it disdain, as the prophet of the new music so often did, the return to a tune once played. Even more, it falls away gradually to its sweet end, with no crashing climax to stun at the finale.

The shouting all came in the prelude to "Die Maestersinger," which was superbly played.

The audience, which had for a great part come back from Europe and from its summer haunts, was composed of society people. It has become a tradition in Boston not to miss a first symphony concert of the season. They received the new conductor with marked approbation, but not with the wild, indiscriminating furore that would have been less subtle a compliment, as not seeing how little change in the orchestra he had yet made.

Next week's program contains Haydn's symphony in G minor, No. 13; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony in C; Spohr's concerto for violin, with Prof. Willy Hess for soloist, and Bach's suite for flute and strings.

—Symphony hall has scarcely ever held a larger audience than on Friday afternoon for the first rehearsal of the season, when the new conductor, Dr. Muck, made his first appearance in Boston. He was greeted with the warmest enthusiasm, and at the conclusion of the afternoon the applause indicated that the audience was quite in sympathy with the conductor. The day was glorious and there were many warm greetings of friends as they met in the corridors for the first time after the long separation of the summer, and both Mr. Comee and Mr. Mudgett must have been gratified with this auspicious beginning of the season, as they welcomed so many who seem to be old friends after the meetings of many years. Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, who are still at Manchester-by-the-Sea, occupied their usual seats, and Miss Lena Little and a friend had Mrs. John L. Gardner's seats just in front. Near them were Mr. Grew and his daughter, Mrs. Boylston A. Beal, and a little farther front, Mrs. William H. Ames (Daisy Hodges), who was very pretty in a raspberry red nuns' veiling, with bands of a darker shade and lace at the bodice; the hat was of erin, trimmed with ostrich tips in the red shades. A few others there were Mr. and Mrs. William P. Lyman and Mrs. Lorillard, Mrs. George B. Inches, who came down from Grafton and was with her sister, Mrs. John Denny; Mrs. Gordon Abbott, who was distinguished in rough gray cloth, the revers of the bodice with persian embroidery and a gray toque with red quills; Mrs. John Lawrence in white cloth with narrow lines of black, and black hat with plumes; Mrs. Roger Wolcott, in black crepe de chine and toque with touches of jet; Mrs. Harry Morse, Mrs. Seth Sprague, Mrs. Addis Whitney, Mrs. Forbes Conant, Miss MacNichol, Mrs. George Stoddard in a French gown of black cloth, the front of the coat hand embroidered in colors; Mrs. H. H. Fay, in elephant gray and small hat in the same shade; Miss Juliette Higginson, Mr. Arthur Foote, Miss Iasigl, Miss Dorothy Devens, Dr. William Sturgis Bigelow, Miss Mary Curtis, Mrs. George Mumford in black cloth and hat with green wings, Mrs. Russell Gray, Mrs. Irving Wood in black taffeta, the coat opening over white embroidery, and light blue hat with blue plumes; Mrs. Rantoul and her daughter, Mrs. T. B. Wheelock; Mrs. Eben Draper, Mr. James P. Stearns, Mrs. Benjamin Lombard, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Brackett, Mrs. Nathan Matthews in dark blue veiling and hat with plumes in the same shade, Mrs. S. J. Mixter, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Mudgett, Miss Jennie Moseley, Miss Alison Haughton, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Miss Mollie Johnson and Mr. Frank Jackson. Mrs. Muck, wife of the conductor, was in the center of the hall and was, of course, intensely interested in the success of the concert. Globe

THE MUSIC SEASON OF 1906-07.

The music season of 1906-07 in Boston began yesterday with a gratification of curiosity. Dr. Muck was seen and the orchestra under his direction was heard. It is a pleasure to add that the new conductor made a most favorable impression. Whether he is in sympathy with the ultra-modern movement in music remains to be seen. He has been guarded in his statements to reporters, and has prudently said that before arranging his programmes for the season he must study the characteristics of the orchestra, know thoroughly the extent of the library, and be informed concerning the precise stage of musical development in the city. May he soon realize that the taste of the public is catholic and that the Symphony audience knows no nationality in art.

In Boston the Symphony concerts set the standard and maintain the interest, whereas in New York the opera is the thing. It seems to us that Boston is on the surer foundation. Opera at its best is a fashionable amusement, the plaything of the rich. Here it is a sporadic entertainment, the venture of invading managers. Mr. Conried saw fit to be displeased two seasons ago because, as he thought, the Boston public did not appreciate his production of "Parsifal," and the public is still under the rod of his displeasure. He talks graciously of forgiveness, if he will be assured of a pecuniary guarantee. Whether the Metropolitan company will visit us is a matter that is on the knees of the gods.

But in Boston the opera is not the staff of musical life. The public is not afraid of choral societies and chamber music, and the managers of these entertainments promise much for the season. New works will be produced, and the old and long approved will find sympathetic interpreters.

Last season was fatal to the hopes of managers of virtuosos, with their display of individual skill and seductive or curiosity-inciting personality. Various reasons were assigned for the prevailing apathy. The managers, however, do not seem to be daunted. Already their trumpets proclaim the approach of mirific pianists, surprising violinists, and singing men and women who must be heard by all who profess any liking for music. The virtuosos will soon be upon us, and there will be embarrassment in choice.

The true influence of the season on the steady development of musical taste will come from the concerts of our local societies. Let us rejoice in the fact that for the most part these societies are unsurpassed.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Two best seats for sale for the season; $50 each. Address G.M.C., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): o 12

SYMPHONY TICKETS FOR SALE

In all parts of the hall. 40 State Street, Room 47. Telephone Main 4846-5. 2t(A): o 9

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Evenings only. Aisle seats only. o 10 2t(A): HARDING, 70 Kilby St.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Two aisle seats, D7 and 8, floor, $27 each. Address C.J.L., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS

One good seat for rehearsals for sale at cost; $40. Telephone Brookline 998-6. (A):

MUCK OVATION AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Post

The first concert of the 26th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Symphony Hall. Dr. Karl Muck, the new director, appeared for the first time, and this was the programme, without a soloist:

Symphony No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
A "Faust" overture, Siegfried Idyl and prelude to "Die Maestersinger".....Wagner

Naturally there was great interest in Dr. Muck, the new director, and upon his entrance he was given an immense ovation.

On the stage he appears quiet and unassuming; there is an absence of mannerisms, nothing to excite the "gallery," so to speak. Yet from the first there was something that indicated that here was a virtuoso-musician, not simply a conductor who could impress with freak interpretations or spectacular demonstrations of any sort.

He directed always with authority, surety and ease of manner. The programme included only familiar numbers, yet each of these was interpreted so as to appear practically new. Especially so was the reading of the Beethoven symphony, which, though in the classic spirit, was never old-fashioned or academic; it was strong, virile, modern in every way.

Seldom, if ever, has this familiar symphony impressed so strongly. The Wagner numbers were also given in admirable manner, especially the "Siegfried Idyl," and Dr. Muck received another ovation and recalls at the close of the concert. He has certainly "made good" from the beginning, and one is confident in saying that the coming Symphony season will be one of especial interest. Mr. Hess will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week in the ninth violin concerto by Spohr. There will also be symphonies by Haydn and Mozart, and a suite by Bach—a severely classic programme all through.

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER PLEASES AUDIENCE AT HIS FIRST REHEARSAL

His Dignified Personality Proved the Chief Feature of the Performance, and He Received a Warm Welcome from City's Music Lovers.

Herald Oct. 13, 1906 BY PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Karl Muck made his first appearance in America as a conductor yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall at the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, the 26th of the organization. The review of the concert this evening will be published in The Herald tomorrow. We are not now concerned with programme or orchestral performance. The feature of the public rehearsal was the personality of Dr. Muck.

This is the period of the virtuoso conductor. He is the rival of the prima donna with her dazzling bravura or dramatic intensity of the applauded and fatuous tenor with the eagerly awaited and robust high C. He journeys from city to city in a conqueror's car, and there is hardly a reviewer who dares to remind him that he, too, is mortal. He rides his war horses, Beethoven, Berlioz, Wagner, Strauss, Tschalkowsky to victory. "What does he find in the Eroica symphony?" "How does his reading differ from that of the famous Herr Bullfinger?" "He is the only interpreter of the Fantastic and the Pathetic symphonies." The curiosity is concerning the conductor, not the composer.

The peculiarities, the mannerisms of the conductor when he is in action are noted minutely and passionately discussed. "Did you see that he did not turn the leaves of the score?" "How he glared at the orchestra when he made that tremendous climax!"

Virtuosity of the Rope-Dancer.

Something of the artistry of the rope-dancer enters into the composition of the acclaimed virtuoso conductor. He is never wholly unconscious of the audience. He bears in mind the fact that there are ladies in the gallery as on the floor. Perhaps his charm is in a delicately manieured left hand which he waves languidly in the repression of undue force. Or his face has passion-paleness, the paleness of a Vanderdecken once more allowed to land in search of the faithful bride. He is thus interesting, sympathetic. Or he is leonine and he shakes a formidable mane. Or he is demonstratively spectacular. His gestures are semaphoric; he is all x's and y's. He coaxes the strings; he tootles with the flute; he faces the brass in stormy passages; goads trumpets, horns and trombones to fury, and in the orgasm of sound reels and totters and mops his glowing forehead. From the moment of his raising the baton he courts, anticipates applause.

And there is the conductor who disdains the stick. He thrills his audience by the operations of his hands. With his fingers he plucks a pizzicato from the strings, a cadenza from the oboe, a gurgle from the reluctant, agonized bassoon.

Dr. Muck of a Different Breed.

Dr. Muck is, fortunately for us, not of this virtuoso family. He is a musician-virtuoso. When he came upon the stage he was welcomed warmly. Many on the floor stood up; some to show in an uncertain way their respect for his office and to pay homage to his reputation; some no doubt that they might obtain a clearer view of the man. He acknowledged the tribute modestly, as he did the recalls after the performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and at the end of the concert. He was simple and modest throughout. He was neither anxious to show his pleasure at the reception nor stiff in dignified acceptance.

He nothing common did, or mean, Upon that memorable scene.

A celebrated English general once said: "Give me a man with plenty of nose." A conductor should have a good back. For the time has gone by when a conductor of a symphony concert faced the audience. Bilse of Berlin was probably the last to show thus his face and decorations. There have been memorable backs, and perhaps the most distinguished was that of Theodore Thomas. A back should neither be obsequious nor arrogant. It should not suggest nervousness or rigidity. Dr. Muck has a good back.

No Play-Actor with Baton.

He is not a play-actor with his stick. He does not give a pantomimic display of musical emotions. He is conscious of the fact that he has an orchestra to serve as his medium, nor does he endeavor to play tunes on the baton. His attitude is authoritative, but not military; it is friendly and not that of a task master. His action has a sobriety that is not indifferent or dull. His use of the left hand is discreet and in gesture he is temperate. In a word, he has no mannerisms that might cause remark. He conducts like a thoughtful musician who, after he has shared with the players his convictions and beliefs about the interpretation of a composition, is willing that they should express the composer's thoughts with an occasional reminder, but without annoying interference.

Such interpreters are re-creators. Through them the hearer recognizes the intention of the composer. They do not stand between, hinder, obstruct. The highest praise of a conductor is that the chief thought of the hearer is concerning the music. Only when the concert is over does he realize the all-important part so modestly assumed and maintained by the conductor.

It is a pleasure to welcome this sincere and accomplished artist, who now makes Boston his dwelling-place. His influence in the making toward musical righteousness will be all the more potent because it is not flamboyant; because his personality is not too personal.

The deeply interested audience was quick to appreciate this.

OCTOBER 15, 1906.

MUCK BRINGS OUT NEW BEAUTIES IN SYMPHONY

Produces Effects That Are Broad, Stirring and Poetic, Classic and Yet Modern—Gets What He Wants by Close Range Methods.

That the Symphony Orchestra has drawn a great conductor in Dr. Carl Muck was made evident before the dark, slender, graceful man had led half the way through the Beethoven "Fifth" at the opening concert on Saturday evening; that the audience was quick to recognize the satisfying fact was as clearly proven by its spontaneous and hearty expressions of pleasure at every proper opportunity.

The orchestra, an almost perfect musical instrument, was ready; the leader, an embodiment of well controlled fire, of authority and of keen and accurate knowledge, took command with the ease of a veteran and produced effects that were broad and beautiful, stirring and poetic, classic and yet intensely modern at the same time.

Dr. Muck is not a Delsartean conductor. His beat is unexaggerated, but it is firm, decisive and all-embracing. He gains the effects he wants by close-range methods, often by the merest suggestion. Once, in the Beethoven slow movement, he dropped his right arm entirely and stood as if brooding over the beauty of the music while the orchestra played on for many bars with a rhythmic perfection that seemed all the more fascinating because undirected.

The program, while made up of extremely familiar things, was cleverly constructed. Beethoven and Wagner! Each the greatest the world has yet produced in his especial field. Two golden opportunities for a conductor who has something to say about his composer. Dr. Muck shone in both. His reading of the Fifth Symphony, while in no sense revolutionary, was individual and romantic. He dared to employ "rubato" in the marvelous slow movement, thereby increasing the ethereal charm, and he brought out into the open the strength of the brasses in the jubilant finale. Unless all signs fail, he will not repress that power and sonority that the band has within it and may well express without at all injuring the tonal splendor for which it is famous.

As an interpreter of Wagner music, the new conductor has won his greatest renown, and results proved that his reputation is well founded. He made the "Faust" overture a thing of unusual clarity and tenderness, so that in all respects the performance was the finest within memory. Only a little less successful was the "Siegfried Idyll," while the pomp and circumstance of the "Meistersinger" prelude came as an inspiring close to an evening of exceptional interest.

After the concert a reception was given Dr. Muck by H. G. Tucker in the Napoleon room of the Tuileries, where a large company of Boston's musically elect met and congratulated the new leader.

HUNDREDS UNABLE TO GET IN

Great Throng Welcomed Dr. Muck at First Symphony Rehearsal

Trans. Oct. 12, 1906

A throng of people, about evenly divided as to sexes, gathered in front of Symphony Hall today for the opening of the doors for the first public rehearsal in the series of twenty-four by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As early as before half-past nine o'clock the long line had its beginning in the arrival of three ladies who patiently took up a position on the top step of the Huntington avenue front of the hall, where they remained throughout the forenoon hours, or until the opening of doors at 1.30 o'clock.

Their early arrival was followed soon by that of others, so that, when the doors finally were thrown open for the long single line to file in, one by one, there must have been fully 800 or 900 people who had hope of being admitted. The line doubled on itself again and again the entire length of the Symphony Hall steps and then stretched way up Huntington avenue far past the Children's Hospital.

Only 505 people can be admitted on this rush at the Friday public rehearsals, to occupy seats in the second balcony. That is the limit of seats, and nobody is permitted to stand at the concerts. At the entrance of the hall an official stands and receives the quarter of a dollar, which everyone is expected to have ready, instead of buying tickets. As each hands in his or her quarter, the little automatic register which the man at the door has in hand is clicked again and again up to number 505, and then all further entrance is stopped. No more can enjoy the privilege of admission, and the other hundreds of patient people who waited today had to turn away reluctantly. While there always is keen disappointment in being turned away, people have learned to take the matter philosophically, for all well know the rules adopted for this rush to the second balcony, where people take whatever seat they may find available.

In other seasons the time of admission of the "silver-quarter patrons" has been one o'clock, and that for admission of regular season ticket holders two o'clock. This year, the twenty-sixth season in the history of these rehearsals and concerts, the time has been made 1.30 and 2 o'clock, respectively.

Interest centred today especially in the first public appearance of the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, since there was no soloist on the programme. The numbers which the conductor chose for his first programme were as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Op. 67.

1. Allegro con brio.
2. Andante con moto.
3. Allegro: Trio.
4. Allegro.

Wagner: A "Faust" Overture.

Wagner: A Siegfried Idyl.

Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

In the lower part of the house many well-known faces were seen this afternoon of people who year after year have attended these rehearsals on Fridays and who seemingly will allow nothing to prevent their being present. Most of these, it may be recalled, paid at the recent auction sales far higher prices for their coveted seats this season than they have in other years. Through the courtesy of friends in this city Yvette Guilbert and Albert Chevalier, who have come to Boston to give a joint recital in Symphony Hall this evening, were invited to hear this first public rehearsal of the orchestra this afternoon.

Dr. Karl Muck may not have been flattered by applause so indiscriminating as to make his initial bow the signal for an ovation, but the heartier salvos at the close of his first number, he must have seen, were face value.

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS

Trans. — Oct 13 '06

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE NEW SEASON

Beethoven and Wagner Make the Programme—The New Conductor's Quiet Authority—Evident Feeling for Beautiful and Proportioned Tone and for Nice Adjustment of Details—Lucidity and Incisiveness—The Music of the Afternoon as It Disclosed the New Leader—A Possible Limitation

Yesterday afternoon Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance in Boston and in America at the opening concert of its twenty-sixth year. There had been no changes in the personnel of the band, and each man sat in his familiar place. The only details, indeed, in which there had been the smallest alteration, was a new form of titlepage in the programme book and a new arrangement of the list of the orchestra in it. Naturally there was no soloist, and the programme, which required exactly an hour and a half for performance, ran:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C-minor.

Wagner: A "Faust" overture.

Wagner: "A Siegfried Idyl."

Wagner: Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Dr. Muck slipped across the stage so quickly and quietly that the audience hardly detected his presence until Mr. Hess waved the orchestra to its feet. The buzz of discovery subsided in a little burst of welcoming applause; the new conductor bowed tautly and nervously to his men and to his audience, and for the first time the three were face to face. Neither photograph nor description had belied him. For the moment the face seemed unusually white and set, but mental acumen, nervous energy, resolution, entire self-control and concentration seemed to meet in it. There was similar nervous energy in his alert bearing and supple movements, but subject, again, to the same full self-mastery. A man could hardly seem more unaffectedly and quietly absorbed in his work and in the pleasure of it.

The beat and the whole manner of conducting were as characteristic. Since Theodore Thomas's time no familiar conductor has stood so still. Dr. Muck plunged at no group of players, beckoned none to their entrances, embraced none in sweeping gesture. Like Thomas, he reserves such muscular labors for rehearsals. His body does not even rise with a crescendo, or go taut with a climax. His score stands before him, his stick is in his hand, in the old fashion; and the beat is unfailingly clear and unfalteringly precise. Hand and stick seem to move little, but there is a curious, quivering nervous energy in their rise and fall. Now and then both arms, half extended, move to the rhythm or sharpen the accent. Rarely the lifted left hand modulates the volume of tone. Once at least, with both arms at ease, Dr. Muck left the band to go its own way. There are no vehemence or obvious emotional appeal or suggestion in any movement. At the rehearsals the conductor has disclosed and imposed his design, will and feeling. At the concert he seems to seek only the clear and exact fulfilment and expression of them. His conducting is lucid precision itself, but precision that is tense with nervous energy.

The range of the tone that Dr. Muck draws from the orchestra seems fuller than was Mr. Gericke's. In Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," for example, he sought and gained subtle graduations and very fine delicacies of beautiful sound; but at moments in the symphony and in the prelude to "The Mastersingers" he was equally capable of large and robust sonorities. His ear for quality of tone seems sensitive and his feeling for it warm. Naturally the men were on their mettle yesterday, and we that listened came fresh to old delights, but seldom have the voices of the orchestra had a more flowing and pliant, a richer and more persuasive loveliness. As fine and warm is Dr. Muck's sense of adroit and beautiful blending and proportioning of tone. He melts his instrumental voices into each other as he twines them in long and curving lines. He seems to seek the steady and delicate undulation of tone that such voices as Melba's sometimes have. Yet as the "Faust" overture showed, he can summon the poignant phrase and the burning accent. He loves too the cunning adjustment and disclosure, so to say, of each thread in the tonal web, and there were details in the interplay of the instruments in the symphony that seemed to leap freshly into life or to come strangely clear to many ears. Dr. Muck's sense of musical design is keen and searching. Everywhere he was entirely lucid. Details fell duly into their place among larger outlines until the whole musical structure rose and took shape before the ear and the imagination. Finely as Dr. Muck drew the threads of "A Siegfried Idyl," he kept the whole web clear and unbroken. Large as was his notion of Beethoven's symphony, no figure, no arabesque in it seemed to elude him. Nothing was blurred or slighted and nothing forced or exaggerated. He showed the faculty that analyzes and also reconstructs. Lucidity and symmetry, precision and plasticity went hand in hand. The sense of musical form and design seem to match the sense of tonal beauty and adjustment. Responsiveness to rhythm animated both and kept both from hardening. Never does Dr. Muck dull or slacken the due pace. He loves the quick, incisive contrast.

Into this design and with these means Dr. Muck in the symphony poured much of the passion, power and beauty of Beethoven. His devotion to the composer's purpose—and to nothing else—was whole-souled. From the start he summoned and kept a largeness of manner, a loftiness of utterance that were of the grand style. Where Beethoven rages he made the music rage. When it grumbles in the scherzo, he made it grumble. The haunting reiterated song of the andante he kept in beautiful and manly simplicity. Familiar indeed is the transition from the scherzo to the finale. Yet Dr. Muck rekindled in some of his hearers the fine suspense of it. Deep and broad went the triumphant chant of the final movement. Nowhere was there the smallest exaggeration or the slightest trace of the conductor who must make each contrast a little more poignant, each melody of a deeper and more flowing beauty than ever conductor made it before. Reading, tempi, general design and incidental detail were normal and impersonal. But back of them seemed to be a singular fulness of understanding and an entire devotion to the music for its own sake. From that understanding the ear and the imagination seemed to hear the symphony as the eye and the fancy see a landscape in the clear sunshine and animating air of autumn. And from the intensity of that devotion came passion, power and beauty. They expressed themselves in the grand style, and they kept its noble reticence. The symphony lived its life again, and we that listened entered into it, understood it, and felt it.

The same fulness of understanding and community of feeling seemed to serve Dr. Muck in Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl." It is no fragment of music-drama in spite of its name and its melodic material. It is a little lyric, in which Wagner, happy for once, makes play in tones with intimate moods and fancies. It is delicate musical tracery, all glint and curve, with grace in every undulation. So Dr. Muck played it without the smallest effort to inflate it, with entire absorption in its tonal loveliness, gentle rhapsody, and tender reverie. He gave to the listener the musing quiet of its beauty. On the other hand, there is no room for reticence and no hint of quiet in the prelude to "The Mastersingers." The tonal and formal pomp of it stirs; the ardor of it whips; the brilliancy of it mounts almost to explosion. It should sound like a long, glowing, irresistible improvisation. All the appropriate virtues that Dr. Muck had disclosed in the course of the afternoon were in his playing of it, but with all his pace, he hardly gave it the due abandon. The conductor might well have vanished in the music: instead he kept it well in hand. So again, with the Byronic vein of much of the "Faust" overture. The music is thick with gloom, sardonic, almost, with struggle. It was the way of the hour, and it was the particular way of Wagner in the forties, "to pile on the agony," even when he was sticking close to an orthodox form. There is no other way nowadays; since we are a long way from Byronic gloom, "the agony" may even be wisely piled a little higher. Dr. Muck, except for one or two flashing phrases, preferred to read the music temperately, and temperance is much too sane a virtue for it. In a word the sheer romantic ardor of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" and the sheer romantic gloom of the "Faust" overture seemed to leave him, and therefore his audience, a little cold. It recalled him three times and with very hearty applause after the symphony. Its breathless silence through the "Siegfried Idyl" was the finest of responses. Its answer to the two overtures was no more than the applause of courtesy.

TIGHT BINDING

H. T. P.

Dr. Muck's Second Appearance

At the Symphony concert of Saturday Dr. Muck renewed and strengthened the excellent impression that he had made on Friday afternoon. The conductor, the orchestra and the audience all seemed more at their ease. In particular Dr. Muck measured better the baffling and trying acoustics of Symphony Hall. Especially in Wagner's "Faust" overture and in the prelude to "The Mastersingers," he gained a sonority, incisiveness and vitality of tone that were lacking on Friday, and that gave the overture a sharper poignancy and a more sombre cast, and the prelude a larger eloquence and a warmer brilliancy. A certain diffidence with which the men played on Friday afternoon, as though hesitating a little over the novel freedom the new conductor was allowing them, had also vanished, and throughout the band was surety and elasticity themselves. To the audience also, since the musical part of the town had talked of little else than Dr. Muck since Friday, he did not come quite strange. It was ready with welcoming applause. It listened with unrelaxing and clearly responsive interest, and it was very hearty in its approval at the close of the symphony, and at the end of the concert.

Admirable, again, were Dr. Muck's feeling for tone that is beautiful in texture, undulating in motion and adroitly proportioned in mass and detail; and for the quality of pure orchestral song in Beethoven's andante or in the lyrical passages of the two overtures by Wagner. His sense of musical design seemed as lucid and large, especially in its grasp of each composition as an organic whole. In the symphony, for example, not only did the music rise steadily to the searching transition to the final movement, but it mounted thereafter to the very last chords. He was as skillful, too, in the adjustment of all the changing moods of the prelude to "The Mastersingers" into the glowing mass of the whole, and it glowed more brightly than it did on Friday, even if the final touch of splendid improvisation was lacking. Clearer, too, was his acute sense of the tonal contrasts that point the composer's thought and set sparks to the listener's imagination as in the restless transitions of the "Faust" overture or the shimmering tracery of "A Siegfried Idyll." And in his stiff, sharp beat lurks, after all, the nervous quiver that makes climaxes elastic, undulating and alive. They marched on Saturday they rose, and they did not dally for "effect."

H. T. P.

There is one distinction of the Symphony Concerts that bids fair to continue under Dr. Muck in even higher degree. Probably our orchestra gives shorter concerts than does any similar band the world over. Mr. Colonne's and Mr. Chevillard's in Paris cheerfully make theirs three hours long, and their audiences listen as cheerfully. Mr. Wood, in London, seems to feel that he would be unjust to his hearers if he did not keep them at least two hours and a half. Concerts in Germany are often lengthy beyond endurance, and in New York, the Philharmonic Society and Mr. Damrosch's orchestra are seldom content with less than two hours and a quarter. By every sign the programmes of the Chicago Orchestra are as long. Yet Mr. Gericke very rarely let a concert run more than an hour and three-quarters, and sometimes an hour and a half sufficed him. Last week Dr. Muck's programme, intermission and all, filled no more time. The list for today and tomorrow is not much longer, and that for next week seems still shorter. Never have our conductors tried to hold too long the concentration, receptivity and imagination of their audiences. They have been discerning enough to see that these faculties will not remain in active play for more than an hour and a half, and wise enough to wish their hearers to come to the last number without fatigue or restlessness, and then to depart full, but not gorged. The understanding of music and the emotional response to it must come on the instant, and therefore the hearing of it makes the most exhaustive listening in the world. There is no turning backward as there is with the pages of a book; no second glance as there is with pictures and sculptures; and no veiled summaries and explanations as there often are in plays. If the psychologists and the pedagogues only knew it, there is no better training in mental and emotional concentration than the understanding and responsive listening to music.

REHEARSALS

FOR SALE—Seat 5, Row D Price $44.00
Apply to Main 3547-2, or Room 731, 59 Congress St (A)

2 SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Seats for sale in Balcony, C 26, 27, right
Price $70 each. Address V.W.A., Boston Transcript. 3t(A) o 4

NEW LEADER MAKES A MODEST DEBUT Muck Pleases a Large Symphony Rehearsal Audience.

DR. KARL MUCK.

Globe Oct. 13, 1906.
"He's a 'snapper'!" said a hearer of Dr Karl Muck yesterday at the conclusion of the Beethoven number. Perhaps that was the best characterization that could be made of the new leader of the Symphony orchestra, be it spoken in admiration and not in any derogatory sense.

Boston received him with a little conservatism. He was welcomed on his appearance with enthusiastic and generous applause, and after the first number, the symphony, he was recalled again and again, but following the Wagner numbers there was comparatively little furor. At the close of the concert the players sat decorously in their seats, but one recall was all the rapidly departing audience vouchsafed.

The conductor is a slight man, grave of demeanor, and with almost no play of expression in his face. He is smooth-shaven, and wears eyeglasses with a dangling cord which gets in the way. He seemed of steel, electrified, but gave the physically slight man's sign of stooping his knees for any extra effort.

"He has the beat!" said a musician, delightedly. And indeed, Dr Muck's manner of leading was unusual. His baton describes no sweeping circles; he moves his arm only from his elbow, for the most part, and in flashes of movement. He held his baton as it might be in the bill of a huge bird, so oddly did his fingers close round it; and much of the time he poked his whole hand forward, "beating time end on," as a bird might peck at the orchestra. During passages where the time was established, and the score called for no changes of tempo or of weight of sound, he stopped beating time altogether, and remained still, his stick resting against the open score.

"Halfway between Nikisch and Gericke" was another musician's comment. This is not close to the mark, for Dr Muck, though he has characteristics of both conductors, has an individuality quite outside of either. His reading of the Beethoven symphony—No. 5—was not sensationally different from that of other conductors; his handling of three Wagner numbers was appreciative and comprehensive, but in no single place did one hear the expression of a personality.

Dr Muck has comparatively little forehead and a good deal of chin; what this may signify let the physiognomists tell; to the mere observer he seems a scholarly man, an aristocrat to the bone, and above all a man who will not so much insist on his personality as on the work of his band and a great faithfulness to the composers whose works he gives. Considerable comment was made yesterday afternoon on the program he selected for his debut; the Fifth symphony, and Wagner's "Faust" overture, "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Maestersinger"—here was no effort to startle, to interest by the weight of something new. It was modest, yet calculated to make comparisons with former conductors inevitable.

Musical people crowded the house. A great curiosity was manifest to see and hear Dr Muck, and many people were in the hall who go more to Saturday night performances than to the rehearsals. Maj Higginson, on whom has rested considerable anxiety about the new conductor, naturally enough, sat in his place.

Dr Muck will make his social debut tonight, at a reception to be given for him after the symphony concert, at hotel Tuilleries. The host is Hiram G. Tucker, and the guests will include most of Boston's musical people.

The great question at present is, of course, "What will his policy as leader be?" And Dr Muck's answer would probably be just now, "What do the people here wish?" His first program was noncommittal; next week's, including symphonies of Haydn and Mozart, a Bach suite and a Spohr concerto, has nothing indicative about it, unless it is to be taken to mean that the symphony season is to represent what westerners believe it does mean in Boston, a sort of sacrifice to the ancients.

Dr Muck—on the word of one who has talked with him—does not come to show Boston what it has been missing, either in new music or in the handling of well-known pieces. He does not come to show Boston how Dr Muck conducts. Within the courteous limits, he wishes to give Boston what Boston wants to hear, and beyond that, he is simply one of the best-trained, most scholarly expositors of music, a skilful player on the many voices of the orchestra. The players who rose to receive him on his entrance, and beat their fiddle backs in greeting, are already enthusiastic over him, and perhaps that is the best tribute he received yesterday.

A correspondent sends us a 'justly indignant letter about the one incident that marred Dr. Muck's first appearances here—the conspicuous departure of a fraction of the audience on Friday afternoon before the final number of a very short programme. Doubtless the offence was partly habit and partly carelessness, but it is a custom and an indifference that are increasing on Friday afternoons and that, to a stranger to local ways, as Dr. Muck still is, was singularly discourteous and disconcerting. Our correspondent writes to the point:

"After the Siegfried music on Friday I should say that between fifty and seventy-five persons, if not more, from the front half of the hall alone got up and went out, and this at ten minutes before four. Considering that it was Mr. Muck's first appearance, it was a singularly discourteous thing to do, and must have struck him like a slap in the face. Boston's alleged musical culture is pretty laughable poppycock, and I often wonder what percentage of the Friday crowd really knows much about or cares really for music. To have cut out one moment of yesterday's concert was inconceivable, but first of all it was a mighty rude way to treat a newcomer, and all should have made a point of staying until the end, whether or not it was a case of having the proverbial 'pearls cast before' them or not." Trans. — Oct. 17, 06

DR. CARL MUCK

Adv. — Oct. 12, 06
THE NEW CONDUCTOR

OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Thorough Conservative in Music

—Not in Favor of Long Programmes—A Man of Versatile Culture.

In very pleasant apartments in "The Empire," on Commonwealth ave., the old musical reviewer met the new musical conductor. The pair did not glare at each other with the antipathy that sometimes exists between the critic and the criticised, between reviewer and reviewee, but entered into friendly converse and exchanged many ideas.

Those expressed by Dr. Carl Muck may interest many who are to hear him the coming season. His sharply outlined face and thin body gave a first impression of asceticism, which, however, vanished completely when he smiled or laughed, which he often did.

Dr. Muck is not as yet well acquainted with the American repertoire of compositions, even John K. Paine being but a name to him. He knew of the compositions of his friend and classmate (in Leipzig), Geo. W. Chadwick; he had heard some of the works of Van der Stucken; Arthur Bird and the American resident musicians in Berlin were of course familiar to him. But of the larger number of American composers he was, as yet, ignorant. He expressed a desire to know more of them and of their work, and we do not believe that the native composer will be neglected by the new conductor.

That Dr. Muck is a musical conservative cannot for an instant be doubted. Emil Paur recently sent his opinion to the present writer to the effect that Max Reger is a genius who is working from darkness into light; Dr. Muck, however, confessed that he could find no coherency or artistic sanity in many of his works. He appreciated Strauss' genius to the full, yet held that in "Heldenleben" and later works the radical had gone too far. Yet he is to attempt even some of these in his programmes, if at all possible. As regards the "Sinfonia Domestica" the statement in one of our contemporaries, that we are to have it "at last," is not quite correct. The fact that our orchestra is not in the Musicians' Union, and that therefore we cannot get the extra instruments and players to fill the exorbitant score, militates as strongly against Dr. Muck as it did against Mr. Gericke. The latter more than once expressed his regret to the present writer that it was impossible to bring this work to performance under present conditions, and Dr. Muck confessed that if the extra parts were to be filled it would probably be in an inferior manner, under the circumstances.

It was quite natural to find Dr. Muck remarking that much of the modern French music "is rather from the head than from the heart," and it was also typical of the breadth of the man that he is to produce it, "tout de meme," in order that it may be studied. He felt that all the fine arts are going through a transition period just now, and spoke of the throes and agonies of recent Painting and Drama and Fiction. In Literature he believed that Germany had passed the danger point, and that the wild struggles of the mystics "to find the fourth dimension" were almost done. And this led him to speak of the love of Shakespeare in Germany, and he stated that the poet is more often presented on the stage in the Fatherland than in any other country on earth.

A man of versatile culture is Dr. Muck, and the literary trend of part of the conversation led the reviewer to ask why the English language had not been added to his accomplishments.

He then told of his strenuous study in the gymnasium, of his father's love for scientific study and of his own exertions in mathematics, Greek, Latin, and an extra course in French. "You can imagine that not many quarter-hours were left over for English or any other study," said he.

Had he composed any works? No; he had studied composition and had perpetrated a few things which were profound secrets between himself and his writing table, but he had never published or sought performance for these works.

In speaking of the different national schools Dr. Muck expressed a belief in Russia. "There is something sturdy and healthy there in spite of all the bizarre effects," said he, "and the music of the people makes a thorough foundation."

Of Mahler he but echoed the views often expressed in these columns, that his later works are programme-music with the "programme" (or plot) omitted. He says that their formless style, their bold contrasts, their graphic effects are all contrary to the ideal of abstract or pure music.

Speaking of his own programmes Dr. Muck said that he did not believe in much length—for which the critics will call down blessings upon his head. In Berlin they sometimes begin a concert early in the evening and continue until nearly midnight. For himself, he thought that an hour and a half, at most an hour and three quarters, was about as much as an auditor ought to be called upon to digest.

Altogether the impression gleaned from this new musical luminary in our firmament is that he is a conservative who is not narrow or prejudiced. He prefers the old masters, but he believes in an honest study of the new. He comes to us with his mind open and is ready to be guided by circumstances. He is of course delighted with his orchestra, and it may also be stated that the musicians are delighted with him. His permission to give his views in print and the interest which the public must feel in the successor of Wilhelm Gericke is sufficient cause for a recital of an informal interview. Louis C. Elson.

DR. MUCK ANNOUNCES FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Beethoven and Wagner Are Represented, the Latter Largely Predominating, in Selections for the Opening Concert on Friday Next.

Journal Oct. 6, 1906
With Dr. Muck here and settled, with the auction sales finished, the way is now clear for the Symphony season of 1906-1907, the twenty-sixth of the Symphony Orchestra. The first public rehearsal and the first concert will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, respectively, and Boston for the first time will have the opportunity to know the new conductor. The auction sales testified to the fact that interest in the concerts this year is keener than it has ever been before, and this naturally is due largely to the curiosity which the coming of Dr. Muck has excited.

Because interest centers in Dr. Muck there will be no soloist in this first program, which Dr. Muck arranged last spring, when Mr. Ellis was in Berlin. He has chosen for his introductory work the C minor Symphony No. 6 of Beethoven, which is generally regarded as a final test of the conductor's knowledge of the traditions of the great classics. As Dr. Muck has been so closely identified with the Wagner movement for the last twenty years, it is but natural that Wagner's works should find representation in his first program; but he has chosen works which are complete in themselves, not excerpts from operas unless the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" is regarded as such. The program for the first concert is as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony in C minor No. 5.
Wagner—A Faust Overture.
Wagner—Siegfried Idyll.
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Dr. Muck Magnet At Symphony Hall

Conducts First Rehearsal Amid Great Enthusiasm—Many Smart People Present.

Journal Oct. 13, 06
Carl Muck was the magnet yesterday to draw a mammoth audience to Symphony Hall and not a seat was to be had at any price. Small wonder Messrs. Comee and Mudgett wore such expansive smiles as they were cordially greeted on all sides by regular patrons with whose faces they have become mutually familiar.

For some hours before the opening the front steps were filled with femininity representing the "rush seat" occupants and lines extended along the avenue. Hundreds were turned away and the same condition will prevail tonight.

Magnetic Conductor.

Not only was the program well chosen—Beethoven and Wagner, but the inspiration of a new and somewhat magnetic (also good-looking) conductor caused the audience to be on hand for the symphony—very few being shut out.

Among the early arrivals was Mrs. Carl Muck, accompanied by Mrs. George W. Chadwick, whom she met abroad during the negotiations with the orchestra management. Mr. Chadwick was on hand also, so were Arthur Foote, Louis Elson and all the critics.

Especially pointed out to me was James Aldrich, the eminent New York critic, who married the other day Margaret Livingstone Chanler. He was a guest of Mr. Comee and displayed much enthusiasm over the setting which Boston gives her orchestra.

Mrs. Gardner Not Present.

Mrs. John L. Gardner was not there, but her seats were occupied by Miss Lena Little, now chatelaine pro tem. of Fenway Court, and Miss Clara Munger.

Noted in the throng were Mrs. Roger Wolcott, in light mourning, relieved by a string of pearls; Mrs. Harold Peabody (Marion Lawrence), Miss Juliet Higginson, the Misses Rosamond and Ethel Gibson.

Mrs. George Stoddard, Stanley McCormick, Mrs. Irvine Wood, Mrs. Edmund Brainerd Cowles, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Miss Mary Johnson, Mrs. Benjamin Pitman, Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce and mother, Mrs. J. Reed Whipple, Mrs. Samuel Mixter and Mr. Dana Estes.

Others Present.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Edward Treble, with Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Miss Stackpole, Mrs. George Francis, Mrs. Henry F. Miller and daughter, Mrs. L. Stevens Bingham, Mr. Robert Jordan, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Mrs. Macomber, Mrs. Eben Sumner Draper, Mrs. William Humphrey and Mrs. John R. Alley (Miriam Stedman), Miss Anna Barron, Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, Mme. Rotoli, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, and hundreds more, of whom space forbids mention.

Others whom I saw at close range were Mrs. John Reece, in black broadcloth and toque with green plumage; Mrs. "Ollie" Ames, in green and blue fine plaid and a black hat; Mrs. Fred Dabney (nee Fay), in russet brown; Mrs. Alley, very handsome in severe black; Marion Peabody Lawrence, in pale gray and a pink straw hat with pink shaded wings; Mrs. Francis M. Stanley, in dark blue tailor-made gown and handsome feather boa; Mrs. Boylston Beal, in dark gray severely made; Mrs. Nathan Matthews, in the blue she likes so well and a fetching blue boa, and Mrs. Stanley McCormick, in dark blue with black embroidery and white felt hat with gray velvet trimmings.

DOLLY ADAMS.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA UNDER DR. KARL MUCK

Journal Oct. 13, 06
Begins Its Twenty-sixth Season with a New Conductor.

BRILLIANT AND EFFECTIVE

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Rendered with Sharp Contrasts, but Without Exaggeration.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-sixth season to-day under the new conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, who has been engaged for one year to succeed Wilhelm Gericke. There was, of course, intense interest on the part of the Boston public, which is not so accustomed to new conductors as the New York public has become in the last few years, to learn what manner of man and musician it is who will have the famous orchestra in his charge during the coming season, and this interest extends beyond Boston to New York and the other cities in which the Boston organization is so highly prized and so frequent a visitor. The hall was thronged to overflowing. In its reception and recognition of the new man the decorous Friday afternoon audience expended what is here considered as enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck is a German conductor of distinction, not yet 47 years old, and younger in appearance, who was a Doctor of Philosophy before he was a musician, and has won his way to a post in the Royal Opera of Berlin, where he stands next to Dr. Richard Strauss as conductor. He was released from his duties in Berlin, to which he has recently been reappointed for a term of years, by special favor of the Emperor, and there is no reason to believe that he is contemplated as conductor of the Boston Orchestra for a period longer than the present season.

Dr. Muck gave the impression to-day of a man of commanding authority and technical power, undemonstrative and self-contained before the public and his men, and very little concerned apparently in making his way with his audience by any hint of personal display. He is indeed rather stiff and unyielding in his bearing, and his beat in itself has very little of the eloquence that some expect to be communicated in this manner. It was clear that he had already established an understanding with the orchestra, and he gained his effects with certainty. He played Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and of Wagner "A Faust Overture," the "Siegfried Idyll," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The reading of the symphony was brilliant and effective, abounding in sharp contrasts, without exaggeration, and only in the slow movement showing a suggestion of unaccustomed emphasis in certain passages. The "Meistersinger" prelude he took rather more rapidly than we are accustomed to hear it, and in this, too, brilliancy and precision of phrase and strong contrast of nuance were the dominating qualities, rather than the fire of eloquence or the glow of tenderness and passion. But let none decide offhand that Dr. Muck does not possess these qualities, for there is still much for him and his men to do to gain full insight into each other; and for the nervous wire edge of these first appearances to be smoothed away.

Nor is it just to conclude from the four programmes that Dr. Muck has already announced that he is an unsuccessful programme maker. He has made a conserva-live beginning; it ought not to take him long to find out what the musical audiences of this country have been accustomed to and expect. That he is a man of unusual power and ability is unquestionable. By the time he is in New York in November there will be a fairer test of the musician than was possible to-day.

Byron T T T Oct 17.06
No doubt Boston is "peculiar"—she would not deny herself that there are times when if one says that she is "peculiar" in the sense of being peevish and difficult she could not on her New England conscience deny it. There is a certain curious conflict of emotions when Boston settles down to look at herself as in that absolutely correct and authentic representation of the "Boston that is Boston," to be found at the Symphony concerts. Boston society is vexed, that is to say, to the point of biting her lip and coloring slightly to see that it is eternally the same old thing—the same set of people, the same familiar figures in the same seats, year after year; and yet when there is something of a shaking up, as there has to be at the beginning of a new symphony year, with new people in large numbers in the place of the old familiar faces, Boston does n't like that either. Boston is proud and fond of her past; she would have liked always to keep the sacred cause of culture and criticism in the same hands; all literary performances in the hands of the Atlantic Monthly galaxy, the musical criticism in the hands of John S. Dwight (whom the up-to-date notes of the Symphony programme still have to quote), even if it would not leave all musical composition in the hands of Professor J. K. Paine and J. C. D. Parker; but surely the dramatic criticism in the hands of Mr. Henry Clapp; and the conducting of the orchestra in the hands of—well, something at least as conservative and at least as far back as Mr. Gerlicke. Yet the "pleased and pleasant ladies, in their splendid high-necked dresses and the bald or iron-gray men attentive and appreciative," would not be satisfied forever with that either. And they know it better than anybody else.

+ + +

It takes but a Saturday night or two for things to settle down in Symphony Hall to about their usual acceptability in spite of certain disturbing changes among occupants of seats in certain rows of benches on the floor and in the balconies. It did not take more than the second movement of the Beethoven Symphony Saturday night to convince the Symphony audience that in Dr. Muck it had simply drawn a prize again. His back, and indeed his entire trim figure, surmounted by a head rather too large for it and evidently well charged with power, is fine to look upon. It carries conviction at once that it has "stood before kings," and you can easily believe that it is something more than the formal fiction of court etiquette that the kaiser has spared him with reluctance for a year in Boston. At the reception after the concert, planned for a general greeting by resident musicians and amateurs of music, the new conductor replied to the questioner who expressed a hope that his stay here might be more than a year long, "That depends on the kaiser." We have often heard of conductors painting tone pictures with the orchestra—Dr. Muck actually does it. His baton is really a brush and he even uses the left hand as a painter does, with his thumb or rag to rub out some touch of too much that he has just put on. Each man of the orchestra seems to be waiting and ready to plant his spot of color, and the right response to his pressure for the right tone at the right place gets the master-artist's quick little nod of confidential recognition for the happy unit of the mighty host marshalled in the composition the conductor is reproducing.

+ + +

With all the new conductor's mastership one feels that he is a modest and gentle soul, bracing himself to be stiff and severe simply from seriousness and devotion to his task. When it is a matter of broad and melodious flowing passages he lets them tell for all they are worth, rolling every sweet morsel and turn of the song in the piece under his tongue, as it were, to get the full savor of it, and lingering long enough upon it to let the dullest apprehension catch up with the enjoyment of any of quicker and keener reactions. Then when it comes to the obscurer passages, those bewildering connecting and transition periods between the great moments, he does not hurry or bluster, either to get past or to hide difficulties in the confusion of the hearers. What must have been for most listeners heretofore a dark passage he faces collectedly, with calm analysis and intelligent sympathy with the composer's aim and mood. Taking the listener by the hand he lets him see that the heretofore blind and tortuous tunnel, rocky and dark, lighted up in this way has a beautiful vaulted roof and sculptured sides, perhaps. The valiant giant-killer walks through it as calmly and steadily as through the broad and fair melodious green pastures by running waters. His stick becomes as a lighted wand throwing its beams upon the shape and proportions of the cavern and the safe way through it, and inspiring confidence in those who follow with him by his own securely planted footing. The very chasms and cumbering masses, heretofore only meaningless, mountainous obstacles in the path, become its sombre beauty and define and reveal its artistic purpose and relation in the tremendous scheme of the whole.

SKETCH OF DR. KARL MUCK, CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Advent of a New and Noted Conductor.
Sun Dr. Karl Muck. (Oct. 14, 06)

The dates of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in this city at Carnegie Hall are Thursday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, March 21 and Saturday afternoons November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23. These concerts will have a new interest this season by reason of the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be the conductor of Boston's orchestra. It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburgh Orchestra. When the orchestra first came to this city to give a concert in Steinway Hall, Mr. Gericke, then in his first term of service, was at its head. During the last three years of Mr. Gericke's first engagement the orchestra became firmly established in the affection of New York's music lovers and under Nikisch, Paur, and again Gericke, its patronage here has grown steadily until, indeed, New York has come to regard it as partly its own.

There is no reason to doubt that the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder, chorus master in the Opera in Zürich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds.

While it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor, his experience in concert work has been very thorough, and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera. In the early years of his career, when he was the chief conductor of Graz, he began to make a name for himself in symphonic music. In Prague, where he was principal conductor of the German opera from 1886 to 1892, he was also the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts and gave them a standing which they had never had before. Later, when he went to Berlin, he began to receive invitations from the leading orchestras of Europe, and to-day is one of the most sought Mahler relinquished the Philharmonic orchestra Dr. Muck was one of the first "guest" conductors invited to lead the band. Last year and the year before he conducted four of the eight concerts, Felix Mottl of Munich conducting the others. For the coming year arrangements had been made whereby he was to have conducted all eight of the concerts, but his engagement to come to America compelled the Philharmonic Society to fall back on the old plan of having two conductors, who are to be Mottl and Richard Strauss.

The engagement of Dr. Muck is to a certain extent a radical departure in the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past the plan has been to take a man who was comparatively unknown. Henschel, the first conductor, was absolutely unknown in that capacity when he took charge of the orchestra in 1831. Gericke, when he first came to America, had been a subordinate in the Vienna Opera House, while Nikisch and Paur, coming from the Municipal Theatre of Leipzig, were both unknown men. Curiously enough, all of them had been identified almost entirely with opera.

To be sure when Nikisch left in the spring of 1893 Hans Richter was engaged, and when he broke his contract with Mr. Higginson he wrote urgently to Dr. Muck asking him to come instead. Had this happened, Dr. Muck would have been another comparatively unknown man to take charge of the orchestra. But now, thirteen years later, he comes to America a member of that small group of men who have raised the position of the conductor to a higher plane than it has ever held before.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. But the soloists who are announced are unusually strong, four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski.

Paderewski will play but once in New York next winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony. Gabrilowitsch has always been a favorite here and Olga Samaroff is rapidly establishing herself as one of the most brilliant of our pianists. Neither Willy Hess nor Timothée Adamowski needs introduction to Boston Symphony audiences in New York. They are among those who make "the virtuosi orchestra an orchestra of virtuosi."

Announcements of novelties will be made later.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BACH.

SUITE No. 2, in B minor for FLUTE and STRINGS.
(VON BULOW'S arrangement.)

- I. Overture: Largo; Allegro.
 - II. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo.
 - III. Sarabande: Andante.
 - IV. Bourrée I. and Bourrée II.: Allegro molto.
 - V. Polonaise with Double: moderato.
 - VI. Menuet.
 - VII. Badinerie: Presto.
- Solo Flute; MR. A. MAQUARRE.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in G minor (Breitkopf and Härtel.
No. 13.)

- I. Adagio; Allegro,
- II. Largo.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito.

SPOHR.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D minor, No. 9.

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegretto.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY in C major, with Fugue Finale,
"Jupiter." (K. 551.)

- I. Allegro vivace.
- II. Andante cantabile.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Professor WILLY HESS.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Advent of a New and Noted Conductor.

Sun Dr. Karl Muck. Oct 14. 06

The dates of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in this city at Carnegie Hall are Thursday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21, March 21 and Saturday afternoons November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 23. These concerts will have a new interest this season by reason of the presence of Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin, who has come to America on a year's leave of absence from the Royal Opera of that city to be the conductor of Boston's orchestra. It is thirteen years since the Boston Symphony brought a new conductor to New York—if the visit last year, of Vincent d'Indy be excepted—the last one having been Emil Paur, now of the Pittsburgh Orchestra. When the orchestra first came to this city to give a concert in Steinway Hall, Mr. Gericke, then in his first term of service, was at its head. During the last three years of Mr. Gericke's first engagement the orchestra became firmly established in the affection of New York's music lovers and under Nikisch, Paur, and again Gericke, its patronage here has grown steadily until, indeed, New York has come to regard it as partly its own.

There is no reason to doubt that the brilliant achievements of the past will be duplicated under Dr. Muck. He comes to this country with a splendid reputation won in a career of twenty-six years in some of the most exacting posts of Europe. Beginning at the bottom round of the ladder, chorus master in the Opera in Zürich, his advancement was so rapid that in twelve years he was appointed one of the principal conductors of the Royal Opera in Berlin, which post he now holds.

While it is true that he is best known as an operatic conductor, his experience in concert work has been very thorough, and in Europe he is esteemed as highly in concert as in opera. In the early years of his career, when he was the chief conductor of Graz, he began to make a name for himself in symphonic music. In Prague, where he was principal conductor of the German opera from 1886 to 1892, he was also the conductor of the Philharmonic concerts and gave them a standing which they had never had before. Later, when he went to Berlin, he began to receive invitations from the leading orchestras of Europe, and to-day is one of the most sought after of the "star" conductors. Mahler relinquished the Philharmonic orchestra Dr. Muck was one of the "guest" conductors invited to lead the band. Last year and the year before he conducted four of the eight concerts, Felix Mottl of Munich conducting the others. For the coming year arrangements had been made whereby he was to have conducted all eight of the concerts, but his engagement to come to America compelled the Philharmonic Society to fall back on the old plan of having two conductors, who are to be Mottl and Richard Strauss.

The engagement of Dr. Muck is to a certain extent a radical departure in the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the past the plan has been to take a man who was comparatively unknown. Henschel, the first conductor, was absolutely unknown in that capacity when he took charge of the orchestra in 1881. Gericke, when he first came to America, had been a subordinate in the Vienna Opera House, while Nikisch and Paur, coming from the Municipal Theatre of Leipzig, were both unknown men. Curiously enough, all of them had been identified almost entirely with opera.

To be sure when Nikisch left in the spring of 1893 Hans Richter was engaged, and when he broke his contract with Mr. Higginson he wrote urgently to Dr. Muck asking him to come instead. Had this happened, Dr. Muck would have been another comparatively unknown man to take charge of the orchestra. But now, thirteen years later, he comes to America a member of that small group of men who have raised the position of the conductor to a higher plane than it has ever held before.

There will be no soloists at the November concerts in New York, and for the March concerts no soloists are yet announced, since Dr. Muck has not yet determined what he will do on his last visit to this city. But the soloists who are announced are unusually strong, four pianists and two violinists. The pianists are Paderewski, Rosenthal, Gabrilowitsch and Olga Samaroff. The violinists are Willy Hess and Timothée Adamowski.

Paderewski will play but once in New York next winter, and that will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He comes to this country for three weeks, in which time he will play seven concerts with the Boston Symphony. Rosenthal will make his first appearance with orchestra in New York with the Boston Symphony. Gabrilowitsch has always been a favorite here and Olga Samaroff is rapidly establishing herself as one of the most brilliant of our pianists. Neither Willy Hess nor Timothée Adamowski needs introduction to Boston Symphony audiences in New York. They are among those who make "the virtuosi orchestra an orchestra of virtuosi."

Announcements of novelties will be made later.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BACH.

SUITE No. 2, in B minor for FLUTE and STRINGS.
(VON BULOW'S arrangement.)

- I. Overture: Largo; Allegro.
 - II. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo.
 - III. Sarabande: Andante.
 - IV. Bourrée I. and Bourrée II.: Allegro molto.
 - V. Polonaise with Double: moderato.
 - VI. Menuet.
 - VII. Badinerie: Presto.
- Solo Flute; MR. A. MAQUARRE.

HAYDN.

SYMPHONY in G minor (Breitkopf and Härtel.
No. 13.)

- I. Adagio; Allegro.
- II. Largo.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro con spirito.

SPOHR.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D minor, No. 9.

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegretto.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY in C major, with Fugue Finale,
"Jupiter." (K. 551.)

- I. Allegro vivace.
- II. Andante cantabile.
- III. Menuetto: Allegretto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Professor WILLY HESS.

The Symphony Concert

To praise the fine qualities of the playing of the Symphony Orchestra makes an old story, and to repeat it too often is to be promptly told by some restless iconoclast that its public is living in a musical backwater of self-satisfaction. In fact, it is so used to those qualities that it does not fully appreciate them, and it needs the stimulating contrasts and comparisons that the visits of other orchestras—if only it would go to hear them—might bring. Not that our band has all the orchestral virtues, but it has the qualities that shine particularly through such a programme of eighteenth-century music as Dr. Muck repeated on Saturday evening. There is no hiding any technical slips in music that is so luminously clear. Every ear may hear, while not one in a thousand may detect what goes on underneath—so to say—in a tone-poem by Strauss or a symphony by Mahler. There is no other goal in this music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart than the beauty and the charm of formal sound, and they must find communicating voice in the beauty and the balance of tone, the pliancy of rhythm, the delicacy and the lightness of pattern-weaving that an orchestra brings to them. Without loveliness of tone, suppleness of rhythm and animated spontaneity, the music does seem thin, antiquated, stiff and monotonous. An orchestra must sing and dance in it. The very lightness and brightness of the task make it quite as difficult, if it is to be done delicately well, as the playing of ultra-modern music. Bright incisiveness, endless undulation and fanciful grace in music are more evasive than much of the tonal storm and stress that has come after them. Dr. Muck let all these qualities in the music speak for themselves, but it was his men who gave them their fitting voice, and therefore their lasting beauty.

There were the same adroit discrimination and delicate sympathy in the adapting of the means to the end in the playing of the two members of the orchestra who had solo parts. Mr. André Maquarrie, when he chooses, can give his flute half the voice and twice the liveness of a coloratura singer sparkling through the ornaments of song. In the solo part of Bach's suite he was discerningly content with a tone that had suave beauty, graceful undulation and light life. Mr. Hess, in turn, played the violin part in Spohr's ninth concerto. He did not try to transfigure Spohr, to make him sound heroic, as Ysaye makes Vieuxtemps, for example, sound. Neither did he "walk through" the concerto, as the phrase runs of actors who neglect their parts, and play it as a glorified exercise in the higher technics of the violin. Mr. Hess has those technics under easy mastery, but he used them to serve and heighten the languorous grace or the fluent animation of Spohr's concerto. Here again was music that asked the flow of beautiful tone in long-drawn melody, that sought clearness of outline and softness of texture, a smooth and formal symmetry and a certain sweetness of sound and of fancy. It is very easy to emasculate Spohr and very stupid to inflate him. Hess took the music for exactly what it is and so for the half hour gave it life again. Trans. Oct. 22, 1906. H. T. F.

WO solid hours of Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart was Dr. Muck's offering for the second Symphony concert Saturday evening. It was a bold venture indeed, and affords still further evidence that the new leader does not intend to be bound down by tradition. Furthermore, the cordial reception accorded the exceptionally long programme demonstrated that Dr. Muck is feeling his way with the musical public most successfully.

The programme was Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings, Haydn's major symphony, a violin concerto in D minor, Spohr, and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Mr. Willy Hess was the soloist. Whatever doubts the critical might have had regarding the wisdom of selecting such a programme, those doubts must have been speedily dispelled at the close of the first number, the Bach selection, for the audience became most enthusiastic, compelling conductor and Mr. Maquarrie to repeatedly acknowledge its applause. It was just a bit beyond the ordinary for these concerts. Of course, Mr. Maquarrie's remarkable playing was a most essential factor. It was simply delightful.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Haydn number seemed to open up beauties heretofore not fully appreciated. Considering the unusual length of the evening's programme it might have been a judicious move to have cut this selection, yet it must be allowed that there was not the slightest doubt of approval of the work in its entirety as given. The finale brought out some truly marvelous playing on the part of the orchestra and well merited the hearty recognition accorded it.

Spohr's concerto brought Willy Hess once more forward as the soloist, and enthusiastic as was the greeting accorded him it was tame in comparison with the enthusiasm aroused by his well-nigh peerless playing. It was artistic in the highest sense of the word and easily the feature of the concert. Mr. Hess, true artist that he is, plays as the composer wrote and does not strive for the unusual.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony might well have attached an explanation of the "Jupiter." Possibly because it came at the tail end of a long evening it was not as well received as it should have been. Certain it is that although well played, it did not create any particular impression. The third concert, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, this week, promises to make amends in the matter of length. The programme is a Brahms symphony, Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and three movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Trans. Oct. 22, 1906.

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS AGAIN

AN AFTERNOON OF EIGHTEENTH CENTURY MUSIC

A Programme with Individuality in It—The Right of the Old Masters to Be Heard by Themselves—Bach, Haydn and Mozart According to Dr. Muck—His Sympathy with the Letter and the Spirit of Their Music—Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—Musical News

There was unusually warm applause, for so feminine an audience, when Dr. Muck took his place to conduct the second Symphony concert yesterday, and it continued through the afternoon. Clearly he has interested and impressed his hearers, and they have found him modestly and humanly likable. Their friendly mood was in the air, and conductor, audience and players were mutually eager and at ease. The programme was longer than that of last week, and it comprised a suite and two symphonies of the eighteenth century, and a concerto of the first quarter of the nineteenth, with Mr. Hess to play the violin part. In detail it ran:

Bach: Suite, No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings (Von Bülow's arrangement).
Haydn: Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13).
Spohr: Concerto, No. 9, in D minor, for violin and orchestra.
Mozart: Symphony in C major, "Jupiter."

With reason, but with risk, Dr. Muck originally made his programme wholly from the music of the eighteenth century, and then added Spohr's concerto as most in accord with it of all that are in Mr. Hess's repertory. With reason, because the composers of the eighteenth century, even the greatest and the most lasting, are best heard by themselves. With risk, because the first and the clearest sign of the gulf of years between them and us is a sated and flagging interest if we hear too much of their music, and because a symphony by Haydn and another by Mozart on the same programme repeats the symphonic form at its simplest. The orthodox and uninspired concerto did not bring variety, in spite of the delicate brilliance and supple smoothness of Mr. Hess's playing, and the suite, with its range of diverse dance measures, began the programme. After all, it was the precise and insistent progression of allegro, largo (or andante), minuet and finale through two symphonies of which the ear, mind and fancy began to weary. The music itself did not cloy the receptive faculties—it was played too persuasively and sympathetically for that—but the iterated form stiffened them.

Otherwise Dr. Muck's scheme was altogether defensible. It implied delicate and discriminating æsthetic perceptions in him and flattering confidence in the same perceptions in his audience. The connoisseur of pictures, if he is worthy of his possessions, does not mix his Watteaus and his Bouchers, or even his Reynoldses and his Gainsboroughs, with his Monets, his Sargents, and his Barbizon landscapes. Which ever he may prefer, he will not let his nineteenth-century pictures overbear and overcloud his eighteenth. No more should the connoisseur of music, be he conductor or listener, let his nineteenth-century music dull or dim his Mozart, his Haydn and his Bach. It has no æsthetic right even to point and to invite the inevitable contrasts. The farther it is away the better. Mozart, Haydn and Bach took scanty thought of posterity and posthumous glories. They did their day's work like the industrious men and musicians they were, took the immediate rewards of it, and let the rest go hang. The pleasure with which we in 1906 hear their music lays them under no reciprocal obligation. The conductor who tries to make them sound modern and the hearer who tries to listen to them as though they were modern go equally wrong. Mozart and Haydn and Bach wrote not only according to themselves, but according to their time and their hearers. Let their music, if it can, recall and recreate for the hour the moods, tastes and standards to which it was addressed. Let it make its own atmosphere and maintain it as long as it can. Do not disturb it with modern notions or smother it in modern wraps. There is a fair field in æsthetics as well as in sport, and Dr. Muck gave his eighteenth-century music a fair field yesterday, though he did have to play it in a hall, and therefore with an orchestra, twice or thrice too large for it.

Thus left to itself the music did speak with its own voice and summon its own atmosphere. It never commanded—that was not the way of the arts in the eighteenth century—it enticed, persuaded and fascinated. It charmed away the mental, emotional and æsthetic barriers that separate us of the twentieth century from the ladies in their brocades and the men in their laces for whom it was written. It melted all the standards by which we might falsely try it, and then crystallized standards of its own. For the moment the atmosphere of Symphony Hall became, with a little spring and settling of the imagination, like that of the minor court at Cöthen, for which Bach made his suite, or of the Concerts Spirituels in Paris, hearing the symphony commissioned from Haydn, or of the concert room at Prague, where Mozart felt the sunshine of favor. Bach's flute trod its measures through his stately dances, in and out among the curtsying and attendant strings, or tripped through the light steps of his "Badinage." We who listened were content to ask no more of music than glorified dance melodies and rhythms, pattering on the ear and the fancy, like the fall of dancing feet. Then came the clamorous staccato chords of the beginning of Haydn's symphony. Could eighteenth-century music turn strenuous after all? But it was only playful thumping. In a moment the music was as free from thunderbolts as lace, and was weaving its delicate patterns through a light allegro. Homely was the song of the largo, but the eighteenth century liked to play at homeliness and musing and to end both as Haydn ends his with measured minuet and the gayer dance of the finale. Form grew lovable for its own sake and melody for the mere beautiful curve and contents of it, while play with theme and figure became exhilarating sport.

Yet Haydn in his symphonies and Bach in this particular suite were writing no more than superficial music. It was Mozart's symphony that searched the heart of his time as well as his own. Here were perfection and even complexity of form, as complexity went in those days. Yet underneath was a shiver and quiver of passion. Here was the beauty of sound for its own long-drawn and curving loveliness, yet underneath was haunting and wistful melancholy—the melancholy of some of Watteau's pictures. Here was restlessness, sharpening contrasts and disturbing rhythms, as though the tone patterns were shaken and twisted by some quick breath of passion. Here was music that leapt out of the pretty bonds of the minuet into the tumultuous freedom of the finale. The "Jupiter" symphony is indeed music with a life of its own, independent of all else but Mozart, yet in it also is the mood of its time. Mozart in spite of his detachment had begun to feel it and to smart under it.

This eighteenth-century music spoke, persuaded and charmed, because the form and the manner of it exactly impart its mood and substance, because all four are in nearly perfect fusion, and because Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought the fusion and the fascination to very full expression. It is formal music, but form that Bach, Haydn and Mozart never turn rigid, and Dr. Muck kept his band as supple as they. It is music that is full of the tracery of delicate detail that never becomes hard or meticulous. It was lightness itself, it had even the sense of graceful improvisation as Dr. Muck and his men often played it. They sang the largo of Haydn and the andante of Mozart as pure instrumental song. Under their hands the rhythms of Bach's suite danced in long measured curves or in tripping steps. They sent the gay abandon of Haydn's finale sparkling to the ear and the fancy. Their rush in Mozart's fugue was breathless—and sure. Everywhere were the beauty and the pliancy of tone, the euphony and the symmetry that give eighteenth-century music half its magic. Conductor and men caught the cool, clear brightness of it. Not once did Dr. Muck try to force or to distort this music that it might sound for something different from what it is. He followed the letter of it to very delicate shadings, to very light transitions. He animated it with its spirit and life. But did he a little miss the wistfulness and the tenderness that Mozart at least could put quivering underneath?

H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

For the third pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck for the first time this season has put an ultra-modern composition, Strauss's "Don Juan," on his programme. With "Death and Transfiguration," it is the most familiar of Strauss's tone-poems, and the composer himself has conducted it in Boston. It will put Dr. Muck, moreover, to new and interesting tests. The symphony is the first of Brahms in C-minor, and the dances of the sylphs and the will-o'-the-wisps and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" complete the programme, which is notably short. There will be no soloist.

For the first of the Symphony concerts at Cambridge, in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, at eight, Dr. Muck has made a programme of three symphonies, Haydn's in G-major, Mozart's "Jupiter," and Beethoven's fifth. Only these and nothing more. We doubt whether a programme like this has been made in America in recent years, and Dr. Muck is far too able a conductor to need to turn instructor in the evolution of the symphony.

Dr. Muck, Symphony Director, Provides Program of Ancient Classicism Which Was Made Profoundly Stirring.

Journal Oct. 22, 1926

As his second essay for the favor of Symphony audiences Conductor Muck arranged a concert of mild and ancient classicism. The program was all of one piece, so far as form went, for Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart do not afford any especial variety. To many it was a novelty to hear all this unbroken beauty and refinement with never a thrill to change the current of musical thought, except perhaps in parts of the great "Jupiter" symphony. And yet such a plan has its uses and its pleasures. It impresses effectively the facts of style as pertaining to certain ages of composition, and it gives many the delight of satiety. But there is little need for a repetition of it. Let us admit that the four men of calm classicism are, or were, giants in their day, but let us also humbly petition Dr. Muck to forego this particular kind of program for a while, at least.

Again the readings by the new leader were marked by refined charm mingled with poetic force. There is nothing new to say with Haydn's G major symphony, for instance, nor can any fresh twist be given such a bit of elegance as the Bach suite for flute and strings. To say, therefore, that these were played with perfection of dynamics and tonal loveliness is to give all the praise possible. The Mozart symphony, however, has within it emotion and strength of a genuine, if old-fashioned, sort, and here was another real test of Dr. Muck's qualities as an interpreter. To declare that he made the work as profoundly stirring and fascinating as have any of his predecessors is to bestow as high praise as is possible to give.

Willy Hess was the soloist, playing Spohr's concerto in G major with as much expressive eloquence as the rather square-cut and formal work demanded.

SYMPHONY MUSIC PLEASES AUDIENCE

Herald

Ultra-Classical Concert of Boston Orchestra Conducted by Dr. Muck Applauded.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the second Symphony concert given last night in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck conductor, was as follows:

Suite in B minor for flute and strings, Bach
Symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 13)

Violin Concerto in D minor, No. 9.... Spohr
Symphony in C major "Jupiter".... Mozart

In spite of its undue length this concert apparently gave much pleasure to the audience. The name of Bach is one to conjure with, and there are many who believe in his plenary inspiration. Every allegro is to them a masterpiece; every adagio is sublime. There should be more discrimination in this matter. Bach thought, lived, had his being in counterpoint and his fertility was amazing. What wonder, then, if there are many pages in his complete works that are formidably dull? There are lively movements that might go on forever or stop at any time as far as any true musical interest is concerned.

This suite, however it is arranged or disarranged, is exceedingly monotonous and tiresome. Last night Hans von Buelow's version was used, for the first time, we believe, in Boston. It is perhaps a little less dull than the version by Franz which has been heard at preceding concerts. The tonal monotony, however, must always remain, and even Von Buelow's ingenious tinkering cannot vitalize music that was composed originally in a perfunctory manner and intended for chamber hearing.

Haydn's symphony was played with great spirit, and the opening movement and the finale were good to hear. Would that Dr. Muck had had the irreverent courage to omit the largo!

Bach, Haydn, Spohr and Mozart—all in one concert and for two hours! A programme like this may be endured once in 24 concerts. Any one of the pieces might be welcome when well contrasted with those that are modern and hypo-modern. A programme like that of last night must inevitably suffer from lack of contrast.

Mr. Hess, who had hoped to play D'Erlanger's concerto this season, was obliged to keep within the frame of the programme, so he chose Spohr's ninth, a work that, as a rule, is of more interest to violinists than to a general audience. His choice turned out to be most fortunate.

Never before in this city has Mr. Hess displayed his artistry to such full advantage. His performance was admirable in quality and purity of tone, in fine phrasing, in the graceful surmounting of technical difficulties. Furthermore, there was a musical spirit, a prevailing taste, a sense of the style peculiar to Spohr's music, that engrossed the attention and compelled respect, enjoyment and applause. When the composer played this concerto in Paris he complained because the adagio made less effect there than did the first movement and the finale, and he indulged himself in sour remarks concerning the unwillingness of the French to play or listen to earnest adagios. Last evening Mr. Hess triumphed in each movement.

The performance of the orchestra was admirable, and due tribute should be given to Mr. Andre Maquarre, the flutist, for his work in the suite by Bach.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: Brahms' symphony in C minor, No. 1; Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan"; three movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

MRS. MUCK HONOR GUEST.

Wife of Symphony Leader at N. E.
Women's Press Association Session.

Herald Oct. 18, 1926

Mrs. Karl Muck, wife of Dr. Muck, conductor of the Symphony orchestra, was the guest of honor at the historical meeting of the New England Women's Press Association at the Vendome yesterday. The Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham spoke on "Paul Revere's Road." The other speakers were Mrs. Laura W. Fowler, regent of the Old South chapter; Mrs. Lillian C. Kirtland, regent of the Minute Men chapter; Miss Floretta Vining, regent of the John Adams chapter; Mrs. Dora R. Crosby, regent of the Lexington chapter; Miss Marian H. Brazier, regent of the Paul Jones chapter, all of whom spoke of their work as heads of their chapters. Mrs. Marian Longfellow O'Donohue also read a paper on "The Homes of Bryant, Lowell and Longfellow."

MUSICAL MATTERS

Second of the Season's
Symphony Concerts.

Puccini's "Mme Butterfly" to be Sung Here Next Week.

Camille Saint-Saens Soon to be in Boston.

Globe Oct. 21, 1906
Last evening the second concert of the Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr Karl Muck was given. For the second time the new conductor observed that his musical judgment was enthusiastically indorsed by patrons of the concerts, and he was also made aware that in selecting his soloists from among the musicians of his organization his course meets the hearty approbation of his audience. For last evening Symphony goers were permitted to hear Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmeister, and Andre Maquarre, flutist, in solo parts. Their reception justifies Dr Muck in frequently turning to his corps for individual performances.

Prof Hess played the somewhat spectacular Spohr concerto No. 9, written for the solo violin and orchestra, a work which had its last previous performance by the Symphony with Kneisel as soloist, so long ago that the occasion has been forgotten by many Symphony patrons. There is ample opportunity for the display of virtuosity in this composition, but it was by no means too pretentious an undertaking for the leading violinist of the orchestra. There are bits of brilliant contrast in the three measures and of the soloist is demanded precise technique, delicate fingering and broad, sturdy bowing.

In the opening passages of the first measure, the allegro, there is the quick approach to the chief theme by the solo violin and Prof Hess compelled admiration thus early by the dexterity of his technique and the firm, clear-cut precision of his tones in the rapid scale. Under his bow the theme was developed with sympathetic fervor, and then came the simple melody of the second theme, followed by the florid passages which tax the flexibility of the artist. Here the versatility of the player was manifest, for the repetitions were played with cumulative strength and delicacy.

The second measure, adagio, fairly scintillates with runs and intricate phrasing in the interweave of the two themes which is the basis of the movement. There is much to dazzle the ear in these passages, and though glittering it serves principally as a preparation for the concluding movement, the allegretto.

Written in the major, the rondo brings out all of the latent vigor of the violinist, and Prof Hess reached the heights which have on many occasions been evaded by soloists who have attempted this concerto. The movement abounds in double stops with a frequency of florid writing. In the use of the double strings Prof Hess displayed not only distinctly accurate technique and brilliancy of execution, but the breadth and volume of his tones with deftness and virility brought out the light and shade of this arbitrary composition.

The orchestral numbers were the Bach suite No. 2 for flute and strings, Haydn's symphony in G major and the symphony in C major with fugue finale by Mozart. In the opening number Andre Maquarre sustained the prominence of the flute and the light, lilting passages the soloist played with the dexterity of the virtuoso.

Of the orchestral numbers the greatest credit to the organization must be given for its performance of Haydn's symphony, not because of greater excellence of execution, but because of the impression it made upon the audience. There was something appealing in the richness of the second movement, the largo, the strong, serious theme maintained by the violins and flute, then by cellos and oboes and carried to its full development by the complete orchestra. Here from his band Dr Muck extracted daintiness and virility, and the violins and cellos were marvelously true in the sonorous depths of the largo.

MUSICAL MATTERS

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv. Programme. Oct. 21, 06
Bach. Suite in B minor for Flute and Strings.
Soloist, Mr. Maquarre.
Haydn. Symphony in G minor.
Spohr. Concerto for Violin in D minor.
Soloist, Professor Willy Hess.
Mozart. Jupiter Symphony.

Saturday night the programme extended to two hours and was entirely in the old classical school, which former conductors have administered to the public in small and very careful doses. It was a very hopeful sign, therefore, to find the applause continuous and the interest sustained. It proves that the old well has not yet run dry; Haydn and Mozart have not been thrust upon the shelf by modern dealers in orchestra at wholesale. Yet we could have spared one of the symphonies very readily, in spite of the excellent reading of both.

Bach aroused the greatest enthusiasm. Von Buelow's arrangement of the work is effective, and the old intellectuality without the modern asceticism and crabbed ugliness seemed more beautiful than ever. It is possible that the modern plunges into "cerebral music" may, by comparison, result in causing a better appreciation of this more unstrained complexity,—a merit which we had not thought of in connection with the new school.

Of course Mr. Maquarre's playing had much to do with the appreciation of the work. He played as he always does, in a perfect manner, and in the delicious canon of the Sarabande (flute and violoncello), Mr. Warnke followed in beautiful imitation. The dignity of the Polonaise and the airy delicacy of the finale were points to praise especially. It might have been wise, however, to have omitted one or two of the movements (all in one key), and to have made a pause after the overture. It was a point of new and rather severe discipline, the giving of the seven (or with the "Doubles," etc., ten) movements without interruption. Latecomers must have gnashed their teeth as they grew gray with waiting in the outer corridors, for the work lasted about half-an-hour, during which no one was admitted to the hall.

The Haydn symphony took on new life in the excellent reading which Dr. Muck gave to it. He did not harass our expert musicians with too much time-beating in this, and sometimes allowed the orchestra to run on without any beats whatever. There was especial beauty in the lyrical manner in which he caused the Largo to be sung, and the Minuet with its Musette Trio had just the right tinge of contrast and an abundance of life. The finale was taken at a veritable Presto pace, which was not impossible for our orchestra, although we doubt if any band of Haydn's time could have sustained the pace. We do not believe that our forefathers could think as quick as that. But it made the jolly little folk-melody, which is the chief theme of the Rondo, very attractive, and the audience burst into the heartiest of applause at its end,—a tribute that was well-deserved.

Prof. Willy Hess was taken back to Boston's bosom as a prodigal son. The orchestra did not sing Foster's "Willie we have missed you," but they joined in the general applause at the reappearance of the gifted violinist. Spohr's Chesterfieldian music fitted perfectly to the very unstrained character of the entire programme. If there was emotion in the work it was of that kid-gloved, lace handkerchief kind which does not run close to the agony line. The limitations of the work were not to be charged to the account of the executant; Prof. Hess played the concerto like an artist of the first rank, which he certainly is. The cantilena of the Adagio was sung in the most perfect legato, and in matters of intonation, timbre, or surety of execution not a flaw could be found.

The finale, often omitted by soloists, was the most effective movement of the three, for here there was something of dramatic effect, and the purity of the double-stopping and the manner in which the many technical difficulties were overcome, were matters of admiration. Three hearty recalls testified to the appreciation of the audience.

It is to the credit of the artist that he did not in the least tamper with the spirit of the work; he did not attempt to introduce any sensational effects, but gave pure, suave, gentlemanly playing, such as suited to the conservative vein of Spohr.

The "Jupiter" symphony, which we have had frequently enough, was of course well read and well performed. Either this or the Haydn symphony could have been omitted to advantage. Parts of such works must necessarily grow threadbare,—the minuets and the repetitions in the slow movements, for example. The fairly trained concert-auditor of today knows ten measures ahead just what is going to occur, and the set formulas end by becoming tame.

The next concert is to be wholly of a moderately radical character. As a witty auditor observed, if this concert is of the "extreme right," the next is to be of the "left centre"; a simile which followers of French politics and Boston music will easily understand. Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCES.

Dr. Muck, at the first public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra, was evidently much surprised by certain performances on the part of the audience. He gazed curiously at those who streamed in after the first movement of the symphony. He gazed with equal curiosity on many who left the hall before he raised his stick for the last piece on the programme. At the concert the next night he again showed signs of wonder at the leisurely manner in which late comers strolled toward their seats.

He will soon be used to all this, and he will be inclined to pardon the late comers as soon as he realizes the fact that many subscribers live far from the hall and are dependent on street cars. It is not probable that he will ever understand why many should leave on Friday afternoons and Saturday nights before the concert is over. Is the famous Boston public not fond of music? Is there so much to be done between the public rehearsal and dinner that the last piece must go unheard by many?

He will learn in time that the public rehearsal is, in the eyes of some, a social affair. They feel it a duty to be present and to be seen. They are restless until they have exchanged set may differ from the glory of another, yet each circle is of sacred importance to those within it until they can surely rise to one higher. There are some who drop into a public rehearsal as into an afternoon tea or a private musicale. Incidentally they approve Dr. Muck's tailor, applaud a soloist or a symphonic poem, and then remember an engagement elsewhere.

78

The audience of Saturday night is, as a whole, more sedate, less easily distracted, less suspicious of music, not so much afraid of being bored. There will inevitably be some late comers, but if the concert be of reasonable length there will not be a marked exodus. Dr. Muck will learn that certain composers have a rare gift of diminishing an audience. A symphony by Bruckner in the second part of a programme is an admirable test of the endurance and the courtesy of hearers. Dr. Muck is said to be a Brucknerite. It will be a pleasure for him to free the audience from a possibly unreasonable prejudice by showing the hearers that a symphony by Bruckner may have beauty and strength, not merely length, breadth and thickness.

Hearers who wish to listen conscientiously and to their full enjoyment and self-improvement should prepare themselves for a symphony concert. They should dine at a reasonably early hour and on food that fortifies, not stupefies. No one can listen with pleasure to a symphony after a pompous feast or a New England boiled dinner. A light wine should take the place of the hot juice of the Tuscan grape. Strong waters should be studiously avoided, but much coffee may be recommended in case of a symphony by Brahms. The conversation at table should be cheerful, modelled on that of Sir Thomas More before he went to the scaffold. Least of all should there be any sharp passage-at-arms, known eupheference. The women of the household should be dressed in ample time, and the husband or father should be allowed at least a pipe or a small cigar before the mad rush for seats in the car. If the wife be musical and the husband merely obliging and consenting, she should conduct the conversation in the car with the utmost tact, that the victim may be in a thoroughly receptive mood when he enters the hall. If the husband be the melomaniac, it is prudent on his part to compliment his spouse on her personal appearance.

To enjoy music with full voluptuousness, a hearer should go alone and be alone, but there has been only one Louis of Bavaria, and he was reckoned mad. Louis, solitary in the opera house, saw no one yawning furiously at the moment when he himself was ecstatic. No one put a wet umbrella close to his best trousers; no one near him whispered hoarsely to a neighbor: "You should have heard Rubinstein play it," or "Wait till you hear the adagio; it's too lovely for anything."

79

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

- I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
- II. Andante sostenuto.
- III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'istesso tempo.
- IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

RICHARD STRAUSS.

TONE POEM, "Don Juan." (after N. Lenau), op. 20

BERLIOZ.

MINUET OF WILL-O'-THE WISPS, BALLET OF SYLPHS, and RAKOCZY MARCH, from "The Damnation of Faust."

ds and smiles with persons in their own set, and while the glory of one set may differ from the glory of another, yet each circle is of sacred importance to those within it until they can surely rise to one higher. There are some who drop into a public rehearsal as into an afternoon tea or a private musicale. Incidentally they approve Dr. Muck's tailor, applaud a soloist or a symphonic poem, and then remember an engagement elsewhere.

The audience of Saturday night is, as a whole, more sedate, less easily distracted, less suspicious of music, not so much afraid of being bored. There will inevitably be some late comers, but if the concert be of reasonable length there will not be a marked exodus. Dr. Muck will learn that certain composers have a rare gift of diminishing an audience. A symphony by Bruckner in the second part of a programme is an admirable test of the endurance and the courtesy of hearers. Dr. Muck is said to be a Brucknerite. It will be a pleasure for him to free the audience from a possibly unreasonable prejudice by showing the hearers that a symphony by Bruckner may have beauty and strength, not merely length, breadth and thickness.

Hearers who wish to listen conscientiously and to their full enjoyment and self-improvement should prepare themselves for a symphony concert. They should dine at a reasonably early hour and on food that fortifies, not stupefies. No one can listen with pleasure to a symphony after a pompous feast or a New England boiled dinner. A light wine should take the place of the hot juice of the Tuscan grape. Strong waters should be studiously avoided, but much coffee may be recommended in case of a symphony by Brahms. The conversation at table should be cheerful, modelled on that of Sir Thomas More before he went to the scaffold. Least of all should there be any sharp passage-at-arms, known euphe-mistically as a slight domestic difference. The women of the household should be dressed in ample time, and the husband or father should be allowed at least a pipe or a small cigar before the mad rush for seats in the car. If the wife be musical and the husband merely obliging and consenting, she should conduct the conversation in the car with the utmost tact, that the victim may be in a thoroughly receptive mood when he enters the hall. If the husband be the melomaniac, it is prudent on his part to compliment his spouse on her personal appearance.

To enjoy music with full voluptuousness, a hearer should go alone and be alone, but there has been only one Louis of Bavaria, and he was reckoned mad. Louis, solitary in the opera house, saw no one yawning furiously at the moment when he himself was ecstatic. No one put a wet umbrella close to his best trousers; no one near him whispered hoarsely to a neighbor: "You should have heard Rubinstein play it," or "Wait till you hear the adagio; it's too lovely for anything."

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.

II. Andante sostenuto.

III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso. L'istesso tempo.

IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

RICHARD STRAUSS.

TONE POEM, "Don Juan." (after N. Lenau), op. 20

BERLIOZ.

MINUET OF WILL-O'-THE WISPS, BALLET OF SYLPHS, and RAKOCZY MARCH, from "The Damnation of Faust."

OLIVE FREMSTAD
SOPRANO

STRAUSS AND BRAHMS

Trans: Oct 27, 06
INTELLECTUAL MUSIC FOR THE
THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

The "Don Juan" That Strauss Has Built Out of His Own Time for His Own Time and the Potent Appeal of It—A Performance of Brahms's First Symphony That Kept All Its Great Qualities—Concerts of Next Week and Next Month—

We listeners at the Symphony concerts can tune our ears and our fancies to the music of the eighteenth century and find pleasure even in two hours of it. We can honor the great and established classics of the first half of the nineteenth, and when conductor and band recall them to life rejoice in them. Most of us know the voices of Wagner and of Liszt and respond readily and fully to them. Yet near as they are to us in purpose and achievement, their music cannot quite make the appeal to us that does the music of our time, that has been written since Wagner put the last note of the last measure of "Parsifal" on the page—ultra-modern music if one will, as Strauss and Mahler and Reger, D'Indy, Debussy, Loeffler and Elgar have shaped it. Dr. Muck began the third Symphony concert yesterday afternoon with Brahms's first symphony; and ended with the two dances and the Rakoczy March from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Between the two—it was a short concert—stood Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," the first music of our own time to have a place on Dr. Muck's programmes. There was no resisting the call of it. The first glowing burst of it with the instruments speaking with the voices and in the fashion that are of our own and no other day, was as exhilarating as glorified champagne to a tongue that has half forgotten its peculiar savor. The swift passage into music that ran high and deep with passion was transporting. The whole tone-poem, because most of us had heard no such music for six months and none while we have been hungering for it since the concerts began, was finely intoxicating. Wander into past centuries and mighty classics as we may, here was music that was bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh, vital with the ideas, the moods and the expression of none but ourselves.

The learned programmer has made a long list of operas from 1713 to 1892 that find their dramatic material and musical inspiration in the trite old legend of Don Juan as the play-makers and the story-tellers began to recount it in the sixteenth century. Possibly since the days when music began to be descriptive there have been composers other than Strauss who tried to relate it with the orchestra alone. Yet what do we of this autumn of 1906 care for such a Don Juan—a mere insatiate and insatiable pursuer of the 103 women, more or less, of Leporello's catalogue, who finally met his just fate at the hands of a stone statue and whom little red imps duly pulled into an underworld of redder fire. For other times, other Don Juans. Ours should be no such banal, fleshly and material figure. Pursuer of women he must be, but let him pursue not one or twenty of them, but rather a feminine ideal that is always elusive and always vanishing. Die he must for his transgressions, but let his real punishment be his disgust, weariness and disillusion of spirit with them. Down to the underworld he must go, but let him be capable of sitting there, even as Mr. Shaw's Don Juan sits in "Man and Superman," in analytical and satirical discourse of himself, mankind and womankind; and if need be, let him adjourn the conversation, as does Shaw, to the side of a motor-car in the moonlit mists of the Spanish mountains. Such a Don Juan is of our time and no other, and it is of him that Strauss has really written his music. "Tone-poem after N. Lenau," says the laconic titlepage, and Nicholas Lenau died mad in 1850 and wrote his poem of "Don Juan" six years before, when madness was already stealing upon him. Perhaps it was the madness of a man who was out of joint with his own romantic day and might have lived happier and saner in a later and subtler time.

Listen to Strauss's music to hear the voice of this Don Juan of the beginning of the twentieth century. Watch it with the eye of the imagination to see the composer limn his picture, or rather search his Juan's mind and heart. For only incidentally is Strauss interested in his hero's gallant bearing and all-conquering charm. They merely flash through the music. At best they can be no more than conventional, as the feasts and orgies that Strauss similarly suggests are the conventional background in or out of tones. His music deals with less tangible things. Deep goes the melody of passionate and inappeasable longing from almost the beginning of the tone-poem. High runs the love-song of the oboe when Don Juan seems almost to clasp the woman of his ideal. It is searching music, thrilling, enkindling ear and fancy, but it never quite attains its fullest heights or sounds its deepest depths. It is music, after all, of the ideal that Don Juan has reared in his imagination and that flees him when it seems closest and then turns and pursues him restlessly. Contrast with this melody the theme of disgust and disillusion, of weariness with the quest, with himself, almost with the ideal. It is poignant with the psychological poignancy that is one of Strauss's peculiar powers. It is bitter and acrid music, music of thought as the other is music of passion. Hear the two in interplay, in contrast and conflict, in recall upon each other as Strauss develops them from the fiery beginning to the wan close; and out of the tone-poem rises a Don Juan that is of our minds and moods, illusions and disillusion, as they go even in this Boston of October, 1906. It is a truism that the spirit of the passing centuries reshapes and recreates the figures of legend to suit its own imaginings. So Strauss has recreated and in music a Don Juan of the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth for us that live in them.

This recreation owed something yesterday to Dr. Muck and the orchestra. The conductor visibly toiled to gain from his men the lucidity and eloquence, the intensity and incisiveness that he sought. His conducting and their playing was exposition at its vividest and finest. It disclosed the intellectual design of the music in large outlines and in pregnant or in subtle details. It missed none of the contrasts and conflicts of the emotional design. It shaped and colored the figure of Don Juan before the listeners, seemingly as it stood before Strauss's imagination. It searched into Juan's mind and heart. Yet never once was it cool-blooded. From beginning to end the music went at white heat. Dr. Muck touched passionate eloquence whenever the music of the ideal demanded it. The eloquence turned bitter and sardonic when the music of the disillusion required it. Throughout he kept the peculiar restlessness and nervousness of the music. And Strauss was the more vivid and eloquent because the orchestra played his music with entire technical ease and because the conductor in all his zeal for exposition and emotion never slighted a purely musical requirement. Dr. Muck may not admire this ultra-modern music, but by every sign he cannot withstand the appeal of it. He plays it too well not to play more. The intellectual qualities in his temperament, if nothing else, bind him to Strauss.

The ideal, and the impossible, conductor is he that could approach any sort of music with full and sympathetic understanding of its contents and the transmitting power to bring all that is characteristic in it to as full and fitting expression. There is no such conductor, and there never will be, but within the range of his programme yesterday Dr. Muck came surprisingly close to such qualities. In his playing of "Don Juan" he brought the characteristic attributes of the music and of Strauss to vivid expression. His Berlioz was the thing of sound, fury and rhythmical delirium that the Rakoczy March is, and the thing of imaginatively calculated effects, harmonic, rhythmical, instrumental, that the two dances are. At moments he kept them tiny fragments of palpitating tone and once he and the band attained a pianissimo that the listener felt rather than heard. At others he laid on Berlioz's contrasts. His Brahms, in turn, summoned exceptionally the great and individual qualities of the music that too close a devotion to its letter often chokes and too little insight into its spirit often hides. Throughout, the music moved with a singularly deep and rich tonal splendor. Its stride was noble and its mood lofty. It kept its austerity and its reticence, and the austerity never became hardness and the reticence was of ordered and mastered power. Reflective and profound as the symphony is, Dr. Muck saved it from crabbedness or obscurity. He caught its calm, clear, cool beauty that is as intense as the light of an autumn day. Once again he made some phrase or passage flash into the darker colorings and the sterner stress of the music like the glint of the same autumn sunshine. He kept what really is its tonal beauty. Rarely has the first movement sounded so large with austere passion and so deep with mystery; or the second seemed such serene and uplifted meditation, keeping the voice of song; or the last marched with more triumphant solemnity. There was the exaltation in the playing of the symphony that is in the music itself—the gravity of its beauty, the power of its calm, the depth of its ideas, the fulness of their expression. Brahms was a Viennese who lived a homely life there when he was writing his first symphony; but the voice that speaks in it is as old as Sophocles. When it is played as it was yesterday there is no more doubting it than there is doubting the "Antigone."

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

Dr. Muck is apparently trying to give coherence of substance, mood and style to each of his programmes. Last week he chose only music of the eighteenth century, with a concerto of the first quarter of the nineteenth that was closely akin to it. Tonight his programme comprises music that makes its first appeal to the intellect, and in saying this we are not forgetting Berlioz's thoughtful and calculated dances. For the fourth pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, romantic music makes the programme—Schumann's first symphony, the symphony of the spring that Mr. Gerike and Weingartner each played for us last winter; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Weber's overture to his opera, "Der Freischütz." Mme. Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the singer, and since she now believes that she has lifted her contralto voice into a high soprano, she will sing Agatha's familiar scene from Weber's opera. Her other numbers are Schubert's song, "The Erl-King," with orchestra, and Schumann's songs, "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" with piano. Evidently Dr. Muck believes that a solo singer's music should be an integral part of the programme of the whole concert.

GIVE NOBLE READING OF BRAHMS' WORK

Herald ———— Oct 28.

Orchestra's Performance of Great Symphony Never Surpassed Here.

DR. MUCK'S ANALYSIS
FULL OF LIFE AND FIRE

Heroic Conception of the Grand Finale—Strauss, Berlioz Played.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the third Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 1.....Brahms
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Strauss
Three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz

Mr. Arthur Whiting, in the course of his remarks last week on the employment of the damper pedal of the piano to gain color effects, took occasion to say that Brahms was at times sensuous in his music, although he has been called austere and dry. Mr. Whiting believes that the reproach of dryness is due usually to the performance of Brahms' music rather than to the music itself. It is true that when Mr. Whiting played piano pieces of Brahms in illustration of his theories concerning the damper pedal the music was anything but sensuous.

There are various kinds of sensuousness in music as in human life. Some years ago Josephin Peladan, the fantastical Sar of dark corners, likened the music of Brahms to a gypsy woman dancing in tight-fitting corsets. He detected latent heat beneath the formal exterior.

The sensuousness of Brahms is cerebral. It might be called Platonic. However, he regulated the conduct of his private life; no woman disturbed his musical landscape. Even in songs with words of an amatory nature, his music is contemplative rather than emotional. There is no frank outburst of passionate longing or sensuous regret.

Now sensuousness alone does not make a composer great. Some of the most distinguished have not been sensuous in the meaning of the word as understood by such widely different men as Wagner and Massenet. There is a noble sensuousness in which spirit and not matter alone enters. Such sensuousness vitalizes pages of Beethoven and Cesar Franck. This quality is of close kin to mysticism. The lives of certain saints reveal this. This species of sensuousness is not dependent on color effects. It may be observed in the line of musical thought without consideration of the harmonic or the orchestral dress.

Neither the earthly nor the spiritual kind is to be observed in the music of Johannes Brahms. Like the master in the parable, he was an austere man. His two chief and distinguishing characteristics are a depressing pessimism—for there may be a reassuring and stimulating pessimism, as in the counsels and maxims of Schopenhauer—and an unusual mastery over the structure and architecture of music.

Dr. Muck could, of course, not bring out of his first symphony anything that is not contained within it; but he gave a most illuminative interpretation of the work, an interpretation that shed light on the admirable qualities of the composer and also on his limitations.

I have never heard in this country or in Germany a more intelligent and masterly performance of this much discussed work. The manner in which Dr. Muck analyzed before the audience the structure of the first movement was inimitable. His analysis was not didactic; it was not that of a person who is eager to die in defence of the sonata form. On the contrary, it was full of life, imagination and enthusiasm. It was, furthermore, remarkably elastic, and all this may be said of his interpretation of the other movements. His whole conception of the finale was on a grand and heroic scale, and he forced, in his quiet, modest manner, this impression on the audience. He mastered his hearers by something more than overwhelming sonority and realization of a superb climax. He sang his lyric orchestral passages as a skilled singer, with understanding and soul. He did not forget to prepare cunningly his backgrounds. He was not too anxious over that which is comparatively unimportant.

And the interpretation of these two movements was the crowning glory of an engrossing concert.

In the andante, which in spite of certain passages of meditative beauty is on the whole inherently uninteresting and tedious, he displayed his qualities of leadership and his insistence on a lyrical performance with the liberties in rhythm and in accentuation that are taken by all poetical and creative interpreters. The third movement might well be omitted in all performances of this symphony. Even the saddest-eyed Brahmsite can find few words in excuse of its dryness.

Strauss' "Don Juan" was fresh in the memory of the audience. The performance was highly spirited, but the music itself has produced a greater effect on former occasions. The intensity was too seldom relieved; the contrasts were not always sharply defined. What Disraeli said of the conversation of a certain colonel or captain in "Tancred" might be applied to the greater portion of the work as it was played last night: "Nothing could have been more noisy in a genteel way." Yet the section with the oboe solo was finely imagined, and the whole performance was one of great force and dash.

The excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" are perhaps too well known, nor was the performance in any way unusual.

The audience was enthusiastic after the symphony and warmly applaudive after the other selections.

The programme of the concert this week will include the overture to "Der Freischuetz," Schubert's "unfinished" symphony and Schumann's symphony in B flat major. Mme. Olive Fremstad will sing Agathe's scene and aria from "Der Freischuetz," Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" and "Mondnacht" and a song to be announced.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dr Muck gave Boston for his third program a delightful walk—or perhaps dance—through modern music, beginning with Brahms' symphony No. 1, in C minor, which Dr von Buelow called the "Tenth symphony, not as though it should be put after the Ninth; I should put it between the Second and Eroics." Then came Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem, feverish and sensuous, and finally Berlioz' three bits of "The Damnation of Faust," the minuet of the will o' the wisps, the ballet of sylphs and the Rakoczy march—a different Rakoczy march from that purveyed by so-called Hungarians with a tizmballon.

The effect of this arrangement was, after tearing his audience to pieces with the wonderful Brahms music, delighting them a little fearsomely through the scenes of Don Juan's hunt for the perfect woman, the conductor sent them from his presence delighting over the delicate melodies of the Faust dances, and with the marching rhythms of the famous old Magyar melody beating below their footsteps. It was a good order.

Dr Muck grows on one. He has his men in better touch with himself already, and has inspired the orchestra with some of his own electric, dramatic feeling. The performance is not so smooth, not so rigid either; there is perhaps a hairsbreadth visible in the attacks, but there is more fervor and abandon, and the result is more inspiring, except perhaps to the precisian.

His reading made the Brahms symphony seem like the exposition of the character and life of a great robust, masculine, uncouth woman, never understood, constantly striving to the finer things she perceived, but of which nobody believed her capable; constantly surprising one by revelations of unsuspected tenderesses, womanliness, even religious feeling, and at the end doomed to die still without the sympathy of a single soul, but triumphant in her own self-knowledge. The finale went with indescribable fire.

The "Don Juan" music was playing with great unisons, and swift appreciations of sudden, inconsequent thoughts, and the audience applauded at its close as though they had just waked up to Dr Muck for the first time. Best of all, however—O, cultured Boston—they liked the deliciously delicate humor of the fading ballet of sylphs, expiring on the soft night air.

Miss Olive Fremstad is to be the soloist this week; she will sing the "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" aria from Weber's "Freischuetz," the overture to which begins the concert. She will also sing a group of songs, with piano. The Schubert unfinished symphony, and the Schumann No. 1 will complete the program. 41th Oct 27. 06

BRAHMS' BEAUTIES SHOWN BY DR. MUCK

Found Oct 29. 06

Symphony Auditors Treated to a Positive Revelation by Magic of Famed Conductor.

The third Symphony concert proved the mettle of Conductor Muck in an entirely new and fascinating way. For it was as an interpreter of Brahms that he suddenly flashed out as the one of most brilliant musical lights Boston has ever known. He took the "austere," the "crabbed," the "unlovely"—such are the words of the Brahmsophobes—first Symphony, and made it rich, glowing, poetic, thrilling. Even the opening movement, which is on the whole long-winded and severely intellectual, was read with such beautiful clarity, such skilful contrasting of what color effects there were inherent, that it was not only not tedious, but eminently a thing to like. No less fine were the readings of the second and third movements, but the crowning glory was the finale, which Dr. Muck made so full of fire, so eloquent with tremendous crescendos, so steadily working to the last splendidly sonorous climax, that the most hardened habitues of Symphony Hall on Saturday evenings were carried away with the excitement and made to rub their eyes when it was all over and ask themselves if this were really Brahms. However, preconceived theories vanished completely against the great fact that one of the most overwhelming musical effects Boston has known had just been produced.

From that point the interest declined. Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" actually suffered after the Brahms revelation. With all its amazing uproar, its rich ornamentation and its purple tones, it seemed empty of ideas for once. It was read and played with much skill, but not with superlative power or poetry, which was rather surprising, as Dr. Muck was thought to be a great interpreter of the Strauss idea.

The performance of the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust" excerpts was brilliant, yet not altogether truthful. For instance, the will-o'-the-wisps made an unnatural amount of noise in their minuet, which was turned into a show-piece for orchestral fireworks. The famous march went with fine swing and fervor.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Brahms. Symphony No. 1, C minor.
Strauss. Tone Poem. "Don Juan."
Berlioz. Minuet, Ballet of Sylphs and Rakoczy March, from "Damnation of Faust."

After Saturday's concert no one can doubt for an instant that Dr. Karl Muck, in certain schools, is as great as any conductor in the world. Nothing but superlatives can present to the reader the absolute triumph achieved by the reading of Brahms' C minor Symphony. One must bear in mind that this is the most intricate of the composer's four symphonies, that the first movement contains some of the subtlest figure development that exists in symphony. Yet, on this occasion, the work became clear, its coherency manifest, its beauty overwhelming.

For the time this intellectual composition swept all the other modern "tone-poets" out of sight. How futile Mahler's keyless musical stories seemed, or the figure jugglery of D'Indy, after such a feast! Not that one school of composition can abolish another, but many of the moderns only attempt what Brahms has entirely accomplished. We only wished that the programme-book contained D'Indy's recent attack on Germans in Music and that the second symphony of that composer might have followed as a practical commentary.

There was no soloist upon the programme, nor was one necessary. Dr. Muck is teaching us to appreciate orchestral music "per se." The interest was continuous from the very first measures, and the introduction to the symphony was authoritative even from its first notes.

The slow movement seemed less powerful than the other three, for this is the purely emotional part of a symphony, and in direct pathos or intensity of emotion Brahms is not the rival of a Tchaikowsky or a Grieg. Yet there is far more depth of feeling in the work than one would at first concede. The scherzo, the weakest movement, made greater effect than ever before.

But the great finale was the glory of the performance and of the concert. There were many new points of reading here. There was a different tempo in the pizzicato effects from that which we have had and the horn theme was made much broader.

The summing up at the end, where the salient points of the entire work pass in review, was inexpressibly powerful. Yet there was not the slightest eccentricity or sensationalism apparent in the reading; there was no effort to inject "personality" into the interpretation; there was simply a faithful, intelligent and poetic endeavor to make all the subtleties of the symphony clear. And the result was that the audience went fairly wild over the work—and its conductor. Dr. Muck was recalled to the platform amid a frenzy of enthusiasm.

The rest of the concert was less remarkable. Even with the interval of corridor-promenading between, the Strauss work suffered by the giant power of the symphony. We may say, in parenthesis, that the placing of such an earnest work at the beginning of a programme is a distinct advantage, since the auditor comes unjaded to its complexities; yet the Gerickan idea that the effect of a masterpiece ought not to be disturbed by any following numbers, had also its confirmation by the comparative tepidity of the numbers which succeeded, although these were the most sensational of the programme.

The tone-picture of the amatory experimentalist, Don Juan, who is given over to wine, woman, but only occasionally to song, and who finally dies of paresis, was not done as perfectly as we have had it in the recent past.

The horns blew their theme till their lips were almost bleeding, and Mr. Longy played the beautiful love-theme on the oboe to perfection, but Hasheesh was not as attractive as usual after the healthy food of the first part of the feast.

Berlioz (like Bizet and Franck in other directions) is one of the French composers who has something to say. Like Richard Strauss he does not allow either sensationalism or complexity to be his sole object. Wagner's sneer that he "ciphered with notes" has long since been recognized as unjust. We have had some of the most perfect orchestral interpretations of Berlioz, in Boston, that can be imagined, and therefore the good execution of the three last numbers of the concert was by no means a revelation, in spite of very good performance. Compliments must be paid to the flute and piccolo (in the Mephisto theme of the minuet) to Mr. Schuecker's exquisite harp harmonics, and to the muted violin passages of the Ballet.

The Rakoczy march was well interpreted, yet we have heard more effect made with that final mysterious crescendo with its portentous bass-drum strokes. An extended crescendo with perfect gradation of power, such as is here demanded, is a most difficult thing to execute.

But as regards the force of the strong passages nothing was left to be desired. If the Hungarians played like that when they advanced to battle they were evidently not planning to surprise their enemies, for they would certainly attract notice some 10 miles away. But since Berlioz wanted this triumphal racket we suppose conductors must allow it to him.

Adv. Oct 29 1906 Louis C. Elson.

There are 109 concerts in the list of the Symphony Orchestra for the current season—in the smaller cities of New England, like Worcester, Portland and Providence, in the five cities—Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, New York and Brooklyn—that the band visits on its monthly trips, and in Rochester, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Indianapolis and Cincinnati for its Western journey at the end of January. As hitherto it will give two concerts at home in the course of the season for the increase of its pension fund, and at one of them Paderewski will play.

Musical Events

Transfer - Oct 29 1906

BRAHMS, Strauss and Berlioz numbers made up the programme for the third Symphony concert, said programme being Brahms' C minor symphony, the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan" and selections from "Damnation of Faust." It was an evening where the good things came first and came in such abundance as to fairly sweep the auditor off his feet. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Brahms' symphony was a revelation even to the most ardent Brahms' enthusiast and must have brought hundreds of new worshippers to the foot of the throne. It not only polished up the old and well-recognized beauties until they assumed new lustre, but brought out heretofore hidden and unappreciated beauties until the whole number seemed simply wonderful. Small wonder indeed that the audience was carried away with enthusiasm and recalled and recalled Dr. Muck. After the concert Saturday night Dr. Muck will have to be placed in first place as a reader of Brahms. Nothing equal to it has been seen in this city.

Naturally enough, after such a feast the Strauss number seemed tame. Truth to tell, the orchestra did not seem to get as much out of the number as heretofore. But then, the exceptional rendering of the symphony had so stirred its hearers that perhaps they were not in quite the right frame of mind to thoroughly appreciate the lesser work. The magnetism of the opening selection still ruled.

Dr. Muck's reading of the Berlioz number was clearly his own. It was quite different from what we have heard and did not do the work full justice. But here again it was a case of the lesser following the greater and possibly suffering from the comparison.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

To the Editor of The Herald:

Dr. Muck does well to study before arranging the Symphony programmes "the precise stage of musical development in this city." Few persons realize to what degree the taste and interest of the general public—the non-performing public, if you like—affect the musical opportunities in a community. The New England Conservatory could hardly expect to keep and tighten its grip on visiting students if Boston had inferior winters of concert and recital; and it is certain the visitors could not keep such concerts and recitals up to their present number and quality if the permanent local public did not support them. What is done to cultivate a general taste for hearing music is so much effort applied to bringing students to Boston. Let those who profit by the presence of the musical colony take this to themselves and agitate the teaching of musical appreciation in the public schools.

A. MINOR.

Boston, Oct. 14.

MUCK TO CONDUCT GERMAN CONCERT

Herald — Oct. 28, 1906

Because of Emperor William's great interest in the welfare of the Germanic Museum at Harvard, and because through the special permission of the German Emperor that Dr. Karl Muck of the Royal Opera of Berlin was given a year's leave of absence to enable him to come to Boston and become the director of the Symphony Orchestra, the latter has consented to conduct the concert which is to be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 18, for the benefit of the Germanic Museum. Nearly all the members of the Symphony Orchestra have accepted the invitation to play on that evening, and Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Symphony will give a violin solo. In addition the Arion Gesangverein of Brooklyn, N. Y., with 100 men, will sing. This concert is being arranged by the United German Societies of Greater Boston, and the committee in charge is Robert Sturn, president of the United German Societies; Prof. Frank Vogel, Christian Eberhard, Dr. Frederick W. Stuart and Berthold Schriftgiesser.

PADEREWSKI TALE FALSE.

Rumors alleging that Paderewski, the pianist, is offended because Dr. Karl Muck, the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has decided not to have the orchestra play the pianist's new symphony are declared by Mr. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony society, to be absolutely false and without foundation.

"The only reason why Dr. Muck has not yet used Paderewski's new composition is that the work is not completed," said Mr. Ellis last night. "Paderewski is still busy with his new symphony, but we understand that he is rapidly getting it into shape. Paderewski will arrive in this country the latter part of December, and will give his first concert here in January, as scheduled. He will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra." Oct. 1906

TWO TICKETS WANTED for Sat. evening Symphony Concerts. Side seats in first balcony, or on floor not far back of broad aisle. Price for remainder of season not over $25. Address N.K.P., Boston Transcript. (A)

FOR SALE—ONE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL SEAT for alternate Fridays, beginning Oct. 19; second rehearsal. Address V.H.W., Boston Transcript. (A)

The Symphony Concert

Dr. Muck's reading and the orchestra's playing of Brahms's symphony in C-minor transcended all else in the Symphony concert on Saturday night. Even Strauss's "Don Juan," which seemed less nervously and intensely played than it was on Friday, was tame for the moment in comparison. Nothing that Dr. Muck has done since he came here, not even his performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony at the first concert, matched this re-creation of Brahms's music. His listeners heard it as they have never heard the symphony before. The familiar qualities that we have come now to know in Dr. Muck's conducting shone through it—a lucidity that disclosed every detail and every subtlety of development and yet adjusted each to its place in the whole musical design; an elasticity that gave a life and a freshness that were re-creating to almost every measure; a songful quality of tone, as the Germans say, that changed the slow movement, parts of the first allegro and the noted transition into the finale with a very deep and potent beauty; and a superb sonority that lifted that finale into a mighty hymn. Greater and rarer qualities than these went besides, into the performance. Dr. Muck saw and felt the music objectively, as he does all music, but the directness of his vision and the intensity of his feeling seemed to bring the very imaginings, the very emotion, with which Brahms wrote. Here was the exaltation of mood, idea and speech that are in the music; the high aloofness rising now to grandeur or content again with serene meditation; the power that is mighty because it is so calm and so sure; the weight of thought and the warmth of feeling as the thought takes life in the tones; and the sublimity—there is no milder word—that the symphony touches at moments when a conductor and his men so rear it before the ears, the minds and the emotions of their hearers. The power and the beauty of the performance matched the thought and the passion—at its purest and whitest—that it would express. The fusion of matter, utterance and feeling was complete. The symphony became an epic in tones and an epic that had life.

H. T. P.

CONCERT DRESS.

Mr. Emil Paur, formerly of Boston, said a few days ago to a reporter: "The impression prevails among the middle or the working classes of Pittsburg that it is essential to wear full dress attire to attend a Pittsburg orchestra concert at Carnegie Music Hall. Not so. The concerts are for everybody. It is my earnest wish to have every one who loves music, rich or poor, to attend the concerts."

This is the proper spirit, although the phrase "full dress attire" may shock the purist. A man may have his body clothed in pepper-and-salt garments and yet have music in his soul. A man in a jumper may yet be sound on the question of Brahms. Never let us despise a man at a concert because he wears a shiny frock coat which puckers in the back; he may be a musician, or even a music critic.

The Lancet, a journal which has destroyed the dietetic confidence of thousands and taught them to find death lurking in door-knob, hair-brush, drinking glass and telephone, advocates "dressing for dinner" as a stimulant and bracer far superior to the cocktail. It would undoubtedly recommend dressing for a concert if the preceding dinner were too unsubstantial for such courtesy.

When the Symphony concerts were given in Music Hall "evening clothes" were seldom seen. They were worn by strangers in the city or by young men who had no other means of acquainting the world with their proud possession. Since the concerts have been given in Symphony Hall the practice of dressing for them has become more and more common, till it may now be said to be general, as far as the sitters on the floor are concerned. At the same time there is no fixed rule concerning dress as there is at Covent Garden and certain London hotels.

If only those dressing would be uniform and accurate in taste! One man will be seen in a house coat, white waistcoat, with a white cravat and a gibus. Another will walk down the aisle to his family pew in the dignity of a clawhammer, but with incongruous black cravat and derby. We regret to say that these solecisms are observed at the opera when that form of musical entertainment is vouchsafed to us. Brethren, these things should not be! Boston is without a "dresser" to serve as an authoritative model; nevertheless, torial principles that should be observed by all.

88

Nor are women as careful as they should be. How often at the opera a woman wears a handsome bodice and a rain skirt. Seen in her seat she may win the admiration of the most fastidious rival. Let her walk in the foyer and the incongruity recalls the line of Horace:

Destinat in plicem, muller formosa superne.

Or another may display in the concert hall or theatre a shirt waist and diamonds.

An audience of festal appearance stimulates those on the stage to a more brilliant endeavor. As concerts are now managed there is an appeal to both the eye and the ear. Who would be interested in the performance of a virtuoso if he were to play behind a screen? An audience in the bravery of gala dress is inspiring to actor, singer, orchestra and itself. But the donning of formal evening dress should never be made compulsory in Symphony Hall. There are some who have serious and constitutional objections to the swallow-tail coat, as Mr. George Bernard Shaw of London, and a distinguished music critic of New York.

After all the swallow-tail coat is a comfortable garment, and almost every man looks the better for it. It lasts many years if it is treated with ordinary respect. Man changes his skin, they say, every seven years. A dress coat should be serviceable for at least as many.

DR. MUCK SETS
BIG SYMPHONY
CROWD AFIRE.

American — Oct 28. 06

New Leader Scores a Great Triumph in Brahms' Heroic Work No. 1.

By Kent Perkins.

Dr. Karl Muck set the Symphony audience on fire last night!

There was a great blaze and a mighty roar, but no fire engines were called and the flames burned themselves out without damage except in blistered palms and split gloves. It was only an emotional conflagration, but it was a hot one while it lasted.

Now, a Symphony crowd is not a highly inflammable one and it is a moteworthy achievement to set it blazing. It takes a man of fire to do it and Dr. Muck proved last night that he had the necessary caloric on tap to do the trick.

He began striking fire with the steel of his nerve-ruled leadership on the sentient flint of the orchestra from the beginning of Brahms's heroic Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Began With Little Sparks.

They were only little sparks that flew out here and there through the fateful strivings and yearnings and searching for peace that rise in ever-heightening waves of harmony in the first three movements to the end of the beautiful adagio beginning the last movement and moving all with its thrilling call by horn and flute.

With the opening of the final allegro, when triumph of soul is in sight, the flames began to flow from Dr. Muck's baton. They caught in the violin strings; they leaped hither and thither, from cellos to second violins, to trombones, bassoons, oboes, clarinets, double basses, horns and trumpets, and when the whole orchestra was at last ablaze, in the tremendous closing bursts of harmony, the conflagration jumped to the audience.

Then there was given to Dr. Muck a tribute of enthusiasm that is rarely seen in Symphony Hall. He was forced to come out to acknowledge the great applause and was visibly pleased in his modest way with the deep impression he had made.

Vibrated and Sparkled.

Though there were no further furious outbursts from the audience, only normally cordial applause, the glowing emotional fire of the leader continued throughout the remainder of the programme. In the romantic beauties and suggestive emotionalism of Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem, and through the Berlioz "Faust" selections—the minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, the dainty Ballet of the Sylphs and the grandiose Rakoczy march, Dr. Muck's brilliant conducting coruscated, vibrated, flashed and sparkled.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3, AT 8 P. M.

Programme.

WEBER,	OVERTURE to the Opera "Der Freischütz."
WEBER,	SCENE & ARIA, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer." from "Der Freischütz,"
SCHUBERT,	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor. I. Allegro moderato. II. Andante con moto.
SCHUMANN,	SONGS. "ICH GROLLE NICHT." "MONDNACHT." "ERLKÖNIG."
SCHUBERT,
SCHUMANN,	SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 1, op. 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: molto vivace. Trio I: molto più vivace, Trio II IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Mme. OLIVE FREMSTAD.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

there are certain fundamental sartorial principles that should be observed by all.

Nor are women as careful as they should be. How often at the opera a woman wears a handsome bodice and a rain skirt. Seen in her seat she may win the admiration of the most fastidious rival. Let her walk in the foyer and the incongruity recalls the line of Horace:

Desinat in piscem, mulier formosa superne.

Or another may display in the concert hall or theatre a shirt waist and diamonds.

An audience of festal appearance stimulates those on the stage to a more brilliant endeavor. As concerts are now managed there is an appeal to both the eye and the ear. Who would be interested in the performance of a virtuoso if he were to play behind a screen? An audience in the bravery of gala dress is inspiring to actor, singer, orchestra and itself. But the donning of formal evening dress should never be made compulsory in Symphony Hall. There are some who have serious and constitutional objections to the swallow-tail coat, as Mr. George Bernard Shaw of London, and a distinguished music critic of New York.

After all the swallow-tail coat is a comfortable garment, and almost every man looks the better for it. It lasts many years if it is treated with ordinary respect. Man changes his skin, they say, every seven years. A dress coat should be serviceable for at least as many.

DR. MUCK SETS
BIG SYMPHONY
CROWDAFIRE.

American — Oct 28. 06

New Leader Scores a Great Triumph in Brahms' Heroic Work No. 1.

By Kent Perkins.

Dr. Karl Muck set the Symphony audience on fire last night!

There was a great blaze and a mighty roar, but no fire engines were called and the flames burned themselves out without damage except in blistered palms and split gloves. It was only an emotional conflagration, but it was a hot one while it lasted.

Now, a Symphony crowd is not a highly inflammable one and it is a moteworthy achievement to set it blazing. It takes a man of fire to do it and Dr. Muck proved last night that he had the necessary caloric on tap to do the trick.

He began striking fire with the steel of his nerve-ruled leadership on the sentient flint of the orchestra from the beginning of Brahms's heroic Symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Began With Little Sparks.

They were only little sparks that flew out here and there through the fateful strivings and yearnings and searching for peace that rise in ever-heightening waves of harmony in the first three movements to the end of the beautiful adagio beginning the last movement and moving all with its thrilling call by horn and flute.

With the opening of the final allegro, when triumph of soul is in sight, the flames began to flow from Dr. Muck's baton. They caught in the violin strings; they leaped hither and thither, from cellos to second violins, to trombones, bassoons, oboes, clarinets, double basses, horns and trumpets, and when the whole orchestra was at last ablaze, in the tremendous closing bursts of harmony, the conflagration jumped to the audience.

Then there was given to Dr. Muck a tribute of enthusiasm that is rarely seen in Symphony Hall. He was forced to come out to acknowledge the great applause and was visibly pleased in his modest way with the deep impression he had made.

Vibrated and Sparkled.

Though there were no further furious outbursts from the audience, only normally cordial applause, the glowing emotional fire of the leader continued throughout the remainder of the programme. In the romantic beauties and suggestive emotionalism of Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem, and through the Berlioz "Faust" selections—the minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, the dainty Ballet of the Sylphs and the grandiose Rakoczy march, Dr. Muck's brilliant conducting coruscated, vibrated, flashed and sparkled.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3, AT 8 P. M.

Programme.

WEBER,	OVERTURE to the Opera "Der Freischütz."
WEBER,	SCENE & ARIA, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischütz,"
SCHUBERT,	UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor. I. Allegro moderato. II. Andante con moto.
	SONGS.
SCHUMANN,	"ICH GROLLE NICHT."
SCHUBERT,	"MONDNACHT."
	"ERLKÖNIG."
SCHUMANN,	SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 1, op. 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: molto vivace. Trio I: molto più vivace, Trio II IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Mme. OLIVE FREMSTAD.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

NIGHT OF SONG AT SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston American Nov. 4. 06
Dr. Muck, with Mme. Fremstad as Soloist, Gives a Melodious Program.

AUDIENCE MOVED TO ENTHUSIASM

By Kent Perkins.

It was a lyric evening at the fourth Symphony concert of the season in Symphony Hall last night. For those good folk to whom tuneful melody is all in all, the programme was one long uninterrupted pleasure.

They were untroubled by any staid classicism that, according to their view, leans too far backward in its dignity to be pleasing; they were untroubled by any geometric figuration or brazen blare of the ultra-modern striving for novelty. They drank deep drafts of glorious song from Weber, Schubert and Schumann, and were content without surfeit.

Now Dr. Muck dearly loves a song—a real song—and it delights his soul to help the Symphony Orchestra sing it with all the moving force that high artistry can command. So he threw himself into the work of last evening with a fervor and illumination of interpretation that developed new beauties in the well-known melodies given forth by the musicians.

The "popular" character of the programme and the presence of Mme. Olive Fremstad as soloist served to fill every seat in the hall.

First came Weber's ever gaudy overture to "Der Freischütz." Then Mme. Fremstad sang the lovely recitative and aria from the same opera, "How tranquilly I slumbered" and "Softly sighing." Her dramatic expression was satisfying and not overdrawn, while her singing of the air made familiar by immemorial use as a church hymn gave extreme pleasure.

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B minor, in which if in any human song the music of the spheres may be heard, was played with uplifting effect.

Mme. Fremstad sang Schumann's "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Erlking." She was accompanied only with the piano and it seemed more like a recital at this point than a Symphony Concert. She was at her best in the "Erlking" with its dramatic possibilities and was recalled repeatedly by a hearty applause.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1, wherein the hope and beauty and glory of Spring are pictured in matchless melody and harmony, called forth the highest efforts both of Dr. Muck and the orchestra with results that will long be remembered by their hearers.

Next Friday and Saturday the orchestra will be on tour; so there will be neither rehearsal nor concert.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post Nov. 4. 1906
Popular Programme With Mme. Olive Fremstad as Soloist

Mme. Olive Fremstad of the Metropolitan Opera Company was the soloist at the fourth Symphony concert last evening, and this was the programme:

Overture to "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Recitation and aria from "Der Freischütz".....Weber Unfinished symphony B minor.....Schubert
Songs with piano:
"Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht".....Schumann
"Erlking".....Schubert
Symphony No. 1, op. 38.....Schumann

This was a programme of familiar numbers, yet probably none to be given at future concerts will surpass the one of last evening as to general popularity. The overture to "Der Freischütz" is probably one of the best of its kind, and the "Unfinished Symphony" never loses its charm. The Schumann symphony also is always welcome.

Dr. Muck interpreted each of these numbers with remarkable clearness and intelligence.

Some portions of the overture were taken in slower time than that which one has been accustomed to, but all in all the general performance was in every way satisfying.

Mme. Fremstad appeared at these concerts for the first time. She has sung elsewhere in this city at various times, the most important occasion being at the Boston Theatre as Kundry in "Parsifal" and Sieglinde in "The Valkyrie."

Last evening she sang with acceptance. She has a fine mezzo-soprano voice, especially in the lower register, and sings with excellent style. She does not, however, apparently use her voice to the best advantage, owing, probably, to some fault in method of production, and the outcome will evidently be an impairment of voice within a few years, a result that could be avoided with the proper training. Mme. Fremstad was liberally applauded, and there were several recalls.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

FREMSTAD APPEARS AS SOPRANO

Herald Nov. 4. 1906
Contralto Is a Victim to Her Misplaced Ambition.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, Dr. Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall last evening, was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Scene and aria from "Der Freischütz".....Weber Unfinished symphony in B minor.....Schubert Songs—"Schumann's "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mondnacht" and Schubert's "Erlking."
Symphony in B flat major, No 1.....Schumann

There are some who say, and not without reason, that the appearance of a singer or violinist, or pianist, or violoncellist, at a Symphony concert is an intrusion unless the individual display of art be necessary to the ensemble, as in the finale of the Ninth symphony or in Vincent d'Indy's symphony on a mountain folksong for piano and orchestra.

Whenever a commanding personality comes between orchestral pieces the interest of the great majority of the audience is centred on the singer, pianist, violinist. The expectant pay little attention to the opening overture or symphony, and the composition that stands between the two appearances of the man or woman serves for rest or for the accumulation of fresh enthusiasm which will soon be expended.

The audience is especially curious about opera singers, for these singing women even while they are in the exercise of their calling are enveloped in a legendary mist. The fact that an opera singer of more than ordinary dramatic ability disappoints the hearer as a rule when she ventures upon the platform of a concert hall is not considered by the audience, which has eyes and not ears alone. There is the distinguished prima donna, Mme. X., not Mme. X. as Sieglinde, or Carmen, or Aida, but Mme. X. without a make-up. There is pleasant speculation as to her age, the cost of her gown and the dwelling place of her dressmaker. Incidentally the audience hears her sing. Accustomed to make dramatic points in the opera house without a fine regard for the niceties of vocal art, she often forgets that dramatic animation in song seems extravagant or grotesque in the concert hall.

The force of an operatic situation, the intensity of dramatic action, the sumptuousness of scenery and costumes, the encouraging and abetting orchestra—these conceal in a large measure vocal deficiencies which in concert are only too apparent. Few distinguished prima-donnas excel in concert. Still fewer shine in an intimate song-recital.

The public demands the presence of soloists in the course of a season of symphony concerts, whether the city be Berlin or Boston, Paris or New York. The managers, wise in their generation, gratify this demand. The list of soloists in the preliminary announcement excites more comment than would a complete list of the orchestral pieces to be played.

When the distinguished singer does appear the programme is usually disarranged for her, and it is without coherent plan, without significance. Mme. X. gives a concert assisted by the orchestra.

Mme. Olive Fremstad was the singer last night, and it may at once be said than is generally the case.

than is generally the case. The programme arranged by Dr. Muck before he left Berlin was one of very familiar pieces, so familiar that to discuss their character would be an act of impertinence toward the reader.

The overture to "Der Freischütz" might well be shelved for a few seasons. At the next concert we are to have the equally familiar overture to "Oberon." One—two—then let the overture to "Euryanthe" be played Nov. 24, and let Carl Maria von Weber be retired on three strikes.

Inasmuch as Dr. Muck felt that the overture to "Der Freischütz" should be played once more in Boston—was the performance the 14th or 15th at these Saturday night concerts?—what more fitting than that Mme. Fremstad should sing Agathe's scene and aria from the same esteemed opera?

Inasmuch as familiar symphonies by Schubert and Schumann were chosen by Dr. Muck—they were played extremely well last season—what more appropriate than songs by Schumann and Schubert? Evenings with the old masters! Weber and Weber! Schubert, and Schubert! Schumann and Schumann!

Mme. Fremstad, who won her reputation as a contralto, has of late years grown uneasy. The laurels of sopranos would not let her sleep. Having tried flights in the higher vocal aether, she now announces herself as a dramatic soprano.

She chose for an aria the one from "Der Freischütz." The allegro of this aria is inherently unvocal. It is clumsily written for the voice, and certain passages are of a purely instrumental character. The music taxes any true soprano. Last night there was the constant suggestion during the performance of a singer laboring to achieve something which was beyond her natural limitations. And so in the "Mondnacht" of Schumann and in the "Erlking," there was laborious expression. The pity of it, and the more the pity because this ineffective exhibition was all unnecessary. Mme. Fremstad was gifted by nature with a voice of surpassing beauty. Her ambition has led her to disdain this natural beauty in the desire to achieve an impossible triumph. As a result she has lost in a measure the rich and imposing quality of the lower tones, and the upper tones are not musical or of any true dramatic force. As her voice now is it seems prematurely worn and uneven. This much may be said in praise of her performance: that she respected the limitations of the concert stage, and was not extravagantly dramatic. While her delivery of the "Erl King"—a song, by the way, that was sung for many years only by men—was not by any means masterly, it was never, as is now too often the case, a mere exhibition of ventriloquism.

Orchestra Gives Numbers Well Worn by Repetition.

Dr. Muck was not wholly in the vein. The first movement of the overture was taken so slowly that the horn song suffered from lack of continuity, nor was the rest of the overture demoniacally sinister and irresistibly triumphant. Schubert's symphony has been better played here. The reading was over elaborate, mannered and at times sentimental fell into sentimentalism. Dr. Muck was more fortunate with Schumann's symphony, for the first movement was played with much spirit. All in all an uninteresting concert.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mme Fremstad Soloist at the Symphony.

The fourth Symphony program contained no musical novelties, familiar compositions by Weber, Schubert and Robert Schumann being the selections. Mme Olive Fremstad was the soloist. Dr Muck was on safe and conservative ground with this program, for the larger compositions could be classed as enjoyable to the general concert attendant who finds scant pleasure in abstruse musical—or nonmusical—problems, and the orchestra could play them "offhand" and felt at ease following the conductor's baton. The numbers were the overture to Weber's opera, "Der Freischütz," and a scene and aria from the same work; Schubert's unfinished B minor symphony and his "Erlking" aria; two songs by Schumann and the same composer's first symphony.

Mme Fremstad's voice shows the rich quality of the contralto through most of the registers and, excepting in some forte passages, the tone was clear, true and sweet. The Weber aria was sung with splendid expression and dramatic effect, although not in an operatic vein. The mezzo voice was used in Schumann's "Mondnacht" with great skill, and in the "Erlking" the vocal contrasts were defined admirably. It was only in sustained high soprano work that Mme Fremstad failed to give satisfaction, and that was more by contrast than by actual performance. Her reception was very cordial.

The long program was made thoroughly enjoyable by the seemingly perfect work of the orchestra and its thorough sympathy with Dr Muck's readings. There were no "surprises" in the interpretations, and nothing radical in the performance of any number. The beauty of the horn passages in the Weber overture calls for special mention in that piece. The unfinished Schubert symphony was played, as it always is by the orchestra, with exquisite refinement and sentiment, and Schumann's symphony was little, if any, less worthy of commendation. Mr Zack played the piano parts to the songs in his usual efficient manner. The orchestra will be away this week. Mme Szumowska will be the soloist at the fifth rehearsal and concert.

Trans. Here in Boston Nov. 2, 06

Dr. Muck makes his first appearances in New York as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, next Thursday evening, and the following Saturday afternoon. At the first of the two concerts, he will repeat the programme that he made for his debut here—Beethoven's fifth symphony, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," "A Slegfried Idyl" and a "Faust" overture out of Wagner. At the second concert, he takes Brahms's first symphony and Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," out of his programme here last week, and adds to them Weber's overtures to his operas, "Der Freischütz" and "Oberon." The two symphonies will disclose Dr. Muck's amplest and finest powers as a conductor, and by the compositions from Wagner and by Strauss's tone-poem, New York may judge his feeling and capacity for the music of our own generation.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK RE-CREATES FAMILIAR MUSIC

Trans. Nov. 3, 1906
A Programme Out of Schumann, Schubert and Weber—A Week of Pianists—The First Kneisel Concert—Schumann-Heink's Song Recital—Concerts of the Month

Again, for the Symphony concert yesterday, Dr. Muck made a programme that had a large unity of design, substance, and mood. It began with Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," and then Mme. Fremstad sang Agatha's long scena from that opera. Schubert's unfinished symphony followed, and next Mme. Fremstad sang two songs of Schumann, "Ich Grolle Nicht" and "Mond Nacht" and Schubert's own "Erl King." Then for ending came Schumann's first symphony—the symphony of the spring and the elation that it stirs. Thus, it was a programme of the romantic music of the first half of the last century, as it expressed itself in opera, in songs, and in the symphonic form. All the music was familiar; almost all of it we were hearing only last winter, and therefore it was the more potent to communicate and maintain the mood that Dr. Muck sought. It asked him and his band to impart, and his hearers to feel the dramatic warmth and poignancy of Weber's overture coming to as full expression within the orthodox forms as it might in all the freedom of a tone-poem; the variety and the ardor of emotion in his scena, orthodox again though its form is; the lyric beauty and the power of lyric outburst in Schubert's unfinished symphony; and the superb sweep and spirit, the sheer tonal splendor, and the sheer ardor of feeling in Schumann's apotheosis of the spring. The intervening songs were, perhaps, as sidelights and incidents to the rest, and since Mme. Fremstad sang them under difficulties that will have vanished by tonight, they and her singing of them may wait for later comment.

Of the rest, too, it is almost superfluous to write. Thrice within the year the public of our orchestral concerts has heard both symphonies and Weber's overture, and twice his scena has been sung to it. If there was the spur of familiarity to prick our ears and our fancies to quicker understanding and warmer appreciation, there was also the peril of the loss of vitality of impression that besets all familiar things and familiar music most of all. It was for Dr. Muck and the orchestra to avert this danger, and he and his men lavished upon the music the new vitality he has summoned in them. They flung Schumann's symphony upon the ears and the imaginations of their hearers with what seemed the very passion with which the composer wrote, brought to the fulness, power and beauty of expression that his imagination heard. They recreated the undulating beauty of Schubert's orchestral song, and through that beauty shone darker or brighter the fitful moods of his tone-poem as freshly and as vividly as they played first through him. In the overture Weber's music glowed again. For once, such was the dramatic appeal of it, the curtain might have risen forthwith and we that listened heard the opera gladly. As it was the orchestra vanished by the magic of its own playing and its conductor's fire, and in its stead, even on the stage of Symphony Hall, stood Agatha and her Max above the darksome glen of Samiel's incantation.

H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Nov. 3, 1906 PROGRAMME. Adm
Weber, "Freischuetz Overture."
Weber, Prayer scene from "Der Freischuetz."
Schubert, Unfinished Symphony.
Schumann, "Moonlight and 'Ich grolle nicht.'"
Schubert, "Erl-king."
Schumann, Symphony in B flat.
Soloist, Mme. Olive Fremstadt.

It was at least a consistent programme, all good, all of the early romantic school, and nothing new or incendiary. Dr. Muck runs to symphonies. He has given Boston two at a single concert, and Cambridge heard three at a sitting. At this concert we had one and a half. It was not too much, for the Schumann symphony is short, both symphonies above-named are beautiful and they are well contrasted.

There was no such surprise and triumph, on this occasion, as when a week before, the great performance of the Brahms symphony took place. We have had the best possible performances and readings of the two symphonic works of this programme, and the present interpretation seemed rather careful and intelligent than inspired. The Weber overture was read somewhat after the Weingartner manner, all contrasts being made as sharp as possible, and the slow portions drawn out to an extreme length. The horn quartette was excessively slow, and scarcely gained by this. But the pizzicato effects on the contrabasses and the theatrical phrases which follow were powerful and the entire reading, if not the reviewer's ideal of the number, was striking and neither affected nor experimental; the conductor evidently knew exactly what he was aiming at, and had succeeded in imparting his views to his orchestra.

It was quite logical to follow the overture with an aria which contained one of its themes. But we may confess that we no longer become very enthusiastic about the mild-mannered Agatha and her target-shooting sweetheart. In the field of dramatic and theatrical power the world has passed beyond Weber, although his overtures, because of their conciseness, and because they combine good development with their melodious themes, will probably never be superseded.

ne. Fremstadt was unequal in her execution; at times tepid and making the linked sweetness too long drawn out, and at times vehement rather than broad-toned. Her group of three songs did not seem to fit the orchestral surroundings, although Mr. Zach "did his possible" with the piano accompaniments. "Ich Grolle Nicht" is not a female song. Its bitter denunciation, its fury of triumph (a musical amplification of Tennyson line—"Perish in thy self-contempt!") are entirely masculine, and while Mme. Fremstadt evidently had an artistic ideal of the scope of the work, she could not attain it.

"The Erl-king," too, in spite of the greatness of Mme. Schroeder-Devrient in its measures, is not properly a female song. Here the artist deflected from pitch once or twice, and gave a remarkable "Parlando" effect to the statement that the child was dead—in the last measure.

If ever there was a musical picture of a calm, still moonlight night, it is in the "Mondnacht" of Schumann, and if ever there was a song that was unfitted to a Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, it is this one. Mme. Fremstadt sang it artistically, with full comprehension of its delicacy and subtleness, but, to use a commercial metaphor, this composition belongs to the retail, not to the wholesale, trade.

There are many orchestral works in the same predicament. We fancy that some of the Mozart and Haydn symphonies, some even of the Mendelssohn overtures, and certainly all of the Bach orchestral numbers, would gain greatly if they could be heard performed by a smaller orchestra in a much smaller hall. Such an organization can yet be established in Boston, without trenching upon the field of our great Symphony Orchestra, and we hope that it may soon come into existence.

Everything seemed a trifle slow at this concert, and the unfinished Symphony formed no exception. Schubert charms by his melodic directness, and only gains by simplicity of interpretation. Here, if ever, it is impossible to gild refined gold or add a perfume to the violet.

The Schumann symphony was the finest part of the concert. It is a work that can never grow old, and familiarity only increases enthusiasm in this case. Its charm perhaps lies in the fact that it appeals both to emotion and intellect. Its melodies are beautiful, natural and unstrained, yet symphonic shape and symphonic development are there in full measure. The scoring is very simple, compared with the vivid hues of the present, but we would gladly exchange all the tone-colors of Strauss or Mahler for a little more of the tune-instinct of Schumann or Schubert.

Louis C. Elson.

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY
First Balcony facing stage, third row; two good aisle seats, $30 each, Saturday concert. Address F. E. M., Boston Transcript.
2t(A):

GERMAN CLASSICS AT THE SYMPHONY

Journal — Nov. 5/06

"Der Freischütz" Saturday and
"Oberon" Announced for Next Performance.

The fourth Symphony concert was evidently devised by Dr. Muck as an educator. Boston was to be given a good, wholesome dose of the German classicists, something pleasant to take, and at the same time eminently helpful to the musical system. So he began with the overture to "Freischütz." No symphony-goer need be told how ancient, how hackneyed, how almost completely uninspiring this work is. Unless it is read with consummate poetic art—as Weingartner read it here last season—it is nowadays perilously close to being a bore. Dr. Muck and his men failed to breathe into it any extraordinary vitality or beauty and it left its hearers indifferent. The program book announces another Weber warhorse, the "Oberon" overture, for the next concert. It should be accompanied by a lecture on the beauty and power of this suddenly rediscovered composer.

The two beautiful fragments of Schubert's B minor symphony are always full of pathetic charm, no matter under what conductor, if he be adequate at all. In this case the movements were more roughly played and less coherently outlined than we have been used to hearing them. They made their way by their own great charm, but they have been given with more nobility at these concerts. The Schumann "Spring" symphony, with its irrepressible spirit and fascinating romanticism, went much better. The conductor evidently felt the meaning of the music to the full, and his interpretation of it, while not invariably bringing out the crystalline purity of the music, was full of fire and joyous abandon. The third movement, especially, with its complexity of rhythm and phrase, was particularly well done.

Mme. Olive Fremstad was the soloist, and her choice of songs seemed modeled on Dr. Muck's choice of orchestral pieces. She first gave the familiar Weber aria from "Freischütz," a thing that now arouses no emotion in the hearer save that of ennui, unless some singer of consummate ability presents it. Mme. Fremstad, excellent and impressive as she is in grand opera, has not now the voice nor the style for concert singing, and she lent no distinction to the work. She was at her best in the Schubert song, "Ich grolle nicht," later.

The Symphony Concert
Dr. Muck completed on Saturday evening the first four of the Symphony concerts of the year. His programmes for them have ranged from Bach, Haydn and Mozart, through Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms, to Wagner and Richard Strauss. He has had highly sympathetic audiences and as sympathetic a band. His men have done their best for him; his hearers have been first open-minded, then well-disposed, then eager. He leaves us now for a fortnight for the first journey of the orchestra to other cities, and his absence, perhaps, brings the moment in which to try to sum the qualities that he has disclosed. Of three at least there can be no disputing. He has given the orchestra a new elasticity, a new sonority and a new vitality. It has long played with very high technical aptitude, accuracy and intelligence. To them it has added as long and in as high degree, beauty and euphony of tone. To those qualities Dr. Muck has now added a new richness and warmth and a responsive undulation that bends to every turn of the music and to the mood or the passion behind it. There is more of the full voice of song now in sustained passages and more of energy and suppleness in the fitful; there are deeper or sharper tints in the tonal backgrounds; there is more elasticity in the tonal arabesques. In a word, the performances of the orchestra under Dr. Muck, when both are at their best, have come warmer in feeling and in expression. There are equally a new emotional depth and a new nervous energy in them. At their fullest, as with Beethoven's or Brahms's symphonies, they have been as exciting as ever wandering "star" conductor wrought. And so far they have attained to this intensity with no abatement of the accuracy, the euphony, the balanced and interwoven tone, and the general technical finesse of the band.

Dr. Muck has further disclosed himself as a purely objective conductor with all the virtues that such a point of view and temperament imply. His aim seemingly is not to impart the music to us as it may flow through him and take shape and color from his own ideas and sensations, but to re-create it as it flowed through the composer's mind and imagination. He has striven seemingly to give to each symphony, overture and tone-poem, its peculiar and characteristic eloquence. Twice, at least, by the penetration of his own intelligence into that eloquence and by his own imaginative response to its beauty and its power, he has re-created the symphonies of Brahms and Beethoven so that they sounded as they have not sounded here in years. He kept his programme of eighteenth-century music to the voice and the manner of its time. He gave his programme of romantic music, at least on Friday afternoon, the ardor of feeling and expression that lies behind it. He has caught the nervous intensity of Strauss, and the more sustained emotional intensity of Wagner. He is capable of the imaginative as well as the technical virtuosity that Berlioz's dances asked. In two respects only has he fallen short. His objective qualities could not penetrate and summon the tenderness of Mozart nor the lyric beauty and the lyric emotion of Schubert. They are not, seemingly, in Dr. Muck's temperament, and by taking thought, deeply and imaginatively as he takes thought of all his music, he may not place them there. H. T. P.

Mrs. Muck Makes Many Friends Here

Will Receive at the Vendome Friday Afternoon During "The Tambola."

Journal — Nov. 7, 1906
Mrs. Karl Muck, who, with Margaret Deland, is expected to receive at the Vendome Friday afternoon during "The Tambola," is making quite a place here in society. I find her one of the most unassuming and approachable of women, who will make friends purely through her own personality and savoir faire. She is a native of Graz, Austria, and moves in the highest circles there and elsewhere, notably in Germany.

Since the death of their only child Mrs. Muck has traveled with her husband wherever his musical duties have taken him, and, being gifted along those lines, they find much mutual pleasure. She is most attractive, as I've already told you, is above medium height, slender, with expressive features, brown hair and blue eyes, and an effective foil for Mr. Muck, who is quite dark, as we know. Their apartments in the Empire overlook Commonwealth Avenue and are handsomely fitted up. Mrs. Muck goes to New York late in the week.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

WANTED—One-half share in two season tickets. Address D.A.K., Boston Transcript.
(A):

2 SYMPHONY TICKETS FOR SALE

Alternate Saturday evenings. First row balcony; A 30, 31. Telephone 658 Main.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

Two best seats for sale for the season; $50 each. Address G.M.C., Boston Transcript.
2t(A):

WANTED—HALF OF A SATURDAY EVENING SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKET—Please communicate with S. W., 2 Berkeley Place, Cambridge.
2t(A) n 13

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to the opera "Oberon."

CHOPIN,

CONCERTO in E minor, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, No. 1, op. 11.

- I. Allegro maestoso.
- II. Romanze: Larghetto.
- III. Rondo: vivace.

SINDING,

SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 1, op. 21.

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante.
- III. Vivace: Più moderato.
- IV. Maestoso.

Soloist:

Mme. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.

The Piano is a Mason and Hamlin.

DR. MUCK SCORES ANOTHER TRIUMPH

Brings Out Unusual Power From Orchestra at Fifth Symphony Concert. Nov. 19, 06

The program for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Saturday night was short, and a great many persons were delighted at the brevity. Dr. Karl Muck led all three numbers. The list was made up of Weber's overture to "Oberon," Chopin's E minor concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mme. Antoinette Szumowska at the piano, and Sinding's D minor symphony.

The overture is familiar and without doubt known backward by one-half the audience, but Dr. Muck displayed consummate skill in its performance, making the adagio a most exquisite scene. When the finale was finished the large audience realized they had really heard the overture for the first time.

The selection of Chopin's E minor concerto was unfortunate as a vehicle for the display of Mme. Szumowska's virtuosity, as the beautiful composition was not intended for performance in such a large hall. Except for a slight misunderstanding between orchestra and soloist and a tendency upon her part to unnecessary vigor, the concerto was admirably given.

Sinding's symphony has been heard before, but so long ago it was to all intents and purposes new. It was read under Mr. Gericke in January, 1899. It is somber and grim throughout, almost savage. Dr. Muck brought out new strength in the fortes and withal developed unexpected powers in the orchestra.

A LADY HAS A SYMPHONY TICKET
For Sale for the rest of season. Address
P. B. O., Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony Seats Wanted Two good seats on floor for alternate Saturday evenings. Address, with price and location, C. T. C., Boston Transcript.
WS(A) n 28

Wanted—A Friday Symphony Ticket
Whole or half-ticket. E. J., 4 Dean St., Everett, Mass. (A):

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, pianist, was the soloist of the Symphony concert last evening, and the programme was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony No. 1.....Sinding

The Sinding symphony was played once before several years since under Mr. Gericke. The work has many pages of interest, although as a whole it is uneven and often labored, being evidently not a work of lasting value. Dr. Muck conducted with evident intent to bring out all the merit that there was in the work and succeeded remarkably well. The familiar "Oberon" overture proved most acceptable. Mme. Szumowska played the Chopin concerto in a highly finished manner, but the interpretation was generally without depth or poetic sense. It was pleasing but not authoritative. The pianist was liberally applauded and recalled.

A "Russian" programme by Glazounoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff is promised for this coming week, with a Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, as the soloist in the Tchaikowsky concerto.

WANTED—HALF OF A SATURDAY EVENING SYMPHONY CONCERT TICKET—
Please communicate with S. W., 2 Berkeley Place, Cambridge. 2t(A) n 13

SYMPHONY TICKETS
Rehearsals, Concerts — Choice locations.
HARDING, 70 Kilby St. 2t(A): o 6

(6299.) The Boston Athenæum has an incomplete set of Symphony Orchestra programmes. Has anyone a complete set?

C. K. B.

[The following reply to the above query is from the Boston Public Library: "We have in the Brown collection a complete set of the Boston Symphony programmes, 1881 to 1906, compiled with indexes, comments and clippings from newspapers, by Allen A. Brown, twenty-five volumes, M. 125. 5. There is in the fine arts department an incomplete file from 1886 to 1906, without comments, *8057. 38. This latter set contains the programmes as printed, while Mr. Brown uses only the one page giving the programme of the concert."]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

WEBER, CHOPIN AND SINDING MAKE THE PROGRAMME

Three Sorts of Romantic Feeling, and Dr. Muck's Skill in Contrasting Them—A New Week of Many Concerts—Other Concerts to Come—The Plans of the Hoffmann Quartet

Trans. — Nov. 17, 1906
Dr. Muck's programme for the fifth Symphony concert, yesterday afternoon, lacked the clarity and certainty of scheme that has distinguished its predecessors. Again, it was a romantic programme, but three sorts of romanticism divided it—the highly colored, declamatory, and dramatic romanticism of Weber's overture to his opera of "Oberon"; the subtly tinted, reticent and musing romanticism of Chopin's piano concerto in E-minor; and the sombre, deep-voiced and passionate romanticism of Sinding's symphony in D-minor. Sixty years in time separated the overture and the concerto from the symphony, and the interval in imaginative and emotional content is far wider. German though Weber was, his romanticism in the overtures to "Der Freischütz" and to "Oberon" and in the "concert piece" for piano and orchestra that Mr. Reisenauer played last autumn, is of the sort that Théophile Gautier symbolized when he put on his flaming red waistcoat for the first performance of Victor Hugo's "Hernani" in Paris. It is romanticism with a flourish. "Allegro con fuoco" Weber scrawled in the score after the crashing chord that ends the soft mystery of the introduction and begins the main body of the overture.

... "Monts d'Aragon! Galice! Est-tramadoure!
Oh! je porte malheur à tout ce qui m'en-toure!"

cries Hernani to Dona Sol at one of the crises in Hugo's play. There is the same flourish in the music and the verse—Hugo ought really to have made a libretto for Weber—the same loud, clear note of chivalry, the same voice of high-pitched and warmly colored romance. "Il tutto pianissimo possibile" is Weber's direction at the beginning of the overture; in imagination he must have heard, and yesterday he could in fact have heard, Oberon's horn call in the purest of tones; "presto con fuoco" goes the instruction further on; again there is warmed brilliance and again full-voiced musical speech. In a word, everything must tend to its extreme (as musical extremes went eighty years ago); everything must be declamatory; everything must be sharp-set in dramatic contrast to what precedes and follows it. Weber, in the "concert piece," could not help dramatizing the little story of the returning Crusader. In the overtures he is almost melodramatic. The orchestra must declaim in them as the actors do in their Hugo.

Delicate and super-delicate in immediate comparison seemed the romanticism of Chopin's concerto. Much of the overture was fiery inspiration; as much of the concerto, rather languorous meditation. It is easy to call the long and tedious "working-out" of the first movement mere adroit technical exercise. Perhaps it is quite as much gentle musing over the melodic material Chopin had already devised. It is sweet in the first movement; it becomes sweeter in the larghetto; it is little more than animated sweetness in the finale. Weber put into the overture the high emotions, the vivid sounds, the dramatic moods that Romance spoke in his ears. Chopin in the concerto heard only a gentle call, repeated as he mused upon it, and he answered it as gently. Weber's Romance trod the stage; Chopin's in the concerto was a gossamer vision, a thing of sweetness and of tender light. He could not make her voice too sweet, her step too graceful; and little cared he whether his concerto would sound thin and pale in a modern concert-room with a modern piano and a modern orchestra. Weber saw and cried his visions. Chopin dreamt in this particular concerto and barely spoke out. His is the loveliness of romance, the brightness of its little things.

Probably the audiences that were hearing "Oberon" and the concerto in E minor in the thirties would not have called Sinding's symphony romance at all. They would have heard it as some of us first heard "Thus Spake Zarathustra," or "A Hero's Life," as almost savage music. They would have recoiled at its incessant sonority, its sombre coloring, its insistent restlessness and striving, its bareness and boldness of idea and expression. Yet here, as truly as the romanticism of Weber and of Chopin is of their time and temperament, is another romanticism of ours, touched, indeed, by Sinding's own individuality, but still of his whole generation. Weber's romantic feeling saw glorious or darksome visions—knights sweeping up through the forest to the castle gate; or Oberon and his fairy court; or Samiel's haunted glen. "It is intended to convey beautiful memories, moonlit impressions," wrote Chopin as he dreamed of the soft song of his slow movement, and akin is the grace that dances in his rondo. For Sinding there are no implicit visions or moonlit impressions to put into tones. Romance has lost her brightness and her gentleness. Her robes are dark, and her voice deep. She fills her devotees with a passionate and sombre striving. They pursue her, as Sinding pursues her through the passionate sonorities of his first movement, now with a grim intensity, now with bold impetuosity. She calls to sombre meditation, to restless longing, to the bare, bleak song with which he fills his slow movement. She drives them to the shadowed gayety of his scherzo. And then he and they turn and pursue her again imperiously, almost savagely. "Her face is far from this our war, our call and counter-cry," but still she stirs the passion of men to reconquer her in all her brightness and gentleness. Strive they will, though it desolate their hearts and darken their pleasures, and it is this passionate eagerness and restlessness that Sinding puts into his music. They will not woo her as Chopin, for example, did. They will conquer her as Sinding would conquer her. His is the romance of a dark and troubled yet bold imagination, speaking with passionate utterance. Later, perhaps, he was to hold her captive and bright again in his "Chivalric Episodes."

There has been no better evidence of the acute intelligence, the imaginative discrimination and the clear emotional responsiveness of Dr. Muck's conducting than the skill and the vividness with which he differentiated Weber's, Chopin's and Sinding's music. Each composer seemed for the moment to be having his will. It was with the utmost of pianissimos that the overture to "Oberon" began; the horn calls haunted, and then the music leapt on its fiery way. The glow of romance burnt again in the overture. Familiar as every dramatic device is in it, the vitality remained. The orchestral part of Chopin's concerto, thin and scanty as it is, kept its characteristic note of gentle and musing swiftness. Then came the passionate sonorities, the endless restlessness, the bare bold tonal coloring of Sinding's symphony. Dr. Muck's vigor answered its largeness; his elasticity served its restlessness; he gave it a kind of bleak tonal color like yellow wintry lights piercing gray clouds. He brought the insistent and striving passion of it to full utterance, and he gave it a singular dramatic quality. Mr. d'Indy used to imply that a kind of dramatic action underlay and was in his mind as he wrote his second symphony. Sinding's symphony carries the same suggestion as though it were playing out the grim tragedy—here, and everywhere, in this time of ours—of the pursuit of romance.

H. T. P.

Granitic and Inexorable Music—Chopin Piece by Szumowska.

Herald Nov. 18, 1906

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Piano concerto in E minor.....Chopin
Mme. Szumowska.
Symphony in D minor.....Sinding

The carefully considered and brilliant performance of the overture to "Oberon" was followed by one of Chopin's concerto in E minor that was on the whole ineffective, although Mme. Szumowska played the Romanze with poetic feeling. The concerto itself, beautiful as it is, is not a work for a large hall. Its dreamy character, its intimate melancholy, are as nought when there is no close relationship between pianist and hearer. The accompaniment was subdued and Mme. Szumowska had every opportunity for the display of her skill, but the hall was still too large, and the perfume of Chopin quickly evaporated.

Nor are the bravura passages any more than the purely melodic thoughts effective in Symphony Hall. It must also be said that both in the first movement and in the rondo the pianist's rhythm was not always sharply defined and in the working out section of the opening allegro the pianist and the orchestra were not in full sympathy. Mme. Szumowska was too well acquainted with the traditions to force tone in this concerto or to gain extraneous effects by converting a long reverie into a stump-speech. On the other hand there was a lack of delicate brilliance in the quick movements and more than once there was evident labor where there should have been graceful fleetness.

Sinding's symphony had been played here only once before last night, and to many in the audience it was unknown. Mr. Gericke produced it here early in 1899. It is a rugged work and there is little euphony in it, but the composer's voice, though generally raucous, is his own and it is impressive. It is a Scandinavian work, for it is charged with the Scandinavian spirit of the sagas and the old religious books. There is the grimness of the Vikings, there is the relentless clamor of the sea wolves. Even in the moments of comparative quiet in the first movement, ominous voices are heard, "ancestral voices prophesying war." The andante is a dirge without hope even of mead poured eternally for the brave. The scherzo, which at first suggests a native dance, becomes a savage orgie. Some no doubt looked eagerly for the close of the finale—"when the hurly-burly's done"—yet in this finale there are strongly conceived passages.

This symphony is wholly without sensuous charm. If there be thought of landscape or seascape, the hearer is reminded only of that which is forbidding in Norwegian scenery. But here is a composer who apparently disdained all easy ways of winning popular favor and said his say without regard for a public. He spoke forcibly, and at times he roared in speech. His rough eloquence was occasionally softened a little by fleeting remembrances of Wagner's language, but he quickly sought again his own native tongue.

Whether you like or dislike the symphony, its savage intensity and its stern expression of inexorable conviction are not to be denied or at once forgotten. No orchestral music written by Sinding since this symphony has the same force. The symphony in D minor expresses what Mr. Busoni tried vainly to say in his "Geharnische" suite.

For Sale, Symphony Orchestra Season Tickets for balance of season; telephone Back Bay 2841-4, or address P. N. B., Boston Transcript.
(A)

Dr. Muck in Philadelphia

The Symphony Orchestra began its monthly visit to other cities in Philadelphia last evening when Dr. Muck conducted for the first time there. His programme was that in which he made his debut here—Beethoven's fifth symphony, and, from Wagner, a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "The Mastersingers." Here are some of the comments of the Philadelphia newspapers this morning:

The Ledger—Dr. Muck is, of course, entirely master of the orchestra, and is not afraid to let it play out. There was little suppression, except in the very soft passages which were extremely suppressed. Otherwise the accent was nearly constant, and, while the symphony was played with the utmost precision and with a noble volume of sound, there was no marked suggestion of poetic insight and the emotional appeal was rather obscured by the prevailing vehemence. The general impression made by the conductor at this first hearing was not so much temperamental as authoritative, as befits the official dignity at Berlin. It is very likely that this impression may be altogether changed by better acquaintance when we have heard him in a wider range, but we are probably safe in concluding that he has also a Prussian respect for authority, and will not be a dangerous innovator. The personal impression was entirely pleasing and won the cordial recognition of the large audience.

The Press—The programme was essentially a Wagner programme, in which music the conductor and the orchestra were at home and thoroughly as one, yet the reading of the symphony was inevitably the touchstone of judgment. And Dr. Muck's inspired and poetic interpretation placed him among those who believe the colossus of the old school had a message which should be revealed and not distorted in the light of modern utterance. Hence the symphony was wrought in a noble manner as befits it. All was lucidly sung from first to last and the climax was superb.

The Record—All who are familiar with classical music know the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven almost by heart and most people have their own conceptions of how it should be played; nor are the "Faust" overture of Wagner, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by the same composer, by any means strangers to music patrons. By making such a selection Dr. Muck directly challenged comparison with other conductors, and it must be admitted the result justified his intent. There can be no doubt that Dr. Muck is a great conductor. The applause which greeted his appearance was perfunctory and the audience was a little apathetic during the first two movements of the symphony. As Beethoven's immortal work progressed, however, the orchestra warmed up and the audience grew more enthusiastic and less critical; and with good reason. Seldom if ever has a finer rendition of the last two movements of this symphony been heard in this city.

The North American—The programme included Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, rendered somewhat conventionally and with the academic precision of expert instrumentalists, and Wagner's "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Meistersinger" overture—the last a revelation in musical interpretation. This prelude to Wagner's only opera comique has never been played here with the grace, vitality, rhythmic fidelity and tonal sonority imparted to it by the Boston players under Dr. Muck's baton. The rendering of the "Meistersinger" music was all the more surprising in view of the conventionality of the previous numbers. Conductor Muck presented the Beethoven symphony reverentially and with classical conventionality; but his interpretations of the Wagner numbers evinced originality, independence and absolute command of the vast resources of a modern orchestra.

SYMPHONY HALL CROWDS.

Commissioner O'Meara Says Sergeant and Seven Policemen Are on Duty
After the Concerts.

Commissioner O'Meara had a few words of advice to give to those who attend Symphony concerts and who, upon coming out, find an overabundance of automobiles and carriages, and not enough policemen to suit them. He says that complaints have come to him from people who think that there should be more policemen about the building, to lessen the danger to them on account of the many vehicles.

In making reply to these complaints the commissioner says:

"Complaint has been received of the danger, on account of the great number of carriages and automobiles, encountered by persons leaving the Symphony concerts Saturday nights and seeking to enter street cars in Huntington and Massachusetts avs.

"Because of the new conductor, or the higher price of tickets, or the flush times, or the love of display, which the founder and supporter of the concerts publicly deprecated this week, the carriage patrons and especially the automobile patrons have increased in number this year far beyond the previous experience of the police.

"So that from the beginning of this year's series a sergeant and seven patrolmen have been assigned to Symphony hall for every concert, and that is a liberal deal for such a purpose in the busiest hours for the police on the busiest night of the week.

"This detail will be continued for the present under the direction of the captain of the division, but meanwhile foot passengers should remember this: That if they ignore the police protection which is afforded at regular crossings, and in their eagerness to catch particular cars, push through the lines of carriages at ungarded points they run their own risk."

POLICE AT THE SYMPHONIES

Carriage Patrons Have Created a Condition Dangerous to Other Attendants

Each succeeding Symphony concert finds the number of vehicles at the hall greatly increased and some of those attendants who have approached the hall on foot have complained to Police Commissioner O'Meara of the danger to which they are subjected in tracing their way across the connecting avenues to the building. These complaints seem to have been made without a realization of the police arrangements which are already in force at the hall on concert nights and the commissioner took occasion today to make explanation. As he observes, the concerts were not instituted for the purpose of affording the opportunity of display which some attendants have a fondness for making with their equipages, but as this condition is one which the police must treat as they find it the department is doing its best to cope with the crush of vehicles, unnecessary as the latter may be.

The commissioner says:

"Complaint has been received of the danger on account of the great number of carriages and automobiles, encountered by persons leaving the Symphony concerts Saturday nights and seeking to enter street cars in Huntington and Massachusetts avenues. Because of the new conductor, or the higher price of tickets, or the flush times, or the love of display which the founder and supporter of the concerts publicly deprecated this week, the carriage patrons and especially the automobile patrons have increased in number this year far beyond the previous experience of the police. So that from the beginning of this year's series a sergeant and seven patrolmen have been assigned to Symphony Hall for every concert; and that is a liberal detail for such a purpose in the busiest hours for the police on the busiest night of the week. This detail will be continued for the present under the direction of the captain of the division; but meanwhile foot passengers should remember this: That if they ignore the police protection which is afforded at regular crossings, and in their eagerness to catch particular cars, push through the lines of carriages at unguarded points, they run their own risk."

News of the Day

An old friend of Dr. Muck, who is now living in New York, visited him in Boston the other day. They talked, among other things, of the Symphony Orchestra and in the course of the conversation Dr. Muck said: "Of course I knew I was coming to a splendid orchestra, but I really had no idea of what the Boston Symphony really is. Its wind choirs are most beautiful, and as for the strings, I have never heard such as in all my life."

THE SYMPHONY CROWDS AGAIN

To the Editor of the Transcript:

I have read with great interest the very pertinent communication of "Brookline" which appeared in Saturday evening's Transcript on the subject of the Symphony Concert crowds, and I am sure it expresses the sentiments of all Symphony Concert goers who are obliged to take the electric cars after the concerts are over.

I have been a frequent attendant at the opera and at concerts in all the large European cities, and in many cities in America, and as far as my experience goes Boston is the only city where carriages are not obliged to use the carriage entrance and that only.

As "Brookline" so truly says, more people who go to the concerts make use of the cars than of carriages, and surely to this majority sufficient consideration should be due to permit them to reach the cars without danger.

If the police regulations obliged all carriages to stop at the Massachusetts-avenue entrance to Symphony Hall, all danger to pedestrians would be obliterated, and three policemen, instead of the seven now promised, would be quite sufficient for all necessary service.

W. D. L.

Brookline, Nov. 11, 1906

[As there was no Symphony concert last Saturday evening, an examination of the conditions of which our readers are complaining was impossible. It will be made at the earliest opportunity.—Ed. Transcript.]

NEW YORK CHEERS

DR. KARL MUCK

New York, Nov. 8.—Dr. Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, appeared for the first time in New York tonight at the opening concert of this orchestra's twenty-first season. Carnegie Hall was crowded and there was more enthusiasm than has attended any Boston Symphony concert in recent years.

Dr. Muck did nothing sensational, save in the "Meistersingers" prelude, when he allowed the orchestra to play while he refrained from beating time for a brief space. This is a common trick abroad, and it is usually regarded as a pretty compliment to the virtuosity of the orchestra players.

How that band from Boston did play. Dr. Muck unleashed the brass choir so that it was a joy to the ear. And the strings—the most wonderful set of orchestral string instruments in the world—were exquisite. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the opening number of the program, was impressively read.

Dr. Muck departed from the conventional in several of his tempi, and he emphasized some details with stunning effect. The fact that there was no soloist did not in the least create the feeling of a vacancy in the program.

The Symphony Concert

Sinding's music confirmed and heightened, at the Symphony concert on Saturday, the impression that it had made on Friday, and to all intents it was new music. Seven years ago Mr. Gericke played the symphony at a pair of concerts, but never afterward revived it, and the musical memories were long that could bridge so wide an interval. Moreover, the symphony has chiefly its passion, power and largeness to commend it, and these are not the readiest means to warm liking. It is careless of the minor graces of music; it disdains, except in a few rare moments, any sensuous appeal. Its clangor sometimes deafens emotions by a too incessant insistence. Yet that over-insistence is born of the grim intensity with which Sinding fills the music. In spite of the symphonic form, it is dramatic music—some fierce drama of pursuit and conquest, Scandinavian, as Sinding is, universal as the appeal of his symphony is, what the stirred listener will, but certainly a drama. In that drama is all the passion of pursuit that Sinding flings into the sonarities of his first movement and pours into the broad sweep of his finale. The slow movement is desolate with the pain and the fruitlessness of it, the scherzo returns to the wildness of it. Sombre all the music is, and bare and bald, except when some soft gleam of beckoning or wailing voices falls across it. The passion of conquest finds voice in it and mightily, and it is a rare emotion. The utterance is as bold as the mood and spares not. Throughout the music is grandiose and Dr. Muck and his men so played it.

Only a very full-voiced pianist may make Chopin's concerto "sound" in a great hall with a grand pianoforte before him, and a great orchestra. Even then, he makes it "sound," as Rosenthal, for example, does, with qualities than are less of the music itself than of him who is playing it. Mme. Szumowska is not such a pianist, and she and Dr. Muck were at least steadily at one in their unwillingness to force the music. It and its fellow are the two intimate concertos of all their kind, and Mme. Szumowska used to be a pianist whose delicate traits shone most in intimacy. There can be no intimacy in Symphony Hall but even with allowance for such an obstacle, she played the concerto with more conscientious intelligence than distinction of style, fineness of imagination or charm of lyric fancy and lyric song.

H. T. P.

Dram. Nov. 19, 1906

THE SYMPHONY CROWDS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Upon reading the article in Friday night's Transcript on the police regulations for the protection of persons wishing to take the cars after the Symphony concerts on Saturday evenings, the obvious reply will occur to many who know by experience, that the suggestion of using the crossings only—of which, by the way, there are but two—is an utterly impossible one, as the cars are not allowed to stop on crossings, and as they stand in a long line on Huntington avenue the only possible way of reaching any given one is to cross the street where that one happens to stand. As undoubtedly many more persons use the cars than carriages, there should be one side of the hall where carriages are not allowed, as was the case formerly.

The danger on Huntington avenue is very great, and one needs to be agile indeed to reach a car in safety under the present conditions.

BROOKLINE

DR. MUCK TALKS OF HIS ORCHESTRA AND AUDIENCES

Gabrilowitsch at Chickering Hall—The Symphony Concert—Saint-Saens's Retirement—Francis Wilson as Playwright—News of the Day

In Boston, before he began his work with the Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck talked of his anticipations of it. In New York, ten days ago, after he had given his first concerts there, he talked of the impressions the band, his audiences and our musical conditions generally had made upon him, and added a little about his plans for the future. A reporter of the New York Times noted some of these things as follows:

"I should say the Boston Orchestra was equal to the best," began Dr. Muck, "to the orchestras of Vienna and Berlin and such organizations. The most fortunate thing about it is that the men have been accustomed to play together for so many years that they have been welded into a harmonious organization that would not be possible under any other system. Such a condition is to be found only in our largest orchestras abroad. In most of them the membership changes so frequently as to prevent the thorough understanding so necessary to harmony. The selection of the Boston Orchestra has also been made with the greatest wisdom. The men for the various instruments have been taken from the best. Thus we find most of the wood instruments are played by Frenchmen, many of the brass instruments by Germans, and many of the string instruments by Austrians and Americans. It was a very wise selection."

"We understood each other from the first moment. I no sooner addressed myself to the men than I saw that I was completely understood, and from that time forward there has been the utmost harmony. It is delightful to work with such an orchestra. It is scarcely necessary to explain things to them; they are such splendid artists. Sometimes with an orchestra it is necessary to waste many words, and then not be understood. With this one it is often necessary to say just one word, and what is wanted is done instantly."

"And the American audiences?" Dr. Muck smiled again. "I like the American audiences," he said. "In fact, I do not hesitate to say that they will compare favorably with the best German audiences. I find them to be warm, attentive, enthusiastic. They recognize good music instantly. I know that there is an impression in Germany that the Americans have not a high standard of music and do not recognize the best and understand the best. But I shall carry back an entirely different idea. I am certain that they appreciate the first artists. I am not certain how far I am able to judge, as perhaps I have had the good fortune to come in contact only with the best of the American music lovers, but if these are representative of a great class I should say that America is intensely interested in music and has fine taste. I find that America is kept well informed on the new music, and that, therefore, there is little to introduce of the compositions of recent times. But I have instructed the editors in Berlin and Paris to keep me in touch with their publications of the very newest works, and should any of them be suitable I shall introduce them before my return. I have hope to be able to put several novelties before the American public.

"I am here for a year only," said Dr. Muck, "and the question of remaining does not lie with me only. It lies with the Royal Opera, with the emperor. I am pleased to say that I am well liked by the emperor, and he does not wish me to be away from the Royal Opera, and, of course, I would not wish to be away under such conditions. It was difficult to get my leave of absence for a year as it was, and I got it only on the promise that I would not ask for another for a long time to come. Even under such conditions I doubt whether it would have been given had it not been for the interest the emperor has in America. As you know, he is very fond of the Americans and he is particularly fond of Harvard University. It was the connection of Major Higginson with Harvard that enabled him to get the ear of the emperor."

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mme Szumowska at Symphony Concert.

Globe Nov. 18, 1906
The overture to Weber's "Oberon," Chopin's E minor piano concerto and Sinding's D minor symphony made up the fifth Symphony program last week. Mme Szumowska was the soloist. The romantic spirit of the Weber overture was charmingly illustrated by Dr Muck's men, the horn figurations being given with clarity of tone and precision, the crashing "Oberon" chord sounding sufficiently vigorous and all the tripping elf-like measures by the strings swinging along in a dainty and harmonious ensemble that was delightful to the ear. The appreciation of this number was expressed in a marked manner. Chopin's E minor concerto has such a modest orchestral background that it is admirably suited to Mme Szumowska's style of interpretation, and as the score makes but slight demands upon the artist's physical ability, her performance proved to be thoroughly satisfying.

Mme Szumowska's work is particularly enjoyable in compositions of a gentle and romantic nature, and she played the concerto with all the grace, finger dexterity and tonal beauty which has always characterized her interpretations. In the muted string accompaniment of the second movement the perfect accord of piano and orchestra made the adagio specially interesting, the crisp staccato ornamentations by the solo instrument calling for high commendation. In the finale Mme Szumowska's work was brilliant, the runs and arpeggios were executed clearly and rapidly, and only in the more vigorous passages did this popular artist show lack of power to properly set forth the composer's ideas. Her greeting was very cordial, and at the close of her performance the applause was spontaneous and long continued.

The symphony of the Russian composer, Sinding, who is said to be a fiery fellow by nature, shows undoubted power of a grim sort, for the score contains many startling effects and strange instrumental combinations, allied with great technical skill, which here and there develops some beautiful but brief melodic measures. The general impression of the work is that it lacks contrasts and is savage, aggressive and melancholy in nearly all its moods. The scoring is so full as to be noisy at times. Conductor Muck led his forces through the musical labyrinth with considerable vigor and they responded nobly to all the demands of composer and director.

This week's program will be devoted to modern Russian music. The soloist will be the Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, who will play Tschai-kowsky's D major violin concerto. The other program numbers will be the overture, "Betrothed of the Tsar," by Rimsky-Karsakoff, and for the first time here Glazounoff's fifth symphony.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Odor PROGRAMME. Nov. 19, 06
Weber—Oberon Overture.
Chopin—Piano Concerto in E minor.
Soloist, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska.
Sinding—Symphony in D minor.

It looked like a short programme, but the length of the symphony carried matters near to 10 p.m. We scarcely feel at liberty to reveal anything about the first part of the "Oberon" overture, for Dr. Muck whispered it to the audience in the strictest confidence. But we may intimate that things become very difficult for the horns when their passages are taken so very slowly. On this occasion they flatted perceptibly. The end of the overture, however, was effective and inspiring, and Dr. Muck has warrant enough for the tempo and shading of the first part also—although we prefer the less crawling speed that we have been accustomed to.

The Chopin Concerto was not very exciting. It is possible that the work would make its best effect in a smaller hall. Liszt did not think the two concertos were among Chopin's most inspired compositions, in spite of the fact that the Larghetto of this work may be considered as a love-letter to the singer Constantia Gladkowska. That the concerto is melodic in its credit, for it is refreshing to turn occasionally from "Life's endless toil and endeavor" as represented in the ambitious compositions, and rest in a tuneful nook.

That excellent artist, Mme. Szumowska, erred a little, as Joseffy has done, on the side of delicacy. There was much fluency in her interpretation, but also some lack of force. She gave some beautiful touches, however, in the Larghetto and in the finale, and at the end she was recalled twice and received floral tributes.

Dr. Muck has a man of surprises. The concert had been somewhat languid up to this point, but now the conductor suddenly caused the audience to sit up. From the very first measure there was virility and power in Sinding's symphony. Every point was brought out with mastery. Yet there was no such wild enthusiasm on the part of the public such as followed the wonderful reading of the Brahms symphony, three weeks before. The Sinding symphony is a great work, but it is an unequal one, and it is at times prolix. It is too earnest and grave to become popular. Yet we predict that each successive hearing would reveal new beauties; it is a symphony that would grow upon acquaintance.

The Andante, for example, pictures brooding and loneliness in a more graphic manner than we can recall in any other symphony, and the impressive reiteration of the moving organ-point, a "basso ostinato," is wonderful. Horn and clarinette deserve credit for their work in this, and the bassoon was very effective in the finale.

The ferocity of the bass tuba is a marked feature—the ending, and the entire finale has a Viking brutality that is not always attractive but is original and by no means ineffective.

Everywhere there is full control of the orchestra displayed. If the work of sombre it is deliberately so, the composer knows what he wants to say and speaks his thought with attractive individuality. The wood-wind is used a la Tschalkowsky, chiefly in the depths, and the brasses have some remarkable passages against pizzicato strings. Nor is contrapuntal skill lacking, for there are some effective canonic passages in the finale.

But the prolixity of the finale must be considered a fault. Here there is a leaning towards bombast and grandiloquence which is too long-continued. To us the second movement seems the gem of the work and is full of the loftiest beauty.

Dr. Muck deserves the highest praise for the careful manner in which this work was read. It was as praiseworthy as the Brahms revelation already alluded to. And we can imagine that it was a much less grateful task than the interpretation of the C minor symphony, for even with the best possible performance this symphony of fjord and mountain, of Viking and Saga, was bound to be somewhat removed from popular comprehension and appreciation. Next Saturday we return to Muscovy. "Die Russen kommen!" Louis C. Elson.

From: The Symphony Concert Nov. 30.

Sinding's music confirmed and heightened, at the Symphony concert on Saturday, the impression that it had made on Friday, and to all intents it was new music. Seven years ago Mr. Gericke played the symphony at a pair of concerts, but never afterward revived it, and the musical memories were long that could bridge so wide an interval. Moreover, the symphony has chiefly its passion, power and largeness to commend it, and these are not the readiest means to warm liking. It is careless of the minor graces of music; it disdains, except in a few rare moments, any sensuous appeal. Its clangor sometimes deafens emotions by a too incessant insistence. Yet that over-insistence is born of the grim intensity with which Sinding fills the music. In spite of the symphonic form, it is dramatic music—some fierce drama of pursuit and conquest, Scandinavian, as Sinding is, universal as the appeal of his symphony is, what the stirred listener will, but certainly a drama. In that drama is all the passion of pursuit that Sinding flings into the sonorities of his first movement and pours into the broad sweep of his finale. The slow movement is desolate with the pain and the fruitlessness of it, the scherzo returns to the wildness of it. Sombre all the music is, and bare and bald, except when some soft gleam of beckoning or wailing voices falls across it. The passion of conquest finds voice in it and mightily, and it is a rare emotion. The utterance is as bold as the mood and spares not.

Throughout the music is grandiose and Dr. Muck and his men so played it.

Only a very full-voiced pianist may make Chopin's concerto "sound" in a great hall with a grand pianoforte before him, and a great orchestra. Even then, he makes it "sound," as Rosenthal, for example, does, with qualities than are less of the music itself than of him who is playing it. Mme. Szumowska is not such a pianist, and she and Dr. Muck were at least steadily at one in their unwillingness to force the music. It and its fellow are the two intimate concertos of all their kind, and Mme. Szumowska used to be a pianist whose delicate traits shone most in intimacy. There can be no intimacy in Symphony Hall but even with allowance for such an obstacle, she played the concerto with more conscientious intelligence than distinction of style, fineness of imagination or charm of lyric fancy and lyric song.

H. T. P.

DR. MUCK MAKES HIS FIRST APPEARANCE IN NEW YORK

A Crowded Hall and an Enthusiastic Audience—What the Reviewers Say—Hearty Praise for the Conductor in Wagner's Music and Varying Views of His Reading of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—Familiar Qualities and a New Vitality in the Orchestra From Nov. 9, 06

Dr. Muck conducted for the first time, last evening, in New York—the test that he has most dreaded and by which he has set most store since he made his first appearance here. Carnegie Hall was filled almost to the last seat, and the audience that the Symphony Orchestra attracts in New York is of exceptional musical intelligence and discrimination. It received Dr. Muck warmly, and its applause continued general and hearty. Again the conductor repeated the programme of his first concert here—Beethoven's fifth symphony and, from Wagner, the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Again, too, his men did their utmost for him. This morning the principal reviewers have favorable impressions to record. The Sun, for example, says:

"In so far as the impressions of a first concert may be trusted we are likely to find that Dr. Muck will not in the deeper qualities of conducting lead us away from the composition to the sensational interpretation. While there were certain personal idiosyncrasies in the reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony, there was nothing disturbing. Everything was sane and well regulated. Everything showed reverence for the master and a sincere desire to present his noble work chastely and honestly. It was a straightforward, vigorous, yet polished performance that Dr. Muck conducted. There was much care in the elaboration of the andante and plenty of boldness in the attack of the finale. We have all heard more tragedy in the first movement and more mystery in the scherzo, but the unflinching beauty of style and the exquisite balance, transparency and richness of tone of the Boston organization were in full evidence. For those who hungered for temperamental interpretation there was satisfying food in the reading of the 'Faust' overture. It was superbly conceived and its poignant emotions were voiced in telling tones. The orchestra played up to the conductor magnificently. The 'Siegfried Idyl' was somewhat deficient in contrast and the climax seemed unusually tame, but the finesse of the performance was admirable. The 'Meistersinger' prelude was of course well played, but New York music lovers have often heard it given in more stirring fashion. On the whole, however, Dr. Muck made an excellent impression. That he is a conductor of the first rank has long been conceded in Germany, and it will not be questioned here after his interpretations of last night. As for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is the same splendid body as of old, and the glories of its tone do not seem likely to be dimmed under the new baton."

The Times—Dr. Muck is clearly a man of authority and intellectual force, and he has that classical merit in a conductor of knowing what he wants and getting it. He is an analyst and a thinker about his art. He had taken thought strongly about every measure that he played last evening, and what he had thought was realized in the performance. Whether he is also a man of warm and convincing temperament who can rise on occasion to glowing powers of eloquence as an interpreter was not so clearly established last evening. Yet there was not lacking that which stirred the audience to enthusiasm. His was a performance in respect of finish, of elaboration of detail, of the general adjustment of the lesser proportions to the whole that at every point compelled admiration. It may also be said that it was more finely and definitely finished than it was a few weeks ago in Boston, whence it may be inferred that Dr. Muck is not satisfied with first results, and that he is imbued with something of that "passion for perfection" that is a tradition with the Boston Orchestra.

There can only be praise for his readings of the several numbers of his programme. The performance of the symphony was an admirable one, full of the spirit and robustness of the music, elastic in tempo, minutely shaded in nuance, with all its climaxes and contrasts skilfully prepared. It was not a "Wagnerized" version, even in the treatment of the "motto" or detached theme with which the symphony opens; nor does Dr. Muck seek for inner voices in the orchestration to be exploited at the expense of the symmetry of the whole. He is not afraid to let the more powerful instruments of the orchestra be heard powerfully when occasion requires; yet he has a sense, if not the highest sense, of balance of orchestral tone and beauty of orchestral color. He did nothing startling in the symphony, for there is nothing startling to be done by him who is only for eliciting its beauty and who holds to the text and its plain mandates. But it seemed, at last, with all the skill expended upon it, that it was not a performance that imparted everything the symphony has to say.

Dr. Muck gave a superbly dramatic reading of the "Faust" overture, capturing its spirit of gloomy passion entirely and filling it with an infinity of strongly wrought details, which were never allowed to stop the coursing of the dramatic blood. It may be imagined that his leanings are to the dramatic. He put a deal of patience into the "Siegfried Idyl," whose charms, undeniable and delectable though they are, are mercilessly long. And in the "Meistersinger" prelude he was again more in his element. He takes the tempo faster than most, with a loss of perhaps something of the most characteristic spirit of the work, though there is a splendidly propulsive energy gained by doing as he does. He has no superabundance of lingering rubatos in this piece, and he brings out with the utmost clearness the contrapuntal complications in the middle of it that are sometimes mud rather than a pellucid stream of many-voiced melody. There was much enthusiasm aroused by this performance, and there was apparently a feeling that Mr. Higginson had intrusted his men to safe hands.

The Herald, which fondly fancies that Dr. Muck comes from Dresden, has its reserves: It would have been hard to select a programme, it says, better calculated to disclose the new conductor's personality, aims and methods. In some respects he disappointed expectations by his treatment of it; in others he satisfied them. That the orchestra would be governed by other ideals than those of Mr. Gericke was made plain in the Beethoven symphony. Dr. Muck aimed at a bigger tone and a more dashing manner than Mr. Gericke ever allowed his men. He got it, but at the price of some lost refinement and elegance of technique. There are many Boston orchestra patrons who were forever complaining that they never really heard the brass. These will now be in clover, for the brass instruments are unleashed by Dr. Muck. There are others who set store by the wonderful polish of detail which has recently marked the orchestra's playing. These were the disappointed ones last night, for much of it was lacking. One even suspected the woodwind choir of being out of tune. On the other hand, Dr. Muck showed himself a Wagner conductor of great imagination. He made the scores of the "Idyl" and the "Faust" overture pulsate with life and interest, even when they departed from tradition.

In the Tribune, Mr. Krehbiel is decidedly short-breathed. A "hold" in the first movement of the symphony absorbs him nearly to the exclusion of all else: Dr. Muck, it would seem from last night's exposition, he writes, has no desire to play the iconoclast, or instigate a revolution. He made no effort to make new disclosures or find strange philosophies in familiar texts. His band was brilliant, as of yore. It struck like a thunderbolt when called upon to do so, and its euphony fell delightfully into the ear. There were moments in the symphony when it seemed as if conservatism and convention were receiving a little more than their due, but, strangely enough, this was in the very movement that evoked the warmest enthusiasm from the hearers—the second. In the first there was something which might be set down as a new reading, or, at least, like a reading not hit upon by any of Dr. Muck's predecessors. Beethoven's indication and Wagner's plea for a stern and grim performance of the hold on the last note of the characteristic theme were respected, in a manner, but no sooner had the note been sounded than there was a breathless and precipitate continuation of the theme. Though sustained, the effect was not that of a fermata at all. It seemed to be measured off, played by rule of thumb, and therefore was unimpressive. A pause, no matter how slight, would have presented the figure in its naked, stark pulchritude, enforced its physiognomy, proclaimed its significance as the central thought of the whole magnificent work. The singular precipitancy, studiously compelled by Dr. Muck, robbed the movement of the loft and essential quality of repose, which beautified all the rest of the music of the evening. The fact that the second movement seemed to give greater pleasure than the immeasurably finer and greater first indicated that the audience felt the deficiency. The "Faust" overture was played with superb warmth and poetry, and received a full measure of appreciation. There was in the concert the promise of a glorious season.

The World continues: There can be no doubt about Dr. Muck's temperament, for that was clearly proven in the prelude to Wagner's "The Master-singers," there is no lack of poetic feeling—that fact was shown in the "Siegfried Idyl"; and he has reverence for the classics without indulging in dry-as-dust readings—that was made clear in his interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. He did nothing sensational, save in the "Mastersingers" prelude when he allowed the orchestra to play while he refrained from beating time for a brief space. This is a common trick abroad and it is usually regarded as a pret complement to the virtuosity of the orchestra players. How that band for Boston did play last night! Dr. Muck unleashed the brass choir so that it was a joy to the ear. And the strings—probably the most wonderful set of orchestral string instruments in the world—we again exquisite. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the opening number of the programme, was impressively read. Dr. Muck departed from the conventional several of his tempi, and he emphasized some details with stunning effect.

The Globe says: It was soon evident to another and a contrasting temperament ruling the virtuoso orchestra. Here was a man that took an almost epicurean delight in the different choirs and their several voices. He won from the strings a tone that dropped honey; to the woodwind, he allowed in solo passages the freedom of movement and style, that go by inalienable right, the greatest artists in the world of some and as for the brass, he gloried in its strength and brilliance, as his predecessor did, and its mellowness and depth. Never probably had the orchestra included color and shading in such variety, from a pianissimo fairly saturated in sweetness to a fortissimo overwhelming in its penetrating sonority. Striking as these changes were they were not without their drawbacks. In this same fortissimo, one missed the perfectly blended richness of Mr. Gericke's fortissimo; one had more than a glimpse of the "Grain" so to say, running through its sheeny strength of texture.

In Dr. Muck's conducting, one felt first all the enormous energy that expressed itself as a rule in a short, sharp, angular beat, for Dr. Muck is almost as sparing of pose and gesture as Mr. Gericke or Mr. Weingartner. His other dominant traits are a keen analytical grasp of the elements in the music before him and a vivid sense of effectiveness. One misses in him, to some extent, the unity of conception, as well as the somewhat ascetic dignity that gave singular coherency and strength to a performance directed by Mr. Gericke. Nor did Dr. Muck reveal that subtle insistent vitality that Mr. Weingartner injects into a reading by its seeming inevitableness causing phrase to rise from phrase and period to emerge into period as if determined by the impulse of life itself.

Again and again, Dr. Muck seemed essentially a conductor of opera. He made his points with an evident feeling for dramatic effectiveness, with much the same care and emphasis with which an actor of solid training makes his. At times, this very sense of effectiveness tended to defeat itself. In the finale of Beethoven's fifth symphony, for instance, the music would have been even more eloquent if left to tell its own story. But by a too "expressive" reading the conductor perceptibly missed the goal he sought.

Dr. Muck's Second Concert in New York

Dr. Muck conducted for the second time in New York on Saturday afternoon, and his programme was nearly that of the third pair of Symphony concerts here—Brahms's symphony in C-minor, Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan," Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," and also his overture to "Oberon," which was substituted for the three fragments from "The Damnation of Faust," which completed the list in Boston. Again the audience filled the hall, and again it was most enthusiastic, recalling Dr. Muck six times at the end of the symphony. Nearly all the reviewers are as warm in praise, and Mr. Henderson's article in the Sun of yesterday is worth quoting, for the keen perception of Dr. Muck, as we in Boston know him from longer acquaintance, that it discloses:

"Dr. Muck made a stronger impression than he did on Thursday night. He seemed to feel surer of himself and his hearers. He had learned the temper of New York music lovers and he reached out after emotions, which had to meet him more than half-way at the evening concert. What will be the probable change in the style of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under him was indicated in the Brahms symphony. There was nothing startling in Dr. Muck's reading. Tempi and nuances were those established by the clear indications of the score. But where under Mr. Gericke all was subdued and exquisitely polished, under Dr. Muck some of the Ciceronian nicety was swept away. The new conductor even permitted his men in one or two places to slip from that military precision of attack and that machine-like unanimity which were inseparable from every performance under the inexorable baton of his predecessor. These were but momentary failings, however, and for the most part the orchestra maintained its traditions of finish. But in muscularity, incisiveness, brilliancy and power it far outshone anything it has done in recent seasons. The performance of the magnificent last movement of the symphony was one of the most eloquent ever given in this city. It was inspiring to hear. The audience felt the inspiration of the performance and rewarded the conductor with six recalls. These recalls really meant something, for conductors, unlike pianists, do not play encore numbers.

"The other compositions on the programme were Weber's 'Oberon' overture; Richard Strauss's 'Don Juan' and Weber's 'Der Freischütz' overture. It was a formidable test for the music of Weber, but none the less triumphant. The florid old overtures stood their own handsomely in the presence of the philosophizing of the arch-realist of Munich. It seems that Weber was really a composer of talent. The Strauss music was superbly played yesterday. Dr. Muck conducted it con amore, for he and Strauss are associates in artistic labor. If the first two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were fairly prophetic of what is to come, we shall probably have less perfection of tonal smoothness, less elegance and repose in performance of Brahms's symphony and thoroughly deserving of the prolonged outburst of enthusiasm it caused. It was one that brought out every detail, every touch of color, every contrasting phrase and point of imitation in the work; one that composed all its parts in their proper relation, and that built up the symmetrical and nobly proportioned whole. It was quickened with imagination and touched everywhere with life and enthusiasm. So magnificent and altogether imposing a climax as he secured in the last movement is most rarely to be heard in a symphonic performance. . . . Strauss's tone-poem was played with dazzling brilliancy and irresistible energy; and here again the careful exposition of the thematic structure, even in all the welter of sound, contributed greatly to the impression made. Dr. Muck's reading of the two Weber overtures was equally brilliant."

Trans. Nov. 12, 1906

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, OVERTURE to the Opera "The Betrothed of the Tzar."

TSCHAIKOWSKY, CONCERTO in D major for VIOLIN, op. 35.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Canzonetta: Andante
III. Finale: Allegro vivacissimo.

GLAZOUNOFF, SYMPHONY in B flat major, No. 5, op. 55.
I. Moderato maestoso: Allegro.
II. Scherzo: Moderato: Pochissimo meno mosso.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegro maestoso.
(First time.)

Soloist:

ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv. PROGRAMME. Nov 26-06
Rimsky-Korsakoff. Overture, "The Betrothed of the Czar."

Tschaikowsky. Violin Concerto in D.
(Soloist, Mr. A. Petschnikoff).

Glazounoff. Symphony in B flat, No. 5.

One of those unified programmes for which Dr. Muck is becoming celebrated. Russian composers and a Russian soloist. Nor, judging by the applause, was it Caviare to the general. The first number was more intelligible to an American audience than the name of its composer. Even Russians seem to be at sea as to how to accent his name. The Russian ambassador, Baron Rosen, once told the present writer that the accent was on the first syllable of both names; Andrew D. White, our minister to Russia, agreed with this; but a pupil of the composer has since given him the information that the gentleman himself accents his name on the first syllable of the first and the second syllable of the second name—RIM-sky Kor-SA-koff!

What's in a name? A Russian by any name whatever would write melodiously and be intelligible in his music, and this composition, with all its pomp and circumstance, its military effects and its ponderous brass phrases, is yet attractive in a tuneful manner. That the performance had an occasional touch of roughness was condonable because of the virility of the picture. In this work we do not have a kaleidoscopic array of fragments, such as we often find in modern French and German works, but steady and comprehensible tunes which charm by their contrasts and also in a more advanced manner by the development of some of their figures. Such a work is refreshing in these days of musical problems.

Tschaikowsky's violin concerto seems to us about as artificial as anything he has ever composed. The first movement might have been written by either De Berliot or Vieuxtemps, providing they ever became so prolix. One might have applied to it the Shakespearian words,—

"This will last out a night in Russia,
When nights are longest there."

The second movement (also too long) was at least more characteristic and less conventional. The horn tones, giving the effect of a bell, as in Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony, were very impressive, and here at least there seemed to be something earnest and poetic in the contents of the work. In the last movement the folk-song bazar was opened, as is usual in the finale of many of Tschaikowsky's works, and there was a brilliant ending. But it was not the Tschaikowsky of the "Pathétique," or of the piano concerto, or of the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, after all.

As to the artist, Petschnikoff played both correctly and fluently, but with a Dresden China fragility of tone that was out of place in Symphony Hall. His work on the

G string was much lighter than it ought to have been, but his intonation was flawless and his harmonics were very pure. His delicacy of expression was quite in place in the second movement, but more force would have been acceptable both in the first and last movements.

The cadenza, placed like that in the Mendelssohn concerto, a good way from the end of the first movement, was brilliant enough, but we found Petschnikoff less great than many violinists that we have recently heard; there were some sitting back of him, in the orchestral ranks, who could have excelled him. Yet the audience evidently did not share this view, for they applauded the first movement to the echo, and recalled the artist twice at the end of the work.

The Glazounoff symphony began majestically enough and its broad unison passages were given with much dignity. There was possibly too much bombast in its make-up and the brasses came too often to the front in its measures.

Again we found the tunefulness of the Muscovite revealed. The Scherzo contained a march that was as popular as the march in Raff's "Lenore" symphony, tinkled out with Glockenspiel and with every sugary effect possible. Naturally this was applauded almost to the encore point.

The slow movement was most beautiful, the gem of the work. It is chiefly founded on a figure much like the first six notes of "Celeste Aida," but treated in a manner that removed it altogether from the Verdi vein and put all thought of resemblance or plagiarism to flight. Here also was a most effective contrast, a sudden change to a portentous phrase on the trombones which came in with striking power and weirdness. This movement was read exquisitely.

Now there came an amount of revelry and devilry that suggested that Charpentier's "Montmartre" scenes had been transplanted into symphony. Yet it was so frankly "canaille" that it possessed an odd attraction. If Mr. Gericke ever repressed the brasses they now had their compensation. "Is a Muck running the brasses or are the brasses running amuck?" asked an astonished auditor of the reviewer. The wildest orgies of Kunavina, during the fair of Nijni-Novgorod, might be represented by such music. It was Vodka in tones. But what a headache the celebrants must have had the next morning!

Louis C. Elson.

Wanted 3 Season Tickets

To Concerts of the Choral Art Society. Address, stating price, S.F.O., Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony Seats Wanted Two good seats on floor for alternate Saturday evenings. Address, with price and location, C. T. C., Boston Transcript. WS(A) n 28

RUSSIAN NIGHT FOR THE SYMPHONY

Jan 6 — Nov 26
Petschnikoff as Soloist and Program of Slav Music Delighted the Orchestra Patrons.

At the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening the following was the program:

Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar,"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Concerto in D major, for violin, op. 35,
Tchaikovsky
Symphony in B flat major, No. 5, op. 55, Glazounoff

The presence as soloist of Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, and his selection of the Tchaikovsky concerto appears to have inspired Dr. Muck to a program composed entirely of Russian music. The lack of variety that might have resulted found its alleviation in the fact that the Russian composers selected were not always as Russian as they might have been. The Rimsky-Korsakoff overture, for example, is Eastern rather than Slavic in its charming melodies, which please, if they do not especially impress.

Less Russian still, if the fourth movement be excepted, is the Glazounoff symphony, which was heard in this city for the first time. Originality does not force itself to the attention in this score. Indeed, it would not be difficult to support by evidence charges of the very antithesis of originality, for Glazounoff certainly owes something to predecessors and contemporaries for ideas. The scherzo shares this lack of originality, but it possesses a daintiness and tunefulness that, added to the richness of the orchestration, almost places the movement in the "popular" class. In the finale, however, the Slav comes very much into evidence, and the coarse strength of the music bears the stamp of originality. As a whole the symphony is worthy, but not unduly impressive.

The soloist, whose violin was heard with the Symphony some half-dozen years ago, made an excellent impression in the familiar Tchaikovsky concerto, which may have been better played here, but never with more zeal. Mr. Petschnikoff was very much in earnest, and was evidently in close sympathy with the work; perhaps more so than the majority of his auditors.

The orchestra played with spirit and much breadth of tone, and Dr. Muck conducted with inspiring beat.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Echoes From Yesterday's Symphony.

Glazounoff — Nov 25 1906
Dr Muck's sixth symphony program was thoroughly Russian in character, three Slav composers of the modern school being represented, and the Russian violinist, Alexander Petschnikoff, appearing as soloist. The fifth symphony, by Glazounoff, was played for the first time here. Tchaikovsky's D major violin concerto and the Rimsky-Korsakoff overture to "Betrothed of the Tsar" completed the selections. The concert as a whole was of a vigorous type, with the Muscovite musical, or unmusical characteristics liberally introduced. The overture, though, comes not within this category, for although the opera is filled with tragic episodes the introductory music, which was admirably played by the orchestra, is but slightly suggestive of the story.

Glazounoff's symphony abounds in well-contrasted "colors," and some of them are laid on pretty heavily. He is prone to make his announcements in reiterative measures given to various groups of instruments and nearly all the themes are worked up to a riotous climax. The first part was of this nature and it gave the different contingents capital opportunities to display their splendid quality of tone in fortissimo work, which in some orchestras is blatant or rough.

There is a charming scherzo for the second movement, with quaint figurations for the lighter instruments and just a few touches of the Slavic harshness to form a connecting link with the other divisions of the work. This part was so delightfully played that the audience became very enthusiastic. The lighter strings continued their good work in the third movement, which was quite interesting because of its romantic character, and in the finale the crashing turbulence of the scheme was exemplified with becoming vigor. All through the work the orchestration shows great skill and ingenuity in the obtaining of legitimate musical results, but like other composers of this nationality, Glazounoff frequently offends the ear by combinations that have no melodic significance to express, aside from being noisy.

Petschnikoff played the immensely difficult violin concerto with wonderful verve and impetuosity, his sureness of intonation suffering at times from his rushing fingering. When he played the same selection with the orchestra about six years ago the technical feats, possibly, were not so brilliant as they were yesterday; but at that time he was regarded as a violinist of high attainments, and certainly he is a great, or greater, artist today. His tone is generally very sweet; he readily masters all difficulties of fingering, and his bowing, though a bit rough in chord passages once in a while, is firm and even. The young artist was rapturously applauded. The orchestral accompaniment was a trifle uncertain in some of the "two-forty" passages, the pace of the soloist being so rapid as to cause a bit of lagging in the tempo. Rosenthal will be this week's soloist in the Liszt E flat major concerto for piano and orchestra. Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3, and Bruckner's seventh symphony will complete the program.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK MAKES AN "ALL-RUSSIAN" PROGRAMME

Rimsky-Korsakoff in an Overture, Tchaikovsky in the Violin Concerto and Glazounoff in a New Symphony—Russian Music at Its Brightest—Mr. Gogorza's Song Recital—Concerts of Next Week and Weeks to Come—Musical News

Trans. — Nov. 24, 1906
Dr. Muck made a hazardous venture at the Symphony concert yesterday with a programme that consisted wholly of music by Russian composers—Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to his opera "The Betrothed of the Tsar"; Tchaikovsky's concerto for violin, played by Mr. Petschnikoff, and Glazounoff's fifth symphony, in B-flat major, heard for the first time in Boston. No one of the three is of notable distinction as Russian music goes; no one represents the composer at his best and fullest, and each discloses rather transparently the characteristic virtues and shortcomings of Russian music. By this last token there is a measure of similarity in the three pieces; for, the "new" Russian music as we of the West hear it, is cut to the same last, even as are the operas of the "new" Italians, and the work of the "new" Frenchmen, if they have happened to be pupils of César Franck. There was a kindred brightness of instrumental color, for example, in Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture, and in many parts of Glazounoff's symphony. The cantilena of Tchaikovsky's concerto and the cantilena of Glazounoff's slow movement, different in many respects as they are, still kept, so to say, a family resemblance, discernible in their melodic outline rather than in their melodic contents. The turbulent finale of the concerto and of the symphony beginning abruptly, rising and falling sharply, is one of the earmarks of the whole Russian school.

So equally with less obvious resemblances. Note, for example, the aptitude of all three composers for instrumentation. Their ears and their imaginations are sensitive to very delicate distinctions of instrumental color, and their skill with the orchestra brings those distinctions to expression. Their instrumentation can be as exquisitely delicate and suggestive as it can be rudely powerful. They think in instruments; they imagine in them. How, for example, what seems merely passage-work for the display of the violinist's dexterity in Tchaikovsky's concerto is really a searching of the heart of the instrument. Contrast the subtle lightness of Glazounoff's scherzo with the flamboyant tumult of his finale. Note, too, the ease of invention which all three men seem to enjoy, but do not listen too closely, lest that invention shall seem oftener an adroit transformation or a very slightly disguised repetition of catch phrases or of a musical idea already fully expressed. Consider, too, a certain gleaming quality in all three of the compositions played yesterday. First and last they were highly decorative music. The peril of an "all-Russian" programme is that this brilliance may ultimately cloy and pall, and that it may sometimes only illuminate—and much too brightly—a certain emptiness behind. The peril was the greater yesterday since all the music was comparatively light. Naturally in a violin concerto Tchaikovsky does not mount the heights or plunge into the depths of passionate expression. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture is decorative preluding to his opera without the gorgeous pictorial quality of his "Scheherazade" or the dramatic power of his "Antar." As for Glazounoff's symphony, it was the first piece of musical entertainment that the audience has had in the six concerts of the year, and it testified its pleasure in heartier applause than a new symphony or almost any new composition has received for long.

Narrow as the Russian composers sometimes seem, there are many sorts of Russian music—glowing Oriental fantasies like Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," tone-poems of Russian legend like the same composer's "Sadko" or Glazounoff's own "Stenka Razin"; "tone-pictures" like Ippolitoff-Ivanoff's "The Cliff," or Glazounoff's "Kremlin"; ballets that glorify the dance and transfigure with tones the material things of the theatre; and symphonies like the fifth and the sixth of Tchaikovsky that traverse primitive passions at intense play. These are the sorts of Russian music that our concerts ordinarily make known to us. There was curiously little of any of these qualities in the Russian music of which Dr. Muck made his programme yesterday. There was no touch of the neighboring Orient; no tone-poems or tone-pictures; and no play of primitive passion. It was the brightness of Russian music, the peculiar kaleidoscopic quality of it, and of its instrumental coloring above all, that programme, conductor and band seemed most to disclose. Perhaps they disclosed as well, though least in the concerto, the facility of it, that makes much of it, have shimmer rather than depth and leave little impression when the exhilaration of the moment has passed.

Tschalkovski's and Glazounoff's cantilena wheedles the listener. The fantastic grace, the light tonal imagery, the invariable instrumental felicity of Glazounoff's scherzo is exquisite pleasure as one hears. There is no resisting at the moment the sonorous and pliant energy of his allegro, the tumult of his finale. Tschalkovski and Mr. Petschnikoff searched the secrets of the violin or leapt into the relief of their turbulent finale. Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture is all brightness. The concerto has become one of the stalking horses of the virtuosi of the violin. It has been long with us and it will remain. There is no escaping it or forgetting it. But how completely has recollection of Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture passed though it has been twice played at our symphony concerts! And will Glazounoff's symphony be easy to recall a year hence, except, perhaps, the scherzo? The Russian music that lasts is the music of primitive passion, or of folk-legend or folk-tune; or of the mysterious Orient or of the bare steppes. Yesterday Glazounoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff were of Petersburg, the urban, when the Nevsky Prospekt and the restaurants in the islands of the river are at their gayest on a bright winter afternoon. H. T. P.

The Symphony Concert

Perhaps Tschalkovski's concerto for violin still awaits the heaven-sent violinist who will play it as it sounded to the composer's imagination when he wrote. He had trouble enough to find any violinist to undertake it, and probably Mr. Brodsky, who first played it anywhere and who played it long ago in Boston, came nearer to drawing from it all that Tschalkovski believed it contained. Certainly Mr. Petschnikoff's playing of the music, either on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening, was not heaven-born. In a sense he is master of the technical difficulties and intricacies of the concerto; he achieves accurately and surely all that in these respects the music exacts; but it is the laborious achievement of uninspired and obviously toiling industry. He does not glorify his bravura by spontaneity and an air of elate improvisation, or distinguish it by seeming fancy or elegance. It remains a task done to the letter, but with obvious nervous effort. Moreover, in all this passage work Tschalkovski was searching and sometimes finding the secrets of the violin, and there was no hint of the quest in Mr. Petschnikoff's playing. In another way his song in the slow movement was equally disappointing. He overloaded it and his instrument with feeling, and when he sought the warmest and largest emotion, his bow bore too heavily upon the strings and vitiated the quality of his tone, so that the poignancy he would gain often became mere sharpness. It was in the trembling ardor of the finale that his sense of nervous rhythm and his agile vigor served him and the concerto best.

Again, on Saturday evening, the new symphony by Glazounoff was warmly received, and again the playing of Dr. Muck and his men glorified it. The music asks a warm and elastic brilliance, an incessantly rich or supple instrumental color. It must go with the lightest and surest of tonal touch in the scherzo and with a sweeping vigor that shall have a touch of frenzy and yet neither rant nor roar, through the finale. The song of the slow movement must have a breadth and warmth that shall hide its shallowness. The first allegro has moments of glowing euphony. The life of the symphony is in its instrumental coloring, and Dr. Muck made the slow movement sound as the draught of claret that Keats poured over the snow in his throat, so rich, so smooth, so warm was their playing. The scherzo was all tip-toeing rhythms and brightening and fading of tonal half-tints. Now and then there is magic in Glazounoff's harmonies when they come to the ear as the orchestra brought them in the first movement. The gorgeous sonority of tone made the tumult of the finale seem a passionate welter of excited sound. In the eloquence of the expression there was no room for thought of the idea behind. It was expression for its own intoxicating sake. Who talks of grapes when the smoothest of Burgundy is soothing his palate or the brightest of Champagne sparkling on it? Jan. 26.06 H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

ad. 26.06 PROGRAMME. 1906
Rimsky-Korsakoff. Overture, "The Betrothed of the Czar."
Tschalkovsky. Violin Concerto in D.
(Soloist, Mr. A. Petschnikoff).
Glazounoff. Symphony in B flat, No. 5.

One of those unified programmes for which Dr. Muck is becoming celebrated. Russian composers and a Russian soloist. Nor, judging by the applause, was it Caviare to the general. The first number was more intelligible to an American audience than the name of its composer. Even Russians seem to be at sea as to how to accent his name. The Russian ambassador, Baron Rosen, once told the present writer that the accent was on the first syllable of both names; Andrew D. White, our minister to Russia, agreed with this; but a pupil of the composer has since given him the information that the gentleman himself accents his name on the first syllable of the first and the second syllable of the second name—RIM-sky Kor-SA-koff.

What's in a name? A Russian by any name whatever would write melodiously and be intelligible in his music, and this composition, with all its pomp and circumstance, its military effects and its ponderous brass phrases, is yet attractive in a tuneful manner. That the performance had an occasional touch of roughness was condonable because of the virility of the picture. In this work we do not have a kaleidoscopic array of fragments, such as we often find in modern French and German works, but steady and comprehensible tunes which charm by their contrasts and also in a more advanced manner by the development of some of their figures. Such a work is refreshing in these days of musical problems.

Tschalkowsky's violin concerto seems to us about as artificial as anything he has ever composed. The first movement might have been written by either De Berliot or Vieuxtemps, providing they ever became so prolix. One might have applied to it the Shakespearian words,—

"This will last out a night in Russia,
When nights are longest there."

The second movement (also too long) was at least more characteristic and less conventional. The horn tones, giving the effect of a bell, as in Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony, were very impressive, and here at least there seemed to be something earnest and poetic in the contents of the work. In the last movement the folk-song bazar was opened, as is usual in the finale of many of Tschalkowsky's works, and there was a brilliant ending. But it was not the Tschalkowsky of the "Pathétique," or of the piano concerto, or of the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, after all.

As to the artist, Petschnikoff played both correctly and fluently, but with a Dresden China fragility of tone that was out of place in Symphony Hall. His work on the G string was much lighter than it ought to have been, but his intonation was flawless and his harmonics were very pure. His delicacy of expression was quite in place in the second movement, but more force would have been acceptable both in the first and last movements.

The cadenza, placed like that in the Mendelssohn concerto, a good way from the end of the first movement, was brilliant enough, but we found Petschnikoff less great than many violinists that we have recently heard; there were some sitting back of him, in the orchestral ranks, who could have excelled him. Yet the audience evidently did not share this view, for they applauded the first movement to the echo, and recalled the artist twice at the end of the work.

The Glazounoff symphony began majestically enough and its broad unison passages were given with much dignity. There was possibly too much bombast in its make-up and the brasses came too often to the front in its measures.

Again we found the tunefulness of the Muscovite revealed. The Scherzo contained a march that was as popular as the march in Raff's "Lenore" symphony, tinkled out with Glockenspiel and with every sugary effect possible. Naturally this was applauded almost to the encore point.

The slow movement was most beautiful, the gem of the work. It is chiefly founded on a figure much like the first six notes of "Celeste Aida," but treated in a manner that removed it altogether from the Verdi vein and put all thought of resemblance or plagiarism to flight. Here also was a most effective contrast, a sudden change to a portentous phrase on the trombones which came in with striking power and weirdness. This movement was read exquisitely.

Now there came an amount of revelry and devilry that suggested that Charpentier's "Montmartre" scenes had been transplanted into symphony. Yet it was so frankly "canaille" that it possessed an odd attraction. If Mr. Gericke ever repressed the brasses they now had their compensation. "Is a Muck running the brasses or are the brasses running amuck?" asked an astonished auditor of the reviewer. The wildest orgies of Kunavina, during the fair of Nijni-Novgorod, might be represented by such music. It was Vodka in tones. But what a headache the celebrants must have had the next morning!

Louis C. Elson.

DR. MUCK REVIVES BRUCKNER SYMPHONY

Jan. 26.06 — Dec 3.06

The seventh Symphony concert was made notable, and in a certain sense interesting, by Dr. Muck's resurrecting of Bruckner's symphony in E major after a sleep that nearly approached that of Rip Van Winkle. It arose from its slumbers as ponderous and certainly better understood than in those earlier days, when it staggered audiences and critics alike. It no longer seems wild and fantastically noisy, for Richard Strauss and Mahler and the rest of the "moderns" have taken care of that. It is still extraordinary, however, in its almost incredible mixture of beauty and baldness, nobility and nothingness. That the man who could write the fascinating middle portion of the first movement, the almost supernatural loveliness of most of the adagio and the savage jocosity of the scherzo could also produce the dull and formless scrappiness, the twaddling melange of the entire last movement is not explained and cannot be. The only plausible theory is that Bruckner was for most of the time a highly educated and respectable maker of routine music, across whose mind some strange influence flashed occasional moments of genius. Was it Wagner or was it Beethoven? Both appear strongly in the best pages of the symphony, not in imitation, be it understood, but as if the real thoughts of those masters had somehow filtrated through the brain of a devoted disciple. The performance was on a magnificent plane of thought and virtuosity, as fine in its way as anything Dr. Muck has yet attained. Then came Moritz Rosenthal, he of the amazing technique, with Liszt's pianoforte concerto in E flat major. It was a performance of the most scintillating brilliancy, yet warm, rich and as highly idealized as the glittering thing permits. There is little of poetry or the calmer sort of romance in the work; it should be given at a white heat and with all possible power and bravura, and that Rosenthal contributed every necessary qualification to its playing goes without saying. Yet for some reason his phenomenal performance left the audience comparatively cold; tyros and medecrities in number have won far more in the way of recalls than did this master of the pianoforte.

The performance of Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture, with which the long concert ended, was stirring, but not exceptionally fine. Indeed, it has been given with more classic beauty many times by this orchestra.

Frank Musical Comment Dec 3.06

Dr. Muck ended on Saturday the second month of the Symphony concerts, and in it he has subdued much of the complaint about his programmes that was murmuring a few weeks ago. The programmes of the first four concerts he made early last summer in Germany. He knew nothing at that time at first hand of his orchestra or his public. Each had equally to come to know him. As any wise conductor would do, he shaped his programmes accordingly—of familiar classics that would serve best as a medium for the gaining of this mutual knowledge. In the two months that he has spent in Boston, he has very swiftly learned the resources and capabilities of his band and the temper and interests of his public, and he has begun to arrange his programmes accordingly. Three modern symphonies—Sinding's, Glazounoff's and Bruckner's—have been played at the last three concerts. Glazounoff's was actually new to Boston; Sinding's had not been heard for seven years, and Bruckner's for nearly twenty. Two of the three virtuosos—Petschnikoff and Rosenthal—have played modern, if more familiar, concertos. In fact, in the last three weeks there have been only three classics on the programmes—Chopin's first concerto, Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture upon which Dr. Muck was bound to prove his skill. Surely there is no ground for complaint over the interest or the freshness of the last three programmes. The worst that can be said of them is that perhaps they have followed a little too rigidly the severe Viennese model of overture, concerto, symphony. Two weeks hence, however, there will be no symphony at the concerts, and a new tone-poem by Mr. Chadwick stands on the list. Later in the winter, Mr. Converse's music is to have a place, and there will be room for Debussy and other of the "new" Frenchmen. In a word Dr. Muck, like the discreet man he is, has preferred to discover his public and his band before he made many programmes. Now he has set about the task with a discernment that some of his predecessors were much slower to acquire.

As the concerts go forward, there seems, too, very little cause for the alarm that some listeners, especially in New York, have professed to feel lest the precision, the finesse and the euphony of the orchestra should suffer under the new vigor, elasticity and sonority that Dr. Muck is giving it. They have rejoiced—they could not, indeed, help rejoicing—in the full-throated and spontaneous sonority that the band brought to Sinding's symphony or to the tumbling finale of Glazounoff's. Yet was not this vigor costing the orchestra a little of its delicacy of tone and rhythm? The scherzo of Glazounoff's symphony and a score of the finer passages in Bruckner's tested both, and it was hard to detect the smallest loss. One of the compensating beauties of Bruckner's music is the penetrating or caressing euphony of some of his instrumental combinations. They sounded on Saturday like the voices of his visions. The brass of the band speaks full-voiced now, but its tones keep their mellow sonority. The delicate euphonic blending of orchestra and solo instrument has seldom been higher than it was when Mr. Rosenthal played Liszt's concerto or Mr. Petschnikoff Tchaikovsky's. Moreover, it is the new sonority that Dr. Muck gains from the orchestra that filled Sinding's symphony with its viking voice of passion; and the new elasticity that seized the Russian's rhythm and animated the overture to "Oberon" and the "Leonore" overture with fresh dramatic vitality. Perhaps Dr. Muck was overdisposed to draw the last drop of musical and emotional contrast out of Beethoven's overture; but the whole impression was still of the flinging of it anew and spontaneously upon our ears and our emotions. As long as we of the younger generation can remember our orchestra has been a beautiful thing. Now the range of its beauty is wider, the height and the depth of it ampler. There is more character diversifying it and more vitality coursing through it.

Bruckner's symphony was better received on Saturday than it had been on Friday. The listeners were less restless, though there were still signs of weariness, and the applause was much heartier, even to recalling Dr. Muck, as if in thanks for the revival of the symphony. Yet a second hearing of the music brought little change in the impression that it originally made. It struggles under the severest of burdens that may rest upon any thing of the arts—its salient defects are exactly of the sort that most defeat its salient virtues. The beauty of some of the melodies, of moments in their development, of the color that some of the instrumental combinations impart to them, is of the purity or the iridescence of a vision of the ideal. Bruckner touches at moments an ecstasy of disembodied loveliness, of idealized feeling that only César Franck among modern composers has attained. Franck, however, maintains this ecstasy. The listener may hear Franck's music and be conscious of nothing else. Bruckner not only fails to maintain it; he falls away, and on the instant, into the shallows of finicking pedantry or the wastes of baldness. When he is not winged, he slouches. When he is not the Bruckner of ideal visions, he is Bruckner the peasant of Windhag or the pedagogue of Vienna. The singleness of mind that absorbs him in his visions makes him forget that others beside Bruckners were to hear his music. He bids them at moments into a world of his own creating and that only music could create. Then he misses the clew and leaves them groping and weary. The result is inevitable: the world loses its illusion and they renounce the quest for it.

Following the symphony Liszt's concerto and Mr. Rosenthal's playing of it seemed the other extreme of musical achievement. The music itself sounded like an heroic improvisation, wrought in sustained passion with means that leapt, perfect and sure, to answer the composer's imagination. The concerto may sound, and with reason, like a hard and brilliant show-piece. It may sound, even as Mr. Joseffy makes it, as a soft tapestry of bright and changeful tonal colors. And it may be the heroic rhapsody into which Mr. Rosenthal transforms it. The music glowed as he struck it from the piano. The very rhythms had a passion of motion. The ornaments were as hot flashes of fancy. The melodies were as the spontaneous voice of kindling and transporting feeling. Here was romance speaking in its largest, warmest, richest voice. And when it called there was no room for the thought of the mastery of the instrument or of the music by which it spoke and was made alive. Mr. Rosenthal did not read the concerto; he read Liszt's imagination as he wrote; he read the romantic ardor, the heroic sweep, the tonal magnificence of it all. And his reading was re-creation.

SYMPHONY

Herald Nov 25.06
Symphony by the Russian Glazounoff Played Here for the First Time.
P. Hale

The programme of the sixth concert of the Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, which took place in Symphony Hall last night, was as follows:
Overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar"...

Rimsky-Korsakoff
Violin concerto in D major.....Tchaikowsky
Symphony in B flat, No. 5.....Glazounoff

No doubt, as it is stated elsewhere in The Herald this morning, Mr. Petschnikoff's choice of a concerto suggested to Dr. Muck the idea of a Russian programme, Russian at least in name. Rimsky-Korsakoff's unpretentious and pleasing overture has Russian, or at least Oriental, color in the majority of its pages. It has exotic flavor; it does not come from Germany. But the finale of the symphony is the only distinctively Russian movement in that work.

This symphony was played here for the first time. It is not nearly so striking a composition as the symphony of Glazounoff, that follows it in order of time, and it is not so generally pleasing as that which precedes. When it was played for the first time in London, and also in New York, there were loud outcries against the composer's thematic plagiarisms. He was accused of lifting the "Sword" motive in Wagner's "Ring" for his first movement, and "Celeste Aida" for his third, and other resemblances, close or far-fetched, were alleged. It is true that there is a suggestion of the "Sword" theme, and there is the thought of Radames' first air in the matter of rhythm, in the melodic figure, and, once or twice, in the harmonic and orchestral treatment. After all, the chief question is: "What did Glazounoff do with these themes?"

There is little individuality in the first three movements, which might have been made in Germany by any well trained young man with a taste for rich instrumentation. The first movement follows the traditions of form so that there need be no talk of originality in that direction, and in the chief thematic ideas and in the development of them there is no departure from the highly respectable commonplace. The scherzo is pretty enough, though the main thematic idea is not new. It is scored with the coloring and the piquancy that are expected in the grand ballet. The andante which follows has a suavely sentimental and romantic character, but again we search vainly for any truly original thought or expression.

The Finale has character, though you may call it rowdy, or brutal, or even vulgar. It has this saving merit:

it is honest. At last Glazounoff is heard speaking in his own language and in a familiar, natural way. He is no longer in Germany; he has not crossed the Alps for an agreeable melody. He has put aside the remembrance of men that worked before him, Wagner, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Verdi. In the finale he is true to his race and to himself.

When Mr. Petschnikoff was here six years ago, he played Tchaikowsky's concerto, and played it with little artistic success. He had been playing it before he came, and he has been playing it since he left. It would be a miracle if he had not improved in his performance of it in many details, but his interpretation last night was by no means engrossing, and it was often dull. Or was the concerto itself at fault? It is to us one of the least interesting works of Tchaikowsky, yet we can easily conceive of a nobler performance and we remember that Mme. Maud Powell and Mr. Brodsky made much of the work.

Mr. Petschnikoff has irritating mannerisms, as in the manner of his attack, and he is inclined to sentimentalism. In passages of sentiment his tone last night was warm and sympathetic until through exaggeration it became lush. When he essayed robust measures he was not effective and his bravura lacked brilliance and authority.

The orchestra played the overture in a delightful manner and its euphony and gorgeous sonority were well displayed in the symphony.

120

*Distinguished Pianist, 72 Years Old, Plays Own Works Before Crowded House,
Assisted by Orchestra.*

121

SYMPHONY HALL, Monday Evening, November 26
At Eight o'clock

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

AND

Camille Saint-Saëns

His first appearance in Boston

Programme

Overture, "Les Barbares"

Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor,
No. 2, Op. 22

- I. Andante sostenuto
- II. Allegretto scherzando
- III. Presto

PIANO SOLOS

- SAINT-SAËNS {
- a. Valse Nonchalante
 - b. Valse Mignonne
 - c. Valse Canariote

Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Op.
78

- I. Adagio (C minor)
Allegro moderato (C minor)
Poco adagio (D-flat major)
- II. Allegro moderato (C minor)
Presto (C major)
Maestoso (C major)
Allegro (C major)

(Mr. J. WALLACE GOODRICH at the organ)

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the concerto

THE PIANOFORTE IS A KNABE

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS, THE FAMOUS FRENCH COMPOSER.

*Distinguished Pianist, 72 Years Old, Plays
Own Works Before Crowded House,
Assisted by Orchestra.*

SYMPHONY HALL, Monday Evening, November 26
At Eight o'clock

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

AND

Camille Saint-Saëns

His first appearance in Boston

Programme

Overture, "Les Barbares"

Concerto for Pianoforte in G minor,
No. 2, Op. 22

- I. Andante sostenuto
- II. Allegretto scherzando
- III. Presto

PIANO SOLOS

SAINT-SAËNS {
a. Valse Nonchalante
b. Valse Mignonne
c. Valse Canariote

Symphony No. 3, in C minor, Op.
78

- I. Adagio (C minor)
Allegro moderato (C minor)
Poco adagio (D-flat major)
- II. Allegro moderato (C minor)
Presto (C major)
Maestoso (C major)
Allegro (C major)

(Mr. J. WALLACE GOODRICH at the organ)

There will be an intermission of ten minutes after the concerto

THE PIANOFORTE IS A KNABE

TIGHT BINDING

Herald Nov. 27, 1906 BY PHILIP HALE.

Mr. Camille Saint-Saens, assisted by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, gave a concert last night in Symphony Hall, which was crowded; for many stood. The programme included these compositions of the distinguished visitor: Overture to the opera, "The Barbarians"; concerto in G minor, No. 2, for piano; these piano solos—Valse nonchalante, Valse Mignonne, Valse canariote—to which Mr. Saint-Saens added his transcription of a familiar symphonic andante by Haydn; symphony in C minor, No. 3.

Mr. Saint-Saens visited us for the first time, and early in his 72d year. His compositions have been played and applauded in turn for 30 years in this city, which welcomed him long ago as a composer, as it had welcomed Berlioz before him. He has been playing the piano for 60 years; he has triumphed gloriously in the chief cities of Europe, in the Orient, in South America. What a long and brilliant career! What has he not seen and heard, this keen, ironical, friendly observer of towns and men and life! What has he not done in all the fields of musical composition!

When he first played in public, the year was 1846. Mendelssohn had died only the year before and Schumann had yet 10 years to live. Wagner's "Tannhauser" had been produced the year before and Verdi's "Rigoletto" and "Il Trovatore" did not see the footlights until the early fifties. Brahms was a lad and Tchaikowsky was only 6 years old. Eighteen hundred and forty-six was the year of the production of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Mr. Saint-Saens has seen the revolutionaries in music flourishing torches and alarming orthodox citizens and then becoming orthodox themselves. He has seen the apotheosis of composers who in life were hooted at or ignored. He has seen Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, Verdi, Franck, take their place among the immortals.

He is now living in the period of d'Indy, Debussy and Richard Strauss. Through all the years he has been musically active and alert, he has been true to himself and his beliefs, and he has worshipped sincerely in the great Temple of Art. When chamber and symphonic music were neglected in Paris, he worked indefatigably to make it understood. A sturdy patriot in daily life, he was not chauvinistic in his musical opinions and in his career as a concert giver. Extremely versatile, he is poet, playwright, play actor, essayist, archeologist, interested in all branches of science, a polished man of the world, famous for his wit and shrewd reflection.

No wonder then that Boston paid him homage last night in Symphony Hall. It will not soon have the opportunity of paying a like tribute to one as worthy.

Mr. Saint-Saens came before us as a composer and as a pianist. Many were eager to hear him play the well known concerto. Many would fain have heard the "Danse Macabre" or "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" in the place of the overture to "The Barbarians," which is not one of the composer's works of marked distinction. Some, no doubt, would have willingly not heard the three waltzes for the piano. The "Valse Non-chalante" is not without grace, but the others of the group are commonplace, if not wholly without interest.

The symphony, led with skill and sympathy by Dr. Muck, is in many respects a noble composition, one in which the composer is without the characteristic irony that flavors his symphonic poems and thus saves them from the reproach that may often be made justly against music with an explanatory and interlinear text.

It is not necessary to speak now at length concerning the character of Mr. Saint-Saens' music, or to discuss the question whether it be skilfully made and eclectic or irreproachably made and also individual. (He has been called the "finest, sanest, soundest and most versatile French musician of the 19th century." He is certainly the most versatile, and he is perhaps the finest in the true meaning of the word. "Sanest and soundest" may not be the highest compliment or the most far-seeing judgment. There is a wild imagination that is divine insanity, and this quality distinguishes the best work of Berlioz, a colossal genius who happened to express himself in music.

Mr. Pope was an eminently sane and sound poet, but who would rank him above Coleridge, Byron, Shelley or the Wordsworth of a few poems? A composer named Cesar Franck lived in the 19th century. Or if exquisite taste and a rarely poetic spirit count for something, there are the songs and chamber music of one Gabriel Faure, as there are the poems of Collins in literature. Should not the great composer be deeply emotional, passionate with a passion not extravagant yet glowing?

But time settles all these questions in his impassive way. It is enough to say that Mr. Saint-Saens now seems sure of a most honorable rank among the composers of France and for the artistic perfection of his musical expression stands among the very first.

The audience did not grow weary of applauding Mr. Saint-Saens after his performance of the concerto. This performance was interesting in many ways. It was surprising, in view of the age of the pianist, and chiefly so on account of the display of mechanical clearness and dexterity.

The third movement of the concerto was, indeed, a presto. It was taken at a break-neck speed, and there, as in the other movements, the pianist was inclined to outstrip the orchestra, more than once at the expense of rhythm. The music, even that of the first movement, does not call for any interpretation of deep sentiment. The opening, which suggests Bach living in Paris and submitting himself gracefully to its influence, is admirable in its dignity. While the melodic passages of this movement have little inherent warmth, they may yet be sung with more elasticity and charm than they were sung last night. Fleetness, clearness and elegance should distinguish the interpretation of the scherzo and the finale, and in these movements Mr. Saint-Saens revealed to us in large measure the substantial reason for his high and long-maintained reputation as a pianist.

His appearance is even now a memory, and it is doubtful whether he will ever visit us again to revive it. It was a great pleasure to see and hear him, and this pleasure should be an abiding one. The man himself won all hearts. The tribute paid was not only to the com-

THE SAINT-SAENS CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Overture to "The Barbarians." Adv.
Piano Concerto in G minor. Nov 27
Valse Nonchalante.
Valse Mignonne.
Valse Canariote.
Symphony No. 3 in C minor. 1906

One of the great events in Boston's musical history took place in Symphony Hall last night. A great foreign composer, possibly the very first of the French composers of the present, made his debut in our city. The occasion was made worthy of the great visitor. Our famous orchestra with its equally celebrated conductor collaborated with him and the programme was made up entirely of his compositions. The tremendous audience and the enthusiasm also proved that Boston appreciated the importance of the concert. M. St. Saens was received with a fervor that must have convinced him of the rank he holds in our estimation.

All considerations of the rank of the composer aside, it was a wonderful thing to find this septuagenarian (born Oct. 9, 1835) a pianist of high rank; not, perhaps, a technician of the Lhevinne or Rosenthal type, but a poet of the instrument, a man whose phrasing was perfection, who appreciated the soul of his work and artistically submerged his personality in the ensemble. The musical thought came first, the technique, ample though it was, remained ever a means and not an end.

We were glad that the composer chose his G minor concerto for this memorable concert. It is, to our mind, the best of his works in this form, and is likely to remain a favorite work with pianists and public for a generation or two. Its form is rather free, but that is no fault in the 20th century, although when it was written, in 1868, the omission of a strict first movement was held to be very iconoclastic. In every part of this work there is beauty and charm. Here one finds no crabbedness, no puzzles, no artificial ugliness. The movements are well-contrasted and the brilliancy of the finale comes as an excellent climax after the delicacy of the Scherzo.

The pianist-composer interpreted each mood to perfection, but the chief success was undoubtedly won in the bright and crisp second movement. In every movement, however, the veteran showed himself a master of "nuance." We have had so many infant prodigies upon the piano that it was refreshing to change to a prodigy of seventy-one! When St. Saens grows up he will be one of the world's finest pianists. But we scarcely thought the three waltzes (mere "omelettes souffles" of music) fitting to the occasion, and he must reserve the variations of "Ah vous dirai-je Maman" (played as an encore) for some 40 years hence, when he has reached his second childhood and once more poses as an infant phenomenon.

Nevertheless it was very wonderful to hear the grace and daintiness, the co-quetry and piquancy with which the veteran invested these trifles, and the applause after them, as well as after the concerto, was frenzied. A huge floral tribute was also given to the composer.

The orchestral pieces were rather unequal. The overture to "Les Barbares" is in the "medley" form; that is, it is made up from themes used in the opera which are strung together in good contrast, but without regard to much figure development or to the time-honored "sonata-allegro" form. It is, however, scored for a large modern orchestra and shows a surety in handling tone-colors that proves St. Saens's right to high rank among the orchestral radicals.

Yet we do not think the overture one of the composer's great successes. There is a lack of that vigor and ferocity which, according to Gibbon, was a trait of ancient Gaul. The barbarians, as well as the Roman legions, are somewhat too Chesterfieldian. One needs the composer of the battle-scene of "Heldenleben" for a subject of this kind.

It was a pity that this short work was not conducted by the composer, although sometimes the creator of an orchestral work is by no means its best interpreter, and, after all, the two orchestral numbers, as well as the piano concerto, could scarcely have been in better hands than when led by Dr. Muck, who certainly shared in the triumphs of the evening.

But the magnificent third symphony was open to no "if" or "but" or other mental reservations; it was a colossal work written to the memory of Franz Liszt, and it introduces both organ and piano as orchestral adjuncts.

In this great work we have St. Saens at his best, as the master of figure development, a giant in the field of thematic treatment. The figures for this treatment are audible even in the introduction, and part of the thematic material of the chief theme is overlapped into the subordinate theme, just as Beethoven and Brahms did in the two great symphonic predecessors in the same key.

St. Saens is not trammelled by form in this work. He does not make the usual sonata return of the first part in this first movement, but he allows the essential parts of the melodies to return and form a transition into the Adagio, in which he introduces the organ and gives a hymn-like character and a celestial ending well-fitted as a homage to the memory of the great composer which this work celebrates.

In the next movement the piano enters, not as a solo, not even as an obbligato instrument, but as a definite tone-color, its scales being joined to certain piccolo passages and rounding them off with a decidedly novel effect. It is possible that the piano was introduced with some reference to the memory of the greatest of pianists, but it has something definite to say, which could have been said by no other instrument.

There is again magnificent figure treatment in this second division of the mighty poser and pianist: it was also to one who has for 60 years maintained an hon-

WORK. Violins and violas give a figure in unison that is answered upon the kettle-drums (tonic and dominant). The working-out is as ingenious as ever D'Indy could have conceived, yet it is never ugly or even very puzzling, although it is carried to too great a length. Even Richard Strauss could not have juggled rhythms more intricately. After an alternation of 6-8 and 9-8 the theme is suddenly transformed in 2-2 in a march style, and then again changes into a 3-1 rhythm. And amid all these changes one can follow the most subtle development of the violin-viola theme and another, rather broken melody in three-noted figures.

Cymbal clashes punctuate the phrases and serve to identify them amidst the rhythmic complexity, and the finale is grand and lofty and in it the organ blends with the orchestra in a noble climax. In short, all of the complexities and the orchestral tone-coloring of the most radical school are in this work, without the ugliness and senseless dissonance that too often accompany them. It is perhaps St. Saens' greatest work, and it was an epoch-making event to have this given in Boston under the composer's own supervision, if not under his personal direction.

Mr. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ, and that instrument added tremendously to the effect. The piano was at the rear of the orchestra, since, for once, it had no leading part.

At the close of the symphony M. St. Saens was called to the platform and again forced to bow his acknowledgments.

We have had several great composers in America in the recent past. Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Guilmant, etc., and very soon Puccini is to direct one of his own operas on this side of the Atlantic; but, since Rubinstein, Tschalkowsky and Dvorak were among us there has been nothing comparable to the musical event which took place last night in Symphony Hall.

Louis C. Elson.

Saint-Saens Concert.

A change has been made in the program of the Saint-Saens concert which is to be given in Symphony hall next Monday evening. Since it was first announced that the distinguished composer was to come to Boston innumerable requests have been made that he play one of his piano concertos. When it was announced that he was to play only the organ great disappointment was expressed. The fact is that he cannot play the piano and conduct in the same evening.

The general desire to hear him play the piano led the management to ask Dr Muck if he would conduct this extra concert. It was asking a good deal, for just at this time the orchestra is hard at work on some unfamiliar music. Dr Muck, however, said that he would be glad to help make the Saint-Saens concert a success, and yesterday it was settled that the composer would not conduct or play the organ.

He will play his concerto in G minor, the most popular of the works he has written for the piano, and a group of solo pieces. The orchestral numbers will probably be his overture to the opera, "Les Barbares," and his symphony in C minor, No. 3.

3000 BOSTONIANS WILDLY APPLAUD SAINT-SAENS

Eminent French Composer, Pianist, Virtuoso, Veteran of Thousand Concerts, Receives an Impressive Ovation.

Journal Nov. 27, 1906.

One of the most important musical events Boston has known for many years—perhaps the most important, so far as affectionate sentiment and the personal equation are concerned—was that which had its enthusiastic scene at Symphony Hall last evening when Camille Saint-Saens, the grand old man of France, and the greatest composer now living in the world, stood before nearly 3000 friends and modestly, but genially, bowed his head to the plaudits of the throng.

The incident was all the more touching and impressive because Saint-Saens is old, and yet age was not the prevailing note. Above and beyond all was immense admiration for the man who has for over forty-five years upheld the banner of absolute music in France; who has written symphonies, operas, masses, songs, concertos, chamber music entr'act pieces, oratorios, chorals, organ compositions, cantatas—in fact, everything known to the human musical mind—and who has achieved in all this prodigious mass of music many things of a grace, beauty and piquancy that will send them down the years to whatever immortality is destined for the music of the nineteenth century. There was felt, too, that uplifting that comes to most human beings in the presence of a great man. And there was the extreme pleasure of hearing highly prized works interpreted by the master from whose mind and heart they sprang.

The concert was, of course, entirely made up of Saint-Saens' pieces, two of them familiar, the others less so. The Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck lent their services, and certainly the composer could not have been other than satisfied at the interpretation of his musical thoughts by the splendid band and its virile and magnetic conductor.

The wonderfully clear and vivid playing of the overture "Les Barbares," which seldom-given work led all the rest, infused into it more interest and effectiveness than is sometimes the case, for it is not in Saint-Saens' most attractive vein. And the remarkably poetic and powerful reading of the C minor symphony made that long and sometimes diffuse, though always beautiful composition, a thing of true enjoyment.

Saint-Saens himself played the sparkling and exquisite G minor pianoforte concerto, the warhorse of countless hordes of newly fledged pianists, and he played it with amazing power and technical skill for a man of his years. The sonorous force of his left hand, the flexibility of his trills and roulades and the clean-cut virtuosity of everything that he did were almost incredible. As for his charm of authority, the beauty of his rhythmic expression, the elegance of all his phrasing, no praise can be extravagant. Saint-Saens is that rare sort of genius, a great composer and a great pianist.

Flowers and Plaudits.

At the close of the concerto the enthusiasm of the big audience was unbottled and the player was recalled time after time, in the midst of which journeys off and on the stage he was presented with an enormous stand-wreath of palm leaves, with C. S. S. in immortelles running across and a bow of French tricolor at the bottom.

The smiling veteran of a thousand concerts carried his trophy away by main force, struggling, but happy. Afterward he played three waltzes of his own, pretty trifles, elegantly turned, and then, as an encore piece, a fantasia on a familiar Haydn symphony air, which pleased the audience as much as anything ring the evening.

Musical Events

Handled

SAINST-SAENS, who is to appear here as composer and pianist with the Symphony orchestra at the special concert next Monday evening in Symphony Hall, has already played four times in New York, and at each concert several hundred have been turned away from Carnegie Hall, unable to secure seats. It has been many years when any artist, except Paderewski, has had such a sensational success in that city. The huge audience of the first concert was attracted chiefly by curiosity, but at the subsequent concerts it was Saint-Saens, the pianist, who drew them. The same is true of Chicago, where he has already played three times with the Chicago orchestra and where efforts are being made to have him return. Every inducement has been offered him to stay more than the allotted six weeks in America, but the great Frenchman hates the cold and is yearning for Egypt, where he spends his winters.

It is an interesting fact that he expects during the coming winter to write another symphony. He says that it is all clear in his mind now and he has practically nothing but the mechanical part of the work to do. Saint-Saens as a composer promises to keep his fresh and virile creative faculties as long as Verdi did.

Coming Concerts—The Visit of Saint-Saens

1906

The Symphony Orchestra is to give a special concert on Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, in Symphony Hall in honor of Saint-Saens, the eminent French composer, of whose approaching visit to America much has been already printed in the Transcript. The full Symphony Orchestra will play; the programme will consist entirely of Saint-Saens' own music; and he himself will conduct, except in one of his piano concertos, in which he will take the solo part. The occasion will be, moreover, his first public appearance in this country. No French composer of such generally acknowledged eminence and none such of any nationality, except Tschalkowsky, has hitherto visited this country, and it is an agreeable "homage," as Saint-Saens would say in his own French, that the chief orchestra in America should be the first to receive him. Not only does Saint-Saens love new lands and new manners, but he loves also, and as few composers do, the zest of public appearances. He was an accomplished pianist long before he became a distinguished composer, and he has nursed his skill as carefully as though he were a virtuoso, whose reputation depended upon it. In France and in many European cities he has often conducted in concerts of his own music, and the pleasure he finds in the work passes quickly to his audience. With d'Indy, last winter, as the guest of our orchestra, and with Saint-Saens a fortnight hence for his first appearance in America, Boston seems a musical haven for French composers.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two seats, first balcony, 5 and 6B; bargain. Address L. H. M., 44 Gray St., Arlington, Mass.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two aisle seats, evening; choice location; very low. Address G. E. F., Boston Transcript.

The Symphony tickets come somewhat higher, like about all the other necessities of life nowadays.

ist:

H. WARNKE.

126
Miss Cow. SAINT-SAENS' RECITAL. Dec 5 1906

Camille Saint-Saëns gave a piano recital at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, November 27, before a fair sized and very enthusiastic audience. The program, most unconventional in its makeup, was as follows:

Italian Concerto	Bach
Prelude and Gigue	Bach
Les Tourbillons	Rameau
Les Cyclopes	Rameau
Sonata, A flat, op. 26	Beethoven
Barcarolle	Chopin
Fragments of First Act, Samson and Delilah	Saint-Saëns
Andante, from Surprise Symphony	Haydn-Saint-Saëns
Valse Mignonne	Saint-Saëns
Valse Nonchalante	Saint-Saëns
Valse Langoureuse	Saint-Saëns
Valse Canariote	Saint-Saëns
Quartet, from Henry VIII	Saint-Saëns

Transcribed by the Composer.

Saint-Saëns is a recognized authority on early classical music—indeed, on what school of music is he not an authority?—and his playing of Bach and Rameau was a lofty performance, serene in spirit, chaste and continent in color, and masterful in the presentation of musical outlines and contrapuntal details. The clearness of Saint-Saëns' touch and technic, his penetrating musicianship, and his knowledge of rhythms and accents, all combine to make him an ideal interpreter of the clavichord school of music.

The Beethoven sonata was given a translucent exposition as regards its strictly musical contents, but a more vivid presentment of some of its moods would have helped the performer to touch his hearers more deeply. The same thing may be said about the Chopin barcarolle, which is essentially a work for a pianist of passion.

In his own music Saint-Saëns was inimitable. His polish of technic, purity of tone, and elegance of phrasing set off the four charming waltzes in delightful fashion, and in the larger excerpts the composer was most successful in imitating orchestral colors and effects and suggesting happily the idea of singing voices, with instrumental accompaniment.

All in all, the occasion to hear a master-musician like Saint-Saëns at the piano was a memorable one, and succeeded in putting the hearers into a most enthusiastic frame of mind. Continued applause rewarded all the performances of the venerable composer-pianist, which he acknowledged with his customary grace and modesty.

127
SAINT-SAENS, AT 71, MAKES 3000 MARVEL AT HIS VIGOR

Amoski Nov 27. 06

By Kent Perkins.

1906-07.

Camille Saint-Saens, seventy-one years old, in many respects the leading composer of France, man of the world, actor, poet, archaeologist, essayist—and several other things—scored in Symphony Hall last night one of the most remarkable triumphs ever won in the musical history of Boston. Incidentally he gave a smashing blow to the theories of Osler.

It was his first visit here, where his music has been admired for a generation. As he was to play his own piano music and Dr. Muck was to lead the Symphony players in some of the great Frenchman's orchestral work, the combination magnet drew a splendid audience that filled all the seats and all the standing room.

The new Symphony leader had never before been seen by large numbers of the 3,000 present, as they were not regular Symphony patrons. He was warmly received and both he and the orchestra were roundly cheered after the first number, the overture to Saint-Saens's opera, "The Barbarians," whose semi-savage climaxes were delivered with magnificent force and whose romantic interludes were voiced with charming grace.

Then appeared Saint-Saens, short, stout, erect, with bearded face and large, full head, a type of the large-minded, big-hearted Frenchman of the Loubet class, whom he resembles not a little. He came upon the stage with firm tread, nonchalantly removing his white gloves as he advanced.

With dignified grace he acknowledged the storm of applause that greeted him. Then he adjusted the piano seat to fit his short legs, with Dr. Muck eager to aid, but hesitating to interfere, sat down like a youth full of bottled up energy and began after the orchestra's preliminary strains his own concerto in G minor, No. 2, one of the most difficult of piano compositions.

His rapidity, without sacrifice of precision, considering his years, was perhaps the most marvellous feature of his work. He actually ran away from the young giants of the Symphony Orchestra, who worked like Trojans under the spur of Dr. Muck to keep up with his break-neck speed. They were often a part of a note behind him in the complicated rhythm of the presto.

The concert closed with a magnificent rendition of Saint-Saen's Symphony in C minor No. 3, to which Dr. Muck and his players gave their best in high art and spontaneous enthusiasm. The composer heard it with evident pleasure from a secluded seat among the audience under the right balcony.

ONY ORCHESTRA.

3K. Conductor.

ICERT.

IBER 29, AT 8 P.M.

mmme.

NS on a THEME by JOSEF HAYDN, ncti Antoni), op. 56A.

for VIOLIN, in F sharp minor.

SONG AT THE MANGER } From the
 HE THREE HOLY KINGS } Oratorio
 "Christus"

pist:

AMOWSKI.

Mus. Conv. SAINT-SAENS' RECITAL. Dec 5 1906

Camille Saint-Saëns gave a piano recital at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, November 27, before a fair sized and very enthusiastic audience. The program, most unconventional in its makeup, was as follows:

Italian Concerto	Bach
Prelude and Gigue	Bach
Les Tourbillons	Rameau
Les Cyclopes	Rameau
Sonata, A flat, op. 26	Beethoven
Barcarolle	Chopin
Fragments of First Act, Samson and Delilah	Saint-Saëns
Andante, from Surprise Symphony	Haydn-Saint-Saëns
Valse Mignonne	Saint-Saëns
Valse Nonchalante	Saint-Saëns
Valse Langoureuse	Saint-Saëns
Valse Canariote	Saint-Saëns
Quartet, from Henry VIII	Saint-Saëns

Transcribed by the Composer.

Saint-Saëns is a recognized authority on early classical music—indeed, on what school of music is he not an authority?—and his playing of Bach and Rameau was a lofty performance, serene in spirit, chaste and continent in color, and masterful in the presentation of musical outlines and contrapuntal details. The clearness of Saint-Saëns' touch and technic, his penetrating musicianship, and his knowledge of rhythms and accents, all combine to make him an ideal interpreter of the clavichord school of music.

The Beethoven sonata was given a translucent exposition as regards its strictly musical contents, but a more vivid presentment of some of its moods would have helped the performer to touch his hearers more deeply. The same thing may be said about the Chopin barcarolle, which is essentially a work for a pianist of passion.

In his own music Saint-Saëns was inimitable. His polish of technic, purity of tone, and elegance of phrasing set off the four charming waltzes in delightful fashion, and in the larger excerpts the composer was most successful in imitating orchestral colors and effects and suggesting happily the idea of singing voices, with instrumental accompaniment.

All in all, the occasion to hear a master-musician like Saint-Saëns at the piano was a memorable one, and succeeded in putting the hearers into a most enthusiastic frame of mind. Continued applause rewarded all the performances of the venerable composer-pianist, which he acknowledged with his customary grace and modesty.

SAINT-SAENS, AT 71, MAKES 3000 MARVEL AT HIS VIGOR

Amorin Nov 27. 06

By Kent Perkins.

1906-07.

Camille Saint-Saens, seventy-one years old, in many respects the leading composer of France, man of the world, actor, poet, archaeologist, essayist—and several other things—scored in Symphony Hall last night one of the most remarkable triumphs ever won in the musical history of Boston. Incidentally he gave a smashing blow to the theories of Osler.

It was his first visit here, where his music has been admired for a generation. As he was to play his own piano music and Dr. Muck was to lead the Symphony players in some of the great Frenchman's orchestral work, the combination magnet drew a splendid audience that filled all the seats and all the standing room.

The new Symphony leader had never before been seen by large numbers of the 3,000 present, as they were not regular Symphony patrons. He was warmly received and both he and the orchestra were roundly cheered after the first number, the overture to Saint-Saens's opera, "The Barbarians," whose semi-savage climaxes were delivered with magnificent force and whose romantic interludes were voiced with charming grace.

Then appeared Saint-Saens, short, stout, erect, with bearded face and large, full head, a type of the large-minded, big-hearted Frenchman of the Loubet class, whom he resembles not a little. He came upon the stage with firm tread, nonchalantly removing his white gloves as he advanced.

With dignified grace he acknowledged the storm of applause that greeted him. Then he adjusted the piano seat to fit his short legs, with Dr. Muck eager to aid, but hesitating to interfere, sat down like a youth full of bottled up energy and began after the orchestra's preliminary strains his own concerto in G minor, No. 2, one of the most difficult of piano compositions.

His rapidity, without sacrifice of precision, considering his years, was perhaps the most marvellous feature of his work. He actually ran away from the young giants of the Symphony Orchestra, who worked like Trojans under the spur of Dr. Muck to keep up with his break-neck speed. They were often a part of a note behind him in the complicated rhythm of the presto.

The concert closed with a magnificent rendition of Saint-Saen's Symphony in C minor No. 3, to which Dr. Muck and his players gave their best in high art and spontaneous enthusiasm. The composer heard it with evident pleasure from a secluded seat among the audience under the right balcony.

NY ORCHESTRA.

JK, Conductor.

ICERT.

IBER 29, AT 8 P.M.

mmme.

NS on a THEME by JOSEF HAYDN, (ncti Antoni), op. 56A.

for VIOLIN, in F sharp minor.

SONG AT THE MANGER } From the
THE THREE HOLY KINGS } Oratorio
"Christus"

pist:

AMOWSKI.

128

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 1, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BRUCKNER,

SYMPHONY in E major, No 7.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Adagio: Sehr feierlich und langsam.

III. Scherzo; Allegro: Trio: Etwas langsamer.

IV. Finale: Bewegt, doch nicht schnell.

LISZT,

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA in E flat major, No. 1.

Allegro maestoso.—Quasi adagio.—Allegretto vivace.—

Allegro animato.—Allegro marziale animato.—Presto.

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.

Soloist:

Mr. MORITZ ROSENTHAL.

The Pianoforte is a Weber.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

129

130 Much fuss was made in some quarters about the fact that Dr. Muck performed Bruckner's seventh symphony (at the Thursday concert), and the work was analyzed and discussed as though it were not perfectly familiar to musicians for years past. The old legend about the Bruckner-Brahms-Hanslick battle was stirred up, and excited controversy raged in the proverbial teapot. Of course, all readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER remember the numerous reviews of Bruckner's seventh symphony printed in the Berlin, Vienna, London, and Leipsic letters of this paper. It is therefore not necessary to devote any space at this time to analytical discussion or historical exposition. Just as Bruckner could not be made an issue against Brahms years ago, so he cannot furnish subject matter for argument now. His works were never, and are not at the present time, in any sense of the word revolutionary. Nor are they startling, or even surprising. Bruckner was a composer who mastered the symphonic form in its mechanical aspects, and wrote good, wholesome, academic, music. Sometimes he rose above the average of the many second class composers who have written symphonies, and more often he remained on their level. His simple and lowly life is reflected in his music; it hardly ever shows any real power of imagination, any striving other than that of a typical "bürgerliche" nature. Once for all, Bruckner must be set down as a composer who falls far short of being great, and time will prove that this MUSICAL COURIER estimate is correct. The tapeworm length of the seventh symphony would have put most of the auditors to sleep had not Dr. Muck held their attention with the finesse of his conducting, and the evident enthusiasm with which he tried to arouse favor for the work. Mus. Cw. Dec 12 1906

ANTON BRUCKNER.

ROSENTHAL AND SYMPHONY

BY PHILIP HALE

Anton Bruckner's Astonishing Work With Famous Dirge Performed.

Rerald Dec 1, 1906
Brilliant Playing of Liszt's Concerto for the Piano.

The programme of the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 7.....Bruckner
Piano concerto in E flat major, No. 1.....Liszt
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

Dr. Muck is to be thanked heartily for his courage in putting a symphony by Anton Bruckner on the programme and for the manner in which he conducted it.

His shrewdness was as great as his courage, for he put the symphony first in the order of pieces. Had he put it last, each movement no doubt would have aided in clearing the hall before the appointed time. Any serious symphony should come first, when the ears and the spirits of the hearers are unjaded. Especially is this true of a symphony that is performed for the first time, or is unfamiliar. Mr. Gericke produced Bruckner's Seventh in Boston in 1887, to the great consternation of nine-tenths of the hearers, if we may believe the contemporaneous reports. Since then we have heard the third, fourth, fifth and unfinished ninth of this extraordinary composer, but as yet there is no devoted band of Brucknerites in Boston.

If the overture by Beethoven had come first and then Mr. Rosenthal's performance of the concerto, the greater part of the audience would no doubt have sat courteously through the first movement, possibly through the second, and then exodus would have come after revelations.

Dr. Muck is a discriminative, not a fanatical, admirer of Bruckner. He was the first to conduct a performance of the symphony in Austria, at Graz, when the composer was present. He also first conducted the work in Berlin.

A conductor who wishes all his selections to be trumps, who thinks first of the applause that may follow a performance, will not choose a symphony by Bruckner, whose time has not yet arrived, if it will ever come, as far as the great musical public is concerned in any land. Many orchestral players find no pleasure in their task. Critics are inclined to shake portentously the head. The courage of Dr. Muck is the more conspicuous because in Boston there is no disposition to set Bruckner's music against Brahms', and the devotion of Bruckner to Wagner is to us a matter of not the slightest importance.

Furthermore, an indifferent public in this country not well acquainted with Bruckner's symphonies has been easily persuaded to believe that they are all dull or as the music of a madman. Some have repeated idly the remark of a German about this very symphony. He described it as "the confused dream of an orchestral player unstrung by reason of 30 rehearsals of 'Tristan and Isolde.'" They have repeated it and smiled in a superior manner, though they may never have heard the symphony.

If it be the duty of a critic to find out first of all that which is good in a work of art and at the same time to inquire in what respects this work of art is to be distinguished from others, what is to be said of this colossal composition that enchants for a moment and bores for minutes; that raises the hearer to the high heavens and then quickly drops him into the slough of despond; that makes him now wonder at an unsurpassable flight of imagination and now at futile repetitions of insignificant detail; now wonder at an eloquence that reminds one of Beethoven and now at music that is little above the chatter of a magpie?

How could a man who conceived the exposition of the first theme of the first movement, the pathetic and impressive adagio with that haunting melody of unearthly beauty given to the violins—a melody that Beethoven might well have put in his slow movement of the Ninth Symphony—the climax of the dirge in this same adagio, the Titanic scherzo—how could a man who thus showed the rarest genius have so woefully lacked the faculty of self-criticism which would have led him to strive after a more logical continuity of musical thought and to throw out whole pages of inconsequential and tiresome detail?

This fatal lack of proportion in Bruckner's music is more to be deplored than the passing reminiscences of passages easily found in works of Wagner and Beethoven.

There are pages in this symphony, as in other symphonies of this singular genius, which are of elemental and overwhelming grandeur, pages of a beauty that is not of this earth and can be expressed only in music, pages that put Bruckner for a moment—alas, only for a

Much fuss was made in some quarters about the fact that Dr. Muck performed Bruckner's seventh symphony (at the Thursday concert), and the work was analyzed and discussed as though it were not perfectly familiar to musicians for years past. The old legend about the Bruckner-Brahms-Hanslick battle was stirred up, and excited controversy raged in the proverbial teapot. Of course, all readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER remember the numerous reviews of Bruckner's seventh symphony printed in the Berlin, Vienna, London, and Leipsic letters of this paper. It is therefore not necessary to devote any space at this time to analytical discussion or historical exposition. Just as Bruckner could not be made an issue against Brahms years ago, so he cannot furnish subject matter for argument now. His works were never, and are not at the present time, in any sense of the word revolutionary. Nor are they startling, or even surprising. Bruckner was a composer who mastered the symphonic form in its mechanical aspects, and wrote good, wholesome, academic, music. Sometimes he rose above the average of the many second class composers who have written symphonies, and more often he remained on their level. His simple and lowly life is reflected in his music; it hardly ever shows any real power of imagination, any striving other than that of a typical "bürgerliche" nature. Once for all, Bruckner must be set down as a composer who falls far short of being great, and time will prove that this MUSICAL COURIER estimate is correct. The tapeworm length of the seventh symphony would have put most of the auditors to sleep had not Dr. Muck held their attention with the finesse of his conducting, and the evident enthusiasm with which he tried to arouse favor for the work. Mus. Cour. Dec 12, 1906

ANTON BRUCKNER.

ROSENTHAL AND SYMPHONY

BY PHILIP HALE

Anton Bruckner's Astonishing Work With Famous Dirge Performed.

Revised Dec 2, 1906
Brilliant Playing of Liszt's Concerto for the Piano.

The programme of the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in E major, No. 7.....Bruckner
Piano concerto in E flat major, No. 1.....Liszt
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

Dr. Muck is to be thanked heartily for his courage in putting a symphony by Anton Bruckner on the programme and for the manner in which he conducted it.

His shrewdness was as great as his courage, for he put the symphony first in the order of pieces. Had he put it last, each movement no doubt would have aided in clearing the hall before the appointed time. Any serious symphony should come first, when the ears and the spirits of the hearers are un-jaded. Especially is this true of a symphony that is performed for the first time, or is unfamiliar. Mr. Gericke produced Bruckner's Seventh in Boston in 1897, to the great consternation of nine-tenths of the hearers, if we may believe the contemporaneous reports. Since then we have heard the third, fourth, fifth and unfinished ninth of this extraordinary composer, but as yet there is no devoted band of Brucknerites in Boston.

If the overture by Beethoven had come first and then Mr. Rosenthal's performance of the concerto, the greater part of the audience would no doubt have sat courteously through the first movement, possibly through the second, and then exodus would have come after revelations.

Dr. Muck is a discriminative, not a fanatical, admirer of Bruckner. He was the first to conduct a performance of the symphony in Austria, at Graz, when the composer was present. He also first conducted the work in Berlin.

A conductor who wishes all his selections to be trumps, who thinks first of the applause that may follow a performance, will not choose a symphony by Bruckner, whose time has not yet arrived, if it will ever come, as far as the great musical public is concerned in any land. Many orchestral players find no pleasure in their task. Critics are inclined to shake portentously the head. The courage of Dr. Muck is the more conspicuous because in Boston there is no disposition to set Bruckner's music against Brahms', and the devotion of Bruckner to Wagner is to us a matter of not the slightest importance.

Furthermore, an indifferent public in this country not well acquainted with Bruckner's symphonies has been easily persuaded to believe that they are all dull or as the music of a madman. Some have repeated idly the remark of a German about this very symphony. He described it as "the confused dream of an orchestral player unstrung by reason of 20 rehearsals of 'Tristan and Isolde.'" They have repeated it and smiled in a superior manner, though they may never have heard the symphony.

If it be the duty of a critic to find out first of all that which is good in a work of art and at the same time to inquire in what respects this work of art is to be distinguished from others, what is to be said of this colossal composition that enchants for a moment and bores for minutes; that raises the hearer to the high heavens and then quickly drops him into the slough of despond; that makes him now wonder at an unsurpassable flight of imagination and now at futile repetitions of insignificant detail; now wonder at an eloquence that reminds one of Beethoven and now at music that is little above the chatter of a magpie?

How could a man who conceived the exposition of the first theme of the first movement, the pathetic and impressive adagio with that haunting melody of unearthly beauty given to the violins—a melody that Beethoven might well have put in his slow movement of the Ninth Symphony—the climax of the dirge in this same adagio, the Titanic scherzo—how could a man who thus showed the rarest genius have so woefully lacked the faculty of self-criticism which would have led him to strive after a more logical continuity of musical thought and to throw out whole pages of inconsequential and tiresome detail?

This fatal lack of proportion in Bruckner's music is more to be deplored than the passing reminiscences of passages easily found in works of Wagner and Beethoven.

There are pages in this symphony, as in other symphonies of this singular genius, which are of elemental and overwhelming grandeur, pages of a beauty that is not of this earth and can be expressed only in music, pages that put Bruckner for a moment—alas, only for a ment—by the side of the immortals. And so there are wonderful, Aeschylan lines to be found, radiantly grand, in the incomprehensible verbiage of William Blake's prophetic books. So, too, there are lines in Blake's "Songs of Innocence" that are suggested by certain melodic thoughts of the childlike composer who struggled for years as a humble school teacher and organist in Austrian villages and towns.

Mr. Rosenthal is a pianist who excites the warmest respect as well as unbounded admiration. He is a thinker, not merely a virtuoso beyond compare. His rounded nature and his knowledge of the arts, literature, science, the world enter into the dazzling brilliance of his performance of Liszt's concerto and glorify it. The pianist's imagination reconstructs the romantic years of Liszt and vitalizes all that which might otherwise seem to be of a long forgotten and antiquated period. Liszt wrote the concerto for himself. He unconsciously wrote it also for Mr. Rosenthal. I have never heard such an amazingly brilliant and at the same time such a truly poetic performance of this fascinating work.

To speak of Mr. Rosenthal's fabulous mechanical proficiency would be impertinent toward him and the reader, for this proficiency was acknowledged long ago. He had purposed to play Chopin's concerto in E minor, but in this he was anticipated. It would have been a delight to hear him in the work of Chopin, but it is a matter of general congratulation that we were all allowed to know his conception of the concerto by Liszt. One might grow eloquent over the poesy of his mechanism, its ineffable clearness, the lucid reasonableness of its fleetness, but the pianist's broad and heroic view of the work as a whole and the impressiveness of his presentation of that view are still more memorable.

The performance of the orchestra was of the highest standard, and Dr. Muck was equally the sympathetic friend and interpreter of Bruckner, Liszt and Beethoven.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Rosenthal Plays With Symphony Orchestra.

Tucker's Sunday Concerts Begin
Today in Chickering Hall.

Coming Recitals by Gadski, Eames and Others.

The celebrated pianist, Moriz Rosenthal, was the soloist of the seventh Symphony program, making his first appearance here after an absence of about eight years. He played Liszt's E-flat major concerto. The other numbers were Bruckner's E major symphony and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. The wonder-pianist, in selecting the Liszt concerto, had opportunity not only to show his technical skill in dazzling colors, but also to charm by a poetic exploitation of the familiar number, in which the tonal beauty of his work was of a quality that made a potent appeal to one's imagination. It was not by the tremendous power shown at times that he gained the greatest appreciation, but by the marvelous octave runs, trills long sustained, and exquisite arabesques at lightning speed, which he fairly showered upon the concerto.

The dynamic contrasts were clearly set forth, the fleetness of his fingers did not cloud the beautiful quality and clearness of his tones and all his arpeggios and runs were smooth and even. And allied to the air of authority in musical utterance Rosenthal's demeanor is as modest as can be imagined, and with but the slightest suggestion of enthusiasm. The latter his audience supplied in abundance, recalling him several times to the platform.

The orchestral accompaniment was of the highest order, Liszt proving no more difficult to Dr. Muck's forces than did Bruckner, whose symphony came first. This massive work takes more than one hour in performance, and is generally austere in style, strongly suggestive of Wagner's influence in some of its fortissimo modulations and filled with complex instrumentation.

Much originality in treatment is shown in the adagio, the solemnity of the tremes being preserved skilfully in each band choir, the crescendos in particular calling for special praise on account of the clear management of the instrumental combinations. The scherzo is peculiar, being rather heavy in effect, though there are some light spots in it. There is much that is tempestuous in the finale. The interpretation was satisfactory, of course, but the work was rather too ponderous and severe in character to arouse much interest. The "Leonore" overture was delightfully played.

The orchestra will be away this week on its second trip. The program for the next rehearsal and concert will include Elgar's overture, "In the South"; "Cleopatra," a symphonic poem by Chadwick, first time; variations and double fugue on a "Jolly Theme" by Georg Schumann, first time, and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1906

Musical Comment

Dr. Muck ended on Saturday the second month of the Symphony concerts, and in it he has subdued much of the complaint about his programmes that was murmuring a few weeks ago. The programmes of the first four concerts he made early last summer in Germany. He knew nothing at that time at first hand of his orchestra or his public. Each had equally to come to know him. As any wise conductor would do, he shaped his programmes accordingly—of familiar classics that would serve best as a medium for the gaining of this mutual knowledge. In the two months that he has spent in Boston, he has very swiftly learned the resources and capabilities of his band and the temper and interests of his public, and he has begun to arrange his programmes accordingly. Three modern symphonies—Sinding's, Glazounoff's and Bruckner's—have been played at the last three concerts. Glazounoff's was actually new to Boston; Sinding's had not been heard for seven years, and Bruckner's for nearly twenty. Two of the three virtuosos—Petschnikoff and Rosenthal—have played modern, if more familiar, concertos. In fact, in the last three weeks there have been only three classics on the programmes—Chopin's first concerto, Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture upon which Dr. Muck was bound to prove his skill. Surely there is no ground for complaint over the interest or the freshness of the last three programmes. The worst that can be said of them is that perhaps they have followed a little too rigidly the severe Viennese model of overture, concerto, symphony. Two weeks hence, however, there will be no symphony at the concerts, and a new tone-poem by Mr. Chadwick stands on the list. Later in the winter, Mr. Converse's music is to have a place, and there will be room for Debussy and other of the "new" Frenchmen. In a word Dr. Muck, like the discreet man he is, has preferred to discover his public and his band before he made many programmes. Now he has set about the task with a discernment that some of his predecessors were much slower to acquire.

As the concerts go forward, there seems, too, very little cause for the alarm that some listeners, especially in New York, have professed to feel lest the precision, the finesse and the euphony of the orchestra should suffer under the new vigor, elasticity and sonority that Dr. Muck is giving it. They have rejoiced—they could not, indeed, help rejoicing—in the full-throated and spontaneous sonority that the band brought to Sinding's symphony or to the tumbling finale of Glazounoff's. Yet was not this vigor costing the orchestra a little of its delicacy of tone and rhythm? The scherzo of Glazounoff's symphony and a score of the finer passages in Bruckner's tested both, and it was hard to detect the smallest loss. One of the compensating beauties of Bruckner's music is the penetrating or caressing euphony of some of his instrumental combinations. They sounded on Saturday like the voices of his visions. The brass of the band speaks full-voiced now, but its tones keep their mellow sonority. The delicate euphonic blending of orchestra and solo instrument has seldom been higher than it was when Mr. Rosenthal played Liszt's concerto or Mr. Petschnikoff Tschalkovski's. Moreover, it is the new sonority that Dr. Muck gains from the orchestra that filled Sinding's symphony with its viking voice of passion; and the new elasticity that seized the Russian's rhythm and animated the overture to "Oberon" and the "Leonore" overture with fresh dramatic vitality. Perhaps Dr. Muck was overdisposed to draw the last drop of musical and emotional contrast out of Beethoven's overture; but the whole impression was still of the flinging of it anew and spontaneously upon our ears and our emotions. As long as we of the younger generation can remember our orchestra has been a beautiful thing. Now the range of its beauty is wider, the height and the depth of it ampler. There is more character diversifying it and more vitality coursing through it.

Bruckner's symphony was better received on Saturday than it had been on Friday. The listeners were less restless, though there were still signs of weariness, and the applause was much heartier, even to recalling Dr. Muck, as if in thanks for the revival of the symphony. Yet a second hearing of the music brought little change in the impression that it originally made. It struggles under the severest of burdens that may rest upon any thing of the arts—its salient defects are exactly of the sort that most defeat its salient virtues. The beauty of some of the melodies, of moments in their development, of the color that some of the instrumental combinations impart to them, is of the purity or the iridescence of a vision of the ideal. Bruckner touches at moments an ecstasy of disembodied loveliness, of idealized feeling that only César Franck among modern composers has attained. Franck, however, maintains this ecstasy. The listener may hear Franck's music and be conscious of nothing else. Bruckner not only fails to maintain it; he falls away, and on the instant, into the shallows of finicking pedantry or the wastes of baldness. When he is not winged, he slouches. When he is not the Bruckner of ideal visions, he is Bruckner the peasant of Windhag or the pedagogue of Vienna. The singleness of mind that absorbs him in his visions makes him forget that others beside Bruckners were to hear his music. He bids them at moments into a world of his own creating and that only music could create. Then he misses the clew and leaves them groping and weary. The result is inevitable: the world loses its illusion and they renounce the quest for it.

134

Following the symphony Liszt's concerto and Mr. Rosenthal's playing of it seemed the other extreme of musical achievement. The music itself sounded like an heroic improvisation, wrought in sustained passion with means that leapt, perfect and sure, to answer the composer's imagination. The concerto may sound, and with reason, like a hard and brilliant show-piece. It may sound, even as Mr. Joseffy makes it, as a soft tapestry of bright and changeable tonal colors. And it may be the heroic rhapsody into which Mr. Rosenthal transforms it. The music glowed as he struck it from the piano. The very rhythms had a passion of motion. The ornaments were as hot flashes of fancy. The melodies were as the spontaneous voice of kindling and transporting feeling. Here was romance speaking in its largest, warmest, richest voice. And when it called there was no room for the thought of the mastery of the instrument or of the music by which it spoke and was made alive. Mr. Rosenthal did not read the concerto; he read Liszt's imagination as he wrote; he read the romantic ardor, the heroic sweep, the tonal magnificence of it all. And his reading was re-creation.

BRUCKNER'S SEVENTH SYMPHONY PLEASED

Public interest ran high over yesterday's symphony concert at Symphony Hall, partly on account of Bruckner's seventh symphony, with which Dr. Muck has won laurels abroad, but mainly over the first appearance of Mr. Rosenthal in Boston during his present tour.

Dr. Muck did wonders in his interpretation, and all that could be said for the composer was said.

Bruckner's musical works are slowly attaining recognition in the musical world, but it is a question whether, with their exceptional faults and virtues, they will ever be a complete success.

The opening chords of the concerto were struck with brusque authority, the more lyric themes of the first and second parts were declaimed, not sung, and through it all one felt that the virtuoso was hungering for what was to come.

But with the nervous tapping of the triangle at the beginning of the allegretto, Moritz' eyes began to gleam in a demonic manner. He took up the flute and toyed with it. His hands joyfully gambolled and caracolled over the piano, and from that time on things went with incredible dash and elan.

The strongest orchestral fortissimo seemed incapable of "feazing" him, and there was the absolute conviction that had there been three more orchestras he would have outdid 'em all. His nerves must have been electric batteries, and surely those sinews and wrists can be nothing but tempered steel!

As the last crashing chord sounded through the hall he rose, elated and supreme, and bowed to the frantic applause.

Mr. Rosenthal showed himself in this concerto as the agile, all-conquering virtuoso, nothing more.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner, Symphony in E major, No. 7.
Liszt, Piano Concerto in E flat.

Soloist, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal.
Beethoven, Leonora Overture, No. 3.

Let no one suppose that it was a short concert! It lasted two full hours, and had it not been for Rosenthal and the Liszt Paprika it would have been a fatigued audience that departed from the hall at 10 p.m. It was a deed of heroism to play the Bruckner symphony and Dr. Muck has shown thereby that he is not one of those conductors who seeks merely the applause of his audience, but that he is endeavoring to educate and broaden the public taste. Find fault with the Bruckner seventh symphony as we may, it is yet our duty to hear it and to study it, as one of the peculiar musical developments of modern times.

How much temporary harm an unjust or biased musical critic of prominence can do! Not all of Hanslick's brutal antagonism has been able to keep Bruckner's symphonies out of the repertoire; but he was able to torture the composer and make his life generally miserable. How much this was the case may be surmised from the fact that once, when Bruckner was presented to the Austrian emperor and that monarch genially asked, "Can I do anything for you?" Bruckner, with a peasant's faith in the omnipotence of the emperor, burst out with,—"Yes, your majesty, if you would only ask Mr. Hanslick not to write about me any more!"

We need not join the Hanslick assaults with rapier and bludgeon when we say that we do not altogether admire the present work. It is music for musicians only and appeals too frequently to the intellect and too seldom to the emotions. Its thematic material is very scanty, for all that it is more than an hour in performance. Dr. Muck was wise in putting it at the beginning of the concert, for not only did he thus force each auditor to stay to the end of the work, but one came to it fresh and unjaded and was thereby better able to follow the tremendous amount of figure development.

Great ability to transform musical figures is not an unmixed good. One sometimes follows this to the exclusion of melodic beauty, of tone-coloring, of emotional expression. Bruckner can turn his themes upside down, can augment and diminish them, can give them backwards, until one is overwhelmed with the ingenuity of the workmanship, but the variety and beauty of thematic material of Beethoven or Brahms are not present. The tone-coloring is not better than the neutral tints of Brahms. Frequent contrasts of the fullest orchestra with unsupported solo phrases, and many combinations of tuba or bass-trombone with the flute, may astonish, but do not charm.

Yet there are occasional climaxes of some fervor, oases in the desert. These were chiefly in evidence in the second (slow) movement, in which the tone-color of the tubas gave a sonorous solemnity. But even here the music would not soothe a heart-ache or cause a tear to flow.

The Scherzo was attractive in its brusquerie, had good contrasts and was clear and coherent. Its striking figure could be easily followed even by the non-musician. The figure aforesaid is closely akin to the "Flying Dutchman" motive, as the brass crescendo and climax at the end of the first movement is an echo of the "Dawn" scene of the second act of "Lohengrin."

In all the work there is no crabbed ugliness, and there is no seeking after dissonance merely for the sake of being original; in this point, at least, Bruckner is above many symphonists of modern days.

The finale is again given over to derivations, inversions, and other conjurings. We suspect that if Bruckner had been less of a contrapuntist he would have been more of a composer. The symphony is remarkable in its school, but we do not enjoy the school. Yet it was good to hear it and to study it, and the public may breathe easier over a heavy task well accomplished. Possibly Dr. Muck shares this feeling. At all events he deserves great credit for a clear and well-balanced performance of a gigantic work.

Musical Events

FOR the seventh concert of the Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck offered Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, Liszt's E-flat Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture. Mr. Moritz Rosenthal was the soloist. It required considerable courage on the part of the leader to put the Bruckner number in his programme. It's not a popular selection, and the chances are it never will be. It's too long, over an hour in length, and its flashes of brilliancy are altogether too few and too far between. As a study for the musician, it is doubtless all right, but for the average musical audience the work is too deep. It was well placed at the beginning of the concert.

Mr. Rosenthal has never been heard to better advantage in this city than Saturday night in the Liszt concerto, nor has a better rendition of the composition been heard. It was delightful, and bordered on the sensational. The playing of the orchestra was fully up to that of the pianist. After a truly wonderful finale the pianist was four times recalled in the most enthusiastic manner.

The delightful Beethoven number provided a fitting close to a concert that will long be treasured by the Symphony audience. It's a grand work, and was well interpreted.

A SYMPHONY BY BRUCKNER

Trans. — Nov. 28, 1906
Dr. Muck to Revive His Seventh Symphony After Twenty Years—A Note on the Composer and His Music—The Man as Vienna Knew Him and Some Traits of His Symphonies

For the Symphony concerts of this week, the last before the monthly journey of the orchestra to other cities, Bruckner's seventh symphony—the symphony of the poignant adagio that was the composer's lament for the dead Wagner, who had been his friend—will be played for the first time in twenty years. It was written between 1881 and 1883; Nikisch played it in Leipzig in 1884 and Lévi at Munich in 1885. In 1886 Bruckner's own Vienna heard it under Richter, and in the same year Mr. Gericke gave it in Boston. Since then it has not reappeared on our Symphony programmes, and very few of Bruckner's nine symphonies have ever found a place there. They have in some measure made their way in Germany and in Austria—the composer who was the teacher of Nikisch, Mottl and Mahler has not lacked conductors for champions—but in France, in England and in America they are still very little known. Dr. Muck believes that Bruckner's music deserves a hearing alike for its own sake and for our musical information, and he is beginning with the symphony that discloses his larger qualities at their fullest, coupled with fewest of his shortcomings; that did most to bring him just recognition; and that has usually made the deepest impression of all his music upon audiences.

The other day in Berlin a musical journal published a "Bruckner number," and at the end of a rather tedious set of essays were reproductions of drawings and caricatures of him made in his lifetime. His figure lent itself easily to ridicule; it was short, dumpy, and surmounted by a little round head. The chin is slight and almost receding; the eyes are bright sunken dots; but the forehead is broad and high, and there is will in the projecting nose. It is distinctly the figure of an elderly and timid man, and yet of a curiously overgrown child. Scrutinize these drawings more closely, and even in the caricatures there is some hint of his traits. He was a singularly simple and devout man, who could dedicate a symphony unaffectedly To The Good God and make none that knew him smile. In him was the mystic vein of a Fra Angelico—and his working life was cast in the last half of the nineteenth century and in Vienna. Yet then and there his real world was the world of his music and his imaginings. He had a few friends and sought none; he travelled little and was untouched by experiences of new lands; he had not an interest in the world but music and his plety. His simple-mindedness was at once his safeguard and his pitfall, so that his music sometimes seems the voice of an exalted naïveté. He was forty before he had mastered the resources and the laws of musical expression. He had struggled into knowledge of them through a poverty and unworldliness that had compelled him to fiddle for village fete while on Sundays he played the organ in the village church. His skill as an organist brought him the means and the opportunity for his studies, and led him finally from minor Austrian towns to Vienna. There in comparative freedom and leisure he sought, in his symphonies the musical expression of which he had dreamed so long. No other musical form, though he wrote masses and choral pieces, so deeply appealed to him. There are nine of these symphonies in all, the last, "The Good God," unfinished. Bruckner struggled to get a hearing for them; and at first succeeded oftener in other German cities than in Vienna. There musicians and amateurs alike disdained them and Hanslick the reviewer was spitefully bitter. Steadily Wagner had stood Bruckner's friend, or as he seemed to Bruckner, his demigod. Richter at last began to play his music, and Vienna first listened, then approved, and finally gave the composer what belated honor it might.

Bruckner follows the symphonic form as Beethoven left it, and stops at no lengths in the development of his melodies. His instrumentation and his sense of tonal color generally are plainly of the Wagner whom he loved. There is individuality, however, in his melodic ideas, and endless fertility in his evolution, variation and transformation of them. His invention flows placidly forward with new harmonies, new rhythms, new combinations, new contrasts. Sometimes it seems cold music, sometimes the listener longs for any outburst of any passion. And then the large calm and the serene exaltation of the tones possess him. There is even a measure of grandeur in them and sometimes an emotion that by its very depth touches majesty. There is the voice of religious faith warmed and softened by mystic feeling in some of his adagios, and the voice of religious and mystic elevation in some of his final movements, as though he would have them an apotheosis in tones. Yet just before has stood a scherzo that has a dreamy grace of sentiment and expression and carries a singular charm as though of the naïve delight of the composer as he wrote. They are long symphonies, because Bruckner had been waiting so many years to speak and had no other voice for this pent utterance but music. They are broad symphonies because of this high calm and serene detachment from all but his visions; and they are thick symphonies, for his harmonic invention was tireless. But the hackneyed gibe—some say it was originally Hanslick's and some say Weingartner's—that they have length, breadth and thickness, is more witty than fair.

A SYMPHONY BY BRUCKNER

Trans. — Dec. 106
A CURIOUS EXPERIENCE AT YESTERDAY'S CONCERT

The Exceptional Mood of the Audience—The Music as It Is, and the Music as the Circumstances of Bruckner's Career and His Traits Have Transfigured It—The Concerts of the New Week and the New Month—Musical News

For an hour and ten minutes yesterday afternoon, the audience at the Symphony concert listened to Bruckner's seventh symphony, first with signs of restlessness, then with obvious tokens of weary indifference. Dr. Muck had shifted the symphony from the end to the head of the programme, and there was no escape if the listeners would have their Rosenthal, Liszt and Beethoven that were to come. The long, first movement palpably failed to warm their interest. The second fell like a pall. So far there had been only restlessness and, after either movement, a few faint and scattered handclaps. For the rest of the symphony, there was plain boredom. The house rustled incessantly; there was the buzz of low whispers; the programme book, from the first to the last page became comfort and diversion; the general atmosphere of the hall was somnolent; the house looked what it felt. Audiences at the Symphony concerts show each week more or less liking for the several numbers of a programme. It must be long since they have shown such frank indifference toward any music and such utter weariness of it as they showed yesterday with Bruckner's symphony.

Bruckner still has his champions even here in Boston, though his own Vienna is four thousand miles away, and the battles between his partisans and those of Brahms seem only a little less historical than those of the followers of Gluck and Puccini in the Paris of Louis XVI. These local champions will shrug their shoulders, lift their brows and say, "It was only a Friday-afternoon audience." Perhaps Bruckner will fare better tonight, but, after all, is there such a great gulf fixed between the musical understanding and appreciation of the two audiences? Often it is hard to detect it in their general attitude toward any particular number of a given programme. Moreover, was the audience yesterday, whatever its musical quality, much to blame for its disposition toward Bruckner's symphony? Musical information is a good and usually an interesting thing—even a continuous hour and ten minutes of it. Some of us must have it of necessity, others of us think they ought to have it; others still count it as a personal and convenient adornment of their walk and conversation. Information there certainly was in Bruckner's symphony—information of many kinds. But the imparting of knowledge of the music that has been written is not the sole or even the main purpose of symphony concerts. Their first and their chief end is to give pleasure—æsthetic pleasure indeed, the pleasure of beauty, fancy, power and skill appealing through tones to the ear, the imagination and the emotions, a very high and fine sort of pleasure truly, but pleasure none the less. From Bach to Mahler and Reger that pleasure has taken many forms and will take many more, but whatever its guise and shape, pleasure it remains. Did Bruckner's music give that pleasure; and if it failed to do so, was not the audience justified in its indifference to it?

Supposititious cases are notoriously futile in argument; but suppose, for example, that one Anton Bruckner, otherwise unknown, had dispatched to Dr. Muck a small bale of manuscript containing a symphony in E-major numbered seven. It is not supposititious to say that the conductor would have examined it with the utmost care, understanding and sympathy. If it seemed to him interesting in itself and likely to stir the interest of his hearers, its length was a trifle. No one complains of the dimensions of some symphonies that are as long; in the intrinsic interest of them such a detail vanishes. Because the music of this unknown Bruckner raised many and singularly uncouth difficulties of performance was equally trifling. It is the business of a conductor and an orchestra to conquer them. But when he discovered—to take only the shortcomings of the music that Bruckner's partisans admit—its lack of any large plan and unity; its loose and clumsy architecture in mass and detail; its page upon page of pedantic trivialities elaborated with endless pains while the music as a whole flags and gropes; the essentially episodic quality of much that it contains, its recurring awkwardness, banality and emptiness—when he considered these things might he not presumably have hesitated over performance of the music. He would feel as many listeners felt yesterday the beauty and the significance of Bruckner's melodies, the imagination that plays intermittently in the development of them, the individuality and poignancy of some of his instrumental combinations, the curiously passionless and detached imagination that lay behind. Would these qualities have offset in this supposititious case all the shortcomings of this seventh symphony by this unknown Bruckner, and brought it to performance? Dr. Muck is eminently objective; he has been steadily apt thus far in the taking of the music that he plays for exactly what it is. The more reason, therefore, for suspecting that this symphony of the imaginary and unknown Bruckner would have been baled up again and returned?

There is no imaginary or unknown Bruckner. There is rather a Bruckner whose music the circumstances of his career and the traits of his life have glorified and transfigured out of its real semblance. Pic-cinl survives because he and Gluck in Marie Antoinette's Paris pursued an operatic duel in which partisans of the one and the other eagerly and bitterly took sides. The Opéra is preparing to revive one of his pieces this winter as a historico-musical curiosity, as a survival of a famous musical quarrel. Meanwhile, Gluck's operas live of themselves. In a somewhat similar way, though Bruckner may rank among symphonists far higher than Puccini among operamakers—in a similar way Bruckner and his music figure in a later musical warfare that between the champions of Brahms and Wagner in the Vienna of the seventies and the eighties. The partisans of Wagner and the decriers of Brahms chose to thrust forward Bruckner's symphonies as their exemplar in absolute music, and storms of controversy beat upon them. Living, he suffered cruelly under the conflict. Now that he is dead, that contest is presumed to give his music interest and importance. It has made for it in some quarters something very like a cult. The quarrel over Brahms and Bruckner has become the symphonic parallel to the operatic quarrel over Gluck and Puccini. We must hear the other part, boredom or no boredom, and we must feel as men in Austria and Germany, where they still take new music with intense partisanship, felt in the bitter controversies of a quarter of a century ago. Who does, who can? There are no such warming heats for us of Boston in 1906 when we listen to Bruckner's music. We hear it in its coldness and its baldness.

Bruckner lived a life that began in poverty; that continued long in struggle; that was tortured first by the neglect of his symphonies and then by the fierce controversies over them and him; almost to the end of it he knew little happiness. He was singularly simple-minded, pure of heart, detached from the world, absorbed in his music and the visions he was fain to make it impart. He was a good man—good to what Vienna thought queerness. Often he was a piteous figure; almost always in that Vienna of the seventies and eighties he was pathetically incongruous. But what after all have these circumstances, moving as they may be, to do with the qualities or the impression of his music. We do not try Beethoven's music by the circumstances of his life. Do those of Bruckner's give his its moments of noble thought and utterance, of poignant beauty, of almost unearthly exaltation of mood? Or do they give its wastes of barren and empty pedantry, of passionless monotony, of broken and futile groping? They give neither the virtues nor the shortcomings, but they glamor both. Simple-mindedness is not the way to the achievement of so intricate a thing as a modern symphony, nor does it invite the pulsant utterance of the modern orchestra. Purity of heart is truly a blessing, but it is not the way to the passion and the power that we ask of modern music, unless it be itself a passion of purity and Bruckner was, and his music remains passionless. Of Mr. Rosenthal and of Liszt and Beethoven, it will be time to write on Monday. H. T. P.

DR. MUCK REVIVES BRUCKNER SYMPHONY

Journal — Dec. 3, 1906

The seventh Symphony concert was made notable, and in a certain sense interesting, by Dr. Muck's resurrecting of Bruckner's symphony in E major after a sleep that nearly approached that of Rip Van Winkle. It arose from its slumbers as ponderous and certainly better understood than in those earlier days, when it staggered audiences and critics alike. It no longer seems wild and fantastically noisy, for Richard Strauss and Mahler and the rest of the "moderns" have taken care of that. It is still extraordinary, however, in its almost incredible mixture of beauty and baldness, nobility and nothingness. That the man who could write the fascinating middle portion of the first movement, the almost supernatural loveliness of most of the adagio and the savage jocosity of the scherzo could also produce the dull and formless scrappiness, the twaddling melange of the entire last movement is not explained and cannot be. The only plausible theory is that Bruckner was for most of the time a highly educated and respectable maker of routine music, across whose mind some strange influence flashed occasional moments of genius. Was it Wagner or was it Beethoven? Both appear strongly in the best pages of the symphony, not in imitation, be it understood, but as if the real thoughts of those masters had somehow filtrated through the brain of a devoted disciple. The performance was on a magnificent plane of thought and virtuosity, as fine in its way as anything Dr. Muck has yet attained.

Then came Moritz Rosenthal, he of the amazing technique, with Liszt's pianoforte concerto in E flat major. It was a performance of the most scintillating brilliancy, yet warm, rich and as highly idealized as the glittering thing permits. There is little of poetry or the calmer sort of romance in the work; it should be given at a white heat and with all possible power and bravura, and that Rosenthal contributed every necessary qualification to its playing goes without saying. Yet for some reason his phenomenal performance left the audience comparatively cold; tyros and medecrities in number have won far more in the way of recalls than did this master of the pianoforte.

The performance of Beethoven's Leonore No. 3 overture, with which the long concert ended, was stirring, but not exceptionally fine. Indeed, it has been given with more classic beauty many times by this orchestra.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Dec 3, 1906

Bruckner. Symphony in E major, No. 7.

Liszt. Piano Concerto in E flat.

Soloist, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal.

Beethoven. Leonora Overture, No. 3.

Let no one suppose that it was a short concert! It lasted two full hours, and had it not been for Rosenthal and the Liszt Paprika it would have been a fatigued audience that departed from the hall at 10 p.m. It was a deed of heroism to play the Bruckner symphony and Dr. Muck has shown thereby that he is not one of those conductors who seeks merely the applause of his audience, but that he is endeavoring to educate and broaden the public taste. Find fault with the Bruckner seventh symphony as we may, it is yet our duty to hear it and to study it, as one of the peculiar musical developments of modern times.

How much temporary harm an unjust or biased musical critic of prominence can do! Not all of Hanslick's brutal antagonism has been able to keep Bruckner's symphonies out of the repertoire; but he was able to torture the composer and make his life generally miserable. How much this was the case may be surmised from the fact that once, when Bruckner was presented to the Austrian emperor and that monarch genially asked, "Can I do anything for you?" Bruckner, with a peasant's faith in the omnipotence of the emperor, burst out with,—"Yes, your majesty, if you would only ask Mr. Hanslick not to write about me any more!"

We need not join the Hanslick assaults with rapier and bludgeon when we say that we do not altogether admire the present work. It is music for musicians only and appeals too frequently to the intellect and too seldom to the emotions. Its thematic material is very scanty, for all that it is more than an hour in performance. Dr. Muck was wise in putting it at the beginning of the concert, for not only did he thus force each auditor to stay to the end of the work, but one came to it fresh and unjaded and was thereby better able to follow the tremendous amount of figure development.

Great ability to transform musical figures is not an unmixed good. One sometimes follows this to the exclusion of melodic beauty, of tone-coloring, of emotional expression. Bruckner can turn his themes upside down, can augment and diminish them, can give them backwards, until one is overwhelmed with the ingenuity of the workmanship, but the variety and beauty of thematic material of Beethoven or Brahms are not present. The tone-coloring is not better than the neutral tints of Brahms. Frequent contrasts of the fullest orchestra with unsupported solo phrases, and many combinations of tuba or bass-trombone with the flute, may astonish, but do not charm.

Yet there are occasional climaxes of some fervor, oases in the desert. These were chiefly in evidence in the second (slow) movement, in which the tone-color of the tubas gave a sonorous solemnity. But even here the music would not soothe a heart-ache or cause a tear to flow.

The Scherzo was attractive in its brusquerie, had good contrasts and was clear and coherent. Its striking figure could be easily followed even by the non-musician. The figure aforesaid is closely akin to the "Flying Dutchman" motive, as the brass crescendo and climax at the end of the first movement is an echo of the "Dawn" scene of the second act of "Lohengrin."

In all the work there is no crabbed ugliness, and there is no seeking after dissonance merely for the sake of being original; in this point, at least, Bruckner is above many symphonists of modern days.

The finale is again given over to derivations, inversions, and other conjurings. We suspect that if Bruckner had been less of a contrapuntist he would have been more of a composer. The symphony is remarkable in its school, but we do not enjoy the school. Yet it was good to hear it and to study it, and the public may breathe easier over a heavy task well accomplished. Possibly Dr. Muck shares this feeling. At all events he deserves great credit for a clear and well-balanced performance of a gigantic work.

When Liszt was asked what he meant by his seven-noted figure which begins his E-flat concerto and is so prominent all through it, he sang to its notes—"Das versteht ihr alle nicht!"—"That you cannot understand!" But it has become very easy to understand nowadays, and we only wish that Bruckner or Reger or D'Indy were as comprehensible in their figure development. We always consider the E-flat concerto as rather a Hungarian Rhapsody than a true concerto, both because of its very free shape and the prominence given to the solo instrument. Judged by strict rules the Liszt concerto in A is much the better work, but the highly spiced and scintillant E-flat concerto will always be the more popular of the two.

And it had the artist of artists to bring out its glittering effects. There is no pianist alive who has such a marvellous technique as Moritz Rosenthal. In his double trills, his octave work, his clearness and rapidity in runs and scales, in short in every type of wrist-action and finger-work, he seems unapproachable.

And he entered into the spirit of the concerto perfectly. Once in a while his dash caused the orchestra to become wind-ed, but they managed to keep up with him as a whole, and the end of the concerto became a whirlwind.

Great as Rosenthal is in many directions we have never heard him to better advantage. Possibly this was because Bruckner had been a trifle indigestible and the highly-spiced dish came at the most opportune moment. The audience became frenzied in their plaudits and four recalls proved that they appreciated the artist. We cannot imagine a better performance of the "triangle concerto" (as Liszt's enemies called it) than was given on this occasion.

140

Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 3" (most prosaic name of a most dramatic overture) was finely interpreted. Yet we ought not to forget that this has always been finely conducted at these concerts, and it was impossible to improve upon past performances of the work. There might have been more power in the second trumpet signal of this composition. Both calls were of about the same dynamic force, which did not carry out the idea of the approach of the governor. Louis C. Elson.

141

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

ELGAR.

CONCERT OVERTURE, "In the South."

CHADWICK.

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Cleopatra."
(First time in Boston.)

GEORG SCHUMANN.

VARIATIONS and DOUBLE FUGUE on a Merry Theme.
(First time in Boston.)

WAGNER.

OVERTURE to the opera "Rienzi."

proved that they appreciated the artist. We cannot imagine a better performance of the "triangle concerto" (as Liszt's enemies called it) than was given on this occasion.

Beethoven's "Leonora, No. 3" (most prosaic name of a most dramatic overture) was finely interpreted. Yet we ought not to forget that this has always been finely conducted at these concerts, and it was impossible to improve upon past performances of the work. There might have been more power in the second trumpet signal of this composition. Both calls were of about the same dynamic force, which did not carry out the idea of the approach of the governor. Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

ELGAR.

CONCERT OVERTURE, "In the South."

CHADWICK.

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Cleopatra."
(First time in Boston.)

GEORG SCHUMANN.

VARIATIONS and DOUBLE FUGUE on a Merry Theme.
(First time in Boston.)

WAGNER.

OVERTURE to the opera "Rienzi."

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Adv: PROGRAMME. Dec. 17. 06

Elgar—Overture, "In the South."
Chadwick—Symphonic Poem, "Cleopatra."
Georg Schumann—Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.
Wagner—Overture, "Rienzi."

It was the loudest concert we have ever heard in Symphony Hall. Kettle-drums, bass-drum and snare-drum held high carnival, while the brasses roared giant melodies. Dr. Muck believes in unity of programmes, and this concert was unified on the plane of fortissimo effects. There was no soloist, which we think is a merit in the concerts of so great an orchestra.

We are always glad of an opportunity to hear an Elgar selection, for he is a composer about whose rank there is yet considerable doubt, and it is interesting to study his scoring, his figure development and his themes, and thus confirm or contradict the opinion as to his greatness. We begin to think him less great than we did at first. We do not place Mahler in the first rank, and we are coming to rank Elgar's orchestral work considerably below Mahler's.

The performance of the work was distinctly more impressive than at its first Boston presentation, a year ago. Dr. Muck gave something of the majesty of ancient Rome to the martial touches of the overture. "In the South" in this case does not give an Atlanta riot, a picture of a lynching, a Tillman speech, or a Vardaman theme, for Elgar confines himself to the south of Italy, but, as regards definite characteristics, it might as well be the south of England, with the exception noted above. The viola melody was finely played and a word of commendation must be added for the horn playing also. But the overture seemed as long as the narration of a travelling friend who button-holes you and tells you all about his impressions of Italy after his first tour.

Mr. Chadwick's new work was badly placed, coming after so much of modern orchestration. It has gusts of passion and strong contrasts and, of course, many sensuous touches, and the orchestration is that of a master of the modern school; yet we do not rank the composition with the beautiful "Melpomene" overture.

We are glad that Dr. Muck chose Mr. Chadwick as the American composer to whom to pay his first honor. The conductor read the work with much power and made the most of the sharp contrasts, which were not only between the characters of the military Antony and the amatory Cleopatra, but also between love-making and lamentation, between triumph and sorrow. The union of the two themes at the end was not only a fine climax, but a display of that ingenuity and skill in which Mr. Chadwick excels.

Undoubtedly many of the audience were interested in an instrument that looked like a cabinet organ, which occupied a prominent place in the front of the stage, and was played in this symphonic poem. It was a Celesta, invented in 1886 by Auguste Mustel of Paris. It is an instrument like a glass harmonica, in which plates of steel are struck with hammers as in a piano action. These steel plates are placed over boxes of wood which act as resonators or sounding-boards.

It gives a tone of much sweetness, and, combined with the reed tone of cabinet organ, it has a tone-quality of its own, sweeter and softer than that of the Glockenspiel. Tchaikowsky, Puccini, Leoncavallo and a host of French composers have used the instrument in their scores. Its crystal, bell-like tone is perhaps a trifle sugary, but not ineffective.

Georg Schumann! Georg Schumann! What is your idea of merriment? The melody on which the variations were founded was of the type one often finds in the "Studenten Commers-buch" and suggested what the German calls "hair-ache" rather than happiness and there was certainly "Katzenjammer" in the funeral march and also in the 1st variation, for bassoons. Yet, as regards humor, there is far more of it in a single phrase of the bassoon-work that Brahms wreathed into "Was kommt dort von der Høeh", in the "Academic Overture," than one can discern in all these skillful variations.

The second variation, however, was very original and even humorous. It gave the chief figure of the melody to the kettle-drums, which became for the time being the leading instrument of the orchestra! It is very rare to hear this humble instrument used so prominently. Tausch, the successor to Schumann (Schumann, the great, we mean) as conductor at Dusseldorf, once wrote a kettle-drum concerto, but he demanded five kettle-drums, while Schumann, the lesser, here contents himself with three. Meyerbeer also once scored a whole march for four of these instruments, solo, in "Robert le Diable."

The other variations had less to say for themselves, although all were skillful. But the finale was a movement that would have taken a prize in any contrapuntal examination. We do not to be sure laugh very boisterously at a double fugue, but there were some odd combinations and tremendous ingenuity displayed in every part of this intricate finale.

Wagner discarded his "Rienzi" overture as trash. The public does not agree with him and still applauds it to the echo. It has never before received so fiery a reading as that of Saturday. Dr. Muck evidently imitated King Lear, and signalled to the brasses:—

"Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks! Rage! Blow!"

And they raged and they blew in a manner that suggested a tonal cyclone. The trombones and heavy brasses are evidently endeavoring to make up for lost time. After all, however, "Rienzi" is in the Meyerbeer vein and its effects are only enhanced by a little extra noise.

Louis C. Elson.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Music by Mr. Chadwick and Georg Schumann—A Tone-Poem That Misses the Fascination and the Flame of Cleopatra, but That Warms Mr. Chadwick's Powers—The Jest That Failed, with an Anglo-American Audience in Schumann's Burletta Trans. Dec. 15, 1906

The deliberate intention, if there was any, in Dr. Muck's programme for the Symphony Concert yesterday, was not so clear as the happy result. It began with Elgar's large-voiced and warmly-colored overture of Italian impressions, "In the South." It continued with Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "Cleopatra" and Georg Schumann's "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," both played for the first time in Boston; while for ending Wagner's early overture to "Rienzi" was snatched into perilous distinction from the brass bands and the music halls. In such a list there was none of the continuity of mood and style that Dr. Muck has seemed to seek oftenest in his programmes. There was none either of the more gentle persuasion with which his predecessor used to lead his audiences from one number to another. Georg Schumann's piece is clever and amusing burlesque; Mr. Chadwick's music would be tonal picturing of a fascination that none might resist and of the intense passions that it bred; Elgar's overture is tonal impressionism, and Wagner's overture—well, the last time we heard its cavorting thunders it stood between the turn of the "premier magicians of the world" and the feats of a "queen of the slack wire" in an English music-hall and a thoughtful conductor put on white kid gloves (though it was August) to lead it. The spice of sharp contrast could hardly have been keener in the four numbers, and in the whole effect it proved savory. Unexplainable the programme certainly is; interesting and with an unusual piquancy for a symphony concert, it certainly was. And to be interesting, after all, is the chief end of programme-making, while Dr. Muck seems to like on occasion the interest of the unexpected.

There was distinctly such interest in Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem. Some of his later music, especially in the more academic forms, has seemed a little dry, labored, cold and unimaginative. The warm vigor and the masculine and continent imagination of his earlier work were dulled in them. Now his venture into the freer form of the symphonic poem and into music with clear delineative intent has quickened his powers again. Perhaps, too, there was a spur in the evasive Egyptian queen that he chose for suggestion in his music. She is near two thousand years old now, and in all that time she has evaded all, save one, of the artists who have tried to mirror her in verse or in tones in marble or on canvas, through the momentary reflections of acting. She has escaped the composers as steadily as has Francesca of the garden at Rimini. Is there a Cleopatra of marble or of canvas that has not come, gone and been forgotten? (What if Sargent should try to paint her, sister as she is to the veiled Astarte of desire in our Library!) In a few verses poet after poet has exhausted his imagination with her. Prose, even French prose, may not vibrate to her fascinations. One only has seized them, and her, and the passions that they bred in the strong Roman—Shakspeare in the one of his plays that is all flame. And for three hundred years there has been no actress to play this Cleopatra and leave a glowing memory behind. The Egyptian still baffles and still tempts all the arts, and in our day Mr. Shaw has taken the last and the most modern revenge of the defeated pursuer. He mocks at her ironically. He turns her into travesty.

And vainly, like so many in so many arts, Mr. Chadwick pursues this evasive fascination. No more than all the rest can he individualize Cleopatra. Grant the title, to which we have a right as a clew in a tone-poem, and there is no mistaking Liszt's Tasso, Tchaikovsky's Francesca or Strauss's Don Quixote. Their spiritual and emotional lineaments, their moods and their passions, the characteristic atmosphere of them are in the music. Mr. Chadwick gives his titular clew and the listening imagination springs to it. The tone-poem proceeds. There is music of vague and troubling sensuous suggestion; there is music of languid and exotic passion warming into pulsing glow; there is music of amorous pride and elation, of the woe of love and its despair; there is the glorification of great passion as it thrills in a great memory of the world. Side by side with Cleopatra in the music Antony marches, longs, loves, dies. The music is all tonal suggestion, tonal picture, sometimes nearly tonal narrative, but what more does it gain than the voice of passion as it glimmers, rises, glows and falls into shadows of fate and the darkness of despair, when the woman was as the breath and the man as the wind of their loves? Mr. Chadwick's Cleopatra and Antony might be any such pair of poetry, legend and the visions of centuries; their passion any such passion that as the composer broods upon it impels to musical expression. The fascination and the flame of Cleopatra alike evade him though the imaginative hearer may feel him seeking them now in undulating and iridescent harmonies, now in biting or the languorous suggestions of rhythm; now in throbbing melodic curves that shiver with their own intensity. It is long since Mr. Chadwick has written music of such imaginative suggestion and order of imagination. A composer of his discernment would naturally resort to no cheap and easy devices of Oriental color and impression. But never once, unless perhaps for a passing moment at the beginning, does the listening imagination answer and say "This is Cleopatra." The net of tones adroitly woven, fittingly colored as it is, will not hold her. And one such glimpse of her were worth all the musical imagination and polyphonic skill with which Mr. Chadwick binds her to her Antony.

Georg Schumann's variations were as perilous in their very different kind. They are intended as musical and instrumental humor—not very spontaneous indeed, but still humor, and the usual fate of such ventures befell them. Sir Arthur Sullivan used to tell his friends how he used to put little instrumental quips into the orchestral parts of his operettas at the Savoy. At the rehearsals the conductor used to smile as he signalled for them. For a few performances even the player who was making them showed his amusement in his eyes. Then each grew accustomed to them as to a family joke; but the audiences that came fresh to them night after night never showed the smallest token of responsive mirth. Did they notice this instrumental jesting? Sir Arthur doubted it; or, if they did, they had a truly British shame of their amusement. What was music that it should turn humorous and witty? What were the instruments that made it, that they should be frankly "guying" each other? What were the rules of music-making that they should be travestied. Music was a heavenly maid, and all those fetiches that we English-speaking folk love, even at operetta, and instinctively at a Symphony concert. Poor Sullivan was content with fitting instants of instrumental wit and musical travesty. And Schumann writes a burlesque that is at least fifteen minutes long and that keeps its vein of parody almost from the beginning. He had his reward. A smileless audience listened with a distinct air of those that are puzzled and tapped its hands mildly at the end. A few smiled covertly, half ashamed of their amusement. In vain the bassoons chortled, the double basses cavorted, the bright strings played tricks on themselves; instrument mocked at instrument and form made merry at its own expense. With ironic solemnity the quavering horns and the muttering tuba mocked out a funeral march. The whole band flung itself into a delicious travesty of orchestral excitement—"agitato con furioso," palpitating chords of the diminished seventh, and all that. There was much humor, though some of it was a little heavy and obvious; it poked fun oftenest as a jolly theme in jolly variations, rather than in light merriment and ironic wit. There is genuine virtuosity in its kind in the writing and the playing of such music. It was fun—and nothing else—to hear, if the listener

HUB ORCHESTRA OUTDOES ITSELF

Herald — Dec 7, 06
New York Audience Goes Wild
Over Moritz Rosenthal's Masterly Work.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Dec. 6, 1906. Many things combined to make the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall tonight memorable. The programme was fine. Dr. Karl Muck conducted masterfully, and the soloist, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal, outdid himself at the piano. The audience packed the house and its enthusiasm at times reached a glove-splitting mark. Three numbers made the programme. They were Bruckner's ponderous seventh symphony, the E major which Theodore Thomas made known here 20 years ago; Liszt's E flat major piano-forte concerto, and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven.

This Dr. Muck accomplished, as prolonged applause after each of the four huge movements clearly attested. All departments of the orchestra distinguished themselves in helping the conductor bring to light the wealth of beautiful detail in this score. The heavier brass instruments earned special praise for their pure, sonorous tone and preciseness of phrasing. Mr. Rosenthal has once before this season played the Liszt concerto—not, however, as he played it tonight.

The wizard's fingers seemed to achieve the impossible now and then, and his touch to wake the tone of two or three pianos. The final climax was a sort of musical whirlwind, and it fairly carried the house off its feet. If the Boston orchestra's laws were not as those of the Medes and Persians there would have been added some numbers. As it was, Mr. Rosenthal was brought forward half a dozen times.

Mr. Chadwick's New Tone-Poem

At the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, Dr. Muck, for the first time, is putting on his programme a composition by an American—Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra." It was written nearly two years ago and first played at a concert in the musical festival at Worcester in September, 1905. The music is still new to Boston; it is the first composition in the larger orchestral forms to come from Mr. Chadwick in some years; and he has seldom cultivated the symphonic poem with delineative purpose. Therefore "Cleopatra" promises to be unusually interesting, and we print herewith a note on the tone-poem from the programme book of the Worcester festival, and a word from the composer himself about it. The programme book says:

"The life of Antony by Plutarch contains many vivid situations which are susceptible of musical illustration in the modern sense, and those having the most direct reference to Cleopatra have been chosen for musical suggestion by Mr. Chadwick, although the action of the tragedy is not literally followed. The tone-poem opens (F major, andante sostenuto) with an undulating motive for flutes and harps, suggesting the voyage on the Cydnus, which, after a climax for the whole orchestra, is succeeded by an allegro agitato depicting the approach of Antony and his army. A bold, military theme (allegro marziale, D major), in which the brass and percussion instruments play an important part, is worked up to a powerful climax, but soon dies away in soft harmonies for the wind instruments and horns. The Cleopatra theme then begins, first with a sensuous melody for the violoncello (F major), repeated by the violins, and afterwards by the whole orchestra. The key now changes to D flat (molto tranquillo). Strange harmonies are heard in the muted strings. The English horn and clarinet sing short, passionate phrases, to which the soft trombones later on add a sound of foreboding. But suddenly the Cleopatra theme appears again, now transformed to vigorous allegro, and Antony departs to meet defeat and death. (F minor, allegro moderato.) The Antony theme is now fully worked out, mostly in minor keys and sometimes in conjunction with the Cleopatra motive. It ends with a climax on the chord of C-flat, and after a pause the introductory phrases are again heard. A long diminuendo, ending with a melancholy phrase for the viola, suggests his final passing, and Cleopatra's lamentation (D minor) follows at once. In this section much of the previous love music is repeated, and some of it is entirely changed in expression as well as in rhythm and instrumentation. At last it dies away in mysterious harmonies with muted horns and strings. The work closes with an imposing maestoso in which the burial of Antony and Cleopatra in the same grave is suggested by the two themes now heard for the first time simultaneously. For this, Shakespeare's lines are, perhaps, not inappropriate:

She shall be buried by her Antony.
No grave upon the earth shall clip in it
A pair so famous.

Mr. Chadwick himself writes at our request: "I got my original impulse for the work through the beautiful descriptions in Plutarch. I believe it is thought that Shakespeare derived his play from the same source, and there are therefore some phrases in Shakespeare which quite fit the moods I have tried to express. I do not think the piece could be called exactly programme music, although there are passages in it which I connect in my own mind with Cleopatra's barque on the Cydnus, with the love passages, the death of Antony ('All is lost, fortune and Antony part here'), with the death of Cleopatra ('As sweet as balm, as soft as air, as gentle'). I have not particularly attempted to emphasize the Orientalism of the situations, but rather to contrast the passing of Antony and that of Cleopatra. By a purely accidental incident in the construction, I was able to blend the Antony and Cleopatra themes into immediate conjunction in the finale, although one is in F major and the other in D. The repetition of the Cleopatra theme makes the form seem almost symphonic, although I took no pains to give it that character."

CURIOUS PROGRAM IN SYMPHONY CONCERT

A curious program was set forth for the eighth Symphony concert, a badly assorted group of pieces, two of which had the effect of "killing" the ones next door. It was a mistake to put Elgar's glowing and sonorous "In the South" just before Chadwick's "Cleopatra;" with a light and genial overture preceding it, the serious and ambitious work of our composer would have made a far greater appeal. As it was, comparisons were inevitable, and they were to the advantage of the Englishman.

It has been so often said that Elgar's overture does not suggest the Italy it is supposed to paint in tones, that that may be taken for granted. It does, however, at its first jubilant fanfare speak of the joy of life, and later it breathes semi-melancholy aspiration in a viola theme of haunting beauty. Through all the work is the clear and elegantly tinted workmanship of a man who has great abilities and grave faults—the latter not much here in evidence, however. There are stretches of occasional dulness, but the overture as a whole is interesting. It was read with consummate taste and fire by Dr. Muck and played correspondingly well.

Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem inspired by the "serpent of old Nile" is a nobly conceived work, developed with high musicianship, a keen sense of proportion and an expression of sentiment that never becomes sentimentality. It has beauty in some measure and power in more; it is not crabbed nor unlovely. But with all its obvious fineness and strength, it somehow fails to arouse an enthusiastic response to its call. Its inspiration does not burn; its large ambition does not carry the hearer away. It lacks the convincing force of his earlier overtures, for instance, which, though woven on a plainer musical pattern, were of much greater interest.

Georg Schumann's long-winded jocosity, "Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme," doubtless furnished more sport for the players than for the audience. The clownish air was tossed around from section to section with a good deal of agility and occasional charm. One hearing of the burlesque, however, ought to suffice any reasonable man for the rest of his natural life.

A sumptuous performance of Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, in which Dr. Muck showed his remarkable ability in building fascinating crescendos into overwhelming climaxes, brought a blaze of glory to the concert's close.

Chadwick's "Cleopatra" Played Here for the First Time.

Herald — Dec. 16, 1906

The programme of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given in Symphony Hall last evening, was as follows:

Overture, "In the South".....Elgar
Symphonic poem, "Cleopatra".....Chadwick
Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme.....Georg Schumann
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner

Elgar's overture is intended, as we are told by one of his enthusiastic admirers, to suggest "the joy of living in Italy with its historic past and its present beauty." The overture is entitled "In the South," but, as far as the suggestion and the color of Italy are concerned, the title might be, "In the North" or "In the West." Nor was it necessary for Elgar to journey to Alassio or Moglio. He might as well have remained at Malvern, smoked his pipe and read "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage." When we think today of Italy in orchestral music we remember at once Strauss' "Aus Italien," Charpentier's "Impressions of Italy," the two overtures of Berlioz written for "Benvenuto Cellini." We do not at once associate Elgar's music with Italy, its history or its beauty.

The overture is often gorgeous and the performance last night was also gorgeous. Brilliant as the latter was, it could not disguise the fact that the work itself is inherently episodic, nor is the musical body always worthy of the sumptuous and resplendent dress. The dramatic invention is seldom striking—even the episode for the solo viola owed its chief charm to the entrancing tone of Mr. Ferri and the ingenuity of the accompaniment; but the weaving of this material is often masterly. Yet there are dreary stretches, especially in the latter half of the overture and the work would gain through judicious excision.

Dr. Muck produced two works that were unknown in Boston. Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem, composed in 1904, and first performed at the Worcester festival of 1905, was suggested by a nobly tragic story and was written in an eminently serious spirit. Schumann's variations, produced in Berlin in 1902, are based on a "Merry Theme" and are deliberately burlesque.

Mr. Chadwick chose a high and mighty subject, that tells of Roman pride, of eastern voluptuousness and magnificence; the portrayal in music of Cleopatra with the suggestion of scenes in which Mark Antony now lords it and now is vassal to the superb capriciousness of Egypt's Queen, with the suggestion of alarms and excursions without and din of battle, and death and love triumphant over death. No composer of operatic or of orchestral music based on this wondrous story has ever written a work of great distinction or of long life. And what play actress from Siddons down has left the tradition of a memorable impersonation of the glowing Serpent of Old Nile?

A symphonic poem or overture entitled "Cleopatra" should be sensuous and heroic; sensuous, not after the fashion of pornographic Massenet with his caterwauling violoncellos, but gloriously sensuous; heroic, not in bombastic fashion, but in thought as well as in flourish. Mr. Chadwick's most successful portion of his work is probably the majestic finale with the simultaneous employment of the themes that typify the lovers. The sensuousness of Cleopatra's soul, body and passion is not so surely characterized as is the summing up in the peroration of her death and burial with Antony.

Nor is Mr. Chadwick's martial music adequately typical of Antony's heroic nature, nor is the music that may be supposed to characterize the tumult of battle and the scenes that lead to Antony's self-slaughter convincing or even effective save in a conventional manner. In certain ways the symphonic poem is more modern in its sentiment than are other works of the composer's later period: it is bolder in its harmonic treatment, it is freer, it is richer in color. Mr. Chadwick has written songs that have true sensuousness, that are erotic in the higher meaning of the word. It is unfortunate that he has not painted Cleopatra with amorous gusto. It is also unfortunate that his martial music has not a more imposing form, one that might recall the Roman standards which haunted De Quincey in his opium dreams. There is grace in the opening pages, there is a noble vigor not without beauty in the peroration; but much that intervenes is without true sensuous or heroic distinction.

Georg Schumann's Variations, as I have said, is a frankly burlesque piece. It is a joke, and a long-winded one. So afraid was the composer that he should be taken seriously and praised only for technical skill or abused for certain pages of cacophony that he prints more than once in his score over a theme or at the beginning of a variation "Burlesque." In like manner Artemus Ward occasionally wrote after his remarks: "N. B. This is a goak," or "This is sarcasm." Schumann's music is often ingenious—ly made and it is an excellent piece to exhibit the remarkable virtuosity of the orchestra. It is, however, music for which there should be little sympathy.

It might serve to amuse the idle where there is touching of beer glasses with fervent "Prosits," where tobacco smoke is thick, where laughter is of the hair-trigger order. As a joke, it is too long and often too heavy, so that after all, perhaps it is serious enough for a symphony concert, with a seriousness that approaches gulness.

The overture to "Rienzi," with its circus pomp, brought an end to a concert with a singularly arranged programme.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Novelties Played at the Symphony Concerts.

First Appearance Here of Otto Neitzel—Lyceum Course.

Handel and Haydn Ora- torios—Pension Fund.

Globe — Dec. 16, 1906

Dr Muck offered two novelties for the eighth program of the Symphony season, Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Cleopatra," and George Schumann's variations and double fugue on a "Merry Theme." The concert began with Elgar's overture, "In the South," and closed with the overture to Wagner's opera, "Rienzi." Mr Chadwick's interesting work is about two years old and was first performed at the Worcester festival last September. The composer got his original impulse for his composition through Plutarch's descriptions of Antony and Cleopatra, and musical illustrations having most direct reference to the fascinating queen of Egypt form the chief part of the poem.

The episodes suggested are the voyage on the Cydnus, the approach of Antony and his army, Cleopatra's love scene, the departure of Antony to meet defeat and death, Cleopatra's lamentation and burial of the two lovers. That Mr Chadwick had skillfully arranged his musical contrasts was shown in the first part of his work, in which the turmoil of marching hosts followed quickly upon the sweet undulating theme allotted the flutes and harp. In the former the heavier instruments showed up admirably in suggesting matters of a martial significance and the beautiful "voyage" theme, and later on the "Cleopatra" theme, were each sung by the orchestra with most delicate effect.

Mr Chadwick's score for the woodwinds and horns was notably pleasing in this section of the poem and the sensuous charm of the Cleopatra music first heard on the cello was a fine bit of musical portraiture of this siren of Egypt. The combination of the two motifs which suggest the hero and heroine of the tragedy was wrought out admirably and the lamentation, which was mournfully voiced at first by the viola and afterward by muted strings and brasses, showed that the composer understood the way to produce striking effects by simple means. The pomp and grandeur of the funeral music, with the blending of the Antony and Cleopatra themes, was shown in broad and effective tonal colors.

The work is one of importance and its delineative nature is so vividly apparent to one familiar with the subject that the "pictures" become very real to the auditor. And Mr Chadwick's interesting study was most eloquently illustrated by the orchestra.

The Schumann burlesque proved to be one of those jolly musical juggles of instrumentation that shows wonderful knowledge of the resources of the modern orchestra in producing laughable effects by odd combinations or by unusual treatment and assignments of melodic material. It was a very pleasing group of variations and the audience thoroughly enjoyed the brilliant performance of the piece. The Elgar overture and the Wagner excerpt were played with splendid verve. All the quaint modulations and boldness of orchestration in the Elgar work were vividly brought out by conductor Muck and his authoritative presentation of the "Rienzi" overture gave addition evidence of his high abilities as an interpreter of the German master's compositions.

For the ninth program Dr Muck has arranged one entirely of the works of Beethoven. It is in the sense of commemoration of the birthday of the master; Beethoven having been born Dec 16, 1770. The assisting artist will be Dr Otto Neitzel, who will play the concerto for piano in G major, No. 4 op 58. The orchestral numbers will be the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the symphony in A major No. 7.

A LADY HAS A SYMPHONY TICKET

For Sale for the rest of season. Address P. B. O., Boston Transcript. (A):

Symphony Seats Wanted Two good seats on floor for alternate Saturday evenings. Address, with price and location, C. T. C., Boston Transcript. WS(A) n 28

Wanted—A Friday Symphony Ticket Whole or half-ticket. E. J., 4 Dean St., Everett, Mass. (A):

PAYING FOR BOSTON MUSIC.

San ————— Dec. 6
BARS IN THE WAY OF HEARING
THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Eighteen Dollar and Ten Dollar Season
Tickets Exist in Name Only—Rush Seats
That Cost Time and Strength—Outlook for the Casual New Yorker Cheerless.

BOSTON, Dec. 8.—If a New Yorker, happening to be in Boston some Friday or Saturday during the winter, should decide that he would go and hear the Symphony Orchestra upon its native platform he would receive a surprise amounting to a shock.

If it happened to be Friday afternoon he would in all probability not be able to get a seat for love or money. For that matter the New Yorker, as such, doesn't get anything in Boston for love of himself, he being regarded there with much outward contempt and not a little secret jealousy.

But when even his money—his good money, as he is prone to call it—can't buy him a place in Symphony Hall, that ugly home of beautiful music, his surprise turns to shock. He asks indignant questions and learns the following facts:

Symphony Hall contains something more than 2,500 seats. When the announcement of the season's concerts is published it contains the following paragraph:
"Tickets for the series of concerts and for the series of rehearsals, $18 and $10, according to location." Of course even the New Yorker understands that the concerts are on Saturday nights and the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons.

But what he does not understand is that the price of the tickets is by no means $18 and $10, according to location. The price is whatever a seat will bring more than $18 and $10, those figures representing the minimum price at which two divisions of seats will be sold.

The $18 seats for the rehearsals are sold at auction at Symphony Hall on October 1; the $10 seats for rehearsals are sold in the same way on October 2; the $18 and the $10 seats for the concerts are auctioned off on October 4 and 5. Seats are sold only in the regular order and no more than four seats are sold on one bid.

Probably it is as impartial a method as any of arranging the matter. A good many Boston quirks, which at first strike the stranger as queer, justify themselves on closer investigation.

There is perhaps no more reasonable way of adjusting a scale of prices than by letting the people do it themselves. If certain persons, for the good of the cause, —and the glory of themselves—are willing to pay premiums of from $75 to $300, as on one occasion, who shall say them nay?
Even after all these contributors to gain and to glory have been accommodated there are plenty of seats to be had at prices which will average from $1 to $1.50 for each of the twenty-four performances.

There is only one sort of person who is left in a very bad way. This is the one who, like the stray New Yorker, wants to enjoy a single concert.

Suppose he goes to the box office and with cheerful assurance asks for a seat for the Friday afternoon rehearsal. He is told that there are no seats for sale. A box? There are no boxes in Symphony Hall. Well, meekly, can he have standing room? No one is allowed to stand.

It is all true. Every reserved seat in the building is sold for the entire season. Standees are not admitted.

At a ticket broker's downtown there is now and then a seat to be had, some one sending in a season ticket to be, as it were, sublet for the occasion. But so far as the Friday rehearsals are concerned this does not often happen.

Yet, though the man in the box office may neglect to mention it, there are seats to be had, even in fact only at the last moment. They are good seats, too, and dirt cheap.

But one does pay for them all right enough. If not with money, yet with time and strength. Exactly 505 seats, the entire capacity of the second balcony, are reserved for sale as so-called rush seats.

These seats cannot be bought in advance. Those who wish them must be in line when the doors are opened. Each person must have in his or her hand a silver quarter. Nothing else will be accepted.
A half dollar for two, or a dollar for four, or two dimes and a nickel for one—none of these will be received. Each person pays for himself and pays with a quarter.

One man holds a bag, into which the quarters are dropped. Another man stands by with a counter, which he presses, clickclick, for every person admitted.

When his counter shows that 505 persons have passed in, the bar falls and not another soul—or at least not another body can pass.
The 505 already in rush pell mell up the stairs, tripping on their skirts, panting and puffing and finally scrambling madly into their seats, which as a matter of fact are quite as good as those in the balcony below them.

It is very seldom indeed that all the 505 rush seats are not sold out. Sometimes when there is to be a famous soloist, there would be several hundred more persons in line than there are seats, if it were not that the management sends out somebody to count up and to warn the excess that there is no hope for them. This is a matter of no more than common humanity, since the rush seaters have to wait outside in the cold, not being allowed even in the lobby until they are to be admitted to the hall.

Many women wait in line thus for two or three hours in order to have the advantage of these 25-cent seats. They bring their camp stools and books, wear their warmest clothes and, more than likely, their most Christian scientific principles and stick it out, in fair weather and foul, the whole season through.

The rush seat is a feature peculiar to the Friday afternoon rehearsal. All of the seats for the Saturday night concerts are included in the auction sales at the opening of the season.

The deadhead is practically unknown at the Symphony concerts. There are only two free seats in the entire house. These are known as guests' seats, and are generally given to the soloist for the use of his or her friends.

There have been instances of distinguished dramatic or musical stars visiting Boston and, very naturally, expecting to receive reciprocal courtesies from the Symphony Orchestra people. When these personages were offered the two seats and were informed that they could have no more they have sometimes taken offence at what seemed to them a stingy spirit.
Yet these two seats are the only ones, except the 25-cent rush seats, not sold in advance for the entire season.

In spite of which record, the orchestra does not begin to pay expenses.

HUB ORCHESTRA STIRS ROOSEVELT

President Enthusiastic Over Saint-Saens' Concerto in G Minor.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]
WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 4, 1906.
The President, accompanied by his son-in-law and daughter, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, occupied a box at the National Theatre this afternoon at the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Other members of the President's party were the secretary of war and Mrs. Taft and Senator and Mrs. Lodge.

The President was enthusiastic over the performance of the French composer and pianist, Saint-Saens, who played his own concerto in G minor. There were many prominent diplomats in the audience.

M. Saint-Saens will be entertained at luncheon tomorrow by the British ambassador and Lady Durand, at the embassy. He will spend the remainder of the week here, and appear in recital next Monday at the Columbia Theatre.

The assistant secretary of war and
Mrs. Robert Shaw Oliver entertained at dinner this evening in honor of the conductor of the Symphony orchestra and Mrs. Karl Muck.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK.

Orchestra Throws New Light on Russian Compositions.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]
NEW YORK, Dec. 8, 1906. Russian music made two-thirds of Dr. Karl Muck's programme at the Boston Symphony orchestra's second matinee concert in Carnegie Hall this afternoon. There were presented before a large audience Rimsky-Korsakoff's overture to "The Betrothed of the Czar," Glazounoff's fifth symphony and a violin concerto in F sharp minor by Mr. Gustav Strube, one of the orchestra's first violins. Mr.
Timothée Adamowski, also a member of the orchestra, was the soloist. These Russian compositions have been heard here before. The late Anton Seidl made the symphony known with the Philharmonic Society, and the overture has been played recently by Mr. Altschuler's orchestra.

The superb playing of the Boston men threw new light on both works today, proving them worthy of more frequent hearing in the local concert room. The scherzo, in the Glazounoff symphony, was especially delightful, a delicate web of intricate instrumentation, deftly handled.

"Indian."

to "Euryanthe."

150

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE to Goethe's "Egmont."

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in G major, No. 4.
op. 58.

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Rondo vivace.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY in A major, No. 7, op. 92.

- I. Poco sostenuto: Vivace.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Presto: Presto meno assai.
- IV. Allegro con brio.

Soloist:

Dr. OTTO NEITZEL.

The Pianoforte is an Everett.

151

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adm. PROGRAMME Dec 24 1906
 Beethoven—"Egmont Overture."
 Beethoven—Fourth Piano Concerto, in G major.
 Soloist, Dr. Otto Neitzel.
 Beethoven—Seventh Symphony, in A major.

Once upon a time, before Domestic symphonies and keyless "tone-poems" existed, there lived a sturdy musician named Beethoven. He was a thorn in the flesh to the old fogies of his neighborhood and was thought very much of a radical by those who knew him. Many considered him given to dissonances and to freedom of form. But he believed that there should be more of consonance than of dissonance in Music; that there should be more of hope than of dejection, more of good than of evil, more of light than of shadow, in true Art-works.

The concert, on this occasion, was devoted entirely to compositions by this composer, built upon this strange plan. The audience, oddly enough, seemed to be delighted with music which they could understand, and applauded each number with great enthusiasm, forgetting that (according to latter-day authorities) incomprehensibility should ever be the chief charm of Art and that music that does not mystify and puzzle is valueless. There was not one minute of ugly, sour, hopeless pessimism in the entire programme, and the absence of morbidness calls for the severest censure. Does Mr. Beethoven expect us, the rickety neurotics of the 20th century, to be hopeful, or to be healthy? We cannot for a moment entertain such a proposition!

Dr. Muck sometimes runs to extremes in slow tempo, and this was in evidence once or twice in the "Egmont" overture. But the work on the whole received an effective reading, especially in the triumphant fanfares of the end, and in the joyous piccolo whistlings.

The G major concerto always seems to us a more genial and perfect work than the much-vaunted "Emperor" concerto, but pianists almost always perform the latter in preference to this poetic composition. We had the G major concerto given, at this concert, by two doctors of philosophy, one as conductor and one as pianist. Perhaps this was the reason that we did not find quite as much poetry in it as when Baermann and Paur gave it. We may be excused for being a little hyper-critical in this field, for we have two eminent Beethoven pianists (Baermann and Perabo) resident in Boston and when a stranger is imported from Germany to grace our symphony concerts with a Beethoven number, we may reasonably ask—"Warum?"

Nevertheless, if Dr. Neitzel leaned a trifle to the academic side, he was always clear and evidently knew his work in every measure. There was a sweet sense of security in listening to the concerto as it was performed on Saturday and Dr. Neitzel was much applauded. When one bears in mind that he is also an eminent musical critic, an essayist and a lecturer, one is convinced that he must be a species of "Admirable Crichton" in music.

Dr. Neitzel used the original Beethoven cadenzas in this work. One gains and loses by this process. The technique of Beethoven's time was puerile compared with the effects of today, and the few trills and octave passages (they were played with a stiff wrist in Beethoven's time) could scarcely give the impression of virtuosity that one gets from a Rubenstein or even a Moscheles cadenza. Per Contra these cadenzas were most thoroughly in keeping with the work and developed its figures with artistic unity. They were also properly short, while Reinecke, Mrs. Beach and the host of "cadenza-makers" are apt to go to great lengths in their glittering displays. It was in this concerto that Beethoven began to get impatient of the whole cadenza business, as his mark in the finale—"La Cadenza sia corta"—may show. In the next concerto, the "Emperor," he abolished the solo cadenza and united the orchestra with the piano in the exhibit of technique, in the first movement, Brahms also turned against the cadenza in his last piano concerto, and it is possible that the entire cadenza display may some day be abolished, although it dies hard.

The symphony was gloriously played. Dr. Muck had evidently studied deeply into its effects and the old work became as new because of the virile interpretation. Yet there was no seeking after new meanings, no meretricious "individualization" in the reading. It was simply the manly and healthy Beethoven in a good robust mood. It is the most rhythmic of musical works and the dactylic pulsation of the first movement and the alternation of dactyl and spondee of the second were firmly adhered to. The second, the slow movement, deserves the highest praise, for Dr. Muck avoided the lachrymose and mournful mood with which some conductors invest it (and which Beethoven expressly contradicted by his "Allegretto" mark), and gave it earnestness and great dignity without a trace of morbidness.

The Scherzo awakened the greatest enthusiasm on the part of the audience, which rather surprised us, for the contents of this are the least powerful of the symphony and the excess of repeats only seems to weaken the movement. But the finale was wonderful. It was given with a dash and vigor that made it very exciting. It was taken at a speed that made it impossible to recognize the details of the figures; it was too rapid for the comfort of even the auditor, not to speak of the orchestral players, but it gave a result that perhaps justified the outline sketch.

Dr. Muck has given us two surprises with works that we supposed had nothing new in store for us,—the Brahms C minor symphony, and this symphony of Beethoven. It will easily be recognized that this is a harder task than to paralyze us with new works of Strauss or Mahler. Yet the "Sinfonia Domestica" is coming soon.

Louis C. Elson.

BEETHOVEN NIGHT AT THE SYMPHONY

Kerua Dec 23 06
 Dangerous One-Composer Experiment Fairly Successfully Tried.

DR. MUCK'S LEADING MASTERLY IN MUCH

Fourth Concerto for the Piano-forte Is Sanely Played by Dr. Neitzel.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Three of Beethoven's compositions formed the programme of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr. Muck, which took place last night in Symphony Hall. They were the overture to "Egmont"; the fourth concerto for the pianoforte, and the seventh symphony.

Programmes devoted exclusively to the works of any one composer are dangerous experiments. Few composers can stand the test. In certain German concert halls it has been the custom to announce a "Mozart evening," a "Schumann evening," a "Brahms evening," and so on. One conductor, I remember, had the courage to announce a "Raff evening." Was it not Benjamin Blise, now at rest—if the indefatigable conductor can rest even in another world?

Nor has the modern composer a marked advantage in this respect over the ancient. Highly colored music frets the nerves more than that which is constantly amiable. Each period has its mannerisms, its formulas of expression and those that surprise for a moment by their novelty, quickly become old-fashioned. New harmonic schemes, daring progressions, vagueness of plan, impressionistic effects, if they are to be appreciated, must be opposed to something that has endured by reason of solid architecture and nobility of thought. As the ingenuous Capt. Goby remarked of life in the West Indies: "A fellow's liver goes to the deuce with hot pickles and sangaree."

Variety Even in Music a Need.

The hearer of music rightly demands a certain variety, as he does in diet and in affection. It is given to very few composers to satisfy each in his own music, this natural want. Beethoven responds best of all to the demand, yet care must be taken in the selection, and he must not be treated with too much respect. The doctrine of plenary inspiration no longer can be applied to any composer.

The fetishist should not be heeded in his worship any more than a madman beating on a drum. Beethoven, as other great composers, wrote music that is perfunctory and dull, not only in his youth, but in his second and even in his third period. To fall down before these works in wonder, love and praise, to go into raptures over the overture to "The Dedication of the House" as over the "Coriolanus" overture, is not an act of reverence; it is an exhibition of a lack of discrimination, and Beethoven himself would be the first to reject the noisy persons, among them aesthetic writers, and say: "Away with them. They know me not."

Then there are the interpreters who will not allow the great works of Beethoven to speak for themselves. They must pry into the hidden meaning, inquire into the symbolism, explain "the message to humanity." There are certain pianists whose friends swear that they have "caught the spirit of Beethoven." There are certain conductors who have invented "original interpretations" of the symphonies and overtures. They stand between the composer and the audience. If the composer threatens to be the dominating personality, they promptly kill him with their sticks.

Fortunately for the Symphony audience last night, the programme was judiciously chosen and neither Dr. Muck nor Dr. Neitzel, who played the piano part of the concerto, is among the discoverers or the improvers of Beethoven's music. Each has listened to the Titan, and not merely told him things.

Dr. Muck's Leading Was Sane.

Dr. Muck did not follow the example of some German conductors—Franz Wuellner was one of them—who in the allegro of the overture, emphasized the stern "Sarabande" chords by deliberately checking the pace, so that the continuity of musical thought was wholly lost, and the passage was turned into a separate chapter without inevitable relationship with what preceded and followed. He obtained the due emphasis without interrupting the flow. His treatment of the coda with the opening muttering and preparation for some great scene, with the turning of anticipation into reality, with the final tumult of jubilation, was masterly.

Yet the performance of the overture, as of the symphony, was constantly elastic, and there was ever the thought of the various melodic figures that should be sung, of the moods that should be suggested, of the one great climax in the expression. In his management of the climax Dr. Muck shows his operatic training. He subordinates passages that to some seem important, but these passages do not, therefore, become unimportant, for they serve in the launching of the chief dramatic stroke, or, as a background, they enhance the effect that escapes those who are passionate in their regard for detail.

As is the modern custom, Dr. Muck gave out the first theme of the allegro in the first movement of the symphony as though the composer were improvising tentatively, but with the confirmation of the full orchestra he established the prevailing tempo. His reading of the symphony was one of poetic liberty which did not approach license. However great the freedom in movement, the underlying rhythm was maintained, the controlling thought was vividly presented. In his interpretation of the famous allegretto he steered clear of both the inexorable rigidity that makes the melody square-toed, and of the sentiment that is of close kin to sentimentalism. All in all the performance of the symphony was poetically dramatic and engrossing.

Neitzel Earned His Applause.

Dr. Neitzel chose the concerto in G major, which is now chiefly conspicuous for the rare and unconventional beauty of the second movement and for the occasional hints at the surpassing greatness of Beethoven in the other movements. His performance was thoughtful, but not labored or dryly scholastic. It was sane.

There was no attempt to turn passages of pure formalism into "inspired thought." There was the evident appreciation of the composer's romantic spirit which found full expression in the Andante and in other pages now and then attempted to make its way. Technically, the performance was clean-cut and fluent in the bravura passages, and the phrasing of the melodic sections was rhetorically convincing and artistic. Dr. Neitzel was warmly greeted and liberally applauded.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of the season's Boston Symphony orchestra pension fund concerts will be given in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, Dec. 30, at 8 o'clock. The object of these concerts, as is well known, is to increase the endowment fund of the pension institution and thus provide for the old age or sickness of members of the orchestra. Thanks to the generous spirit in which Boston has patronized these concerts, the fund has been steadily and surely increasing. With the two concerts each season and the dues from the members of the orchestra, the players will soon be on a pension basis as favorable as those which are found in continental orchestras which are maintained by the state. All this helps to assure the esprit de corps which has been peculiarly charac-

BEETHOVEN NIGHT FOR THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck Gives Superb Presentation of Master's Works—Dr. Neitzel Proves Virtuosity.

It was Beethoven night at the Symphony for the ninth concert, with an overture, a symphony and a concerto, the latter played by a distinguished critic and musician who has made himself an authority on all things connected with the great composer and his work. It was, therefore, an evening of refined and sober interest, lacking in musical excitement, perhaps, but worth experiencing now and then to prove that the moderns have all much to learn from the master of them all.

Dr. Muck was in a mood that made Beethoven especially heroic. His reading of the "Egmont" overture was splendidly virile, full of contrasting tones, climactically brilliant and impressive. In the seventh symphony, too, his strong temperament colored richly, but did not spoil the beauty of the work. The exquisite second movement, in particular, was a wonderful exhibition of poetic expression, melodic clarity, appealing tenderness.

Dr. Otto Neitzel, the critic and instructor of Cologne, played the concerto in G major, and interpreted it with a grace and intellectual charm that left no one any just reason for dwelling upon the thought that he was not a resounding virtuoso or a passionate poet of the piano. His reading of the work—not always one of sustained interest—was full of a subtle refinement that never became pedantry, and his technical equipment was ample for the demands made upon it. Altogether his was a sincere and luminous performance, one that might well have been studied by aspirants for pianistic honors.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. — Dec. 22, 06

A "Beethoven" Programme and a Notable Performance of His Seventh Symphony—Dr. Muck and the Orchestra at Their Best in the Recreation of a Classic—The Overture to "Egmont" as Delineative Music—Dr. Neitzel Plays Beethoven's Fourth Concerto

An "all-Beethoven," or any other sort of programme, justifies itself when it comes to such performance as Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra gave theirs yesterday. Concerts of the music of a single composer have been rare with our conductors, and the few that one or another of them has arranged have usually served some commemorative purpose. It is by no means certain that Beethoven was born on Dec. 16, 1770; if he was, a routine anniversary of his birth was already five days past; so that a memorial intention hardly lurked in Dr. Muck's programme. Probably the origin of it was much more prosaic. Dr. Neitzel, the pianist of the afternoon, wished to play Beethoven's concerto in G major. The conductor consented, and the pianist's suggestion kindled him to an "all-Beethoven" concert. Except in the concerto, he made, moreover, a programme of very familiar Beethoven. There was no searching among his obscurer overtures, his ballet music or his occasional pieces to find unfamiliar material for it. Perhaps the concerto, which has not been played here for six years, served for that. For the rest the overture to "Egmont" and the seventh symphony sufficed. Little of Beethoven is more familiar, and both stood on Mr. Gericke's programmes only last winter.

Yet the responsive listener heard both yesterday with a keen sense of newness in the music and freshness of impression in himself. It was the Friday afternoon before Christmas; yet few seats were empty, and the audience was alert, eager and at moments rapt. In fact conductor and band were repeating once more the achievement which is one of their justest distinctions and truest glories, the recreation of classics. From the first days of Mr. Gericke even to the latest day of Dr. Muck, it has been their singular virtue among American orchestras, and as some say among the orchestras of Europe as well, to make the old and the familiar vital again. There is nothing, after all, that gathers dust, that stiffens in its bones so quickly as a classic when once it has become such. Year after year it is duly taken down from the shelf, rubbed and oiled a little in its joints, and then displayed to equally stiff-kneed admiration. Behold and judge for yourselves—and you have long known what you ought to recognize and to admire. To be displayed and to be beheld—and nothing more—is the real fate of most classics, musical or any other, and in that fate is the inspiring cause of the very human instinct that often upsprings in most of us, if we are quite honest with ourselves, to kick over the traces of admiration and bolt into weariness or dislike. When, however, some halcyon occasion recreates and revitalizes these classics, and sets in living array, and not in catalogue, the qualities that have made them such; when they rise before our ears (if they happen to be music) and our imaginations as spontaneously and inevitably as life itself, then there is a new and very keen joy in them. There is no question then of displaying or beholding. The performer has felt and the listener feels responsively. It was such a performance that Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave yesterday of the overture to "Egmont" and especially of the seventh symphony, and it made both new and stirring. And they were so in particular because the conductor used no effort to make either sound new by the easy means of a calculated "effect" here, a touch of distortion there, or any of the tricks, honest or dishonest, of elaborate "interpretation." The conductor and his men were as voices that sought but one end—the fullest utterance of the music as it came from Beethoven's hand. So uttered it could not fail of "effects" that would outdo all that the most interpretative of professional "interpreters" could devise. It would be alive again with the beauty, the power, the irresistible compelling quality that have made it lasting.

Praise our ultra-modern "programme-music" as we may; love its freedom of form and its intensity of feeling as some of us do; yield to many of its suggestions as most of us must. Yet has it, after all, gone any further in genuine musical delineation than Beethoven went in the overture to "Egmont" as it was played yesterday? Some of this programme-music does indeed try to state facts, and in the hands of a Richard Strauss almost succeeds. Some of it tries to describe minutely, and again almost succeeds. But the real purpose and achievement of delineative music is the imparting of the impressions that the composer has received from the object that has stirred him to speech. If we are seeking a description of Egmont and his life we turn to Motley or to some other historian of the revolt of the Netherlands, and not to Goethe's tragedy or to Beethoven's music. At bottom they are the one and the other's impression of the man, his life, his time. Goethe has wrought his in verse and Beethoven his in tones, but each has the peculiar trait of a great impression, greatly uttered. The responsive impression stirs in the reader and the listener feels the Egmont that Beethoven or Goethe felt. Look at Velasquez's portraits of the Phillips of Spain, who were his sovereigns. Who knows, who cares now whether they are like or unlike the man whom the chamberlains of the court and the grooms of the bedchamber knew? They are the Phillips that Velasquez felt, and we feel them, and our children will feel them, as he felt them. The portraits are the perfection of delineation because they do convey an irresistible and abiding impression. The same aim and the same quality dwell in delineative music. Has any that has come since in near a century achieved both more completely than this overture to "Egmont" of 1810?

Thank the muses of "absolute" music, there was no thought of delineation, old or new, in the symphony! There was not even thought, until afterwards, of the surpassing brilliancy, beauty and euphony of tone that the orchestra brought to the performance of it. The ear heard and the imagination felt the brightness of the strings, the liquid purity of the wood winds, the mellow sturdiness of the brass—heard them in rounded phrase, in pointed accent, in adroit shadings, in transparent euphony, heard them as though each instrument were the voice of inspired song—and for the instant took it all for granted. How, so inevitable and spontaneous did it seem, could this seventh symphony be played in any other tones? And the same ears and the same imaginations heard the symphony as a spontaneous and inevitable whole rising measure from measure, shaping itself seemingly by its own will into an idealizing song of the power, the beauty and the glory of rhythm. Recall the lovely persuasion of the introduction luring and exciting the ear into the rhythmic warmth of the allegro; the pulsing song of the slow movement as of rhythm singing itself; the spontaneous leap of the scherzo as though each measure were flashing out of its predecessor, the pause of quiet song as of rhythm subdued to musing; the ecstatic whirl of the finale as of rhythm intoxicated with its own zest. To recall is only to anticipate all these again tonight. Dr. Muck has indeed grasped the symphony as a whole. He has made it the song of rhythm; the "dance-song" of which Nietzsche dreamed and that was written two generations before him. The conductor has done nothing so thrilling and so memorable since he gave Brahms's first symphony as recreating life. H. T. P.

The Symphony Orchestra's Concert for

Trans. Itself Dec. 27, 1906

Five or six times in a musical year the audiences of the Symphony concerts may pay their compliments to the men of the orchestra. A particular number is particularly well played, as was the scherzo of Beethoven's seventh symphony last Saturday, and the applause is very hearty. The conductor acknowledges it once or twice, and then, as Dr. Muck did last week, calls the men to their feet. Three or four weeks hence there may be another such incident, a third in February, and so onward. They make indeed the only opportunities in the course of the regular concerts in which the public that frequents them may prove its understanding and its appreciation of the share of the men in the excellence of the orchestra. When the reviewers of other cities make those flattering comparisons between our band and the bands of their town, they usually note the superior musicianly quality of the men of our orchestra. Trite as the phrase is, they can call ours nothing else than an orchestra of virtuosi. We in our turn take this distinction for granted. It is rather our way in Boston. "Why should it not be?" we ask complacently. It is this complacency that has hampered a little the two concerts that the men of the orchestra give each year for their pension fund. Their own dues are the foundation of it, while the concerts should add annually a substantial story to the superstructure. It is easy to say that forty-eight concerts in seven months by the Symphony Orchestra are enough. Why should its public come to hear it in two more, unless there is a very eminent conductor, singer or virtuoso or an unusual programme to give them special interest?

There is no reason, perhaps, beyond the human and impelling one of familiarity, appreciation and liking for the men whom it hears and watches almost weekly and year upon year from October to May. After all, the Symphony Orchestra is no machine that goes of itself, so to say, Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall. The conductor aside, it is a body of ninety-odd men, each with his individual traits and excellence, and the sum of them is the quality and the virtue of the orchestra. Week after week the audiences at the Symphony concerts take their pleasure of this quality. Twice a year at the concerts for the pension fund they may directly reciprocate their delight in it. Even at these the men of the orchestra usually make no routine return. They brought Richard Strauss here to conduct at one of the concerts. Eminent singers and instrumentalists have come gladly to their aid. Or, as they did last spring and as they are doing again next Sunday night, they can give our opera-starved public fragments of Wagner's music. This time, however, it is a Wagner concert of a new sort. Rightly from one point of view, Dr. Muck will not tear fragments out of the body of the music-dramas, strip them of setting and action and play them "in concert form." He is willing to conduct in the overtures and the preludes and in purely orchestral fragments like the apotheosis of Siegfried in the last act of "Götterdämmerung." Out of these, in chronological order from "Rienzi" through "Parsifal," he and his men have made their programme—a different Wagner programme from any that has hitherto been played in Boston. As for the outside public to whom the men of the orchestra have no particular interest, the concert brings one of the few opportunities to hear Dr. Muck and in the music in which he has gained most distinction in German opera houses.

H. T. P.

Dr. Neitzel's Opinions

Dr. Otto Neitzel, the Admirable Crichton of German music—composer, virtuoso, reviewer, lecturer, scholar—who is paying his first visit to America, is spending the week in Boston. On Monday, he was the pianist at the concert of the Symphony Quartet. On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, he plays Beethoven's concerto in G major with the Symphony Orchestra. Meanwhile he is amusing himself with Boston, and renewing acquaintances begun in Germany. Almost everything in or out of music interests him; his mind seems tirelessly alert; his knowledge endless. A hint from the German decorations on the walls of a room will set him discoursing of old German poetry interestingly, even humorously. He turns graver, when the conversation leads into music. "Contemporary German music," he said, "is altogether decadent. This is sufficiently evident in the fact that the movement to introduce quarter tones into the scale is receiving serious attention. When art begins to concern itself with artificial and entirely outward means of expression instead of with the thing to be expressed, it is a sure sign of degeneracy. Strauss is a musical degenerate, and 'Salomé' is the product of a certain intellectual perversity both literary and musical. Nevertheless it is the most interesting work since Wagner."

"Beethoven represented the highest point ever attained by absolute music since it first began, in the middle of the seventh century. His music is the climax of strength and virility. It contained the kernel of all that is good in art that has come after him. Brahms has but developed certain phases of it, carried it farther, elaborated it in detail. And that is all that anyone has done. Reger is a musical weasel who runs hither and thither hunting a hole into which to crawl. The modern French school still has something to say, and that they say it well no one can dispute. Franck is great. But he, too, lacks that strength which so eminently marks Beethoven. He is, one might say, the poet in music. Too much so, in fact."

Turning to musical criticism Dr. Neitzel strongly disagreed with the theory often advanced that all criticism is, in the last analysis, a question of personal opinion. He maintains most emphatically that there are standards of criticism just as there are standards in the other arts, and cites in proof the work of his colleagues of the German press, who uniformly agree with him. "First," he said, "there are standards that apply to the performer. Everyone knows whether a passage is played clearly or not. Therefore, everyone can judge of the technical proficiency of the artist. In estimating the temperamental and emotional qualities of the performer, there are again standards which may guide us, standards which the most eminent executive artists constantly supply. And, finally, in judgment compositions we have absolute standards in regard to harmony, orchestration, and form with which every well-informed musician is acquainted."

Trans. Dec. 19, 1906

Dr. Neitzel Soloist at Symphony Concert.

In honor of the memory of Beethoven, who was born in December, 1770, the ninth Symphony program was made up entirely of the great musician's compositions, the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," the G major pianoforte concerto and his grand symphony No. 7. The pianist was the distinguished critic, lecturer and pianist, Dr. Otto Neitzel, whose recent appearance with the Boston Symphony quartet demonstrated his masterly ability as an interpreter of chamber music. The variety and musical beauty displayed by Beethoven in his numerous compositions enables a conductor to make up a program from the master's works that should silence criticism as to form, and Dr. Muck evidently succeeded in his task, for his auditors gave indubitable evidences that the program was thoroughly enjoyable.

In the concerto Dr. Neitzel again proved himself the possessor of great interpretative abilities in which the intelligence of the scholar allied with a technique of a high order results in a lofty standard of work. The pianist is very modest, thoroughly in earnest when playing and plainly indicates that his world-wide fame is well deserved. There is no particular need to specify the fine quality of his tone, the dexterity in rapid finger work nor the exquisite coloring and gradations of his performance, for in all the requirements of a virtuoso he evidently is well equipped. He was most heartily applauded at the close of the concerto.

The orchestral work was of a character that calls for naught but praise, and all in all the program probably gave more real enjoyment to the people than any other one of the season. The symphony was a noble performance throughout and in the third movement the joyous spirit of the composition put players and listeners in great good humor, and conductor Muck allowed the orchestra to "run by itself" awhile, evidently entering into the fun of the moment.

Dr. Muck had planned to present two novelties on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, an overture by Noskowski, entitled "The Steppe," and a symphony by Stojowski. Unfortunately, the parts for the Noskowski overture were not to be had in this country, even in the library of congress, so it was decided to postpone this "Polish" program indefinitely. The selections this week will be as follows: Brahms' variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, Strube's F sharp minor violin concerto and two excerpts from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus." Mr. Timothee Adamowski will be the solo violinist.

158
Saturday, December 29, 1906

Owing to the indisposition of Dr. Muck, Professor Willy Hess will conduct this evening.

159
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BRAHMS,

VARIATIONS on a THEME by JOSEF HAYDN, op. 56A.

STRUBE,

CONCERTO for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, in F sharp minor, No. 2.
I. Allegro assai.
II. Reverie: Adagio.
III. Passacaglia: Andantino grazioso.

LISZT,

{ a) SHEPHERDS' SONG AT THE MANGER } From the (First time in Boston.) Oratorio
{ b) MARCH OF THE THREE HOLY KINGS } "Christus"

Soloist:

Mr. TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv. Dec 31. PROGRAMME. 1906
 Brahms—Variations on a Haydn Theme. Op. 53a.
 Strube—Violin Concerto, F-sharp minor, No. 2.
 Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.
 Liszt—Shepherd's Song at the Manger.
 Liszt—March of the Three Holy Kings.

Not a very inspiring programme and Dr. Muck was absent, our climate having at last caught him by the throat. Prof. Willy Hess has hitherto only conducted concertos in Boston; last night he conducted everything but the concerto. We notice that the railroad-timetable exactness, with which Mr. Gericke used to begin the concerts is being departed from; on this occasion the concert began at 8.10.

In the first number the beauty of Haydn's theme impressed us more than the variations of it. Yet there was great skill in the work and the leading of the voices was remarkably fluent. In spite of the charm of the sixth and seventh variations the composition scarcely ever became more than interesting. One felt at the end that Brahms could readily have added half-a-dozen more variations if they had been demanded, with as much ease as a grocer's clerk could add a few more pounds of sugar to your purchase; there was too much facility in the composition, but the work was never dry nor dull, and Prof. Hess brought out the points with praiseworthy intelligence.

The Variations did not make a dress parade of the different departments of the orchestra, as is often done in this form of composition, but followed the higher plan of really developing the theme, so that Haydn's thought became very much enlarged and modernized before the end. Nevertheless, as intimated, we found the chief charm in the melody unadorned.

Mr. Strube and Mr. Adamowski are both very popular with orchestra and with public, and they were welcomed with enthusiasm by both. The concerto is one of Mr. Strube's best compositions. It is modern enough, but it is not exasperatingly ugly, as some of this composer's works strive to be. The Reverie (second movement) is a gem that deserves to be heard frequently. It is much the best number of the work.

The last movement, however, did not grow upon acquaintance. The cadenza, which Mr. Gericke wrote for the work, is an effective display of technique, especially in double-stopping. But we find no adequate reason for the employment of the bizarre rhythmic construction. Tchaikowsky once rebuked a Russian contemporary for using a 5-4 rhythm. Yet Tchaikowsky himself wrote one of the longest 5-4 movements in existence. But that 5-4 rhythm, in the Pathetic Symphony, had something to say; it pictured restlessness and uneasiness, even in the midst of gaiety, while most of the modern irregular rhythms (5-4 or 7-4) are only introduced to show the ingenuity of the composer.

Mr. Strube conducted his own concerto and, of course, with authority. Mr. Adamowski was in his best form, and played with that earnestness and temperament which we find to be his greatest charm. His breadth in the G-string work in the Reverie, his brilliancy in the cadenza, and his surety in every part of the work, carried the concerto to success, and violinist and composer-conductor won a triumph together, being recalled several times.

The selections from Liszt's "Christus" (the two last numbers of the concert) were scarcely as effective as the Bach "Pastorale" from the "Christmas Oratorio," to which we have become accustomed at this season of the year. Yet there is much beauty in each of the selections, in spite of Hanslick's virulent attacks on the work. That eminent German scold held that the master of luxurious instrumentation was trying to blow infantile bagpipes before the Child in the Manger and that the result was a most artificial "naivete," a new form of spiritual over-refinement. He adds that Liszt's "Christus" is an open declaration of musical bankruptcy. He attacks the "Shepherd's Song" with yet fiercer vehemence.

Yet the work lives and is likely to hold its place in the repertoire for a long while to come. Naturally it has considerable oboe pipings. Ever since Handel bleated forth the Calabrian Pifferari melody as true Christmas music, the composers have given the oboes (and the English horns) full swing in this particular subject. Liszt's picture is, if anything, less conventional than the average.

The concert ended with the March of the three Kings. Every member of the symphony orchestra feels secure when he holds three kings, and they therefore played boldly. The opening pizzicati passages presented the kings very much as stealthy banditti are represented in operatic music, but there was fine melody and excellent orchestration in every part of this march. There was also a certain barbaric splendor that suited the subject well, and therefore, even in the teeth of Mr. Hanslick, one may enjoy this brilliant work of that modern composer whose creative fame bids fair to be largely posthumous. Liszt was too great as a pianist to be fairly recognized as a composer during his lifetime, and he was also overshadowed by his chief "protégé," Wagner, who held the stage to the exclusion of everybody else, for a full generation.

Mr. Hess conducted the two Liszt's works well, giving evident care to working up those climaxes in which Liszt revelled so frequently. Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY CONCERT CONDUCTED BY HESS

Christmas Music from Liszt's
Oratorio "Christus,"
One Feature.

VIOLIN CONCERTO OF
STRUBE HEARD AGAIN

Brahms' Variations on Theme of Haydn One of Numbers on Programme.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Variations on a theme of Haydn....Brahms Concerto No. 2, in F-sharp minor, for violin.....Strube
Shepherd's Song at the Manger and
March of the Three Holy Kings,
from "Christus".....Liszt

Dr. Muck, in consequence of a sore throat, did not conduct the orchestra at the public rehearsal or at the concert last night. Willy Hess led in his place. It is stated positively that Dr. Muck will conduct at the Pension Fund Concert tonight.

The programme was a singular one and the concert, as a whole, was not one of engrossing interest. If the object was to provide cheerful music, with a view to the celebration of Christmas, why should the variations by Brahms have been put on the programme? One of these variations, grazioso, has a quasi-pastoral nature and abiding charm; but however interesting the other variations may be to students and amateur Brahmsites, the music is not associated inevitably with the thought of any festival occasion.

Mr. Strube's violin concerto was performed for the first time a year ago (Dec. 23), when Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the violinist. Mr. Adamowski was the violinist last night, and the composer conducted. The work and the performance evidently gave much pleasure to the audience. The first two movements are frankly melodious and Mr. Strube's harmonic scheme is not so super-refined and searched out as in some of his later orchestral compositions. He steers clear of the commonplace and obvious without too apparent effort, and yet there are many instances of fine musical quality both in the body itself and in the orchestral dress.

There was a time when Mr. Strube seemed intoxicated from immoderate indulgence in the ultra-modern harmonic brew. It was as though he were attempting to out-d'Indy d'Indy in his speech and rhetoric. Yet there was an honesty of purpose with a technical skill that commanded respect even when his "Fantastic Overture" was perplexingly fantastical and not convincing.

The influence of the ultra-moderns was seen in Mr. Strube's rhetoric rather than in the substance of his thought. His ideas were his own. His excursions into fields condemned by stern pedagogues and conventional "lovers of music" as miasmatic did him no harm. On the contrary, he gathered flowers not of evil but of good. In this concerto he has shown a finer discrimination in the use of modern expression. His enthusiasm is under firmer control.

The last movement appeals to the violinist of virtuoso blood and there are some unusual and pleasing orchestral effects, but it falls a little below the level of the movements that precede. Mr. Adamowski, who played throughout with gusto, was especially effective in the opening allegro and in the Reverie. His tone in the purely melodic passages was warm and persuasive, and he phrased with care. While the performance was not wholly flawless, it was romantic and full of life.

The shepherd's song at the manger from Liszt's "Christus" was played here for the first time. The "March of the Three Holy Kings" was produced here by Mr. Gericke Dec. 20, 1902. The story of the composition of this oratorio is a curious one.

Much of the music was written when Liszt was living in the Vatican and also in daily intercourse with the Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein, in religious and sentimental intercourse. Was he sincere when he said that he composed "Christ" as the Saviour was taught to him by "the village priest and the Catholic, apostolic and Roman church"? No doubt he took himself seriously at this period and he had sublime faith—in his own music. How much did the princess have to do with his imitations of old Italian ecclesiastical composers, with his expression of religious pseudo-naivete?

Take this Shepherd's Song for example? It certainly did not deserve the harsh criticism of Hanslick, who could not believe that a composer of dazzling virtuoso music could be sincere in his religious compositions. But Liszt's character was strangely complex, and this naivete that is generally puerile rather than childlike was only one phase of many. The Shepherd's Song is both pastoral and ecclesiastical, but in neither way is there the simplicity of genius, the simplicity of Handel and Gluck. Liszt's shepherds are figuring in tableaux, and there is a brilliant audience with the Princess Carolyn in a box. Or a stereopticon might be used advantageously with both this movement and the March that followed.

FOR SALE—Two Symphony Concert Seats

First Balcony A 19, 20, left, for alternate Saturdays; price $27. D.K.A., Boston Transcript (A)

WANTED—SYMPHONY TICKET

For Friday afternoons; floor location preferred. Reasonable price. J.C.P., Boston Transcript.

tone of Brahms's more familiar variations, there is seemingly a similar conflict between two impulses. Each repetition of the music seems to make the original theme from Haydn more commonplace and unpromising—until Brahms's imagination and technical inventiveness begin to make it fertile. Then, like Liszt, he seems to be struggling between two purposes. The one is the fascination for him and for the expert listener of experiments, problems, and many venturesome and subtle inventions in the choosing and the development of the variations. The other is the impulse in him as a poet in tones to give those variations emotional appeal, not of the weight and gravity of the Paganini variations, for example, but of a flowing grace and a pervading lyric mood, to show perhaps that even he could write lithe and elegant music with an air of polished spontaneity. Brahms, however, has adjusted his two purposes much more smoothly than has Liszt. The fragments of "Christus" labor. The "St. Anthony" variations, with all their technical subtleties have an air of easy improvisation by a composer who has style at and to his fingertips. Not once do they lose their air of graceful fancy. Mr. Strube and Brahms are far apart, but these variations of the elder and greater man made persuasive preparation for the concerto of the younger. In it is the same smooth jointure of inventive faculty and scholarly skill with lightness of mood, grace of fancy and ease of touch. But if we fol-

MUSICAL MATTERS

Symphony Program
With One Novelty.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight
—Mr Whitney's Song Recital.

Nordica Coming Saturday —Events of the Week.

The only novelty on the Symphony program last week was the "Shepherd's Song" from the Liszt oratorio, "Christus." "The March of the Three Holy Kings," an excerpt from the same work; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn and Strube's F-sharp minor concerto for violin completed the selections. Mr Timothee Adamowski was the soloist. The Liszt song and march were in keeping with the spirit of the present season and made the performance of these numbers specially impressive. In the song of the shepherds the composer frequently introduces the pastoral idea by phrases for the wood-wind instruments, the snatches of melody being grave and mysterious in their suggestions of rural simplicity and humble homage of the herders, who visited the manger where the Christ-child lay.

Throughout the work the religious and the pastoral ideas are beautifully blended and the work made a fine contrast for the march which followed, the latter being more brilliant and pompous in its significance. Except for the long preludes by the lighter wood-winds in the "song" and the efficient work of the brass contingent in the march the performances call for no special commendation, which probably would not be the case if another orchestra was under consideration.

When Mr Strube's concerto was first played by Mr Adamowski about one year ago the great merit of the work was quickly recognized, and the performance also was generally considered the most satisfactory of any given by the popular soloist. Then, as last week, the composer directed, and in each case the whole performance was thoroughly enjoyable. Possibly Mr Adamowski has acquired greater ease and confidence in his execution since his former interpretation of the concerto for his work. especially in the power, the violin, continuous, pure intonation, pure intonation. The em- second movement forth, the G string particular mention note motif of the variations and ca movement were and generally with the pitch. Compe rapturously appli after the perform- The Brahms var ber, went smooth bassoons in the capitably voiced, difficult passage w perfect and the fl example of ensemb On account of t the concert mast directed the orches The principal n program will be t by the Finnish co The first cellist play Volkmann's the program will ture to Goldmark

THE BIC XMAS BILL
US MUSICAL COLBY FAM
dered Greatest Musical Act in Vaudeville.

WO PUCKS KELLY & REN
Comedy Acrobats.

JONES & SUTT
Singing and Danc

ERNON
Greatest Ven- loquist.

S EUGENIE WEHRMANN
PIANISTE
ed Repertoire of Classical and Popular Mus

GILLETTE TROUPE
NSATIONAL ACROBA

PROF. HESS W IN ABSENCE

The program of concert at Sympl evening was as f Variations on a theme Concerto No. 2, in violin Shepherds' Song at of the Three Holy tus" Timothee Adam and owing to the tion of Dr. Muck, conducted with a tion. It cannot gram was especia was it especial Brahms variation quality with some monplace is dan quite attained, which was condu was played by style that even h ers must admit t usual attainments most captivating work, and here it reached his gr warmth of tone al being most comp herds' Song" was time at these con be set down as th life instilled by mained an exce composition, in conspicuous by march that clos equally lacking

ST. THEATRE
"Audience laughed long and freely." Globe.

WEEK MATINEES
SATURDAY a TMAS MATINEE
MAN PRESENTS

WILSON
T SUCCESSES.
edy in Three Acts,

BILLY
Lloyd Osbourne's One-Act Ph of the Wilderness
Prices, $1.50, 1.00, 75, 50, 35.

MAN PRESENTS
DREW
By Augustus

SEAT SALE TUESDA
NEXT
Regular Holle Theatre Price $1.50, 1.00.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT
LISZT AND BRAHMS WITHOUT DR. MUCK

A Light Programme with Two Fragments of Liszt's "Christus" and Brahms's "St. Anthony" Variations—The Impulses in the Three—Recitals and Chamber Concerts of Next Week—The January List

A touch of laryngitis kept Dr. Muck from his work at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. He will not conduct at the repetition tonight but—what is more essential—he will take the Wagner concert tomorrow, for the pension fund of the orchestra. As it was, Mr. Strube conducted in his own violin concerto, according to previous plans, while Mr. Hess led in Brahms's variations and in the two fragments from Liszt's "Christus." The audience received him with applause, and he conducted with intelligent understanding and ready skill, but naturally with the reserve of a man who is temporarily taking another's place, and with a curious and seemingly automatic suggestion of Dr. Muck's gestures. The audience was plainly in a mood to be pleased and it gave Mr. Adamowski, who played the violin part in the concerto with justness of execution and feeling, hearty and repeated applause.

Dr. Muck deserved the reward of his first light programme of the year and of the pleasurable concert that it brought. Except "The Song of the Shepherds" from "Christus," all the music upon it was more or less familiar—Brahms's variations on Haydn's theme called of St. Anthony, Mr. Strube's concerto for violin first played, and by Mr. Adamowski, a year ago, and "The March of the Three Holy Kings" for a second excerpt from "Christus." "The Song of the Shepherds," moreover, is by no means taxing—a gentle swelling hymn decked out with what the conventions of music have made pastoral suggestion. There is nothing in it to compare in luminous impression with the moment in "The March of the Kings"—one of the vividest moments in all Liszt's music—when the star appears in the heavens to guide them to the Holy Manger. The melodic idea that brings the clear, steadfast light, the light that was as no other, has the poetry of sound and the instrumental voices that impart it speak with illusion. Call it an "effect," as the detractors of Liszt still call both his calculations and his inspirations, but it is an "effect" that brings an authentic imaginative thrill—the more after the insistent reiteration of the progress of the kings—and a genuine vision. What Liszt saw and felt as he imagined the music comes seemingly to transparent and nearly perfect suggestion. Perhaps indeed the apparition of the star is the one moment of spontaneity in these two excerpts from "Christus." Liszt labored long at the oratorio, and other motives than musical expression spurred him to his toil. He liked in his later years at Rome to think himself a devout and innocently minded Catholic, the Abbé Liszt coming as near as he might to the priesthood of which he had dreamed as a boy. Of course he had religious fervor. He could summon any sort of fervor and transform it sometimes into musical ecstasy. But in his faith he touched this fervor with an individual and childlike simplicity of religious feeling. It remained the faith of an imaginative boyhood that could see in young, naive and trusting vision the Holy Night on the plain of Bethlehem. The manger, the star, the coming of the Magi and emotional content they strive for symbols to him. He saw and believed with the eye of a child and with the powers of a composer who loved orchestral expression he would bring the vision and the faith to equal utterance. Hence perhaps springs the conflict of impressions that these two fragments from "Christus" bring. In idea and emotional content they strive for simplicity and innocence of feeling. Yet in expression they seek a considerable sophistication and calculation of orchestral utterance. No wonder that the listener is perpetually struggling between Liszt the ecstatic pietist and Liszt the expert practitioner of instrumental effects.

In Brahms's more familiar variations, there is seemingly a similar conflict between two impulses. Each repetition of the music seems to make the original theme from Haydn more commonplace and unpromising—until Brahms's imagination and technical inventiveness begin to make it fertile. Then, like Liszt, he seems to be struggling between two purposes. The one is the fascination for him and for the expert listener of experiments, problems, and many venturesome and subtle inventions in the choosing and the development of the variations. The other is the impulse in him as a poet in tones to give those variations emotional appeal, not of the weight and gravity of the Paganini variations, for example, but of a flowing grace and a pervading lyric mood, to show perhaps that even he could write lithe and elegant music with an air of polished spontaneity. Brahms, however, has adjusted his two purposes much more smoothly than has Liszt. The fragments of "Christus" labor. The "St. Anthony" variations, with all their technical subtleties have an air of easy improvisation by a composer who has style at and to his fingertips. Not once do they lose their air of graceful fancy. Mr. Strube and Brahms are far apart, but these variations of the elder and greater man made persuasive preparation for the concerto of the younger. In it is the same smooth jointure of inventive faculty and scholarly skill with lightness of mood, grace of fancy and ease of touch. But if we follow our custom we must reserve the concerto and Mr. Adamowski's playing of it for Monday. H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

The first symphony, in E minor, of Jean Sibelius, the young Finnish composer, is the notable number on the programme of the eleventh pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday next, the last before the orchestra goes on its monthly visit to other cities. The symphony will be played for the first times here, and in another column there is an account of it and of Sibelius himself. The other numbers on the programme are Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," which Mr. Gericke used to play often and Volkmann's grateful and flowing concerto for 'cello in which Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, plays the solo part.

The men of the Symphony Orchestra give a concert on Sunday evening, at eight, in Symphony Hall, for the increase of their pension fund, and a day or two ago we were writing of their and its deservings. Dr. Muck will conduct and with the exception of one number he has made his programme entirely from the overtures and the preludes to Wagner's operas. He will play them in chronological order, beginning with "Rienzi" (1842); continuing with "The Flying Dutchman" (1843); "Tannhäuser" (1845); "Lohengrin" (1848); "Tristan" (1865), and "The Mastersingers" (1868); and ending with "Parsifal" (1882). The remaining number is Siegfried's glorification from the third act of "Götterdämmerung." Thus does Dr. Muck hold to his belief that fragments should not be torn from the body of Wagner's operas and shifted to the concert room, and thus does he make a Wagner programme such as has never before been made here. At no other time in the course of the season are we likely to hear him so amply as an operatic and a Wagnerian conductor.

SYMPHONY CONCERT CONDUCTED BY HESS

Christmas Music from Liszt's
Oratorio "Christus,"
One Feature.

VIOLIN CONCERTO OF
STRUBE HEARD AGAIN

Brahms' Variations on Theme of Haydn One of Num- bers on Programme. B Herald — 1906 — Dec 30 BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Variations on a theme of Haydn... Brahms Concerto No. 2, in F-sharp minor, for violin... Strube
Shepherds' Song at the Manger and March of the Three Holy Kings,
from "Christus"... Liszt

Dr. Muck, in consequence of a sore throat, did not conduct the orchestra at the public rehearsal or at the concert last night. Willy Hess led in his place. It is stated positively that Dr. Muck will conduct at the Pension Fund Concert tonight.

The programme was a singular one and the concert, as a whole, was not one of engrossing interest. If the object was to provide cheerful music, with a view to the celebration of Christmas, why should the variations by Brahms have been put on the programme? One of these variations, grazioso, has a quasi-pastoral nature and abiding charm; but however interesting the other variations may be to students and amateur Brahmsites, the music is not associated inevitably with the thought of any festival occasion.

Mr. Strube's violin concerto was performed for the first time a year ago (Dec. 23), when Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the violinist. Mr. Adamowski was the violinist last night, and the composer conducted. The work and the performance evidently gave much pleasure to the audience. The first two movements are frankly melodious and Mr. Strube's harmonic scheme is not so super-refined and searched out as in some of his later orchestral compositions. He steers clear of the commonplace and obvious without too apparent effort, and yet there are many instances of fine musical quality both in the body itself and in the orchestral dress.

There was a time when Mr. Strube seemed intoxicated from immoderate indulgence in the ultra-modern harmonic brew. It was as though he were attempting to out-d'Indy d'Indy in his speech and rhetoric. Yet there was an honesty of purpose with a technical skill that commanded respect even when his "Fantastic Overture" was perplexingly fantastical and not convincing.

The influence of the ultra-moderns was seen in Mr. Strube's rhetoric rather than in the substance of his thought. His ideas were his own. His excursions into fields condemned by stern pedagogues and conventional "lovers of music" as miasmatic did him no harm. On the contrary, he gathered flowers not of evil but of good. In this concerto he has shown a finer discrimination in the use of modern expression. His enthusiasm is under firmer control.

The last movement appeals to the violinist of virtuoso blood and there are some unusual and pleasing orchestral effects, but it falls a little below the level of the movements that precede.

Mr. Adamowski, who played throughout with gusto, was especially effective in the opening allegro and in the Reverie. His tone in the purely melodic passages was warm and persuasive, and he phrased with care. While the performance was not wholly flawless, it was romantic and full of life.

The shepherd's song at the manger from Liszt's "Christus" was played here for the first time. The "March of the Three Holy Kings" was produced here by Mr. Gericke Dec. 20, 1902. The story of the composition of this oratorio is a curious one.

Much of the music was written when Liszt was living in the Vatican and also in daily intercourse with the Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein, in religious and sentimental intercourse. Was he sincere when he said that he composed "Christ" as the Saviour was taught to him by "the village priest and the Catholic, apostolic and Roman church"? No doubt he took himself seriously at this period and he had sublime faith—in his own music. How much did the princess have to do with his imitations of old Italian ecclesiastical composers, with his expression of religious pseudo-naivete?

Take this Shepherds' Song for example? It certainly did not deserve the harsh criticism of Hanslick, who could not believe that a composer of dazzling virtuoso music could be sincere in his religious compositions. But Liszt's character was strangely complex, and this naivete that is generally puerile rather than childlike was only one phase of many. The Shepherds' Song is both pastoral and ecclesiastical, but in neither way is there the simplicity of genius, the simplicity of Handel and Gluck. Liszt's shepherds are figuring in tableaux, and there is a brilliant audience with the Princess Carolyn in a box. Or a stereopticon might be used advantageously with both this movement and the March that followed.

ADAMOWSKI AS SOLOIST WINS PLAUDITS.

Liszt's "Christus" Music Fails to Rouse Enthusiasm of Symphony Audience.

Boston Am. — Dec 30. 06

By Kent Perkins.

It was an "off night" at Symphony Hall in more senses than one last evening. In the first place, Dr. Muck was absent. He was indisposed, not seriously, but sufficiently through trouble with his throat to make it seem wise for him to stay at home and save himself for to-night's Pension Fund Concert. Professor Hess conducted in his place.

Then, too, the programme was a makeshift one. Dr. Muck had planned to have the concert one of Polish music entirely, but it was discovered at the eleventh hour that there was no copy of one of the scheduled compositions in this country; so a new program was thrown together. It began with Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56 A.

Then came Gustav Strube's violin concerto in F sharp minor, which was performed for the first time last year by Mr. Adamowski, to whom it is dedicated. Mr. Adamowski essayed it again last night. It is a work of marked strength, originality and beauty. The solo violinist played it much more satisfactorily than he did on the first occasion and both he and the composer, who led the orchestra, were called out by enthusiastic plaudits.

Christmas Music by Liszt.

A praiseworthy attempt to give a reasonable tone to the programme was made in the final selection, which consisted of two extracts from Liszt's oratorio "Christus," the "Shepherds' Song at the Manger" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings." But the audience apparently was not in a mood for such music and received it coolly.

Perhaps the people were tired of Christmas as it publicly manifests itself in these days and did not like to be reminded even remotely of the recent past of hurly-burly present-buying and entertainment. Or, possibly, the music was too little like the modern Christmas and the holiday shops.

It is simple, pastoral, devotional, deeply spiritual. It smacks not at all of the material glitter of life. The "Shepherds' Song," which was heard here for the first time, is a beautiful song of men who watch their flocks by night, and is full of adoration for the Divine Babe in the manger, reaching a lofty flight in a hymn-like section that is placed between the purely pastoral portions.

Spiritual Triumph Typified.

The "March of the Three Holy Kings" is stately, without pomposity, and is imbued with an exalted simplicity befitting the journey of the single-minded potentates who followed the wondrous Star, bearing gifts to the lowly King of Kings. There is effulgent glory in the representation of the Star and abundant triumph that typifies the coming spiritual dominion of the King to whom the three were marching, but it is not the grandiose tribute of sound that is paid an earthly potentate and requires a certain amount of devotional sympathy for anything like proper appreciation. The people were little moved.

The orchestra under Professor Hess did excellent work and its interpretation of the music was admirable in every way. Yet the people were moved.

SYMPHONY HAS ITS REHEARSAL

Post ————— Dec 29, 06
By Olin Downes

Professor Hess, the concertmeister, conducted the public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon of its 10th concert for the season, Dr. Muck being indisposed. The programme was as follows:

Variations on a theme by Haydn-Brahms; concerto for violin, No. 2 in F sharp minor, Strube; Shepherds' Song at the Manger (first time), and March of the Three Kings from the oratorio "Christus," Liszt. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist, and Mr. Strube conducted the orchestral accompaniment of his concerto.

The Brahms variations would seem to be Professor Hess' particular possession. It was Mr. Gericke who was indisposed when they were performed last year, and on that occasion also Mr. Hess mounted the rostrum. These variations are exceedingly meaty.

There are so many intricate harmonic and rhythmical devices that the interpreter runs the risk of losing the flow of things in his industrious burrowing after melodies and counter-melodies.

Yesterday's performance was far more vital than last year's; the manifold details were kept in their place, and the virile Brahms spirit which permeates every bar of the score was there.

Mr. Strube's concerto improves with acquaintance. It was written for the violin by a man who knows and loves the instrument, and the workmanship is of superior excellence. The solo instrument and the orchestra play into each other's hands and develop the themes in a logical, symphonic manner. With this the accompaniment never degenerates into a few chords, and the solo instrument is never out-voiced; nor do thundering tuttis strike our ears with the shock of an automobile collision, and serve as a more or less well-constructed bridge between the entrances of the violin. The ideas of the first movement are not of great intrinsic value, but they are brilliantly developed, and the movement went very briskly under the composer's baton. The second movement, a reverie, is one uninterrupted flow of spontaneous, beautiful melody, and the last movement is a masterly passacaglia, containing 11 variations and a coda on an original theme in 7-4 time.

It is a pleasure to add that Mr. Adamowski of late years has seldom appeared to better advantage than yesterday. With a very few exceptions he showed a fine technical cleanness, an unusually big and potential tone, and as far as one can judge on slight acquaintance, an intimate appreciation of the convincing in the middle movement. After hearing the Liszt excerpts, with all their mysticism and gorgeous pomp and ceremony of the Catholic church, the creations of such a modern as Cesar Franck become much less astonishing. "The March of the Three Kings" was very brilliantly done, but one had a strong impression (perhaps gained from the time-honored interpretation of the word "pastorale") that the "Song of the Shepherds" could have been taken much more quietly and perhaps in a slower tempo.

Dr. Muck, Wagner and the Pension Fund

The Symphony Orchestra gives the first concert of the current season for the increase of its pension fund on Sunday evening, Dec. 30, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck is to conduct and the programme is to consist wholly of music by Wagner, viz.—the overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" and "Siegfried's Apotheosis" from "Götterdämmerung." Mr. Wood in London once made a programme of overtures and nothing else—thirteen in all. Dr. Muck has approximated the feat within the limits of Wagner by his seven overtures, almost in chronological order and all that Wagner wrote to his operas and music-dramas. The experiment is curious and interesting. Since we have had no opera here for two years and are likely to have none next spring, any Wagner concert has its especial interest. If Dr. Muck is a specialist at all, he is such in Wagner's music, and the recollection of his playing of the "Faust" overture at his first concert here is still stirring. At this concert for the pension fund, moreover, the larger public outside the subscribers to the Symphony concerts will have its first opportunity to hear Dr. Muck since he made his reputation here, and it has given many signs of curiosity about him. As for the pension fund, the fostering of it is not half the obligation the subscribers to the concerts owe to the ninety-six men that give them weekly pleasure.

Sunday Evening, December 30, 1906

At eight o'clock

CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

WAGNER PROGRAMME

OVERTURE, "Rienzi"

OVERTURE, "The Flying Dutchman"

OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser"

VORSPIEL, "Lohengrin"

VORSPIEL, "Tristan and Isolde"

VORSPIEL, "Die Meistersinger"

FUNERAL MARCH from "Die Götterdämmerung"

VORSPIEL, "Parsifal"

Tickets, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00, now on sale.

SYMPHONY HAS ITS REHEARSAL

Post ————— Dec 29, 06
By Olin Downes

Professor Hess, the concertmeister, conducted the public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon of its 10th concert for the season, Dr. Muck being indisposed. The programme was as follows:

Variations on a theme by Haydn-Brahms; concerto for violin, No. 2 in F sharp minor, Strube; Shepherds' Song at the Manger (first time), and March of the Three Kings from the oratorio "Christus," Liszt. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist, and Mr. Strube conducted the orchestral accompaniment of his concerto.

The Brahms variations would seem to be Professor Hess' particular possession. It was Mr. Gerleke who was indisposed when they were performed last year, and on that occasion also Mr. Hess mounted the rostrum. These variations are exceedingly meaty.

There are so many intricate harmonic and rhythmical devices that the interpreter runs the risk of losing the flow of things in his industrious burrowing after melodies and counter-melodies.

Yesterday's performance was far more vital than last year's; the manifold details were kept in their place, and the virile Brahms spirit which permeates every bar of the score was there.

Mr. Strube's concerto improves with acquaintance. It was written for the violin by a man who knows and loves the instrument, and the workmanship is of superior excellence. The solo instrument and the orchestra play into each other's hands and develop the themes in a logical, symphonic manner. With this the accompaniment never degenerates into a few chords, and the solo instrument is never out-voiced; nor do thundering tuttis strike our ears with the shock of an automobile collision, and serve as a more or less well-constructed bridge between the entrances of the violin. The ideas of the first movement are not of great intrinsic value, but they are brilliantly developed, and the movement went very briskly under the composer's baton. The second movement, a reverie, is one uninterrupted flow of spontaneous, beautiful melody, and the last movement is a masterly passacaglia, containing 11 variations and a coda on an original theme in 7-4 time.

It is a pleasure to add that Mr. Adamowski of late years has seldom appeared to better advantage than yesterday. With a very few exceptions he showed a fine technical cleanness, an unusually big and potential tone, and as far as one can judge on slight acquaintance, an intimate appreciation of the aims of the composer. He was especially convincing in the middle movement.

After hearing the Liszt excerpts, with all their mysticism and gorgeous pomp and ceremony of the Catholic church, the creations of such a modern as Cesar Franck become much less astonishing.

"The March of the Three Kings" was very brilliantly done, but one had a strong impression (perhaps gained from the time-honored interpretation of the word "pastorale") that the "Song of the Shepherds" could have been taken much more quietly and perhaps in a slower tempo.

Dr. Muck, Wagner and the Pension Fund

The Symphony Orchestra gives the first concert of the current season for the increase of its pension fund on Sunday evening, Dec. 30, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck is to conduct and the programme is to consist wholly of music by Wagner, viz.—the overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser," the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal" and "Siegfried's Apotheosis" from "Götterdämmerung." Mr. Wood in London once made a programme of overtures and nothing else—thirteen in all. Dr. Muck has approximated the feat within the limits of Wagner by his seven overtures, almost in chronological order and all that Wagner wrote to his operas and music-dramas. The experiment is curious and interesting. Since we have had no opera here for two years and are likely to have none next spring, any Wagner concert has its especial interest. If Dr. Muck is a specialist at all, he is such in Wagner's music, and the recollection of his playing of the "Faust" overture at his first concert here is still stirring. At this concert for the pension fund, moreover, the larger public outside the subscribers to the Symphony concerts will have its first opportunity to hear Dr. Muck since he made his reputation here, and it has given many signs of curiosity about him. As for the pension fund, the fostering of it is not half the obligation the subscribers to the concerts owe to the ninety-six men that give them weekly pleasure.

Sunday Evening, December 30, 1906

At eight o'clock

CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

WAGNER PROGRAMME

OVERTURE, "Rienzi"

OVERTURE, "The Flying Dutchman"

OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser"

VORSPIEL, "Lohengrin"

VORSPIEL, "Tristan and Isolde"

VORSPIEL, "Die Meistersinger"

FUNERAL MARCH from "Die Götterdämmerung"

VORSPIEL, "Parsifal"

Tickets, $2.00, $1.50, and $1.00, now on sale.

A MEMORABLE CONCERT

DR. MUCK AS A CONDUCTOR OF WAGNER'S MUSIC

Three Overtures, Four Preludes and Siegfried's Glorification as Boston Has Not Heard Them in Years—Gliere and Leclair at the Sunday Chamber Concert—Mr. Strube Reanimates the Concerto Form—News of the Local Theatres—"Madam Butterfly" in Paris and "Lakme" in New York

Trans. — Dec. 31, 1907
Seven times, at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last evening for the profit of its pension fund, conductor, band and audience began an opera of Wagner, and yet not once did, or could, the curtain rise. Dr. Muck, who reappeared only a little paier for his illness, had arranged a curious programme, and the performance of it brought curious sensations. The overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," and "Tannhäuser," and the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal"—the beginnings, indeed, of every opera by Wagner to which he put more than an introduction—stood on the list. Not one of them was played in the mild-mannered fashion that sometimes seems to have emasculated Wagner in the journey from the theatre to the concert hall. Dr. Muck and his responsive men took them all operatically in the dramatic accent, fervor and contrast, the tonal pomp and incisiveness, the sweep and weight of climax, with which they clothed them. Theirs were declamatory voices proclaiming the drama that was to come. And yet the curtain never rose, though many a listener must have ached with eagerness for the whole opera when the overture had sounded as not once in many a season it sounds in the theatre. Conductor, men and audience were plainly "on edge." Seven times we began so well, and seven times we stopped so abruptly. It was a feast that never went beyond the most varied and stimulating hors d'œuvres. And with these beginnings we must be content as long as Boston remains operaless. Last spring the Symphony Orchestra gave a Wagner concert for the pension fund and every seat was sold. Last night it gave another, and there was not an empty place in Symphony Hall. All sorts and conditions of men and women made the audiences. Nearly every element in our musical and our social life was represented in them. At both concerts rapt attention relaxed at the end of each number into very hearty applause. If our public does these things for mere fragments of Wagner's operas in "concert form," for the mere beginnings of them, one after another, what would it not do, seemingly, for the whole of those operas in their only true place—the theatre? Yet one of the managers who might give us real opera again still doubts whether there is a public for it in Boston, while for the other the operatic field in America begins at the Battery and ends at the Harlem River.

Not that the opera either might give us would compare in the quality of the orchestra or in the abilities of the conductor with those that we heard in the three overtures, the four preludes and Siegfried's glorification from "Götterdämmerung." Neither the Metropolitan nor the Manhattan Opera House has such a band as our orchestra, especially when it is as alive as it was last night with the new elasticity, warmth and eloquence that the new conductor has given it. Dr. Muck's reputation in Germany, and indeed in all Europe, is that of an operatic conductor of the first rank. The corner stone of that reputation is his signal ability as a conductor of Wagner's operas. Often in his concert work in the past three months here he has given some of the unmistakable signs of an operatic conductor of discernment and power—in the march of his climaxes, in the justness and adroitness of his proportions, in the skill of his weaving of backgrounds against the main current of the orchestral song, and in the quick seizing of the dramatic elements in such music as was inherently dramatic. Last night he had need to be only an operatic conductor, and such a one as we have not heard here since Mottl's brief visit, and such a Wagnerian conductor as has not come to us since Seidl's time. (It was a foolish fancy, doubtless; but it was hard not to dream of a week of Wagner here with singers and scenery borrowed from the Metropolitan Opera House, the Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck.) Some of the nurslings of Baireuth that were hanging about London last summer used to say that Dr. Muck was all very well as a Wagnerian conductor, but that beside Herr Sosa and Dr. Such-a-One he lacked temperament. Temperament indeed—and of a conductor who gave the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," a pictorial and an emotional power such as few that listened could have dreamed dwelt in the music; who wrought the climax of the overture to "Tannhäuser" so that the return of the "Pilgrims' Chorus" was as the flooding of the hot and restless Venusberg with a great and clear white light; who made the path of the Grail, descending and ascending in the prelude to "Lohengrin," one long, shimmering undulation of ethereal tone; who, if he missed something of the insatiate longing of the prelude to "Tristan," yet charged the close with the accents of a fated and tragic woe that is too deep to cry; who made the prelude to "The Mastersingers" seem from beginning to end an outpouring of full-throated orchestral song; who gave the glorification from "Götterdämmerung" a mighty and majestic eloquence—the

The Symphony Orchestra's Concert for Trans. Itself Dec. 27, 06

Five or six times in a musical year the audiences of the Symphony concerts may pay their compliments to the men of the orchestra. A particular number is particularly well played, as was the scherzo of Beethoven's seventh symphony last Saturday, and the applause is very hearty. The conductor acknowledges it once or twice, and then, as Dr. Muck did last week, calls the men to their feet. Three or four weeks hence there may be another such incident, a third in February, and so onward. They make indeed the only opportunities in the course of the regular concerts in which the public that frequents them may prove its understanding and its appreciation of the share of the men in the excellence of the orchestra. When the reviewers of other cities make those flattering comparisons between our band and the bands of their town, they usually note the superior musicianly quality of the men of our orchestra. Trite as the phrase is, they can call ours nothing else than an orchestra of virtuosi. We in our turn take this distinction for granted. It is rather our way in Boston. "Why should it not be?" we ask complacently. It is this complacence that has hampered a little the two concerts that the men of the orchestra give each year for their pension fund. Their own dues are the foundation of it, while the concerts should add annually a substantial story to the superstructure. It is easy to say that forty-eight concerts in seven months by the Symphony Orchestra are enough. Why should its public come to hear it in two more, unless there is a very eminent conductor, singer or virtuoso or an unusual programme to give them especial interest?

There is no reason, perhaps, beyond the human and impelling one of familiarity, appreciation and liking for the men whom it hears and watches almost weekly and year upon year from October to May. After all, the Symphony Orchestra is no machine that goes of itself, so to say, Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall. The conductor aside, it is a body of ninety-odd men, each with his individual traits and excellence, and the sum of them is the quality and the virtue of the orchestra. Week after week the audiences at the Symphony concerts take their pleasure of this quality. Twice a year at the concerts for the pension fund they may directly reciprocate their delight in it. Even at these the men of the orchestra usually make no routine return. They brought Richard Strauss here to conduct at one of the concerts. Eminent singers and instrumentalists have come gladly to their aid. Or, as they did last spring and as they are doing again next Sunday night, they can give our opera-starved public fragments of Wagner's music. This time, however, it is a Wagner concert of a new sort. Rightly from one point of view, Dr. Muck will not tear fragments out of the body of the music-dramas, strip them of setting and action and play them "in concert form." He is willing to conduct in the overtures and the preludes and in purely orchestral fragments like the apotheosis of Siegfried in the last act of "Götterdämmerung." Out of these, in chronological order from "Rienzi" through "Parsifal," he and his men have made their programme—a different Wagner programme from any that has hitherto been played in Boston. As for the outside public to whom the men of the orchestra have no particular interest, the concert brings one of the few opportunities to hear Dr. Muck and in the music in which he has gained most distinction in German opera houses.

H. T. P.

3K, Conductor.

NCERT.

L 20, AT 8 P.M.

umme.

3, "Im Herbst." time.)

NCERTO. time.)

to "The Birds" of Aristophanes.

Mer."

dust:

POWELL.

Henry Warnke.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA REAP- PEARS IN CHICAGO

Trans. — Jan 31. 1907
It's First Concert There in Fifteen Years—

A Notable Audience, Reception and Reward—The Praise of the Reviewers for the Orchestra and for Dr. Muck—Expectations That Were Wholly Fulfilled—The Withdrawal of "Salome"—The Question of Performances Outside New York Still Undecided—An Impending Flood of Musical Plays

For the first time in fifteen years our Symphony Orchestra gave a concert, last evening, in Chicago. For weeks expectation has run high; Chicago is more keenly and widely interested in orchestral music than any other American city, and the present concert-going generation there has known the Boston orchestra only by reputation. Dr. Muck was as new to it and his coming as conductor raised anticipation higher. By all accounts this morning the conductor and the band fulfilled every expectation. The reviewers call the concert "memorable"; the audience was equally notable for its numbers, quality and eager interest, and its applause could hardly have been warmer. The programme comprised Beethoven's seventh symphony, Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"; Wagner's overture to his opera, "Rienzi," and Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto with Mr. Ganz playing the solo part. Below are extracts from the reviews of the concert that appear today in the Chicago Tribune, Record-Herald and Inter-Ocean.

In the Tribune, Mr. Hubbard writes: Chicago music lovers paid a splendid tribute to Boston's great orchestra last evening in the Auditorium. The concert room was filled to its last available space, not a seat in box, parquet, balcony, or galleries being vacant. And it was an audience notable for quality as well as numbers. All that is best in the city's musical, literary and professional circles was liberally represented, and the approval bestowed upon the famous orchestra and on Dr. Muck, its leader, was the approval of the most discriminating and most cultured music lovers Chicago possesses. There was cordiality in the air from the start. Everybody seemed glad to be present and the vast assemblage and the keyed-up expectancy which were inseparable from the hearing of the orchestra after full fifteen years of absence from the city gave the occasion a gala character, which held throughout the entire evening. As soon as the men began to appear on the stage they were greeted with a round of applause, and when they were seated and Dr. Muck came into view a welcome of most cordial kind was extended them and him. After every number there were recalls for the leader, and when, after Strauss's tone-poem, he had the entire orchestra rise, the huge wave of applause which swept up to it could but have told that every one present admired, approved, and was grateful not only for what then was offered but for that for which the Boston organization stands—the generous spirit which has made the founding of symphony orchestras in various cities throughout the United States possible. This Eastern organization is the eldest of existing symphony bodies in this country, and as such it commands a kindly admiration entirely apart from that which its exceptional abilities compel.

The performance was notable, first, for the wonderful tonal beauty that characterized it. Lovelier tone, both individual and in mass, has not been heard from any instrumentalists here in Chicago. The strings were a source of unending delight—strong, vibrant, vital, and yet glorified with a golden softness and richness that made them seem not the product of material substance. The woodwind choir, of which so much has been written in praise and of which consequently so much was expected, proved truly splendid, albeit not so startlingly superior as had been anticipated. We have a woodwind choir which we hear every week, the excellence of which safely stands comparison with that department of the Boston Orchestra. And to state this as explanation for failure to be astonished speaks no disparagement of the superb quality of the visitors' work. It is of the finest and to hear it was a joy. The brasses, too, are wonderfully sonorous, full and rich. The whole organization is one easily without superior in the world and with but extremely few equals. Tonally and technically it is virtually faultless. There is nothing it cannot do, and everything it does is certain to be beautiful, at least as far as tone itself is concerned.

And the musical side of the performance? That depends largely upon the leader, and in the person of Dr. Muck the audience made the acquaintance of a conductor and a musician who commands the sincerest respect and heartiest admiration. There is nothing of the "prima donna" or the "virtuoso" conductor about Dr. Muck. A man, young and active, slight of figure and medium as regards height; his smooth-shaven face, strong and characterful; his dark hair worn slightly tousled, but at only normal length, he comes quietly and simply forward, takes his place at the desk, bows his acknowledgment and begins. There is nothing of frill, of pose, or of self-consciousness about anything he does. A man evidently who knows his powers and respects them, but does not parade them. He directs with exceptional quietness. Theodore Thomas in his calmest moments made no less motion than does Dr. Muck a greater part of the time. His gestures are graceful and easy and invariably meaningful. He caresses and draws the tone from the orchestra, rather than punches and digests it out. All is unobtrusively and directly done. In certain places in the last two movements in the Beethoven Seventh Symphony he did no directing at all with his hands. He stood easily at rest and only an occasional motion of the head told that his eyes were following every movement in the orchestra and that his mind was keen and alert. In many men such a procedure would have smacked of affectation, but it did not in Dr. Muck. He suggested rather the pleasure felt in seeing a perfect mechanism working perfectly—as when an engineer, feeling his mighty machine responding to his slightest wish and finding a stretch of clear, straight track ahead of him, drops his hand from the throttle and sits back admiringly watching the faultless working of that which he has set in motion and which he controls.

In the Record-Herald Mr. Griswold continues: "Masterly," such in a word, was the verdict of musical Chicago at the close of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in the Auditorium last evening. The audience that had gathered to hear the famous Eastern organization included almost the entire musical community. It gave evidence of most cordial feeling and of keen expectancy that great things were about to happen as soon as the players had taken their places. The men were cordially greeted, and Dr. Muck, the conductor, was also heartily received. And the expectations were fulfilled, for, as the evening wore on, there were continued expressions of enthusiastic approval which reached a climax with the significant performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony. When the last note had been played there was the most grateful and thoroughly pleased body of auditors that has been seen in a local concert room for many a day. Playing that showed wonderful technical finish was combined with interpretative powers of the first order, and the result was just what a high-class orchestra should furnish, an indelible impression of the power and beauty of masterpieces played with musical understanding. The auditors went home with the themes of the symphony reëchoing through their minds, with vivid recollections of the entire programme, for the performance was one that could not be forgotten with the passing moment.

Dr. Muck personally is one that commands immediate attention. Quiet in manner, and sparing in his use of gestures, he was still in absolute command at every moment. He dominated the orchestra at all times, yet he never made any aggressive assertion of his control. He showed himself to be both intellectual and highly temperamental in his reading, a musician who is a natural leader. His power of control over his men as well as himself is extraordinary, and his hold is never relaxed, even though he stops beating the time, as he did in the symphony, and allows the men to go ahead by themselves. There is a magnetic quality about his quiet mastery that holds the interest of the auditor without distracting his attention from the music to the conductor's personality. Here is a man who would surely go ahead on his own lines wherever he might be and he has the ability to carry his auditors with him. He does not need to try to follow their inclinations. A look or a slight move of the hand is sufficient for his purpose. The men understand instantly what is wanted and the desired effect is produced. Boston is to be congratulated upon having secured the services of such a man.

Even a conductor of this type could do little if his instrument—the orchestra under his command—were defective. But, given a leader of Dr. Muck's excellence, with an admirably drilled organization of able musicians under his baton, and remarkable results are to be expected. These conditions were fulfilled last evening. The orchestra itself is about as fine a body of players as could be brought together and the men were on their mettle for this performance. They played with verve and enthusiasm and the tone was perfectly balanced as regards the relations of the various instruments. The pianissimos were especially beautiful. Dr. Muck reduced the tone several times to the finest possible point and these moments were exquisite in their charm.

All that has been said regarding the high qualities of the strings was abundantly verified. The violinists were all matured, able performers, with no youthful players in their ranks. The same observation might be extended to cover the entire orchestra, for a finer looking body of men is seldom seen on a concert platform. Being supplied with excellent instruments, and with years of hard drilling in routine work, these players work together with perfect unity, and the tone produced by them is of the finest quality. They are, however, allowed some freedom in bowing, this being a departure from the rule to which we have been accustomed. The volume of tone from the violins is surprising, the strings always being able to dominate. The seating of the men of course had something to do with this last evening, for all were back on the stage with the strings massed in front. In the forward part of the house, at least, the tone from the basses and cellos was several times almost obliterated, and the woodwinds could not always hold their own, but this was due to the position of the players and not to any shortcomings on their part. The delicacy of nuance and the finish of the phrasing were qualities that also won continual admiration, together with the precision and perfection of discipline.

In the Inter-Ocean Mr. Dunn concludes: America's most celebrated musical organization and one of Europe's foremost conductors appeared in the Auditorium last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, whom Emperor William has loaned to Mr. Higginson for the season, gave a concert which in point of popular interest was the most important apotheosis, at last, of a hero in the youth of the world; and who held the prelude to "Parsifal" poised between unspeakable anguish and ineffable beatitude.

Of such was Dr. Muck's conducting. He began by ennobling with sheer largeness of utterance the overture to "Rienzi"—all but that abominable jiggling tune which no man may lift out of its tawdry cheapness. His playing of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" was more than a recreation. It was a revelation. The sea music came surging out of the orchestra with tumultuous voice and breath. Before our ears and emotions the overture developed into a whole music-drama. The Hollander and Senta were alive and vivid in it—the torture of the one, the longing of the other, and the redemption that her self-devotion brought. The poetry of it matched the power. If the overture, under Dr. Muck's hand, is so transfigured, what must the whole opera—almost neglected early Wagner nowadays—be? After it, perhaps, a purely objective view of the overture to "Tannhäuser" that disclosed no more and no less than the music seems to contain, was bound to seem a little tame—until, until, that stream of luminous tone began to pour deeper and deeper, broader and broader through the climax. Many a time has the song of the Pilgrims stilled the orgy of the Venusberg. Last night it flooded it. The shimmering euphony of the strings of the orchestra in the prelude to "Lohengrin" is an old story. It was not one whit the less shimmering last night, but it had beside an exquisite and ethereal undulation of sound that is as light. Long ago, as it seems now, Dr. Muck revealed in Wagner's "Faust" overture his feeling for the impinging and incisive phrase. So, again, he made the prelude to "Tristan" throb and pierce. The transition from the foreboding beginning to the rising passion of the love music was no mere instrumental rhetoric. It was as desire wrenching itself free of fate. It clutched the listener. Mottl makes the passion of the lovers more burning and unappeasable, but he does not match Dr. Muck in the still, spent woe of the close. The prelude to "The Mastersingers" sang itself richly, sonorously, vitally. All its intricacies of counterpoint seemed as spontaneous improvisation—intertwining curves that leapt to the glowing instrumental colors that clothed them. Next, for the first time, Dr. Muck departed from his preludes. Resolute as he is against excerpts from the body of Wagner's music-dramas, he was willing to accept the glorification of Siegfried as a purely orchestral piece. Who, after all, heeds the bearing of Siegfried's body up the forest-path, the falling of the mists and their rising upon Gunther's hall, when he is watching "Götterdämmerung" in the theatre? The spectator may hardly see for the listening to Wagner's orchestral apotheosis of his slain hero. And Dr. Muck made it heroic. The tonal might and majesty were overwhelming, but there was more in his playing of it than this weight and magnificence of sound.

There was heroic eloquence, recalling Siegfried's deeds, heroic lament, sorrowing for his death; and heroic exaltation proclaiming his glorification:

"O kindischer Held!
O herrlicher Knabe!
Du hehrster Thaten thüriger Hört!"

Last of all came the prelude to "Parsifal," the calculated subtle prelude with its longing, its anguish and its ecstasy, its hint of knightly pomps and holy feasts, its voice of hope stilling the voice of pain. Conductors, as their temperament happens to go, have accented now the anguish and now the ecstasy. Dr. Muck poised both in a tremulous and piercing intensity.

Throughout Dr. Muck avoided the familiar pitfalls of Wagnerian conducting—the slow and affected tempi, the exaggerated contrasts, the forced "effects," the distorted phrase, the neglect of points of repose, the sound and fury that signifies nothing but the conductor's overstriving and anxiety. Throughout he kept himself and his men the voice of Wagner's music eloquent with the power of it, vital with the passion of it. And beneath this power and passion was full understanding. Long ago Wagner himself asserted the fundamental principle of all conducting—the finding, grasping, maintaining and imparting of the underlying song, the unifying melody (in the high and sublimated sense of the word) of the whole of a piece of music. So Dr. Muck seized these overtures and preludes, and so imparted them as organic and as songful wholes. Within each whole he shaped each phrase, adjusted each proportion, shaded each curve, sharpened or softened each accent. The sheer intellectual power and insight of his understanding of the music was masterly. The sheer adroitness of his shaping and adjusting of it was fascinating. He might have stopped there and given us a lifeless Wagner. As it was he ennobled the music with its appropriate eloquence; he animated it with its characteristic passion; he made it glow with the richest or the most transparent of tonal coloring. He not only found and kept the unifying song; but he made it throb and undulate with life. And his men, and soon his audience, took fire from him. Since Weingartner conducted here last January, there has been no such memorable concert in Boston. H. T. P.

WAGNER PROGRAM.

Symphony Concert in Aid of Pension Fund.

Large Audience Enjoys Excerpts

From the Music-Dramas.

Globe Dec. 31, 1907
Wagner was the only composer represented at last evening's concert in Symphony hall, for the benefit of the Symphony orchestra pension fund, the program comprising the following selections from his music-dramas: Overtures, "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" preludes, "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Meistersinger," the funeral march from "Götterdämmerung" and the "Parsifal" prelude. It was quite natural that Dr. Muck should decide on a strictly Wagnerian evening of music at this time, for his reputation as a great interpreter of the German master's works is well known, his abilities have already been proven at Symphony concerts this season and the orchestra is familiar with the music.

The audience filled the great hall last evening and it is gratifying to know that the pension fund will be largely increased by this liberality on the part of the public. Dr. Muck, who had been ill for the past week, conducted the concert, and throughout the evening the auditors gave demonstrative evidence that they appreciated his skill as a director and enjoyed the work of the orchestra and that the "one-name" program was highly satisfactory despite its severely serious character. The applause was spontaneous and liberally bestowed, especially after the "Tannhauser" number, when the members of the orchestra were obliged to rise and bow at the close of a magnificent performance of the popular overture.

Four of the selections have been played at this season's symphony concerts, "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman," "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," and the repetitions last evening call for no reiteration of praise now, except in a general way, for each number emphasized the fact that Dr. Muck's fame in the Wagnerian field is well deserved.

The delicacy of the "Lohengrin" music, the pomp and solemnity of the funeral march, and the quaintness of "Die Meistersinger" prelude, were each brought out vividly by Dr. Muck, who, while making no radical departures from accepted traditions, conducted with an air of authority that was very convincing as to the proper interpretation of the selections.

The "Parsifal" selection was given with great impressiveness, the "grail" motif being sung by the violins, and subsequently by the other instruments, with a cadence and beauty of tone that was prominent even in a performance of great merit throughout. The chant of the knights, a fine example of ensemble playing, and the lighter or "temptation" music, were other parts of the prelude calling for special commendation.

SUPERB CONCERT IN AID OF PENSION

FUND

Sound Dec. 31, 06
Symphony Orchestra Gives Entire Program From Wagner—Heard by Notably Enthusiastic Audience in Symphony Hall.

The first of this season's concerts in behalf of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was given in Symphony Hall last night, and music of Richard Wagner made up the entire program. The overtures of "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal," together with the funeral march from "Die Götterdämmerung," were played. A great audience was present; it and its notable enthusiasm were evidence enough, if any were needed, that the Master of Bayreuth is still potent in these regions and that his music, when interpreted and played as it should be, is more highly affecting and emotional than that of any other composer.

It is taxing the versatility of any man to make a complete concert of his works, but Wagner measures up to the test as well as any, save, perhaps, Beethoven. And last evening the variety was great, embracing as it did, the early "trash," "Rienzi," the last semi-sacred "Parsifal," and all of the operas between, save three. It showed, if anyone cared to think of such things in the face of the enormous effect of the selections themselves, the absolute change in Wagner's inspiration and style, the development of a man of prodigious brass band effects, into a genius at orchestral coloring, whose equal the world had never seen.

The fact that this was a benefit concert makes any set review out of place. Yet it must in justice be said that no such gloriously-sustained interpretation of Wagner's music has ever been heard here before. Dr. Muck was in heroic mood and the men played as if their very lives depended upon it. The result was a riot of splendor and colossal effects—more marked, perhaps, than any especially exquisite beauty. "The Flying Dutchman" piece excelled for its weird tonal suggestiveness; the "Tannhauser" overture for its impassioned fervor; the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel for its jubilant and magnificent spirit and the "Götterdämmerung" death march for the overwhelming majesty of its elegiac power. The "Tristan" overture alone seemed less effective, more monotonously restrained than in other performances.

ORCHESTRA PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Wagnerian Programme of the Symphony Given Before a Large Audience.

Herald Dec. 31, 06

The first concert this season in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was a Wagnerian one: Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser," preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal" and the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods." Dr. Muck conducted.

It is a pleasure to know that the receipts of previous concerts and the contributions of members of the orchestra have increased the benefit fund to such an extent that there will soon be enough for four pensions in case they are needed—absit omen! The interest taken by the public in these concerts is naturally most gratifying to the members of the orchestra. This interest is in turn natural. The orchestra is an institution of which Paris, Berlin or London might well be proud. The concerts given here are the chief features of musical life. They are to Boston what the operatic performances are to New York, and there are Bostonians who would have it thus, preferring chaste enjoyment and moderate vibrations to the worship of personalities and feverish excitement, preferring symphonic lilies and languors to operatic roses and raptures. Inasmuch as the orchestra affords the keenest local musical pleasure and spreads the fame of Boston throughout the land, it is only reasonable and meet that the players should realize in a substantial form the appreciation of the public.

It is a custom—and an excellent one—to abstain from criticism of a concert or other entertainment given for a charitable purpose. Yet a few notes on the programme may not be impertinent. As Dr. Muck is famous in Europe as a conductor of Wagner's operas it was a happy thought to give the general public the opportunity of becoming acquainted with his interpretations. The programme was arranged so that Wagner's changing views concerning the character and function of an overture were clearly observed. Starting with the overture to "Rienzi," a potpourri overture, he did not compose a prelude as a purely tone-and-mood picture until he wrote the one to "Lohengrin." In the prelude to the "Mastersingers" he returned in a way to the potpourri form, but what a contrast between this master work and the blatant "Rienzi," which is distinguished by its debased Meyerbeerism! Even in the prelude to "Parsifal," which is not so much a work as the prelude to "Lohengrin" in the absolute perfection of expression there is a looking-back toward the potpourri form.

And how Time disposes quietly of all these matters. When Theodore Thomas first played the prelude to "Lohengrin" at his summer concerts in New York hisses were often heard. This simple music was then considered incomprehensible and dangerous. When Thomas produced the overture to "The Mastersingers" in Boston 35 years ago Mr. John S. Dwight wrote: "Save us from more acquaintance with the introduction to the 'Meistersinger'! It is hard, harsh, forced and noisy, ever on the verge of discord (having the ungenial effect of discord, however literally within the rules of counterpoint). . . . This could never have won the prize before any guild, whether of 'old fogey' Philistines or fresh young hearts." Mr. Dwight wrote honestly, and he undoubtedly voiced the opinion of the great majority in Boston at the time. The singular feature of it all is this: that some who now wonder at the dulness of ears in 1871 are not receptive when listening to ultra-modern music of today. They have ears and they do not hear.

At all events, a Wagnerian programme nowadays attracts a large audience—an audience of saner enthusiasts than was the case when this music required championship—and the fact has been demonstrated more than once at a pension fund concert. Last evening the hall was filled and many stood. The performance was an unbroken record of brilliance and color, and enthusiasm was as spontaneous at the end as at the beginning of the long programme. The climax of applause came after the overture to "Tannhauser," when Dr. Muck had the orchestra rise to respond with him.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT—A WAGNER PROGRAMME.

The concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the orchestra was interesting from the fact that it was almost entirely made up of Wagner overtures and preludes. The overtures to "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser," and the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal," gave a complete history of Wagner's development of these two forms. "Rienzi" gave a startling illustration of the bombastic, foot-light flavor of the earliest period. The "Flying Dutchman" and the "Tannhauser" overtures showed the master at the zenith of his composition in this form. The "Lohengrin" prelude showed the inception of the "Vorspiel" which, because of the composer's theory of musical continuity, was to replace the overture. "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg" showed the zenith of this later form, and "Parsifal" displayed the power of construction and the fertility of invention waning a trifle as old age came on. The only other work of the programme was the Siegfried funeral music.

Dr. Muck conquered his illness sufficiently to conduct the long programme wonderfully, although his fondness for slow tempo was often in evidence. The applause was constant although the enthusiasm reached its height after the "Tannhauser" overture, at which the entire orchestra was compelled to rise and bow with the conductor.

172

The concert was entirely orchestral, yet the audience was the largest yet gathered at a Pension Fund concert.

Such a beneficent concert is not for review, since all the participants are donating their services and all animadversion is excluded, under which circumstances laudation ceases to have its full value. Nevertheless, everybody knows how well our orchestra plays Wagner. Not even New York, in its great operatic performances, has such perfect orchestral interpretations as we enjoy in this little town at the end of the mismanaged branch line of the New York Central railroad.

It is pleasant to see a large audience at each of these Pension Fund concerts. There is a great necessity for such a fund, for our excellent artists being out of the musical labor union (the American Federation of Musicians) are in a severe musical pariah, and might find difficulty in obtaining employment elsewhere, while under the ban of that powerful organization.

Few persons know how much this means. It means, for example, that there is great difficulty in adequately performing Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," since certain extra artists are necessary and the Federation forbids any of its members from playing with any of our men. This does not apply only to the Symphony concerts, but anywhere else, as this letter may show:

Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1906.

Mr. Owen Miller,
Sec'y A. F. of M.,
St. Louis, Mo.

Dear Sir and Brother:

By action of the Directors of Local No. 9, A. F. of M., held on Tuesday, October 30th, Messrs. C. M. Hollander and C. A. Salter were suspended for nonpayment of fines assessed for taking part in an engagement during the past summer with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in violation of our laws. Mr. Hollander's fine was $100.00, Mr. Salter's total fine was $120, $20.00 for the second offense, $100 for the offense proper, this in addition to an old fine of $10.00 standing against him, makes his total fine $130.

By same mail I am sending a notice to Messrs. Weber, Sanger and Ostendorf.

Fraternally yours,

T. C. Keleher, Secretary.

Under such circumstances it is especially necessary for Boston to help its band of musical outlaws, after their long service in its behalf. Dec 31 1906 Louis C. Elson.

MUSIC NOTE.

Letters from Mr. Gericke show that after a pleasant sojourn in Switzerland, and a visit to his home in Styria, he is now settled in Vienna.

WAGNER GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Post Dec 31. 06
By Olin Downs

Symphony Hall was crowded with an enthusiastic audience at the first of the Pension Fund concerts, last night. Dr. Carl Muck's announcement of a programme, consisting of all the Wagner overtures and preludes in chronological order, and the funeral march from "Du Gotterdammerung," excited unusual interest. The audience seemed to appreciate the fact that the programme for once consisted of only the orchestral portions of Wagner's works instead of various scenes sung in a language which but a part of the audience understands.

It is the fashion to sneer at the Rlenzt overture, and point it out as the remarkably weak and immature efforts of the master, who was to astonish the world. But Dr. Muck made this a surpassingly brilliant performance, which was the first of a series of triumphs which followed one after another.

"The Flying Dutchman" overture had the appropriate storm and stress, and the "Tannhauser" aroused such enthusiasm that the conductor was obliged to bow his thanks three times, the audience remaining unsatisfied until he had his men arise and acknowledge the applause.

As to the "Tristan" overture, few have the artistic restraint that enabled Dr. Muck, starting from the first longing sigh of the cello, to build up that vehement, long-sustained crescendo, which mounted to a climax of unutterable passion, and then subsided in throbs of exhausted emotion.

Like a burst of sunlight came the first measures of the Meistersinger prelude. Many may object to the tempo taken, which was slower than is usual. But if one plays Mendelssohn's Wedding March in the originally intended tempo one will have difficulty in finding a couple lively enough to tread the measure, it is argued. This introduction was intended as an apotheosis of the drama, and if the Meistersingers could not march to it, the dignity of spirit was there, when necessary, and a glorious enthusiasm swept everything before it.

The Funeral March was epic in its breadth and solemnity, and the "Parsifal" prelude, with its atmosphere of deeply religious contemplation, closed the concert.

musical event of the year. The splendid theatre was filled with an audience that represented the most critical and conservative musical circles of the city. The public that supports our own orchestra so loyally was present in full force. Enthusiasts from neighboring cities, every important resident professional musician, and more than the usual proportion of students swelled the throng and lent it that quick sympathy and interest that are so vital an element in the success of any musical entertainment. That the audience came prepared to extend a cordial welcome to their distinguished guests was shown by the hearty applause that greeted the members of the orchestra as they filed to their places a few minutes after the time appointed for the beginning of the concert. They are a fine looking body of men, almost all in the prime of life. Here and there a youthful face looked out from the rear ranks and there were a few gray heads. Ninety-eight strong, they stumbled on the great stage of the Auditorium and memory harked back with a pang to the years when our orchestra gathered there to answer to a baton that beats no more.

Then came the leader. The audience caught a fleeting impression of a slight, graceful figure and a keen, cynical face as he quickly bowed his thanks while the hall rang again with the applause. Then he turned to the orchestra and the concert began. Dr. Muck conducts without any mannerisms, without an unnecessary gesture. There is no attempt to interpret the music after the elaborate Delsarte system that a predecessor, Nikisch, had developed to such an irritating degree. Dr. Muck has other means of expression at his command. They are as manifold as music itself, yet it is possible to sum them up in two sentences: First, a wonderfully subtle scheme of dynamic proportions; second, a rare appreciation of rhythmic values. One need not be told that Dr. Muck is a representative exponent of Wagner and his connection with Balreuth is not needed to emphasize that fact. His treatment of the orchestra in the matter of dynamics suffices to proclaim him a faithful disciple of the father of the modern orchestra, for if ever a conductor worked with definite dynamic standards it is Dr. Muck. He has an absolute and unmistakable piano, a volume of tone in forte that is equally definite, and between these poles the performance moves, passing beyond them to fortissimo or pianissimo, until only to study its beautifully symmetrical proportions becomes a source of keenest pleasure. When, however, one sees the artistic intention these sensuously delightful proportions are so clearly proclaiming, there comes admiration for the interpretative genius back of this technical perfection. Dr. Muck is an "absolutist" in music. He is the perfectly transparent medium through which the thought of the composer finds rarely complete revelation.

There can be no question of the excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is as near perfection as orchestras ever attain. All sections are models of efficiency. The strings possess a unity and a fulness of tone that are remarkable. The woodwinds contain some artists at the first desks that any master of orchestration would find a joy, and the brasses are sonorous without hint of harshness. But those who seek to draw instructive comparisons between the Bostonians and our own orchestra are likely to miss the mark. In the first place the acoustics of the Auditorium and of Orchestra Hall make a comparison impossible. Then familiarity with our own organization makes us better informed as to any shortcomings it may possess, while one hearing could hardly acquaint us with the faults of our distinguished visitors. Both organizations are to be ranked with the world's best, which is sufficient honor for all.

NUERT

RY 26, AT 8, P. M.

mme.

AL FANTASY, "The Mystic

in Boston.)

om " Rè Pastore."

Tr ta," "Ah fors' è lui."

rold in Italy."

i :

IBABA.

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF,
PIANIST.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| GOLDMARK. | OVERTURE to "Sakuntala," op. 13. |
| R. VOLKMANN. | CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA, op. 33. |
| SIBELIUS. | SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 1.
I. Andante ma non troppo : Allegro energico
II. Andante ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia.)
Andante : Allegro molto.
(First time in Boston.) |

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH WARNKE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF,
PIANIST.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| GOLDMARK. | OVERTURE to "Sakuntala," op. 13. |
| R. VOLKMANN. | CONCERTO in A minor for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA, op. 33. |
| SIBELIUS. | SYMPHONY in E minor, No. 1.
I. Andante ma non troppo: Allegro energico
II. Andante ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantasia.)
Andante: Allegro molto.
(First time in Boston.) |

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH WARNEKE.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

adv! Jan 7, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark. "Sakuntala" Overture.
Volkmann. Violoncello Concerto, in A minor.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Sibelius. Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

The Sakuntala Overture wears well. We have had it many times at the symphony concerts but familiarity in this case only breeds increased pleasure. Its orchestration is masterly, its melodies beautiful and well worked up. When Goldmark is viewed in the perspective of Time, it is possible that posterity will grade him higher than his own contemporaries have done, for the world at present does not admit him to the ranks of absolutely great tonal masters.

Dr. Muck's reading was a fine one. He drew out the slow passages in his accustomed manner. If one were to time his overture readings it would be found that in almost every case his deliberation adds two or three minutes to the accustomed length of a long movement. But he makes his contrasts very effectively and his climaxes are always effective. The final working up of the principal themes in this overture (representing the two lovers) was superb and there was much enthusiasm manifested. Therefore even the mannerism alluded to is not often to be considered a defect. The end justifies the means.

Volkmann's violoncello concerto is genteel, and Mr. Warnke's performance of it was politeness itself. We admire Volkmann's two symphonies and his "Richard III." overture (in spite of his introducing a Scottish song on an English battle-field and a century before the tune was composed!) but this concerto, for all that it contains some pretty tunes and an enormous amount of technique, is too prolix and too conventional for even the modern conservative. There is very much recitative in the composition, but none of that inspired kind which one finds in the first movement of Bruch's G minor violin concerto. There was frequent dialogue between the solo instrument and one or the other of its orchestral fellows, but it scarcely ever rose above a gossiping level. Sentimental melodies were often revealed, but, while we do not hold with the modern attempts at the abolition of melody, we cannot believe that mere tune constitutes music.

The final cadenza was fearfully long-winded, although it contained almost every kind of violoncello technique. There were harmonics, which Mr. Warnke played with praiseworthy surety; there was pizzicato work; there were many runs and difficult skips; and there was an enormous amount of double-stopping, which Mr. Warnke gave with commendable purity of intonation. In short the technical display was of a very high order, but one does not always crave such instrumental polish. The hungry man in the desert of pearls devoutly wished that they been nuts instead.

Mr. Warnke has not a very large tone, but it is always pure and often sympathetic. His masterly technique certainly deserved the three recalls which were given to him at the end of the concerto.

After this the programme came to its Finnish with the first symphony of Sibelius. The sceptre of orchestral supremacy (when Richard Strauss has ended) will probably depart northward. Russians, Norwegians and Finns seem to have something to say, while Germans and Frenchmen are spending their lives in the search of unusual modulations and new dissonances. At the very beginning of this work there was a clarinette passage (beautifully played) that had something of the loneliness that is found upon the same instrument in Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. There was much gloom in the entire work, but the chief theme in this opening Allegro was remarkably powerful and masculine. The muted horns gave their portentous note of evil and there was mystery and brooding in almost every theme. There were also some very vivid contrasts, a la Mahler, but the thematic material was much more inspired than that of the German. There was a grand climax, legitimately derived from the figures that had preceded, and a sudden pizzicato brought the noble movement to an end. Dr. Muck deserves hearty praise for the clearness with which he presented this allegro.

The Andante was less coherent than the preceding movement. There was some interesting canonic work on the wood wind and an excess of sequence work in all the instruments. There was a tiresome degree of lamenting, even in the major keys.

The Scherzo, however, was once more in the domain of hearty virility, and its unrestrained vigor was eminently suggestive of the sturdy North. It combined the brusquerie of the Halling with the strong rhythm of the Spring-Tanz. There was a charming contrast in the Trio, with its horn phrases, while the return of the Scherzo was emphasized even by the kettle-drums which struck the rhythmic figure with splendid effect. Even this humble member of the orchestra had its obligato and the kettle-drummer must receive a word of recognition for his incisive performance.

The Finale had many points of derivation from preceding movements. Beethoven began this transference of themes from movement to movement in his ninth symphony, but Brahms went far beyond him in this kind of continuity and it has become almost a regular factor in modern symphonic construction.

There was decided unrest in this movement and finally a rush as of a mountain torrent. There were many touches of the wind instrumentation in the depth of the instruments in the vein of Tschalkowsky, the bass-drum added its thumps to the marking of the rhythm and the work ran with frenzied power through the most fortissimo phrases to a very soft pizzicato, where it unexpectedly stopped short. We recognized a sure hand in the construction of this movement, although one may not be able to grasp the full meaning of its contents at a first hearing. We consider the first and third movements the best of the symphony. We cannot pay too much tribute to Dr. Muck's careful and conscientious interpretation. In lesser hands the work would scarcely have made any effect. Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

New York Doesn't Like an All Beethoven Programme.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]
NEW YORK, Jan. 10, 1907. Dr. Carl Muck delighted the ultra conservatives and bored a good many of the radicals in tonight's Carnegie Hall audience by presenting an all-Beethoven programme at the Boston orchestra's third evening concert. While it is true that opportunities are rare to hear such Beethoven playing as the Berlin conductor evoked from his virtuoso orchestra tonight, still it seemed to many that this organization's visits to New York are too few to permit the making of programmes confined to a single school of composition, and there was some grumbling in the "waits" as the consequence.

Three numbers made up the evening's list. These were the "Egmont" overture, the D major violin concerto, in which Prof. Willy Hess, the orchestra's concert-meister, appeared as the soloist, and the seventh symphony in A major, Op. 72. The impress of Dr. Muck's personality upon the orchestra has resulted in a tendency toward bigger and more virile tone by all the instruments, and this has been accomplished without loss of that fine balance and high finish which have long been the most prized characteristics of the Boston organization. Prof. Hess gave the concerto a performance thoroughly commendable from an academic point of view, smooth in tone, especially polished in the slower passages. But this concerto has been given more interestingly before to New York audiences. The violinist was applauded heartily.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN CARNEGIE HALL

N.Y. Herald Jan. 11, 1907
Beethoven Programme Presented by Dr. Karl Muck Delights Ultra-Conservatives, but Bore Radicals.

Dr. Karl Muck delighted the ultra-conservatives and bored a good many of the radicals in last night's Carnegie Hall audience by presenting an all Beethoven programme at the Boston Orchestra's third evening concert.

While it is true that opportunities are rare to hear such Beethoven playing as the Berlin conductor evoked from his virtuoso orchestra last night, still it seemed to many that this organization's visits to New York are too few to permit the making of programmes confined to a single school of composition, and there was some grumbling in the "waits" as a consequence.

Three numbers made up the evening's list. These were the "Egmont" overture, the D major violin concerto, in which Professor Willy Hess, the orchestra's concert-meister, appeared as the soloist, and the Seventh Symphony in A major, opus 72. The impress of Dr. Muck's personality upon the orchestra has resulted in a tendency toward bigger and more virile tone by all the instruments, and this has been accomplished without a loss of that fine balance and high finish which have long been the most prized characteristics of the Boston organization.

The "Egmont" overture exemplified all this admirably last night. So, too, did the symphony. More satisfying interpretations of these familiar scores are difficult to recall. The new conductor's poise, his alert eye, and his quiet but explicit baton obtained just the results he aimed at—nothing less, nor a shade more. The strings distinguished themselves.

Professor Hess gave the concerto a performance thoroughly commendable from an academic point of view, smooth in tone, especially polished in the slower passages. But this concerto has been given more interestingly before to New York audiences. The violinist was applauded heartily.

Symphony Concert of Modern Music.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, Jan. 12, 1907. In striking contrast to the severity of Thursday's all-Beethoven programme, Dr. Karl Muck presented an interesting list of modern compositions in Carnegie Hall today at the Boston orchestra's third matinee concert. Both the programme matter and the stirring manner of its performance went to make an afternoon of rare musical enjoyment, and won the hearty applause of a large audience. Sir Edward Elgar's overture, "In the South," opened the proceedings; a symphonic poem by George W. Chadwick, called "Cleopatra," was played for the first time here; George Schumann's capital "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme" was heard again, and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" closed the programme.

Mr. Chadwick's symphonic poem proved to have considerable value as a piece of romantic "programme" music, and it was well received. Aiming evidently to describe incidents and persons in the life of Cleopatra, there were tone suggestions of oriental splendor, Roman pageantry, a love scene and a final dolorous episode apparently designed to suggest the unhappy queen's end.

In this composition an instrument of Russian origin called the celeste was used with agreeable effect. The orchestra played admirably throughout, and Dr. Muck's interpretations of the more familiar numbers were well proportioned and forceful.

A FINNISH COMPOSER

JEAN SIBELIUS AND THE MUSIC THAT HE WRITES

His Symphony That Dr. Muck Is to Play for the First Time Next Week—Sibelius's Career and the Traits and the Range of His Music—How It Reflects Finland and the Finnish Spirit—Its Progress Elsewhere

Though Mr. Gericke put Sibelius's second symphony, in D major, on one of his programmes two years ago, the Finlander will still be an almost unknown composer hereabouts when Dr. Muck plays his first symphony (in E minor) at the next pair of Symphony concerts. For ten years past, however, his music has steadily made its way westward from Finland and Russia. His symphonies, his tone-poems—"Finlandia," "A Saga," and "The Swan of Tuonela"—and his orchestral suites have now an established place in concerts in Germany. Thanks to Mr. Wood's eagerness for new music and for the music of eastern Europe, London has heard some of them and next spring Sibelius himself is to be one of the visiting composer-conductors at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society there. In America, Mr. Thomas, in Chicago, was the first to discover him, and the Russian Symphony Orchestra next played some of his shorter pieces in New York. Mr. Gericke gave him a place in the programmes of our orchestra and early this month at a Philharmonic concert in New York Miss Maud Powell played his concerto for violin. Meanwhile Sibelius has reached the dignity and the interest of a little monograph in English that Breitkop and Härtel published a few weeks ago—"Jean Sibelius: A Finnish Composer," by Rosa Newmarch, the accomplished writer upon Tchaikovsky and other Russian composers. At the beginning is a curiously striking drawing of Sibelius's head with the eyes of a dreamer, the mouth of a man of sensuous feeling and the nose and the chin of a man of vigorous action—a whole face indeed in which sensitiveness and resolution seem to dwell not in struggle, but composedly side by side. Mrs. Newmarch then surveys briefly the racial traits of the Finns and the physical traits of their country and traverses the slow development of literature and the arts among them.

"In the case of Sibelius," she writes, "it is essential to realize that he is the product of two civilizations: the one elemental, remote, the very memory of which was only revived after centuries of oblivion; the other, the most recent independent culture in Europe; the almost miraculous burgeoning of a stem so accounted sapless and dead. Its earliest origin the folk-music of the Finns seems to have been penetrated with melancholy. 'The Kanteletar'—a collection of lyrics which followed the national epic of 'The Kalevala'—contains one which gives the key-note of the national music. It is not true, says the anonymous singer of this poem, that Valinomöinen made the Kantele out of the jaw of a gigantic pike:

The Kantele of care is carved,
Formed of saddening sorrows only;
Of hard times its arch is fashioned
And its wood of evil chances.
All the strings of sorrows twisted,
All the screws of adverse fortunes;
Therefore Kantele can never
Ring with gay and giddy music,
Hence this harp lacks happy ditties,
Cannot sound in cheerful measures,
As it is of care constructed,
Formed of saddening sorrows only.

"These lines, while they indicate the prevailing mood of the future music of Finland, express also the difference between the Finnish and Russian temperaments. The Finn is more sober in sentiment, less easily moved to extremes of despair or of boisterous glee than his neighbor. The causes of this innate gravity and restrained melancholy of the Finnish temperament are not far to seek. Influences climatic and historical have moulded this hyperborean people into what we now find them. Theirs is the most northern of all civilized countries, and every yard of cultivated soil represents a strenuous conflict with natural conditions. Situated between Sweden and Russia, Finland was for centuries the scene of obstinate struggles between these rival nationalities. Years of hard schooling have thus made the Finns a serious-minded, self-reliant race; not to be compared with the Russians for receptivity or exuberance of temperament, but more laborious, steadier of purpose and possessed of a latent energy which once aroused, is not easily diverted or checked. . . . That the Finns still live as close to Nature as their ancestors, is evident from their literature, which reflects innumerable pictures from this land of granite rocks and many-tinted moorlands; of long sweeps of melancholy fens and ranges of hills clothed with dark pine-forests; the whole enclosed in a silver network of flashing waters—the gleam and shimmer of more than a thousand lakes. The solitude and silence, the familiar landscape, the love of home and country—we find all this in the music of Sibelius."

With this introduction Mrs. Newmarch passes to Sibelius himself. "Jean Sibelius," she writes, whose name—like those of the hand-maidens in 'The Blessed Damozel'—makes in itself a symphony, was born in 1865. He soon abandoned the law for music, studied under Wegelius at the Helsinki Institute and afterwards visited Berlin and Vienna, in which cities he worked under Becker and Goldmark. Thanks to a Government grant, Sibelius has been able, for some years past, to devote himself to creative work, consequently his output is considerable for a man who has barely reached the prime of life. His works include one choral and two orchestral symphonies; four symphonic poems; two orchestral suites; incidental music to Järnefelt's drama, 'Kuolema,' and Adolf Paul's play, 'King Christian II.' one or two ballads for voice and orchestra and a violin concerto. Among chamber music are a few early efforts, and a pianoforte sonata recently published as Op. 12, besides a number of pianoforte pieces and songs. His opus number has reached 48, and I gather from his own information that several important works still remain in manuscript.

"Sibelius's strong individuality made itself felt at the outset of his career. It was, of course, a source of perplexity to the academic mind. Were the eccentricity and uncouthness of some of his early compositions the outcome of ignorance, or of a deliberate effort to be original at any price? It was, as usual, the public, not the specialists, who found the just verdict. Sibelius's irregularities were, in part, the struggles of a very robust and individual mind to express itself in its own way; but much that seemed weird and wild in his first works was actually the echo of the national spirit and therefore better understood by the public than by the connoisseurs. Genius commonly develops in two ways: either it starts by a comparatively conventional or even imitative phase, and, waxing bolder as it grows, ends by sweeping before it every impediment to liberty of conscience and freedom of utterance, as in the case of Wagner and Strauss. Or it may begin by fierce protest and by throwing to the four winds all the pacta conventa of its art, and eventually settle down in dignity and contentment within its own self-adopted limits of expression. In this category we may place Sibelius. With the advance of years, he has shown an increasing respect for the requirements of conventional form, without, however, becoming conventional in the contemptible sense of the word. The sign of this reaction has been the revision of many of his early works.

"From his novitiate, Sibelius's melody has been stamped with a character of its own. This is due in a measure to the fact that it derives from the folk-music and the rune—the rhythm in which the traditional poetry of the Finns is sung. The inviolable metrical law of the rune makes no distinction between epos and melos. In some of Sibelius's earlier works, where the national tendency is more crudely apparent, the invariable and primitive character of the rune-rhythm is not without influence upon his melody, lending it a certain monotony which is far from being devoid of charm. 'The epic and lyric runes,' says Compagetti, 'are sung to a musical phrase which is the same for every line; only the key is varied every second line, or, in the epic runes, at every repetition of the line by the second voice. The phrase is sweet, simple without emphasis, with as many notes as there are syllables.' Sibelius's melody, at its maturity, is by no means of the short-winded and broken kind, but rather a sustained and continuous cantilena which lends itself to every variety of emotional curve and finds its ideal expression through the medium of the English horn. His harmony—a law unto itself—is sometimes of pungent dissonance, and sometimes has a mysterious, penetrating sweetness, like the harmony of the natural world.

In the quaint words of the Finnish critic Flodin: "It goes its own way, which is surely the way of God, if we acknowledge that all good things come from him."

"It seems impossible to hear any one of Sibelius's characteristic works without being convinced that it voices the spirit of an unfamiliar race. His music contains all the essential qualities to which I have referred as forming part and parcel of the Finnish temperament. And yet, I have heard even musicians contend that Sibelius was quite German in style and sentiment and that they listened in vain for the racial note. This is not surprising, for I have also heard Tchaikovsky dismissed as utterly cosmopolitan, and Borodin—of all the racy singers on earth—described as far too French to be Russian! The fact is that in hearing a new work we are often more concerned with what is reminiscent than with what is being said for the first time. The criticism overheard on leaving a concert-room is almost invariably comparative. Yet we must indeed be dull of hearing if we fail to observe in the music of Sibelius an undercurrent of something absolutely novel, and therefore disconcerting: the ground-swell, as it were, of that strong and troubled tide of Finnish sentiment with which so few of us are as yet in touch."

Mrs. Newmarch then describes briefly each of Sibelius's larger compositions and of the symphony that Dr. Muck is to play next week she writes in particular:

"The conciseness and in most cases the brevity of Sibelius's symphonic poems are alike remarkable, and prove that in his case the freer form has not been adopted as an excuse for unbridled loquacity, or incoherent rhapsodizing. Had he only composed such orchestral works as 'The Swan Tuonela,' 'Finlandia' and even 'A Saga' much as we should admire their poetic conception, rhythmic vigor and novelty of instrumentation, there would be some justification in questioning whether Sibelius possessed the large structural style and sustained eloquence which alone could entitle him to a place in the front rank of symphonists.

"The two published symphonies furnish a satisfactory answer not merely to this question, but to one of far wider significance—namely—is the symphony really an obsolute? The narrowest type of programmatist will reply that it is not only obsolete, but dead and buried under an ever-increasing tumult of modern symphonic poems. Armed with the Sibelius scores, which palpitate with vital energy, we can effectively retort to such an argument: "Les gens que vous tuez se portent assez bien." If these symphonies prove anything, it is that the vision of Ezekiel in the Valley can be perpetually reenacted in the world; that the forms which appear to each succeeding generation as the dry bones of academical tradition can be rearticulated and live again, in beauty and flexibility, if only the breath of genius passes through them. The symphonies of Sibelius are at least as conventional as those of Tchaikovsky and Dvorák. They bear no indication of any literary basis; they are not fettered to the expression of any particular sentiment, heroic, pathetic, pastoral, or even domestic; but they appeal to us and thrill us by the sheer originality, beauty and vigor of the musical idea.

"The first symphony in E minor was composed in 1899. The plan of the work is spacious, Sibelius has something to say and takes his time—a liberal forty minutes—in saying it; its structure is solid, but not heavy, while it contains—especially in the finale—an extraordinary wealth of thematic material. From the melancholy, half-pastoral theme given out by the clarinet in the opening bars, to the brief impressive coda with which the work closes, we are conscious of a sweeping tide of virile power; a sustained flight of inspiration that neither flags, nor takes refuge in padding, nor drops into emotional incoherence. My first impression of the work was the essentially 'plein air' quality of the music. Sibelius's oneness with nature, and that kind of poetical pantheism which is the inheritance of his race, are evident in every page of this symphony. His orchestral combinations, more especially his use of the woodwind, seem at times direct echoes from the natural world, to the beauty and mystery of which he is peculiarly sensitive. Frequently this music evoked to my vision the color, atmosphere and melancholy grandeur of some masterpiece of Ruysdael. But I must not leave the impression that the symphony is mere landscape painting, such as we find occasionally in the tone-pictures of Smetana or Rimsky-Korsakoff. The vigorous Allegro energico of the first movement would alone contradict this idea; we feel sure that side by side with these reflections from the natural world the entire symphony has some very human and dramatic tale to tell—one of those unrevealed programmes of which we are ever seeking the impalpable solution.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 11th program of the Symphony orchestra opened with the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala," the first cellist, Mr. Warnke, played the solo part in Volkmann's A minor concerto and the E minor symphony by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, was played here for the first time. The Goldmark overture is a charming work, which pictures in glowing colors the alleged adventures of Sakuntala and her kingly lover, who are separated for a while by a vile priest; the plot introducing the loss of a royal ring, the temporary lapse of memory of the king, the repudiation of his wife, the return of the ring and recovery of reason and happiness almost at the same time. These episodes were daintily set forth by the orchestra, the performance being in a sympathetic vein and thoroughly enjoyable.

In the Volkmann concerto, Mr. Warnke's fingering throughout was about as perfect in tone production as if he had been playing upon a keyed instrument, his work in the higher register having the sweet qualities of the violin and the broader bowing of the heavier strings being free from the rasping accompaniment often heard in less accomplished artists. The chords, double stoppings and harmonics were beautifully executed and none of the great difficulties of the concerto appeared to be an obstacle to the performer not easily compassed. The cadenza was a brilliant exhibition of technique that was almost impeccable. The appreciation of his interpretation was marked and he was recalled several times to the platform.

The Sibelius symphony sounds a mournful note at the beginning and excepting in the quaint and bizarre third movement this somber suggestion is reiterated throughout the whole composition. Much of the orchestration is fantastic, the strenuous moments are oft-occurring and there are tempestuous spots in the first and final movements that are rivals of Wagner's fortissimos at their loudest.

The themes seemingly are continually at war with each other, crescendos abound, and the few gentler motifs, some of them very sweet and all of them very brief, come as a relief to the musical turmoil.

The somewhat piquant third movement has a theme for woodwinds that was exquisitely played by this contingent and in the hurly-burly of the second and last movements the brasses gave out their declamations with a resonant harmony that showed good ensemble work. Aside from these points there is nothing but praise of a general nature for the other parts of the orchestra, as the men were not called upon to do more than play according to the direction of Mr. Muck, carefully and one might say violently most of the time.

This week the orchestra will make its third trip to other cities. The program Jan 18 and 19 will have Katherine Goodson as soloist in Grieg's piano concerto. The other selections will be the overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn and Schubert's C major symphony. W. J. B. O.

SYMPHONY PLAYS A FINNISH WORK

Sibelius' Music Makes Profound Impression with Vigorous Character.

PICTURES STRUGGLE AND SHOCK OF BATTLE

Orchestra's Brilliant Performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntula" Overture.

Herald Jan. 6, 1907
BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the 11th Symphony concert, Dr. Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall last night was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Concerto in A minor for 'cello.....Volkman
Mr. Warnke, 'cellist.
Symphony No. 1 in E minor.....Sibelius
(First time in Boston.)

The orchestral pieces played last night could not have been in sharper contrast, as far as mood and color were concerned. Goldmark's lush and sultry overture reminds one of Strange spice and flower, strange savor of crushed fruit.

And perfume the swart kings treat underfoot

For pleasure when their minds wax amorous.

'Barred frankincense and grated sandalroot.

The symphony by Sibelius is of his country. It is music that suggests desolate moors, storm-swept pines; wild voices heard by lonely wanderers far from any dwelling place of man, angry defiance, shock of battle. If there be a moment of gayety, it is rough rollicking and knives are quickly drawn. There is little thought of woman or of love in this savage music. The gentler passages are those of low lamentation, or the quieter moments are mutterings, "ancestral voices prophesying war."

The second symphony of Sibelius has been played here at a Symphony concert. It is a gray, forbidding work, but it has not the elemental strength, the volcanic spontaneity of the first. It is more prudently, more discreetly written.
It is also less effective.

The themes of the symphony played last night are striking in form and character. Take the chief theme of the first movement, for example, that of the Scherzo and that of its contrasting section; or the second chief theme of the finale. These melodies are of the soil, yet they are not folk tunes. They are something nearer and farther than folk tunes; they are typical of the spirit and the feelings of the Finns; they have epic proportions; they are charged with imagination. Their rugged independence is defiance even now when Finland is subject to Russia. The wonder is that a man who writes this revolutionary music should be granted a stipend by the government.

Fortunate in his invention of themes,
Sibelius impresses by his heroic treatment of them. The elaboration is an enlargement of the spirit as of the letter.
There are no incongruous digressions.
There are no halting places in the allegros for rest and meditation. In the first movement after the opening melancholy tune for the clarinet, a tune which in the finale becomes superbly tragical, the excitement is constantly at fever heat. The harmonic pungency or strangeness, the instrumentation which is often forcible with a force that approaches brutality, often fantastical to the verge of wildness, often overwhelmingly sonorous as is nature's instrumentation of a tempest—these add to the effect and make it irresistible. The music might be dismissed as grim, austere, granitic. It is all this, but it is more than this. The voices of Northern Nature, fierce and melancholy voices of hyperboreans, are heard. Seldom has modern music such a direct and overpowering speech.

The performance of the overture was one of unusual euphony and brilliance and the coda with the blend of the two chief themes was delivered with a proud sonority that became the exultation of the united lovers. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the symphony was even more triumphant in its appreciation of the vital elements; its spirit now of bodement and now of defiant action, now of virile melancholy and now of joy in a hopeless struggle; in its suggestion of wild landscapes; in its intensity of primal feeling.

Between these works was the concertos of Volkman, which voices the melancholy of a shy and broken man. It is not a work of much distinction; in truth, the music is often peevish, often tiresome. Mr. Warnke did little to give it a fictitious value. He played in an amiable manner; he took a commendably cheerful view of the situation; but his performance was below his own standard.

It may be added that few cello concertos are worth the labor of preparation or repay the respectful attention of the hearer. It is the custom for the solo cellist of the Orchestra, whoever he may be, to play annually a concerto.
There was a time when oboe, clarinet, and horn concertos were frequently heard in orchestral concerts. They have disappeared from Symphony programmes. Fifty years from now a cello concerto may be used only for the practice of pupils or for the best in competitive examination.

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

MONDAY, JANUARY 7, 1907

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMMES FOR HALF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mme. Nordica's Recital and the Longy Club's New Music—The Distinctive Note and Merit of Mr. Sothorn's Hamlet as He Now Shapes It—Three Months of the Endowed Theatre in Chicago—News of the Day

Transcript Jan. 7, 1907
Dr. Muck completed on Saturday night the third group of Symphony concerts for the current musical year. The particular concert was the eleventh in the series. Two weeks hence comes the twelfth, the programme for which is already announced.
Thus, it is possible and interesting to tabulate the compositions that Dr. Muck has chosen for half his term of service here.
The list runs as follows, with those that were played under Mr. Gericke last year marked with a star:

Symphonies—Beethoven, No. 5* and No. 7; Brahms, No. 1; Bruckner, No. 7 (first time in twenty years); Haydn, G major; Glazounoff,
No. 5 (first time); Mozart, "Jupiter"; Sibelius,
No. 1 (first time); Sinding, D minor (first time in six years); Schumann, No. 1; Schubert,
"Unfinished," C major.*

Overtures and Preludes—Beethoven, "Leonore,"
No. 3, "Egmont"; Elgar, "In the South"; Goldmark, "Sakuntala"; Mendelssohn, "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Rimsky-Korsakoff,
"The Betrothed of the Czar"; Wagner, "A Faust Overture," "Die Meistersinger," "Rien-zi"; Weber, "Der Freischütz"; "Oberon."
Miscellaneous Pieces—Bach, Suite for Flute and Strings; Berlioz, Dances and March from
"The Damnation of Faust"; Brahms, "St.
Anthony" Variations; Chadwick, "Cleopatra" (first time); Liszt, "Shepherd's Song" (first time) and "March of the Kings" from "Christus"; G. Schumann, Variations and Double Fugue (first time); Strauss, "Don Juan"; Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl."

Concertos—Beethoven, G major for Piano; Chopin, E minor for Piano; Grieg, A minor for Piano; Liszt, E-flat major for Piano; Spohr, D minor for Violin; Strube, F-sharp minor for Violin; Tschetkovski, D major, for Violin;
Volkman, A minor for 'Cello.

Thus, through the first half of the concerts—a time in which a new conductor must necessarily be feeling his way—Dr.
Muck has played two new symphonies, and had the parts been obtainable he would have played a third by the Pole, Stojowski.
He has further revived a symphony by Bruckner, which to all intents and purposes was new, and few hearers could have had a lively recollection, after six years, of Sin-ding's symphony. Each of these four symphonies, moreover, was well worth performance; Sibelius's and Bruckner's in particular were genuinely notable; and Glazounoff's was at least pleasant musical entertainment. Dr. Muck has indeed shown his preference for the composers of the North in his choice of new symphonies, but are there any in Germany or Austria, except Mahler's, that cry for hearing here; and have we not, and recently, had those of every symphonic writer in France, except Magnard's. Nor have we heard of any symphony by an American that has lain in a neglected packet on Dr. Muck's cold doorstep. As for the classics, the conductor's range has been wide and the results in the case of Brahms's first symphony and Beethoven's seventh remarkable.

With overtures, Dr. Muck is making no such quest for new music as Mr. Gericke used to pursue. Only one of the eleven, Elgar's "In the South" (and possibly Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Betrothed of the Czar") had any flavor of novelty.
On the other hand, new or unfamiliar overtures that are interesting are hard to find, and a strange conductor may reasonably test himself and quicken his audiences, as Dr. Muck has done, with his performances of the classics. Three new compositions stand in the list of miscellaneous pieces—Chadwick's tone-poem, Georg Schumann's variations, and the trifle from Liszt.
Schumann's music was amusing and Chadwick's was interesting; but no striking new composition appears in this category of Dr. Muck's programmes. The tone-poem is the characteristic form of contemporary music; yet Dr. Muck has chosen but two such compositions. It is in these miscellaneous pieces that his view might have been more catholic and his choice more interesting.

In the arrangement of his programmes
Dr. Muck has quietly pursued an individual bent. As some will have it, he is too fond of the severely classical order—overture, concerto, symphony or the reverse.
Yet only six of the twelve programmes have been so arranged, and they have not been the less interesting. Apparently the conductor is disposed to make programmes of miscellaneous numbers by themselves (like that which carried Elgar's overture, Wagner's "Rienzi," Chadwick's tone-poem and Schumann's variations) and other programmes which cling to the three classical forms. Often there has been a clear purpose running through a programme, like the grouping of the music of a particular period, spirit or race. Again, as in the more miscellaneous lists there has been seemingly no other guide than personal idio-syncrasy or some cryptic point of view. Liking for Dr. Muck's programmes seems equally a matter of personal taste.
There are many among his hearers that welcome a concert that sustains a single mood or that consists of music of a particular sort. There are others—and they are not few—who like better a programme that mingles many kinds. Other voices find some of Dr. Muck's programmes too rigid, and yet in the next breath complain that his more miscellaneous lists are a hodge-podge.
Perhaps these very differences of opinion prove the interest of the programmes as a whole; surely if he had not made them individual he would have been quickly chidden as one who travels easily in a well-worn rut. Wisely, Dr. Muck has pursued his own way. It is his right to do so, and it is also one of the causes of the interest of his public in him. In the child's rhyme it was the man that took everyone's advice that fell into difficulties—not the man who held to his own course.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA EXPLOITS NEW COMPOSER

That Finland has a great composer, a man who should yet win place among the immortals, was evident to those who heard the E minor symphony of Jan Sibelius at the concert of Saturday evening. It was evident before a dozen bars of the brooding melancholy of the opening movement were played. From thence onward the sweep of extraordinary elemental passion and the never-ending sonority and individuality of a strange yet fascinating instrumentation were potent enough to hold the imagination to the very end. Now and then in the riot of stern dissonances and savage coloring came somewhat calmer yet never suave stretches of melody that had a haunting appeal like that of a cold sunset in a gray and ghostly forest.

If music can produce geographical impressions, then the picture this titanic work of Sibelius puts upon the retina of the mind is that of the north; grim forests, deep firds, stern and naked hills, a cheerless sky over a vast wilderness of pointed firs—all these the barbaric directness and tonal strength of the symphony suggest. If there comes at times the thought of warring tribes of men, it is not the chief thought. Nature holds a more engrossing sway.

The playing of this superb work was equally superb. Dr. Muck read from it and into it all the emotional grandeur possible, and the men, taxed pretty severely by its technical difficulties, gave an exhibition of virtuosity not to be surpassed.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, of its familiarity, was interpreted with of its familiarity, was interpreted with great charm in its early portion and with passionate warmth and pungency in its brilliant finale.

The soloist was Mr. Warnke of the orchestra, who chose Volkmann's cello concerto in A minor for his exhibition piece. The work no longer produces any very marked effect, and, although the artist played it with much grace and a lovely tone, it was the feature of least interest in the evening's program. Journal Jan. 7, 1907

For the 11th Symphony concert on Saturday evening Dr. Muck offered Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Volkmann's A minor cello concerto and the first symphony of Sibelius, the famous Finnish composer, the last-named number being given for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Warnke of the orchestra was the soloist.

Naturally first interest was in the symphony, and it proved to be well merited. Never has the composer been heard to better advantage. His work breathes of Finland throughout, with a breath that simply fascinates. Dr. Muck's reading was thoroughly in keeping with the number, making of the whole one of the most delightful selections of the season to date. The "Sakuntala" overture strengthens its hold upon every hearing. It seemed Saturday evening as though it had never before possessed so much merit. Between these two jewels came the cello concert, which, like all of its school, is endured rather than embraced. This is no reflection on Mr. Warnke, for he made the most of the possibilities, but a cello concerto never has been and never will be enthusiastically received. The soloist ever carries the work. Transillon Jan 7, 07

Trans. As Chicago Reads Jan. 7, 1907

At the end of the month the Symphony Orchestra gives its first concert in Chicago in fifteen years, and the local manager there is advertising it glowingly on the pages of the programme book of the regular Chicago band. "For the first time in nearly fifteen years," runs his announcement, "the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to visit Chicago. In a sense, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the parent of all the other great permanent organizations which are now doing such splendid work for the beautiful art of music. It was first in the field and demonstrated that it is possible for a city to maintain a great orchestra for the cultivation of the highest ideals of the art. The present season is its twenty-sixth. Behind it lies an unbroken record of success which promises to continue in the future.

Especial interest is attached to the concert, since it will bring to Chicago one of the great conductors of Germany, Dr. Karl Muck, who is at the head of the orchestra for the present season. Dr. Muck will be the first of the visiting "star" conductors who will have the advantage, not merely of a thoroughly adequate instrument but of thorough familiarity with it. For this reason his coming to America and his visit to Chicago is of utmost musical importance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring to Chicago its full strength of ninety-eight performers. It has been called "an orchestra of virtuosi" and "a virtuoso orchestra," because of the unusual quality of the artists which are its members, and of the complete discipline which comes from years of playing together. In the strings are such men as Willy Hess, Timothée Adamowski, Roth, Hoffmann, Warnke, Keller, Barth, Strube Ferir and Zach. The leaders of its wood-winds are Longy, regarded by many as the best oboe of the world; Grisez, the best clarinet which the Paris Conservatoire has produced in years; Andre Maquarre, the first flute; Sadony, the first bassoon, who was brought last year from Cologne; Hackebarth and Max Hess, the two first horns; and Kloeppel, the first trumpet. The policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always been, and now is, to secure the best artists in the world, no matter what the cost may be, and the result is a band of musicians who collectively and individually are certainly not surpassed by any in the world." Rarely at home do we get so many particulars of the individual players in the orchestra. For us, it is always a body.

y Hall.

1906-07.

NY ORCHESTRA.

K, Conductor.

VCERT.

ARY 19, AT 8 P.M.

mmme.

Midsummer-night's Dream."

for PIANO.

in C major.

ist:

NE GOODSON.

Katharine Goodson,
Pianist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE, to "A Midsummer-night's Dream."
music, op. 21.

GRIEG.

CONCERTO in A minor for PIANOFORTE, op. 16.
I. Allegro molto moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro moderato molto e marcato.

SCHUBERT.

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 7.
I. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Miss KATHARINE GOODSON.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

Katharine Goodson,
Pianist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE, to "A Midsummer-night's Dream."
music, op. 21.

GRIEG.

CONCERTO in A minor for PIANOFORTE, op. 16.
I. Allegro molto moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro moderato molto e marcato.

SCHUBERT.

SYMPHONY in C major, No. 7.
I. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Miss KATHARINE GOODSON.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

KATHARINE GOODSON

The English Pianist

Will Give A

RECITAL

AT

Chickering Hall

Thursday, Afternoon, Jan. 24

AT 3

PROGRAM includes Mozart, Beethoven, Leo, Exaudet, Corelli, Rameau, Schumann, Arthur Hinton, Chopin.

Tickets, $1.50, $1.00 & 50c, and Programs at Symphony Hall on and after Thursday, January 17.

Mason & Hamlin Piano

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Mendelssohn — "Midsummer-night's Dream." Overture.

Grieg—Concerto in A minor, for Piano.

Miss Katharine Goodson, Pianist.

Schubert—Symphony in C major.

The concert began, as usual, a little later than the advertised hour, which deprived some suburban residents of the magnificent finale of the Schubert symphony. There was quite an exodus before the end. Dr. Muck might well copy the practice of Mr. Lang and Mr. Gericke, who always began concerts on time.

The Mendelssohn overture was most daintily played. Whatever the shortcomings of Mendelssohn may have been, in the domain of musical humor he was second only to Richard Strauss and Wagner. His Scherzos are the finest part of his symphonies and in this overture the delicacy of his humor is more attractive than the grotesqueness of a Beethoven or the prattle of a Haydn. Over two centuries ago the musical Sam Pepys saw the Shakespearean play and wrote:

"To the King's Theatre where we saw 'Midsummer's Night's Dream,' which I had never seen before, nor shall ever again, for it is the most insipid ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life."

But Mendelssohn saw something more in it (after all it is often the German who appreciates Shakespeare best), and has vivified the picture of the fairies of the Athenian actor troupe, and of the translated Bottom.

It is a pity one cannot have the ophicleide, which Mendelssohn called for, to picture the raucous quality of Bottom's snore, but the bass tuba filled its place fairly well on this occasion. It is possible, however, that the older instrument may return to modern scores because of its peculiar tone-color. Strauss has brought back the obce d' Amore, the old Bassethorn is again coming into use, and it is very likely that the ophicleide will soon be resuscitated.

The overture was much applauded and we found it one of Dr. Muck's best readings, conserving all the delicacy of the fairy touches and contrasting these well with the clumsy and awkward antics of the "Pyramus and Thisbe" troupe.

The nub of the concert was the Grieg concerto with Katherine Goodson as the pianist. We have had this concerto with considerable frequency in recent days. Samaroff played it brilliantly and Dr. Ruebner pedantically. But its full power was only revealed at this concert. Katherine Goodson is spoken of in Hullah's recent life of Leschetizky as "one of the best pupils that Leschetizky has ever had," and she proved this most abundantly at this concert. From the very first phrase (in which the piano entered like a rifle shot) the performance was full of authority.

There was tremendous technique in the performance, but the technique was only the means to an end; back of it were poetry and musicianally intelligence. There was remarkable breadth, and when it came to the cadenza the octave and chord-playing was colossal; there was a display of wrist-action such as rivalled D'Albert himself. Yet there was no pounding, no pushing of the piano beyond its capabilities.

The finale has all the heartiness of the Halling, that northern dance in which the men try to kick the overhanging rafters in the Barn where they hold their festival. One of the themes of this Rondo is much like "I dreamt that I dwelt in Marble Halls" translated into Norwegian, but Grieg dreams in a very emphatic manner, and Miss Goodson gave the theme with majestic emphasis. We ought not to forget to praise the work of the horn in the first two movements. The instrument is made very prominent, often having duets with the piano.

At the end of the work Miss Goodson received an ovation such as has been given to very few artists in Boston. The wildest applause and recall after recall followed. We most cordially join in the popular verdict in this instance. Barring a slight over-use of pedal the performance of the concerto was perfect. Every point was brought out clearly and there was no straining for undue effect, there were no liberties taken with the composer. Boston will look with much interest for the recital of this great pianist next Thursday. Her Boston debut has certainly been both a popular and artistic triumph.

Of the Schubert C major symphony as a work one can say nothing new; therefore we will confine our remarks strictly to its performance. Dr. Muck gave to it much more of the heroic quality than is usual in the first three movements. He spared an unnecessary repeat in the first movement. There is still too much of repetition in the symphony and we hope that some day some Schubert-lover will curtail it in the interests of the composer. In a somewhat briefer form it would not lose any essential part and would be more than ever a masterpiece.

In the first movement the closing theme was given too loudly, but one felt grateful to Dr. Muck for giving prominence to the trombone passages of the coda, glorious passages like the clashing of swords, which we have seldom had with proper masculine vigor.

But this vigor was rather misplaced in the closing passages of the chief theme of the Andante, where the contrasts were magnified until they suggested Mahler rather than Schubert. The crash just before the measure rest, and the anxious chords which herald the return of the subordinate theme on clarinette with counterpoint on the violins, was made of deafening character. Great praise must be given to oboes and clarinettes which have very important work to do almost all through this movement; their work was excellent.

We found the prominence of some of the less important figures to be a merit in the Andante, but not so in the Scherzo, where the rhythm of merely accompanying figures was sometimes too distinct.

But we consider the finale to have been among the triumphs of Dr. Muck's interpretations. In the first place it was not rushed in a manner to impair the figure of the violins in the chief theme. Then the four mighty strokes (which Schubert may have borrowed from Beethoven's Violin concerto) a sort of double Spondee, were given with splendid majesty. The final crescendo was also superb. Here in this movement all the virility which Dr. Muck forced to the utmost was quite in place, for this is a finale such as Beethoven ought to have had to his "Eroica;" it certainly balances the heroic character of the first movement of that wonderful work. Dr. Muck was recalled at the end of this and fully deserved the tribute; if we feel that there was an excess of power in the second and third movements we cannot sufficiently praise the coda of the first and the whole of the last movement, both in performance and in reading.

Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Katharine Goodson the Symphony Soloist.

Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, who made her first appearance in America last week at the Symphony concerts, proved to be an artist whose reputation abroad was evidently based upon merit, if one may judge from her performance of the A minor Grieg concerto and the cordial manner in which she was greeted by the members of the orchestra at the close of her work. The audience, too, was really "wildly enthusiastic," for a Symphony audience; but the reception by her associate players showed pretty plainly that her advance heralding was unlike that of some artists from across the sea, where more fancy than fact appeared in the preliminary notices.

Mme Goodson in every phase of the work appeared to readily respond to its demands and she is fortunately mistress of an arm power that is able to cope with an orchestra and sustain the right balance for the solo instrument in the musical picture.

As for technique and skill in all kinds of finger work the pianist is well endowed. And with the possible exception in the earlier part of the first movement her pedaling was admirably adjusted to the requirements of the finger board. And she is so sincere and unassuming in her performance that she impresses the auditor with being a serious devotee in her chosen field of endeavor; an artist whose temperament is thoroughly artistic and who is a student always.

Her tone is very pleasing, whether in piano or fortissimo, and in the first movement of the concerto she gave a splendid exhibition of brilliancy in the long cadenza, which nearly runs the gamut of tonal colors. The bravura passages in the second part and the cantabel, later on, were each thoroughly satisfactory. Very clear and rapid was her arpeggio work in the third part, and the fortissimo finale of the closing movement was as vigorous and well sustained as one would expect to hear at the hands of a woman. She was recalled several times amidst loud plaudits—and Dr Muck smiled as though he enjoyed the tributes of appreciation bestowed upon the English visitor.

The orchestral numbers were the Mendelssohn overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Schubert's grand symphony in C major. The dainty and fairy-like passage for the strings were charmingly played; fairly shimmering in brilliancy and unity of execution in the overture. The Schubert overture, which to some minds should be relieved of a number of the repetitions in its score, deserves high praise. The interpretation was masterly in every way, all the familiar beauties of the composition, and they are very many, being shown in vivid musical colors, and Dr Muck read the score in a loving and sympathetic manner.

Mme Melba will be this week's soloist, singing "L'Amore," from Mozart's opera, "Il Re Pastore," and an aria from Verdi's "Traviata." Mr. F. S. Converse will be represented on the program by an orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," given for the first time in Boston. The symphony will be "Harold in Italy," by Berlioz, Mr Fevir playing the solo viola part.

Mme. Katharine Goodson, pianist, who will make her first appearance in America, at the Boston Symphony concert this week, was born at Watford, Herts, England, on June 18, 1872. She played at an early age in the English provinces, and went to the Royal Academy of Music in London, where she studied under Oscar Beringer from 1886 to 1892. She then went to Vienna and studied with Leschetitzki for four years. On her return to England she gave a recital in London and played at the popular concerts. Since 1897 she has lived the life of a virtuoso, and has played with success in the chief cities of Europe. Her first appearance in Berlin was in 1899, and in Vienna in 1900. She played with Kubelik in 1902, '03, '04 in his English concerts. In 1903 she was married to Mr. Arthur Hinton, composer and conductor. Herald Jan. 13, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MENDELSSOHN, SCHUBERT, AND A NEW PIANIST

Miss Katharine Goodson Makes Her Debut in America, Playing Grieg's Concerto—Concerts and Recitals Next Week—Miss von Radecki Returns—The Weeks to Come—More Salon Music

Trans. Jan. 19, 1907
Miss Katharine Goodson, an English pianist of high repute in her own land, and somewhat widely known in various countries of Europe, made her first public appearance in America yesterday afternoon before an unusually enthusiastic and appreciative audience, who brought her back for four hearty recalls. The programme:

Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for Piano.....Grieg
Symphony in C major.....Schubert

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture must always remain an exceedingly striking instance of the rapid and definite crystallization of individuality at an early age in the range of classic musical literature. The youthful Mozart to be sure gave far more phenomenal exhibitions of mere precocity, of amazing fluency of invention and sheer instinct for composition. But considering how much earlier relatively, his life of productivity began, and how incessantly it was stimulated by the fresh impressions of musicians in various musical cities, he achieved nothing that can bear comparison in point of total originality with the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's Octet or this overture. It contains the kernel of all his romanticism, unfolded later in the overtures "To the Tale of Fair Melusina" to "Fingal's Cave" and the calm introduction to the "Meeresstille." Aside from the indisputable freshness of musical invention, the novelty of orchestral effects alone would have rendered it immortal. The imaginative chords in the woodwind at once proclaim a new world of tone; the scheme of using the violins divided for so considerable a time is a sufficiently memorable achievement in itself, although Berlioz, within a few years, was destined independently to use this device in his revolutionary Fantastic Symphony. The discreetly descriptive humor of the low notes of the solo bassoon and horn, followed by the long sustained tone of the ophicleide (played of necessity on the bass tuba) in delicate allusion to the ass's bray from a grotesque contrast to exquisite fairy music that must have been totally and unforgettably new. It would require much study and careful deduction to enumerate in accurate detail the whole significance from the double point of musical and orchestral invention. It is enough to state that in the year of grace, 1907, aided by a marvellously finished performance, it still sounded spontaneously charming and poetically novel. Considering the ruthless advance of time and the rapid evolution of musical style more could scarcely be said.

Miss Goodson made an exceedingly pleasant and forceful impression. The Grieg concerto has been played so frequently in these concerts that there is no necessity for discussing its qualities at length. It presents an opportunity for moderate display of virtuosity, no little poetic temperament and much of that somewhat indefinable quality known as musicianship. Miss Goodson met these tests not only adequately, but with a generous reserve. Her technique is of that ample and fluent nature which is taken for granted as an essential for musical equipment. Her tone is powerful in forte without being hard; it is penetratingly full and singing in piano. Her rhythm is incisive, full of fire and yet when the occasion demands, elastic. In her performance one was conscious not merely of the well-equipped pianist, but also of the cultivated and thoughtful musician. Her interpretation was poetic, supplying that indispensable sense of imaginative atmosphere so absolutely essential to Grieg, while containing precisely that right pitch of bravura abandon, of dramatic sensuousness which the concerto demands. Too often the inexorable standards of technical cultivation and range of repertory combine to crush the development of the finer musical and expressive instincts. This is painfully the case with many pianists of indubitable talent, now before the public. It is a pleasure, therefore, to record that in Miss Goodson the technical and interpretative qualities are balanced to an uncommon degree, and that her performance of the Grieg concerto showed the sensitive and responsive musician as well as the skilful pianist; an artistic temperament of vitality and poise. Her forthcoming recital will be awaited with distinct interest.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of the great C major symphony was an object of interested expectation. With some miscalculations of instrumental effect, there are many problems in the performance of this symphony which tax the resources of even the skilful conductor of today. To prevent the woodwind from being overpowered by the strings, to keep the trumpets from "cutting through," to allow the trombones to be heard without detriment to the tonal balance of the orchestra, all these are no slight tasks. Dr. Muck's performance of this perennially great work was conspicuously great. The symphony sounded remarkably convincing throughout; the genuine Schubert quality was manifest, and yet the volume of tone, while always well-balanced, was distinctly modern in its richness and dramatic quality. Possibly some exception might be taken to the tempo of the andante con moto as being faster than tradition, somewhat to its disadvantage, but this tempo was not maintained rigorously throughout. Nevertheless the performance of the symphony as a whole was remarkably eloquent and satisfying.

E. B. H.

A Letter About Dr. Muck's Programmes

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The twelfth programme of the Symphony Concerts has been announced and is of no more interest than previous ones have been—Mendelssohn, Grieg, Schubert—and the season is half gone; and but one first-class modern work has been given the while: toujours the old masters!

We hear often how it has become the habit in Boston to fossilize—how a public that piques itself upon its knowledge and its ability to appreciate great art, invariably becomes inert when it must exercise the discriminative sense of the individual and not the tradition of years. Well, there is some truth in that; but what of our new conductor from Berlin? In Berlin, we have believed, Teutonic progress centres. Can it be that in the home of Strauss they are so very exclusive—they of the musical élite—of all that savors of the twentieth century? In his conducting, Dr. Muck has with much authority set for us a standard of interpretation which for its brilliance, reserve and sanity will not soon be forgotten. Shall we not have one well-made programme from his hands?

Perhaps Dr. Muck believes with Mr. Wells that we have not yet awakened from the embalmed repose in which we lay so long under the spell of Beethoven's music. How are we to persuade him that we are alive to the situation—that he stands at the beginning of the twentieth century in a progressive town of today, not in Vienna of the early eighties? After "all-Beethoven" programmes, "all-Russian" programmes, and "all-mediocrity" programmes, may not our minds be refreshed by the Symphonica Domestica, which we have not yet heard in Boston; or our overworked comprehending faculties be soothed by the dreams of Debussy before they are dulled to subtle effects. After the gross eloquence of Bruckner, Elgar and Glazounoff a tone-poem of Strauss, d'Indy, Debussy or Loeffler would be heard, if not with critical appreciation by everyone, at least with genuine pleasure by many.

It takes, as a rule, fifteen to eighteen years for a public to solve with satisfaction to itself the riddle of its creative sphinx. And for this reason particularly it is the first and most certain duty of an orchestra such as ours to produce with all its energy the little mite in each decade which has something new to say; something which, even if not of permanent quality, is of value now, that at least can show the way and say, "This much is true at all events." Not to give pleasure only, though that were enough, but to give light, is the function of our organization. The late Theodore Thomas appreciated with rare keenness the educational task that was his; and by indefatigable searching out of new works of interest, he worked an extraordinary enlightenment upon the mind of the public in Chicago. But perhaps Dr. Muck is a cynic and would not incur the obligations which a teacher must incur—but then, at least, he should aim to give pleasure; he should at all events provide contrasts and stimulation. C. K.

[Programme-making for a series of orchestral concerts is so intricate a task and the results depend so much upon the individual likes and dislikes of the hearer that we venture no comment on our correspondent's letter. Besides, within a fortnight we have printed our own view of the much-disputed matter of Dr. Muck's programmes. As a matter of fact, Strauss's "Symphonica Domestica" was chosen long ago for performance, and will be played in February. By "one first-class modern work," our correspondent seems to mean Strauss's "Don Juan." Others might put Sibelius's and Sinding's symphonies, and even Elgar's overture, "In the South" in the same category. "Old masters," moreover, is rather a comprehensive term when our correspondent stretches it, apparently, to include the contemporaries as well as the predecessors of Strauss. Ed. Transcript.] Trans. Jan. 18, 1907

MISS GOODSON AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Jan. 21. 07
Charming English Pianist Makes Her Debut Both in America and in Boston.

There was no novelty in the twelfth Symphony concert except that furnished in the person of Katharine Goodson, an English pianist of repute. She was an unhackneyed character surely enough, an uneasy and spasmodic young woman, and yet a player of genuine fire and individual charm. How much of the marked effect she produced on the audience was due to her imposing physical method, as of one saying, "See how I impress my innate force upon the keys," it is needless to say, for when all allowances are made for that special influence, the truth remains that the pianist has splendid powers, both of interpretation and of technique. Now she dashes as her work with the hot enthusiasm of a fervid temperament, and again she brings rare poetic feeling to the quieter moods of the composer—in this case the refined, imaginative, delightful Grieg.

Mme. Goodson chose the A minor concerto of the great Norwegian for her debut, which was American as well as Bostonian. She made it as highly interesting, as rhythmically fascinating and as wonderfully picturesque as it deserved, which is saying a great deal. There were moments of excessive storm, perhaps, and tumultuous passages where clearness was sacrificed to speed and power, but as a complete performance Mme. Goodson's may well rank with any of this particular concerto heard here. Mendelssohn and Schubert filled out the balance of the program, the former with the marvelously airy and melodious "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture and the latter with the lovely C major symphony, which time has not even begun to tarnish. Both were played with exceeding clearness and virtuosity, although there have been readings of the symphony that have surpassed Dr. Muck's in pure beauty and artistic repose.

Am. Jan. 26. 07
Miss Katherine Goodson, New to America, Wins Flattering Tribute at Symphony Concert.
SCHUBERT'S IMMORTAL NO. 7 GRANDLY PLAYED

By Kent Perkins.

With a warmth of greeting that was dattering in the extreme Miss Katherine Goodson, a young woman pianist from London, new to America, was welcomed at the twelfth Symphony concert of the season last evening in Symphony Hall.

She played Grieg's concerto in A minor op 16 and rarely has that famous and difficult work been set forth more brilliantly, forcefully or feelingly. Miss Goodson is tall and her head is crowned with a mass of Auburn hair. Her manner is intense, dynamic. In her long simple gown of white satin with copious lace falling from the elbows, she seemed, as she struck powerfully the resounding chords of the Norse harmonies, or tripped with fairy-like lightness over the delicate runs and trills, a very embodiment of a Viking's daughter making music in the great hall while warriors quaffed their mead.

Masterfulness, brilliance and power contrasted with deftness and a slinging, velvety tone in lighter passages are Miss Goodson's most striking characteristics. This combination took the audience by storm last night, and the player was recalled many times at the close of her performance, while each movement was greeted with a salvo of applause.

The program was opened with Mendelssohn's delicious overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which the orchestra played with exquisite delicacy.

After the concerto came Schubert's immortal Symphony in C major, No. 7. It is probable that this glorious masterpiece was never given with more tremendous power than it was last night under the spur of Dr. Muck's leadership. Every note of its triumphant measures, every shimmer of flooding sunlight that is sifted through it, every soaring harmony of the "music of the spheres" that is heard in the wonderful scherzo was given forth with soul-stirring effect. It was a performance to be remembered as an event of a lifetime.

LABOR OF LOVE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last Evening's Programme Was Concession to Music Lovers of Hub.

Herald Jan. 20, 1907.
The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, gave its 12th concert of the season last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:
Mendelssohn... Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream."
Grieg..... Piano concerto in A minor
Schubert..... Symphony in C major, No. 7
Mme. Katharine Goodson was the pianist.

The inclusion in one programme of Mendelssohn's overture and the concerto by Grieg was perhaps a concession to Bostonians, who are psychologically worsted by a programme wholly academic, or one which contains two symphonies. Whether or not in the nature of an indulgence last evening's performance was a labor of love, from the fanciful brilliance of the overture to the vital and engrossing music of Schubert's symphony. Of the technical performance, what can be said that has not been already said many times in many ways?

Mme. Goodson made her first public appearance in America at the rehearsal on Friday afternoon. She is English by birth, and last Sunday's Herald contained a sketch of her life.

Her performance last evening was one of rare brilliance—a revelation to many whose preconceived notions of English virtuosi have been formed from the performances of "favorite" English singers. Mme. Goodson, evidently in full sympathy with the Scandinavian spirit of the work, displayed not only a secure technique and a keen sense of rhythm, but vivacity, temperament and charm.

Her playing was constantly vivid, and now and then, as in moments of the adagio, exquisite; but in general it was glowing rather than tender and, more than once, tempestuous. The pianist was recalled again and again. The audience showed unwonted enthusiasm, both after the concerto and after the performance of Mendelssohn's overture.

The programme of the next pair of concerts will include F. S. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter" (first time here); Mozart's "L'Amore," from "Il Re Pastore"; aria, "Ah, fors e lui," from Verdi's "Traviata," and Berlioz' "Harold" symphony. Mme. Melba will be the soloist.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 26, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- | | |
|-----------------|--|
| F. S. CONVERSE. | ORCHESTRAL FANTASY, "The Mystic Trumpeter." (after the poem by Walt Whitman) op. 19.
(First time in Boston.) |
| MOZART. | ARIA "L'Amerò, sarò Costante," from "Il Rè Pastore." |
| VERDI. | RECITATIVE and ARIA "Ah fors' è lui." from "La Traviata," (Act I, Scene 6.) |
| BERLIOZ. | SYMPHONY in Four Movements with Viola Solo, op. 16, "Harold in Italy."
I. Harold in the Mountains: Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness, and Joy: Adagio. Allegro.
II. March of Pilgrims singing their Evening Hymn: Allegretto.
III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress: Allegro assai. Allegretto.
IV. Orgy of Brigands: Recollections of preceding scenes: Allegro frenetico.
(Viola Solo by Mr. E. FERIR.) |

Soloist:

Mme. MELBA.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

The Western Trip of the Symphony Orchestra. Trans. Jan. 17, 1907

A week from next Sunday, on Jan. 27, the Symphony Orchestra begins the longest Western trip that it has made in many years. A year ago, last autumn, before the season began here, it journeyed as far as Buffalo, Cleveland and Toronto. Now it is going to Chicago, where it has not played for fifteen years, to Indianapolis and to Cincinnati. The first concert of the little tour takes place at Rochester on Monday evening, Jan. 28; the second at Cleveland on Tuesday, Jan. 29; the third at Chicago on Wednesday, Jan. 30; the fourth at Detroit on Thursday, Jan. 31; the fifth at Indianapolis on Friday, Feb. 1; and the sixth at Cincinnati on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 2. From Cincinnati, the orchestra returns directly to Boston. Dr. Muck, needless to say, is conducting at each concert, and making his first appearance in the several cities to be visited. Mr. Adamowski will be the solo violinist in Rochester, Cleveland and Detroit; and Mr. Hess in Cincinnati. In Chicago, Rudolph Ganz, the pianist, plays with the orchestra; and in Indianapolis the local management wished no soloist at all. The programmes, as usual on the journeys of the orchestra, have been made exclusively from compositions that we in Boston have already heard. Beethoven's seventh symphony, Strauss's "Don Juan," and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" stand on three. Detroit is to hear Glazounoff's fifth symphony; Indianapolis, Brahms's first; and Cincinnati the symphony by Sibelius that made so large an impression here a fortnight ago. In full the programmes are:

At Rochester Jan. 28, and Cleveland Jan. 29—

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violin in B-minor, No. 3.
(Mr. Adamowski.)
Beethoven: Symphony in A major, No. 7.

At Chicago Jan. 30—

Wagner: Overture to "Rienzi."
Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Piano in B-flat, No. 1.
(Mr. Ganz.)
Beethoven: Symphony in A major, No. 7.

At Detroit Jan. 31—

Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violin in B-minor, No. 3.
(Mr. Adamowski.)
Glazounoff: Symphony in B-flat, No. 5.

At Indianapolis Feb. 1—

Brahms: Symphony in C minor, No. 1.
Strauss: Tone Poem, "Don Juan."
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

At Cincinnati Feb. 2—

Weber: Overture to "Oberon."
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin in D major.
(Mr. Hess.)
Sibelius: Symphony in E minor, No. 1.

MELBA CHARMS BIG SYMPHONY HALL THROG.

Boston Melba to American Crowd of Record Size Hears
Famous Singer and Altchevsky, a Hammerstein Tenor.

PRIMA DONNA'S VOICE IN FINE CONDITION

By Kent Perkins.

Rarely has Symphony Hall been crowded with so great a throng as that which filled every seat, jammed into every inch of standing room and overflowed into the corridors yesterday afternoon at Mme. Melba's concert. This singer has always been extremely popular in Boston, but her "drawing" power has been increased many fold this season by her pronounced success at Oscar Hammerstein's Manhattan Opera House in New York and by the genuine enthusiasm that her singing has aroused wherever she has appeared outside of the metropolis.

She was assisted yesterday by M. Altchevsky, tenor, of Hammerstein's company; Signorina Sassoli, harpist; an orchestra of fifty players from the Symphony Orchestra, under Professor Hess's direction, and by Alfred de Voto, accompanist.

Mme. Melba's voice from the very start was at the top notch of condition, and it followed inevitably that all her selections were given with the wonderful art for which she is famous. Her singing of the aria, "Caro Nome," from "Rigoletto," was a masterpiece in its refinement. In "Voi che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," her tones were more than usually flute-like, clear and mellow. The Prayer from "Tosca" would have been more satisfying if it had been given with more feeling. Mme. Melba, after this number, sang charmingly a waltz song as an encore.

The climax of the prima donna's success and the enthusiasm of her hearers were reached in the mad scene from "Lucia," for which Mr. Maquarrie played the flute obligato. The audience was so insistent for more that Mme. Melba sang two extra numbers, one with the harp assisting and the other with the singer accompanying herself on the piano.

Mr. Altchevsky pleased only moderately at the start in the prize song from "Die Meistersinger," but he warmed up later, sang Schumann's "Ich Grolle Nicht" with considerable feeling, reached real beauty in a serenade by Rachmaninoff and was at his best in "Thou Art Like Unto a Flower," which he gave as an encore.

Signorina Sassoli's harp selections were finely played and heartily received. The work of the orchestra was excellent in the main.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mme. Melba's Singing Crowds Out All Other Impressions—The Prime of Her Powers and Their Effect Upon Her Hearers Trans. Jan. 26, 1907

Rarely at a Symphony concert does interest in the singer or in the virtuoso of the occasion transcend all else. Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasia, "The Mystic Trumpeter," stood on the programme yesterday for its first performance in Boston, and at the end was Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," the first of his larger compositions that Dr. Muck has attempted here. Between the two Mme. Melba sang the air with violin obligato from Mozart's opera, "The Shepherd King," and Violetta's long and varied scena from Verdi's opera of "La Traviata." The audience listened attentively to Mr. Converse's music and rewarded him warmly, but plainly it had come to hear Mme. Melba. In turn it listened attentively to Berlioz's symphony and testified its pleasure in what it heard, but as plainly it regarded any sequence to Mme. Melba's singing as tame. It had heard her in a still, tense, pervading rapture that seemed almost to burst into the relief and elation of applause that rang and rang again. Sometimes it is a wise reviewer who makes the mood of his audience his own, and yesterday there was no resisting the mood. True Mr. Converse's music abounded in interesting suggestion, and Berlioz's symphony is a tempting test of the enduring and the declining qualities of his work. But there is no discoursing of these things, while the ear hears little but the golden beauty of Mme. Melba's tones, the bright and undulating flow of her song, the long waves of it, the rippling shimmer, the clear depths of it. The listener's ear, the listener's imagination, plunged elatedly into it. There was no other sensation but of supreme vocal beauty and supreme vocal spontaneity. It was as though song were creating itself. And such a mood, and such expectancy of tonight's concert, does not invite to discriminative reviewing.

H. T. P.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mme Melba, Symphony Orchestra Soloist.

Second of Mr Goodrich's Jordan Hall Orchestra Concerts.

Recitals by Mme Zeisler and Miss Schnitzer.

At 8 o'clock last Friday morning, in a snowstorm, six people took up positions at Symphony hall so as to "be on hand" at the opening of the doors, six hours later, for Mme Melba was to sing with the orchestra, and this little group defied wind and weather for the sake of being among the fortunate five hundred odd entitled to sit in the upper balcony, where very popular prices reign. At both concerts many people were unable to gain admission, the capacity of the hall being taxed to the limit, and this despite inclement weather.

The 13th Symphony program was as follows: "The Mystic Trumpeter," an orchestral fantasy by F. S. Converse, first time in Boston; arias from Mozart's "Shepherd King" and Verdi's "La Traviata," sung by Mme Melba, and the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy." Prof Hess played the violin obligato in the Mozart number. Mme Melba's appearance after a long absence from the city naturally made last week's program unusually interesting, for she is one of the very few great singers of the day and her recent successes in New York at the Manhattan opera house indicated that her glorious art of song was retained with all its wonderful attributes unimpaired.

In the bel canto passages of the two arias the purity and smoothness of execution was again displayed in an almost flawless technique. The florid runs and trills, so fluently voiced as to seem easy of accomplishment, were bounteously showered upon the admiring throng, and all the brightness and sparkle of the bravura measures were given with all the finished art of the gifted singer. The quality of Mme Melba's voice, especially in the upper register, is of that silvery purity so requisite for the proper vocalizing in music of this type, and is probably unsurpassed at the present time. The harmony of voice and violin in the obligato passages was exquisite and in perfect unison. The usual demonstrations of delight and wild applause greeted the singer, her auditors insisting on many returns to the stage.

Mr Converse's fantasy, based on Walt Whitman's poem, is in one movement, made up of five divisions, each one representing an episode in the work. The different phrases are outlined skillfully by the composer, who had handled the proclamations by the brass contingent in such a manner as to suggest the subject that follows. He conjures "war's alarms" in stentorian tones, giving splendid measures for the brasses, which this group executed with great brilliancy and harmonic unity. The love motif and the joyous finale are well defined, the latter being especially effective in its working up to an animated climax, that showed the ensemble skill of the orchestra to be as near perfection as can be reasonably expected.

The Berlioz symphony was played with all the vigor and brilliancy requisite to make "Harold in Italy" remembered pleasantly by the big audience. The impressive "March of the Pilgrims" and the "Orgy" deserve special mention, for they appealed most potently to the emotions of the auditors, if appearance be any criterion.

This week the orchestra will be away on its western trip. Feb 8 and 9 the program will be "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Paul Dukas; Tschalkowsky's first piano concerto, Mme Olga Samaroff soloist, and for the first time here Tinel's three-tone pictures on Cornelle's tragedy, "Polieucte."

CONCERT THIRTEEN BY THE SYMPHONY

Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," After Whitman's Poem, First Played Here.

WROTE A SERIES OF MUSICAL TABLEAUX

The Romanticism of Berlioz' "Harold" Symphony—
Mme. Melba Soloist.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

"The Mystic Trumpeter".....Converse
Aria from "Il Re Pastore".....Mozart
"Ah, fors' e lui".....Verdi
Symphony, "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz

Mr. Converse composed his fantasy in 1903-04. It was performed for the first time by the Philadelphia orchestra in Philadelphia, March 3, 1905. It has been played in Cincinnati and in New York.

The composer's purpose was to translate into music sections of Whitman's poem which in turn are expressions of mystery and peace, love, war, humiliation, joy, suggested to the poet by a wild trumpeter unseen, imagined, who played for him alone. The fantasy is in corresponding sections, which are connected by phrases for the trumpet.

Whitman in the poem gives little thumb-nail sketches and he utters rhapsodic generalizations. Mr. Converse is too fine a musician to attempt an interlinear translation. He takes in turn the main idea of one of Whitman's sections and thus presents a series of musical tableaux, which, however, have continuity, and by means of thematic treatment there is a close relationship between the episodes.

The work is planned on a large scale. There are pages that are imposing by reason of rich sonority. The most striking portions are the introduction and the song in praise of love. The former is interesting through its original thought and orchestral expression; the latter has a broad imaginative sweep and a true passion which swells to a superb climax. The battle music is more conventional in thought and rhetoric. The other selections seem to me less original and inferior in other ways to Mr. Converse's later works, for they do not have the melodic charm, the surety of development of the orchestral strength, and savor of, say, his music to "Jeanne d'Arc." The composer suffered by a performance on a prima donna night. It is a pity that an unfamiliar work of this importance is played once and then put aside. It would be fairer to composers and hearers if a new work of any value were performed at two concerts in succession, as is often done at the Chatelet and Lamoureux concerts in Paris.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" was written in 1834. The young romanticists of the thirties were terrible fellows, whether they wrote music, tales or poetry. Anatole France describes these novelists and poets fondly and ironically: "These young and sedentary men of letters, although they led most peaceful lives, made the bourgeois believe that they drank the night long flames of punch from the skull of a mistress! At that time a 'Jeune-France' did not go to the office where he was a copying clerk without crying out with a sarcastic laugh: 'I am damned!'"

Such a man was Petrus Borel whose "Champavert," a collection of grisly tales, was published the year before "Harold" was composed. Petrus added a defiant subtitle: "Immoral Stories," but any rooster after immorality in literature would be bitterly disappointed if he finally succeeded in digging out this singular and forgotten volume from the rubbish heaps of Time, who smiles compassionately on classics and romanticists alike. The heroes are all Harolds in misanthropy, but they are far more extravagant in daily routine than Byron's blase traveller. Passeur, for example, betrayed by his mistress, pays Sanson, the public executioner, a visit: "I come to beg you humbly, and I shall be very much obliged for this condescension, to do me the honor and the friendly deed of guillotining me."

All these young fellows of the young Thirties were honest in their fantastical expression. Read Berlioz's description of the finale in "Harold," the "Orgy of Brigands." "This furious orgy in which the drunkenness of wine, blood, joy and rage all shout together * * * where the mouths of brass seem to vomit forth curses and reply with blasphemies to entreating voices, where they laugh, drink, strike, bruise, kill, ravish, where in a word they amuse themselves." Here we find another Petrus.

But we are men and women of another generation and neither "Champavert" nor "Harold in Italy" is taken by us too seriously. I read the tales of Petrus Borel a fortnight ago, and I assure you the reading was for the most part a task. The characters are lay figures and in the most passionate or horrible scenes there was the thought of creaking and whirring internal mechanism contrived by the inventor to give a semblance of life to his automata. Only one scene is truly dramatic, and that one is not easily forgotten: The temptation and murder of the beautiful Jewess of Lyons by a melodramatic boatman. Let Petrus heap horrors on horror's head, his desperate villains are only bogies, his lovers and their sweethearts are no more real than wax figures in shop windows.

In like manner the readers of this generation may wonder at the novels of Le Touche, and at "Gaspard of the Night," which, written in the thirties was not published until after the death of the fastidious romanticist, the inventor of the prose poem. Does not "Hernani" itself now seem to us preposterous in many ways, as preposterous as the affectations in dress and facial expression, the general pose of those who compared themselves to young lions, but often seemed to honest citizens to be fine specimens of a more prosaic animal?

Berlioz has not gone down into the darkness of the pit with Petrus Borel and the others. No one listening last night to "Harold in Italy" spent any time in considering Childe Harold and his ways. The viola to the audience was simply a beautiful instrument played with wondrous tone and exquisite art by Mr. Ferir. It was not the voice of Harold, melancholy, dreaming, observing, groaning, sobbing. The music made its effect without any thought of programme, as though it were purely absolute music, a species of viola concerto, and it must not be forgotten that "Harold in Italy" owed its origin to the desire of Berlioz to write a viola piece for Paganini. The music was extraordinary 73 years ago, and although some passages now seem old-fashioned, or even barely tolerable, the work as a whole has vitality and a singular fascination.

There are pages, as in the "Pilgrims' March," that sound as though they might come from a composition by some ultra-modern Frenchman curious in the matter of orchestral experiments. Berlioz, like Hugo, like the elder Dumas, like certain painters of that period, was a man of native and uncommon genius. His romanticism was something more than a cloak and a dark lantern hastily taken up for theatrical effect. "Harold in Italy" is not so remarkable a work as the "Fantastic Symphony"; it is not a masterpiece like "The Damnation of Faust," an epic of marvellous power; but only a romanticist who was also a genius could have written it. The symphony was read by Dr. Muck in the appropriately rhetorical spirit, as a fantastic poem, and not as a symphony for class-room dissection. It was effectively played.

Mme. Melba sang "L'Amoro" from Mozart's early little opera and the familiar aria from "La Traviata," which appeared for the first time here on a Symphony concert programme. She was warmly welcomed and enthusiastically applauded. Her voice is the same instrument of golden tones; the tones are still of inimitable and haunting beauty. There has been no voice like it for many years. May it long be spared to give instant delight and pleasure for the memory.

used the happy impressions that Mme. Melba had started. Its romantic beauties were portrayed by the orchestra with exquisite effect, which was heightened by the sympathetic and remarkably moving playing of the viola, representing Harold, by Mr. Ferris.

The one jarring note of the programme came at the beginning—and what a jar it was! It was F. S. Converse's orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter," illustrating the poem of that name by Walt Whitman. It was a novelty to Boston. It certainly had one merit: it was Whitmanesque to the core. But it reeked of Whitman of the "Leaves of Grass." Whitman unclothed and hurling into space in shattered metre language unfit for newspaper publication or polite society. It was not Whitman of "The Mystic Trumpeter" except in the really mystic and beautiful introduction and in a few other scattered bars that popped up like sweet oases in the general Sahara of sound and fury.

Discordant Straining for Effect.

It resounded with harsh strivings after novel effects, searchings after weird discords, bumps of dissonance and rumbles and clashes that made one think of Kingston and Swettenham rather than any sort of a trumpeter.

MELBA IN FINE FORM GETS BIG OVATION AT SYMPHONY

Melodious and "Popular" Program Marred by a Discordant Fantasy Based on a Walt Whitman Poem.

Boston Am. Jan. 27, 1907

By Kent Perkins.

Mme. Melba as the solo singer and a program that with one exception was melodious and "popular" in the simplicity of its appeal served to draw one of the greatest and most brilliant audiences of the season to Symphony Hall last night for the thirteenth concert of the orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Muck.

Mme. Melba sang twice, first giving the aria "L'Amoro, saro Costante" from Mozart's "Shepherd King" and second the ever pleasing recitative and aria "Ah! fors'è lui" from Verdi's "Traviata." Her voice in both charmed mightily with its old-time limpidity and freshness. Her tones had their famed bird-like clearness and unalloyed beauty and the perfection of her vocalization gave pleasure as in her best days.

Dainty in Mozart.

In the Mozart music her daintiness and simplicity were appropriate, while in the more florid and tuneful "Traviata" aria her art roused her hearers to unwonted enthusiasm. She was recalled repeatedly with applause of blizzard-like proportions. The violin obligato in the Mozart selection was played by Professor Hess in a manner that added greatly to the charm of the number.

Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," based on Byron's "Childe Harold," contin-

Novelty and originality are worthy objects of any composer's ambition, but why, in the name of all the muses, why must an orchestra be made to groan like a legion of chained demons lashed with scorpion whips? Why must we be forced to listen to the shrieks of factory whistles in a concert hall? There are new things still to be found in harmony, melody and rhythm, but whether the howls of six trolley cars going around an ungreased curve under a cold and waning moon are music is a debatable question.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra is to take a western trip.

Mr. Converse's New Fantasy

The second hearing of Mr. Converse's orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter" at the Symphony concert on Saturday, confirmed the impression of unevenness that that music left on Friday afternoon. In the poem that suggested it, Walt Whitman hears "some strange musician, hovering unseen in air vibrating capricious tunes." The trumpeter blows of "holy calm," of "old pageants," of "love that is all the earth to lovers," of "war's wild alarms" and "sights of fear," of defeat, despair and resolution still upspringing, and last of "joy, joy, all-over joy." Here plainly are poetic ideas and visions that unite expression in music as well as in words and that stimulate the composer to his work. Sooner or later, the verses are sure to suggest a fantasy, not for orchestra, but for trumpet with orchestral accompaniment. With finer instinct Mr. Converse has avoided such obvious treatment. As an instrument his trumpet is relatively subordinate, linking the fantasy section by section, while out of its song spring the dominating melodies of the music. Throughout he is concerned imaginatively and expressively with the mystery of the trumpeter and the moods of his song and of the listening poet. The mystery shapes and fills the opening measures of the fantasy. There is suggestion of still, weird, expectant calm. Then ensue in the music, the exaltation of love, the clamor of war, the sorrow of defeat, and the uplifting song of joy. The form throughout is of the freest; yet there is no lack of musical or imaginative coherence. Mr. Converse plainly deserves the freedom that he has chosen because he can control it. In none of his music has he been surer or more elastic. Whatever he wills he may say.

Rather it is invention and imagination that seem at moments to fail him. The section "of war's alarms," for example, seems no more than a rather conventional and rhetorical expression of the mood of the verse. The transitional passages, besides, are only transitions, and perhaps it is unfair to ask more of them. Yet in one or two it is hard to resist the impression that they are mere means to enable the composer to get on toward the next mood that has seized him and the next idea that it has stirred in him. There are indeed moments in the music that after the scant test of two hearings leave little lasting impression. In the beginning of the fantasy, on the other hand, Mr. Converse is writing in tones the poetry and the poignancy of mystery. The section that sings of love glows with cumulative power and elation in the melodic contours, in the harmonic development and in the brightness and warmth of the instrumental colors. In the rhythmic accent, as well, comes a curious impression that the music is American and nothing else; that only an American in America could have written it for such a mood. Perhaps the notion is fantastic, but twice the music has brought it. A similar throbbing elation and a similar American accent fill the final apotheosis of joy. It is joy, not as the conventions of music express it, not as other composers of other races have given it utterance in tones, but joy of an American spirit in its own youth and lustiness, in the youth and lustiness of its race and in the promise of a boundless future. Not before in all his work has Mr. Converse written such American music. Perhaps he could not do otherwise with Whitman for his inspiration.

H. T. P.

Dr. Muck and the Symphony orchestra played Beethoven's seventh symphony at their concert in New York last night and the performance stirred the audience and the reviewers to the same admiration that it excited here. Mr. Krehbiel, for example, writes in the Tribune this morning: "Beethoven's rhythms were given as they pulsed in his creative fancy, not in the grimacing caricatures bred by diseased imaginations. His melodies flowed forth with buoyant and elastic life, spontaneous and refreshing. When the players got into the full swing of the symphony the conductor, whose gestures of command had been continence itself, effaced himself altogether. The Scherzo, madly merry as a tumbling mountain brook, played itself, breaking ever and anon into sunlit effervescence, with only the incentive of the conductor's eye or a scarcely discernible motion of his baton to suggest unanimity in a nuance of tempo. So the Finale's wild dance, with its headlong rush, its erratic explosions, its sudden dartings, elusive turnings and wilful pausings. The music and the men seemed to rejoice in themselves and each other, and the audience was transported." Mr. Aldrich adds in the Times: "Dr. Muck may or may not plume himself upon his Beethoven 'readings'; there is generally little evidence in his conducting that he plumes himself upon any of his achievements in front of his orchestra. But whether he does or not, it is evident that he penetrates to the real spirit of Beethoven's music and he reproduces for us that music charged with that spirit. It was a sane, strong, dignified performance at every point; it was instinct with life, with the meaning and significance of each phrase, finely planned and developed with reference to the larger proportions of both the 'Egmont' overture and the symphony. The latter was remarkable for its euphony and for the pointed expression that was given to the marked and entirely characteristic rhythms of each movement." Mr. Henderson in the Sun found the performance of the symphony "admirable in the matter of tempi, nuance and insight. It was especially praiseworthy for its delicacy and clarity. Everything was brought out, and yet nothing was overdone."

The Boston Post

MELBA SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

Jan 26 1907
By Olin Downes

Melba was the soloist at the 13th public rehearsal for the season of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

The opening number was (for the first time in Boston) the orchestral fantasy, "The Mystic Trumpeter," after the poem by Walt Whitman. The composer is F. S. Converse.

In Mr. Converse America has a composer who writes with a rare fertility and distinction of melodic invention, the still rarer faculty of self-criticism and that fine instinct by which he never allows the expression of his ideas to fall below the level of the high and poetic. With each composition that appears from his pen there is perceptible a nobler flight with increased strength and coherency of workmanship. It hardly requires data to demonstrate the obvious fact that this poem is of the same period as the remarkable music to Jeanne D'Arc, performed recently by Mr. Goodrich and his new orchestra at Jordan Hall. The same spirit and peculiar methods of expression are in ample evidence, although in the suite they are perhaps more condensed in expression.

Let us be grateful to Mr. Converse for having omitted in his treatment of the poem those parts which deal with imaginary events; that he has taken, as he himself says, "the elemental phrases of the poem: mystery and peace, love, war or struggle, humiliation, and finally joy," thereby allowing his imagination and ours full sway, and the opportunity to catch unfettered the true spirit of Whitman's poem.

The theme of the mystic trumpeter dominates, and in various aspects binds together, the composition. It is most poetically preluded by a few measures which suggest the opening lines:

"Hark! Some wild trumpeter—some strange musician, Hovering unseen in air, vibrates capricious tunes tonight."

There follows a section concerning "Love, that is the pulse of all," then martial music, treated in a manner akin to the intensely dramatic setting of "Venü Creator" in the "Jeanne d'Arc" music, a passage of lamentation, and lastly measures of uplifting triumph. At this last appearance of the theme, by the way, the reminiscence hunter may recall the entrance of the horn in the introduction of the finale of Brahms' first symphony.

Let the eagle flap its wings! In this opus we have a work by an American composer, on a subject inspired by an American poet, and treated in an American manner, the composer going so far as to quote from "Marching Through Georgia" in the battle music.

It is a very stirring episode, the melody being outlined by the piccolo over a stormy orchestral background. Throughout there is a spirit of lofty fantasy, and the instrumentation is refined and individual, as Mr. Converse's always is.

Melba was in perfect voice, and when united with the musicianship which she displayed at this concert, the performance was worth going a long distance to hear. The voice seemed to flow from her throat as water from a spring, and this is a quality essential to the aria of Mozart's "Il Re Pastori." In the well-known and worn aria from "Traviata," her singing was absolutely flawless, and she extracted the last drop of what dramatic quality there is in the air. To cavil at two or three things obviously the result of passing conditions would be an endeavor to pick flaws in a perfect jewel, and the singing of yesterday was above criticism. Enthusiasm hardly describes the state of the audience. There was a demonstration of approval bordering on the miraculous, when one considers the extremely well-behaved assembly which congregates on these occasions. The singer must have been recalled nearly a dozen times, and it grew to be a contest as to whether the rule of no encores could be broken. The law, however, obtained, and Dr. Muck proceeded to the Berlioz symphony. This had been much anticipated, for Berlioz is still, to the audience of today, a curious monster, and his works, particularly this one, with its slobbering, groaning emotionalism, where the woes of an individual are magnified with colossal egotism, and set forth as only the supreme virtuoso of the modern orchestra could set them forth, offer a tempting field for the modern conductor, and Dr. Muck is surely that. The performance was not a disappointment. The adagio, the whole first movement, in fact, with its brooding restlessness, the popular "Pilgrims' March," the piquant Serenade and the Orgy were very convincing, or at least as convincing as they could be made. Mr. Ferir, the solo viola, was unsurpassable in his part of the proceedings, and Dr. Muck showed a luminous sympathy with the composer, who was viewed as a madman in his time, and whose works are now ultra-modern to the 20th century audience. With his customary force and ability he gave us a new view of a singular creation.

MR. CONVERSE'S NEW FANTASY

"The Mystic Trumpeter." After Walt Whitman's Verses, to Be Played Next Week—A Note on the Contents, Purpose and Form of the Music

Trans. — Jan. 18, 1907
At the Symphony concerts of Jan. 25 and 26 Mr. F. S. Converse's orchestral fantasy "The Mystic Trumpeter" will be given its first Boston performances, an occasion for which we have had to wait far too long. It is worthy of remark that three cities have taken precedence over Boston in so far as acquaintance with this masterpiece of all that Mr. Converse has done in the larger instrumental forms. It was first brought out in February, 1905, by the Philadelphia orchestra under Mr. Scheel; about a year later it was given by the Cincinnati orchestra under Mr. van der Stucken. On April 2, 1906, it was played at a concert of the New Music Society of America by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Modest Altschuler. Inasmuch as the poetic effect of the music is definitely associated by the composer with the poem of the same name by Walt Whitman, it may not be out of place to quote the verses which are connected with the music.

I.

Hark, some wild trumpeter, some strange musician,
Hovering unseen in air, vibrates capricious tunes tonight.
I hear thee, trumpeter, listening alert I catch thy notes,
Now pouring, whirling like a tempest round me,
Now low subdued, now in the distance lost.

II.

Come nearer, bodiless one; haply in thee resounds
Some dead composer, haply thy pensive life
Was filled with aspirations high, uniform'd ideals,
Waves, oceans musical, chaotically surging,
That now ecstatic ghost, close to me bending, thy cornet echoing, pealing,
Gives out to no ears but mine, but freely gives to mine,
That I may translate thee.

III.

Blow trumpeter free and clear, I follow thee,
While at thy liquid prelude, glad, serene,
The fretting world, the streets, the noisy hours of day withdraw,
A holy calm descends like dew upon me,
I walk in cool refreshing night the walks of Paradise,
I scent the grass, the moist air and the roses;
Thy song expands my numb'd imbonded spirit, thou freest, launchest me,
Floating and basking upon heaven's lake.

V.

Blow again trumpeter! and for thy theme
Take now the enclosing theme of all, the solvent and the setting,
Love, that is pulse of all, the sustenance and the pang,
The heart of man and woman all for love,
No other theme but love—knitting, enclosing, all-diffusing love.
O how the immortal phantoms crowd around me!
I see the vast alembic ever working, I see and know the flames that beat the world,
The glow, the blush, the beating hearts of lovers,
So blissful happy some, and some so silent, dark and nigh to death;
Love that is all the earth to lovers—love, that mocks time and space,
Love that is night and day—love, that is sun and moon and stars,
Love, that is crimson, sumptuous, sick with perfume,
No other words but words of love, no other thought but love.

VI.

Blow again trumpeter—conjure war's alarms.
Swift to thy spell a shuddering hum like distant thunder rolls,
Lo, where the arm'd men hasten—lo, mid the clouds of dust the glint of bayonets,
I see the grime-faced cannoneer, I mark the rosy flash amid the smoke, I hear the cracking of the guns;
Nor war alone—thy fearful music-song, wild player, brings every sight of fear,
The deeds of ruthless brigands, rapine, murder—I hear the cries for help!
I see ships foundering at sea, I behold a deck and below deck the terrible tableaux.

VII.

O trumpeter, methinks I am myself the instrument thou playst, Thou mel'st my heart, my brain—thou movest, drawest, changest them at will;
And now thy sullen notes send darkness through me,
Thou takest away all cheering light, all hope,
I see the enslaved, the overthrown, the hurt, the oppress of the whole earth,
I feel the measureless shame and humiliation of my race, it becomes all mine,
Mine too the revenges of humanity, the wrongs of ages, baffled feuds and hatreds,
Utter defeat upon me weighs—all lost—the foe victorious, (Yet 'mid the ruins Pride colossal stands unshaken to the last, Endurance, resolution, to the last).

VIII.

Now trumpeter for thy close
Vouchsafe a higher strain than any yet,
Sing to my soul, renew its languishing faith and hope,

Rouse up my slow belief, give me some vision of the future,
Give me for once its prophecy and joy.
Oh glad exulting, culminating song!
A vigor more than earth's is in thy notes,
Marches of victory—man disenthralled—the conqueror at last,
Hymns to the universal God from universal man—all joy!
A reborn race appears—a perfect world—all joy!
Women and men in wisdom, innocence and health—all joy!
Riotous, laughing bacchanals filled with joy!
War, sorrow, suffering, gone—the rank earth purged—nothing but joy left!
The ocean filled with joy—the atmosphere
all joy!
Joy! joy! in freedom, worship, love! joy in the ecstasy of life!
Enough to merely be! enough to breathe!
Joy! joy! all over joy!

Mr. Converse has assigned these verses to certain sections of his fantasy. Thus the first three voices hint at the mood of the first section. The introduction suggests tones "hovering unseen in air," the "Mystic Trumpeter" theme is given to solo muted trumpet accompanied by strings. After some development comes the second section, which corresponds to the fifth verse, a glowing, highly-colored and imaginative illustration of the mood of this verse. After some elaboration of this theme there is a transition helped on by a fragment of "Marching Through Georgia," and we come to the third section, "War's Alarums." A return of the "Mystic Trumpeter" theme with added harmonic and dramatic intensity leads to an apotheosis of joy, "for thy close, vouchsafe a higher strain than any yet," broadly sung by all the brass, introducing a sort of peroration on the theme of love, and ending with a brilliant suggestion of "Joy, joy! over all joy!"

In this fantasy Mr. Converse has reached the most sustained expression of his individuality in the larger instrumental forms. To maintain coherence and logical development with so free a programme would tax the technical skill of any composer. Mr. Converse has not only given us a vivid suggestion of all that Whitman hints at, but firmly knit, elastic development of spontaneous and graphic themes, wrought with a solidity and unity of thought that is remarkable. The American composer has not manifested a striking ability to develop themes on a large scale without the artificial aid of a conventional form. That Mr. Converse, in spite of the freedom of his scheme, has ruled coherence with an even hand, speaks with singular force of the importance of his achievement, and of the rank which he should win thereby. E. B. H.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

F. S. Converse. "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasia.
Mozart. Aria. "L'Amoro," from "Il Re Pastore."
Verdi. Recit. ed Aria, from "La Traviata."
"Ah, fors' e Lui."
Soloist, Mme. Melba.
Berlioz. Symphony. "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Converse chose a strong subject for his orchestral fantasia in Walt Whitman's poem, which is full of contrasts. In one of its lines the poet cries to the trumpeter—"Thy cornet, echoing, pealing," which may indicate that he did not know the difference between a cornet and a trumpet, or it may be a case of what Mrs. Partington would have called "poetical licentiousness." If it is an error Whitman would not be the only poet who has slipped and fallen when upon musical ground. Coleridge, in his "Ancient Mariner," speaks of "the loud bassoon," when he probably meant trombone (for the bassoon is not especially loud nor would it be very prominent at a wedding feast), while Tennyson invites Maud to come into the garden and listen to an awful combination of "Flute, violin, bassoon," which even Richard Strauss has not tried yet, and Browning—the musical Browning—in his "Toccata of Martin Galuppi" speaks of "Sixths diminished, sigh on sigh," whereas few harmony teachers recognize a diminished sixth, and a succession of them would only constitute a set of consecutive fifths, which would make the teacher of harmony sigh.

Out of the Whitman suggestions Mr. Converse has made some fine orchestral contrasts of Mystery, Peace, War and Triumph, but the work is somewhat fragmentary in effect and neither so homogeneous nor so finely developed as his Overture to "Jeanne d'Arc" which was given in Boston recently. But it is a fine example of the composer's skill in orchestration. In brilliancy and good taste in scoring we can rank Mr. Converse as close to Loeffler and Van der Stucken.

The trumpet was not as prominent nor as characteristically used as one might have anticipated. Harp, bass clarinet, piccolo and oboe were quite as much in the foreground as the mystic gentleman of the title. Nor was the trumpet as well sounded as we are accustomed to hear it from our excellent soloist. The harp, oboe, and especially the bass clarinet, were exceedingly well played, and the piccolo gave out its phrase from "Marching through Georgia" with martial fervor. Loeffler has also used this tune as a typical motive in a very advanced vocal work. The musically uneducated Henry C. Work succeeded in writing one of the three chief songs of our Civil War, a fact that recent composers are beginning to recognize. Mr. Converse's Fantasia was abundantly applauded and its spirited character deserved the tribute.

Then came the event of the concert which threw Converse, Berlioz, the orchestra, Dr. Muck and everything else into the shade. A phenomenal voice, a good larynx and a pair of well-trained vocal cords will outweigh all the other musical paraphernalia in existence, with the general public. Nor is this a recent fad; it has existed for 20 centuries. Imperial Rome valued its Gaditanian singers above all other music, and the Roman misses ran after these slaves with the persistence of a modern matinee girl. Cuzzoni and Faustina out-weighed Handel during the opera seasons of nearly 200 years ago. And Melba being now one of the greatest of her kind, has also the right to triumph over everything musical that is placed upon the programme beside her.

Mme. Melba is in her vocal prime. Never has her voice been so easily controlled or so attractive in its timbre. If we say that there was a trace of effort in one or two very high passages we have found the only fault that hyper-criticism could detect. Those who were her rivals are beginning to show the ravages of time, and it is quite possible that Melba is the greatest living soprano today. Therefore it was that people were standing in line at Symphony Hall, in a driving snow-storm, at 7 a.m. on Friday last, waiting for a chance to get in the hall at 2 p.m., when the carriages of those more favored persons, who held tickets, blocked all the adjacent streets.

Melba sang the Mozart number finely, but not phenomenally. The cadenza was very brilliant and Prof. Hess played the violin obbligato with discreet subordination. But in "Fors' e Lui," her foot was upon her native heath and she shone forth resplendent. The much-abused Alfredo was well represented by an amatory violoncello and the orchestral support was excellent. In this aria the "coloratura" was of the most brilliant description, yet nothing seemed forced or strained. The trill was liquid and beautiful, like that of Patti in her best days.

Therefore "Fors' e Lui" became the chief number of the concert with many an auditor, Wagner to the contrary notwithstanding. What do all the theories of high art matter to the populace? What boots it to say that the music should more subtly portray the underlying sorrow of Violetta, or that a person in the first stages of tuberculosis would not warble in this manner! It was tuneful, vocally gymnastic, and executed by a great singer, and all the theories in the world cannot abolish this branch of music. In fact, it may be a good thing for art when the leaders recognize the fact that tune is as much an element of music as the notes themselves, and return to writing melodies, adding to them the grand harmonies and orchestration of a Wagner or Strauss. We lost count of how many times Melba was recalled. There was tremendous enthusiasm at the end of the number, and at one time it seemed as if the audience were trying to break through the musical laws of the Boston Medes and Persians, and force an encore.

We were glad to see, however, that there was no exodus at the end of the Verdi confectionery. Evidently the singer's triumph did not abolish an appreciation of higher and more dramatic musical work. The first movement of the "Childe Harold" symphony was made perhaps a trifle too heroic for its theme, but Dr. Muck brought out every point of the complicated score. Mr. Ferir was roundly applauded as he came forward to take the obbligato viola part, and he played the tender theme with the utmost beauty.

Mr. Schuecker had also much important work to do in this concert. He had been very prominent in the Converse Fantasia and in the first movement of the "Childe Harold" his support of the viola was exquisitely shaded. But, of course, Mr. Ferir's playing was the most conspicuous and important part of the solo work, and it could not have been better performed; it was the embodiment of the melancholy of "Childe Harold," an emotion that fitted the viola like a glove.

Especially well-shaded were the iridescent passages bowed near the bridge, ("sull' ponticello") in the second movement.

This entire "March of the Pilgrims" was deliciously interpreted by all. Only we found the horn a little too loud at first in the bell tones (the moment the tone is forced the bell-like quality disappears) and the harp was not nearly loud enough; where we sat it was inaudible.

In the third movement the Pifferari seemed far more natural than even those of Handel ("Messiah") or Liszt ("Christus"), although Berlioz did not, like these two, use an actual Pifferaro tune. In this movement one can speak with praise of the playing of the English horn, of the Harold theme as it appears on the flute, and of the delicate shading of the viola as it plays alone at the close. One seemed to see the Byronic hero standing gloomy and apart, after all the merry-making.

Dr. Muck certainly brought out all the brutality of the finale, and his reading was again of the highest order. Every contrast was finely made, the reminiscence of the "March of the Pilgrims" interrupting the orgie of the brigands as a whiff of pure air might penetrate into a reeking atmosphere. Yet the finale seems fading somewhat. It is possible that we have at present gone so far beyond what, a half-century ago, were considered the extremes of music, that the old outbursts seem tame to us.

And now our orchestra departs to prove to western cities that we have not been standing still in our symphonic achievements. There will therefore be no concerts on Friday and Saturday of this week. Bon voyage! Louis C. Elson.

210

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

PAUL DUKAS.

SCHERZO "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." (after a ballad by Goethe.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

CONCERTO for PIANO, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23.

- I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. Allegro con spirito.
- II. Andantino semplice. Allegro vivace assai.
- III. Allegro con fuoco.

EDG. TINEL.

THREE SYMPHONIC PICTURES for ORCHESTRA, derived from P. Corneille's Tragedy, "Polyeucte." op. 21.

- I. Overture.
- II. Pauline's Dream.
- III. Festival in Jupiter's Temple.
 - a) Processional march.
 - b) Dances.
 - c) Sudden Intrusion of Polyeucte and Nearchus. (First time in Boston.)

Soloist:

Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The Week-End Concerts

Dr. Muck was almost the operatic conductor at the Symphony concert of Saturday, and the dramatic qualities that are in him had an outlet that his severer programmes do not always afford. Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," is as truly music to accompany, enforce and illuminate an action, as though the enchanted broom were running to and fro with its buckets on the stage and not merely in Goethe's verses in the programme book. There is the magical spell to weave; the broom to exorcise; its speed with the buckets and the deluge of water and of fear with which it overwhelms the apprentice to portray until the potent word of the master-sorcerer sends it back to its corner. The scherzo is a sprightly musical farce, one of the few like Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" that really "comes off"—impossible to represent illusively on the stage, but quite possible to depict in tones. Dr. Muck and his men played it as though they were acting it. They spun the tale vivaciously, wove its atmosphere of humorous fantasy, caught its dramatic accents, contrasts and climaxes. They flung it off with the zest that a farce must have in tones or in anything else; and they added the last virtue of buoyant spontaneity and lightly incisive brilliance. The rhythm throughout pricked the fancy more keenly than spoken words; the whole scherzo rippled with action; the end was like a "quick curtain."

Again in Tschaiikovski's piano concerto in B-flat minor, Dr. Muck and Mme. Samaroff sought and gained the dramatic accent that makes it one of the very few modern concertos that is alive. The music is no mere combination of tonal patterns, imaginative or perfunctory, and no adroit or obvious means for the display of the pianist's virtuosity. It is the best praise of it and of the pianist that the listener hears with little thought of technical achievement. As remote is the quest of mere ingenuity. The listener does not wonder what the composer will invent next. Instead, he yields quickly to a truly dramatic poem that Tschaiikovski chose to have a piano and an orchestra sing. Each has its moods and passions. The voice of the one answers the voice of the other. Melody struggles with melody, in a very conflict of musical wills. There are retorts, encouragements, pauses, excitements. A dozen contrasting emotions play through the music, from the struggling melody of the introduction to the whirling dance of the close. Again, the rhythm is as action. Again, the whole is as a drama in tones. Again, Dr. Muck, with Mme. Samaroff gave it motion, illusion and vitality. Granted an imagination like Tschaiikovski's and there is no need to anticipate the extinction of concertos. Granted such a performance as Dr. Muck's and Mme. Samaroff's and there is no need to deprecate the playing of them as so much routine.

In the scherzo and in the concerto Dr. Muck had music that is inherently dramatic. In Tinel's "tone-pictures" out of Corneille's "Polyeucte," he had music that was intended to be such, but was not. In spite of the secluded asceticism that Tinel cultivates, the "tone-pictures" are rhetorical, declamatory, theatrical, meet adornment of a "soirée de gala" when "Polyeucte" is taken down from a dusty shelf for an anniversary of Corneille's birth or death. In the music it is easy to see and hear Mounet-Sully, Sylvain and Mme. Dudley stalking and mouthing through the tragedy on the stage of the Théâtre Français while a dutiful audience tries to summon responsive emotions. The players' business is to make Corneille's verses "sound," and it was the conductor's business on Saturday to make Tinel's music "sound." He and his men must transform its swelling rhetoric into sonorous tonal pomp; they must lift its stilted declamation into heroic utterance; they must give the music the grandiose stride and air. In a word, they must glorify it as the French singers of a passing generation used to glorify Meyerbeer's operas. The first concern of the theatre is to persuade for and on the instant, letting cool and subsequent reflections be what they will. If Tinel's music is to make any impression at all, it must be played with equal theatrical intent. To treat it perfunctorily is to betray every one of its weaknesses. To inflate it too much is to turn it into empty bombast. Between is a golden mean that touches it with a grandiose glamor and makes it seem large and almost significant. At that mean Dr. Muck held the "tone-pictures." They sounded grandiloquent; they almost sounded dramatic; and to make them so was perhaps a more difficult and strenuous feat of conducting than to give Dukas's scherzo or Tschaiikovski's concerto its native dramatic accent. It would be good to hear Dr. Muck conduct an opera of Meyerbeer.

Mme. Samaroff's playing of the solo part in Tschaiikovski's concerto confirmed her place among the young pianists of the new school whose traits, apropos of Mr. Ganz, we were noting the other day. Throughout Mme. Samaroff was eloquent with the appropriate eloquence of the music; throughout she seemed to take no thought of herself but every thought of Tschaiikovski. She conceived the concerto as a whole tone-poem, not as a succession of individual and telling effects. It never halted and it never made undue haste. It marched surely and clearly to its moments of decisive contrast and climax. Mme. Samaroff's gradual unfolding and illuminating of the spacious melody of the introduction was truly moving, as a broad, deep beam traverses and dispels surrounding mists. She kept the ensuing allegro alive with rhythm and warmly dramatic with sensuous feeling. The lyric intermezzo—for the second movement is none other—she softened or brightened with a pliant and sensitive charm that has not always been so delicate in her playing. In the finale she and the orchestra struck alternate fire until the music first glinted and then blazed. And all this without a hint of extravagance, exaggeration or toll, with entire command of an expressive technic, an animating touch, and a tone that is as the idea or the emotion made beautiful, vital or eloquent sound. Throughout the impression was of the pianist's mastery of herself, her instrument and her music. The impression was so deep, so stirring, because of the sense behind of full understanding, of emotion felt and controlled, of passion that is ordered because it is so strong.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB 10, 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Olga Samaroff Soloist
at the Symphony.

Pittsburg Orchestra Soon to Be Here—Kandel and Haydn.

Numerous Recitals of the Next Few Days.

The 14th Symphony program comprised the scherzo, "The Sorceress' Apprentice," by Paul Dukas; Tschalkowsky's first piano concerto, Mme Olga Samaroff soloist, and, for the first time here, three symphonic pictures for orchestra by Edgar Tinel, derived from Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte." The jingling and mysterious measures of the quaint Dukas scherzo opened the program in an agreeable manner, for Dr Muck's forces tripped and danced through the peculiar harmonies in a charmingly dainty and spirited way, conjuring, musically, the vivid suggestions of necromancy, as intended by the composer.

In the score the themes are cleverly "juggled" among different instruments and the players skillfully followed the ideas and brought out the tricky phrases as well as the "shivering trumpet blasts" in splendid fashion. It is a jelly little piece and right merrily was it performed by the Symphony men.

Mme Samaroff's performance of the Tschalkowsky concerto was generally commendable, the chief fault being in the almost inaudible pianissimo which at times crept into her playing; a gentleness permissible in a very small hall, but not in association with an orchestra of Symphony proportions. Aside from this little defect the artist's work was thoroughly pleasing and combined the necessary vigor in fortissimo with fine gradations of nuance, technical facility and clarity and carefully proportioned shadings.

In the opening movement Mme Samaroff's heavy chord passages needed no excuse by reason of sex, for they were given with masculine power; her varying themes, of a lighter nature, were very sweetly set forth and the strenuous cadenza measures were admirably handled. The cantabile quality of her work in the second part was exquisite and in the turbulent final movement the dash and brilliancy of her interpretation were unmistakably appealing. She was most heartily applauded for her excellent work.

Tinel's three "pictures" are varied enough in musical color to illustrate quite vividly the themes of the Corneille tragedy without being of any marked value. Parts of the first section, the phrases given to the brasses, are pleasingly sonorous and these showed to advantage this contingent of the orchestra. The second movement "Pauline's Dream," is rather spasmodic in character with fortissimo ejaculations ad lib. The last movement is made up of cleverly devised contrasts worked out by the different bands and culminating in a furious finale for the brasses against arabesque figures on the strings. This latter part was the most interesting of the "pictures" and the work by Dr Muck's men was of that brilliant quality which makes their ensemble playing so nearly perfect.

This week the program will have for a novelty the "Sinfonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss, a work of extraordinary technical difficulties. Special attention is called to the fact that this piece opens the concert and lasts for 50 minutes and is played without pause, so a prompt attendance is requested, as the doors will remain closed until the end of the symphony. Mr Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the well-known pianist, will be heard in Brahms' second concerto and the concert will close with his "Academic" overture.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Dukas. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Scherzo. Tschalkowsky. Piano Concerto, No. 1, B flat minor. Soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.

Tinel. Three Symphonic Pictures from "Polyeucte."

It has been maintained that humor cannot be portrayed in instrumental music without a programme or a definition of its intention by a title at least. But we find humor in Brahms' "Academic Overture" without such aid, and we believe that Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice" would be humorous enough, even if deprived of its story. But given a descriptive title and instrumental music can become graphically comical. Nearly 200 years ago Rameau wrote a humorous sketch for the Spinnet, entitled "La Poule," in which the hen cackled in a mirth-provoking fashion. "The Musical Joke," by Mozart, was a piece of chamber music in which a would-be composer strained every nerve to achieve a composition in the classical sonata form. This delightful work (far too seldom heard) would convey its purport without any title or explanation.

But of jokes cracked by a full modern orchestra we have but two, this scherzo by Dukas and "Till Eulenspiegel," by Strauss. We must state that the first of these does not wear as well as the second. All of the grotesque effects are upon the surface in this present composition and a third hearing is not as effective as a first. Nevertheless, the charm of the persistent theme, the quaintness of the bassoons and contrabassoon, the catchiness of the rhythmic effects, had by no means evaporated, and the bassoons were admirably played. Dr. Muck's reading of the work was most clear and graphic, and he was recalled with enthusiasm at its close.

Mme. Samaroff has certainly won her way to a very high position among the pianists of the present. How much of a favorite she is in Boston was shown by the hearty applause given at her appearance before she had played a note. Her excellent performance of the Grieg concerto last year was evidently remembered. She proceeded at once to justify the outburst by beginning the first movement of the Tschalkowsky concerto in splendid style, playing the powerful chords, against the full orchestra, with wrists of steel. She united great technique with much poetry, and the difficult cadenza was finely played.

Yet we found her most attractive in the second movement, where the tender chief theme (at first played beautifully by the flute) was given with charming delicacy, and the shading was perfect. The brilliant octave playing of the finale and the breadth of the final climax must also be chronicled. Mme. Samaroff was recalled three times with most spontaneous enthusiasm.

Yet we could have borne with more sustained power in the finale. There is something of Cossack ferocity in the last movement of this concerto. The orchestral support was excellent. There is much of Schumann in the make-up of Tschalkowsky, and one finds in his works the same poetry of tune that is in the works of the great German. This leads us to add that, while we have had Grieg and Tschalkowsky in concerto form many times recently, we have not heard Schumann's piano concerto in a very long time.

Tinel's new work (new at least to Boston) had the merit of being clear and tuneful. It had the fault of too much bombast. The composer seemed to have altered Hoyle's well-known rule into "When in doubt play trombones!" The trombones and trumpets were constantly blowing, and made matters too sustainedly heroic and ponderous.

However, much of this loftiness and dignity fitted the ancient theme, and the instruments were excellently played. The brasses certainly earned their salary at this concert.

The coherency and nobility of the overture may be conceded, but "Pauline's Dream" (the second movement) only tempted one to warn the Pauline aforesaid against late suppers and cold mince pie. The Festival March was again a clear bit of writing, but by this time one had become tired of fanfares and brazen chords, so that its ponderous measures fell, not upon deaf, but deafened ears.

The dances which portrayed festivities in the pagan temple were not excessively sensuous, but were earnest, comprehensible and unfrenzied. There was much merit in such a cool, calm school in our present fever-laden musical atmosphere. But we fear that Tinel is a trifle too Johnsonian in his musical utterances in this work. Yet it will bear repetition.

We are glad to find that Dr. Muck is giving us novelties at last. Not that novelty-hunting is a good or a healthy thing, but we ought to know, through our symphony concerts, what is taking place in the modern orchestral world. We may not enjoy Mahler, Reger or D'Indy in some of their most advanced utterances, but we ought to hear them (once), nevertheless. Next Saturday we are to have the domestic troubles of the Strauss family unveiled.

Louis C. Elson.

14TH SYMPHONY Post Feb 9, 07 REHEARSAL

(BY OLIN DOWNES.)

The programme of the 14th Symphony rehearsal consisted of Paul Dukas' scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Tschalkowsky's B-flat minor piano concerto, and three symphonic pictures for orchestra, after Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte," performed for the first time in Boston. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the soloist.

The performance was an exceptionally effective one.

Mme. Samaroff gained another triumph in the Tschalkowsky concerto. Her almost masculine grip of her subject matter and big conception of the composition, as well as her remarkable poise and control of her temperament, enabled her to give a remarkably virile and coherent performance of one of Tschalkowsky's strongest works. There was majesty in her declamation of the opening theme, breadth and strength throughout the first movement; sentiment which never degenerated into sentimentality in the sensuously tender theme of the slow movement, and Cossack fire in the barbaric finale. She was received with intense enthusiasm.

Tinel's "Franciscus," which we have never heard, aroused extended criticism when performed here some years ago. He was hailed as a mystic, a modern prophet, etc. The expectations aroused by these reports were woefully disappointed yesterday. This work, we believe, is the composer's first for orchestra alone. Perhaps purely instrumental music is not a specially congenial method of expression for him, or perhaps he was not thoroughly at home in this element at that time. However it may be, the music performed yesterday is deficient in thematic individuality, uninteresting, on the whole, in its development, stagey and theatrical to the last degree. It is not entirely ineffective. The chorale intoned at intervals by the trombones gives pomp and color to the overture; there are truly dramatic moments in "Pauline's Dream," the second number, and there is the sensation of an impressive scene and strange religious ceremonies during the last movement, "The Festival in Jupiter's Temple." In spite of this, we have the continual sensation of one who has chosen too ambitious a subject for his ideas to adequately illustrate; the music rarely, if ever, rises to the level of Corneille's tragedy, is often weak, rarely original, and too frequently commonplace.

MME. SAMAROFF WINS OVATION AT SYMPHONY.

Boston American July 10 '07
Plays Tchaikowsky Piano Concerto with Inspiring Abandon and Brilliance.

FIRST HUB HEARING OF TINEL TONE PICTURES

By Kent Perkins.

Barring the short opening number, Paul Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," a fetching bit of grotesquerie based on Goethe's ballad of that name, the fourteenth symphony concert of the season last night was a full feast of glowing melody and full-voiced harmony, modern in spirit and form, yet unspotted by the straining after novelty for novelty's sake that some "modern" composers use to cloak poverty of imagination and paucity in inspiration.

There were only two pieces besides that of Dukas, but they were both long and full of varied musical meat, so that neither quantity nor quality was lacking.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, whose presence has come to be exceedingly welcome to Boston audiences, played Tschalkowsky's piano concerto No. 1 in B flat minor. She was a bit nervous, but this showed only triflingly in her manner and did not in the least mar the beauty, poesy and brilliance of her work. She played with an abandon that was inspiring and she overcame the terrific difficulties of the piece with an ease that was astonishing.

In passages whose swiftness was that of lightning her music was like spouts of living fire, shining, clear, seemingly a continuous gleaming tone. Yet it was formed of separate notes, struck by flying fingers, not once missing their mark. At the close she was greeted with hearty and prolonged applause, both from audience and orchestra, and was thus called forth several times.

Edgar Tinel's three symphonic pictures, Op. 21, from Corneille's tragedy, "Polyeucte," performed for the first time in Boston, formed the last part of the programme. The three pictures are overture, Pauline's dream, festival in the temple of Jupiter.

The music is a pictorial, grandiose, duly tinged with tragedy, and probably affected by the Roman theme and its classic handling by Corneille, yet it is strongly human and rich in emotional appeal. There are moments of graceful beauty in the two dances in the temple. There are also intervals of considerable duration where the convulsive shivers and manufactured thrills remind one too forcibly and vividly of the Bowery and its melodrama. The orchestra and Dr. Muck gave the work the benefit of a performance that was magnificent in force and finish.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Circumstance—Tinel and His "Early Christian" Tone-Pictures—Did His Romans and Pagan Ceremonies Interest Him More Than His Martyrs?—Music That Has More Rhetorical Commonplace Than Characteristic Imagination—The Decline of Tinel's Mysticism

Trans. Feb. 9, 1907
Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra gave their first concert yesterday afternoon since their return from their victorious progress through the West, and it was easy to imagine a touch of welcome and approval in the warm applause that the conductor received as he came upon the stage. The audience on Friday afternoons is not the most alert in the world, but it has not yet become so used to Dr. Muck as to make its greeting a perfunctory courtesy, and interest in him still holds it to the end of the concert. Apparently the fatigue that naturally followed the Western journey and impending labors upon Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" measurably determined the programme. It is a weekly temptation to search Dr. Muck's list for some design that may lurk underneath, but yesterday none was discoverable except the working necessities of the moment. Dukas's scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," began the concert. Last year the orchestra played it several times under Mr. d'Indy. The year before it had played it as often under Mr. Gericke. The piece is firmly set in the repertory, and the band comes to it as to a regular thing. Tschalkowsky's concerto in B-flat minor for piano followed and Mme. Samaroff played the solo part with a varied eloquence that indicated a fresh broadening and deepening of her powers. Ten days ago the orchestra was playing the same concerto in Chicago for Mr. Ganz, and again it was prepared. Last came the three tone-pictures to which Corneille's "Christian" and classic tragedy of "Polyeucte" had moved the Belgian, Edgar Tinel. They were new to Boston; they are not familiar anywhere, and upon them Dr. Muck and his men had evidently spent their pains. Other new music has sometimes more rewarded them; but the audience listened with interest to the end.

The Belgian composers—Paul Gilson, Jan Blockx, and Edgar Tinel—seem to work contentedly for themselves and for the Belgians about them. Now and then their music crosses the border into the neighboring France or Germany and even goes onward into a larger world. Tinel's own oratorio, "Franciscus" so went ten years ago from city to city. Gilson's "Sea-Pieces" passed from orchestra to orchestra. Blockx's operas have been heard outside Brussels. The composers themselves go their way unmoved, writing to their Flemish texts, finding Flemish inspirations, and seeking to develop a Flemish music. The great cosmopolitan world does not disturb them. They are concerned with a Flanders that is older than the Gallicized Belgium that has swallowed it. Blockx's music is almost unknown in America. Those that have heard it elsewhere find national and racial traits in it. There were none in Gilson's "Sea-Pieces," and an equally imaginative and expressive Frenchman or German might have written them. Tinel, as "Franciscus" disclosed him, when choral society after choral society was singing it, was interesting as an individual, not as a Belgian. It is easy to say now that "Franciscus" was overpraised—a new oratorio that is imaginatively and musically alive is so rare a thing—but in the music was the suggestion of a temperament that was half-mystic and half-sensuous. Tinel could imagine and utter the devout ecstasies of the converted saint Francis; his eye could also see and his imagination feel the courtly life wherein that conversion was wrought. The pomps of a mediaeval Assisi touched him as well as its humilities. His seemed a temperament akin to Gounod's in its blending of mysticism and sensuousness, but Tinel's was of less amorous and purer and sincerer strain. Out of such imagination, leaping spontaneously to expression as it did in "Franciscus," impressive and distinctive music might come. Enthusiasts saw a Thomas-A Kempis plying the arts of composition and spiritualizing them as devout Florentine painters spiritualized their lines and colors. "Franciscus" came and went, which also is the way of new oratorios, and since, Tinel has written little music, and still less has been played outside his own Belgium.

Corneille's "Christian tragedy" of "Polyeucte" might easily stir the imagination of such a composer, as it has touched many another without pretence to a devout spirit or a mystically ecstatic temperament. True, Corneille's early Christians stalk and speak in his characteristic heroic vein. He could conceive them in no other. They must front his heroic Romans. They are born breakers of images and disturbers of pagan rites. (After all, was it not the manners more than the morals of the early Christians that irritated the persecuting Romans?) Yet Polyeucte and his friend Néarque, had their ecstasies of vision and devotion. The martyr's sombre rhapsody and his passionate discourse with his unbelieving wife glow with them. Presumably it was the mystical side of Polyeucte and of his tragedy that would stir Tinel. The composer could pluck him out of the sock and buskin of classic tragedy and carry into music only the essence of his rapt spirit. The contrast and background might spring from the stately march of the tragedy and from the pompous Roman setting. The heroic vein of Corneille hardly ran in Tinel. The mystic did and as "Franciscus" had long ago proved, the theatrical was not altogether absent.

Yet, face to face with the "tone-pictures" yesterday, the hearer caught hardly a reflection of the exaltation of the martyr. In the third "picture," for example, the governor, his train and the people moved in solemn procession to the pagan temple. The music was truly and sonorously ceremonial. It had weight. It did not lack a sober eloquence and stately pace. It was largely conceived, largely written. It escaped the commonplace with which the mere word "march" on a programme is pregnant. The temple dances followed. There was sensuous and occasionally bizarre imagination in their rhythm and instrumental color. They were both of an ordered ceremony and of a lush and languorous Orient. Then, for climax, the outcry of Polyeucte against the pagan gods and his heel upon the forehead of their overturned images. The orchestra was as turbulent as the scene it would picture. The voice of pagan dance and ceremony died. The choral of the triumphant Christians pealed. In sum the "tone-picture" was an interesting musical treatment of the episode, with Cornille's severe recital amplified by a more pictorial and sensuous imagination. Yet it wanted power and individuality. There was no sense, perhaps there could not be, of the spiritizing Tinel of "Franciscus." He had chosen to deal with externals. The pagans seemed to stir him more than the Christians. Akin, but less interesting, was what seemed at a single hearing the solemn commonplace of the overture—stately and expressive orchestral rhetoric, with the swelling choral and just a hint in a songful melody of the devout ecstasy of the martyr it would celebrate. The one vivid suggestion of the imaginatively and mystically sensitive Tinel of the oratorio came in the second picture, "Pauline's Dream." At moments it was as the music of phantoms of the night, of troubling ghosts of those whom Pauline loved and who were in sore pain. There were harmonies in it that were spectral, grisly, of no near and warm thing. Then rare and individual imagination played in the music and searched the hearer. It had not, after all, quite forsaken Tinel.

H. T. P.

MME. SAMAROFF AND SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays Tinel's "Symphonic Pictures" Here for First Time.

DUKAS' WITTY SCHERZO

AGAIN ON PROGRAMME

Soloist Gives Superb Performance of Tschaikowsky's Piano Concerto.

Herald Feb. 10, 1907

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. Mme. Olga Samaroff was the solo pianist. The programme was as follows:

Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Dukas
Concerto for piano No. 1, Tschaikowsky
Three Symphonic Pictures derived from Cornille's "Polyeucte" Tinel

Dukas' Scherzo was played last night at the Symphony concerts for the third time. Although the composer is over 40 years old, the list of his published works is a short one. His opera, founded on Maeterlinck's whimsical, yet vivid, version of the legend of Bluebeard, is completed, but it has not yet been performed. Since 1897 no new important work for orchestra by Dukas has been produced. A "Villanelle" for horn and piano was performed about a month ago at a concert in Paris.

It would seem that Dukas has not naturally a fertile musical mind, and that composition is to him a set and arduous task. He is now known at the age of 40 to the world as the composer of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." He is, then, a brother in eloquence of "Single-speech" Hamilton, who, by the way, is said to have made other speeches and good ones. Dukas has his overture to "Polyeucte," his symphony, his piano sonata, but who knows them or hears of them?

This scherzo in illustration of Goethe's ballad presupposes for enjoyment an acquaintance with the poem. It is not necessary to go back to Lucian's satiric sketch, where Goethe found the story. There was a time when Lucian's "Dialogues of the Dead" were read in class at Exeter, and in other schools; but the "Lie-Fancier" was not read by many schoolboys, and Lucian today is not numbered among the "quick sellers." How many in the audience last night, outside of the German born, were familiar with Goethe's ballad?

Here is an instance where the title alone does not give to the great majority of American hearers at least immediate information concerning the musical contents of the piece. Of course, all respectable sorcerers have apprentices, as a male virtuoso today seldom travels without his secretary; but if the scherzo is to be judged humorous or grim or fantastical, the judge must base his opinion on comparisons made at the time between Goethe's ballad and Dukas' music, and he thus runs the risk of not hearing all the music, or of failing to note the transliteration into music of a particular passage.

Suppose the hearer ignorant of the poem and the story. Does the scherzo as music without any association of idea impress or charm him? Is the appeal emotional or merely one to the intellect?

The interpretation of Dr. Muck and the performance of the orchestra were extraordinarily brilliant, so brilliant that they might have vitalized less inherently effective music.

It is not too much to say that any hearer ignorant of Goethe's ballad would have been entertained and impressed by the melodic quaintness and capriciousness, the swing and dash, the mystery, the whimsicality, the glitter of the instrumentation. This music appeals both to sensitive nerves and to cool intellect. He that was familiar with the story perhaps had a fuller appreciation than he to whom the scherzo was simply a scherzo. But this music is more than programme music.

Should one ask whether a broom be fit material for an art work, answer him, "The broomstick may be tragic." Men, women, little children have been tortured, hanged, burned, drowned, because they were convicted on the evidence of trustworthy persons who saw them riding to Satan's Sabbath astride a broomstick.

Mme. Samaroff gave a superb performance of the gorgeously barbaric concerto of Tschaikowsky. For once the introductory defiant theme was taken at a pace that allowed the expression of arrogant pomp. The contrast with the main body of the movement was all the more dramatic. The whole performance of the first movement was dramatic and exciting, from the mumbly theme, which the composer heard from a beggar's lips, to the sonorous close.

Admirable, too, was Mme. Samaroff's reading of the second movement, by reason of simplicity and expression of contrasted moods. The finale was in true Cossack spirit and the performance was distinguished by its rhythm and color. The pace at which it was taken was swift, but none too swift; the mechanism was clear and polished; speed never became a scramble.

The whole performance was thoughtfully considered, thoroughly prepared, delightful in detail, irresistible in dash, fire, authority. The repose of the player, her modesty, her freedom from self-consciousness, made this performance the more memorable. Dr. Muck's accompaniment was an inspiration to her.

Tinel, a man of strong, if not bigoted religious convictions, saw in Polyeucte, the hero of Cornille's tragedy, a sympathetic soul, as his own poverty had tempted him to glorify in music St. Francis of Assisi, who was never weary of singing the praises of poverty. Inspired by the tragedy, Tinel wrote an overture, a movement descriptive of Pauline's dream, and a musical illustration of the festival in Jupiter's Temple, with stately processional march, dances, and then the intrusion of Polyeucte, who in his Christian fervor, mocked gods and priests, and finally broke the sacred vessels and overthrew the statue of Jove himself.

There was plenty of material for the overture: Chorals and church tones to represent the Christians; plaintive themes to typify the conflict between Polyeucte's love for his Pagan wife Pauline and his duty as a fierce iconoclast; or a theme to typify the pure love of the heroine for the Roman Severus, who, loved by her, was reported dead on the battle field; for the close a grand apotheosis—the triumph of Christianity, as shown by the conversions that followed the beheading of Polyeucte.

The dream of Pauline—how Severus appeared to her and reproached her for infidelity, and her father, Felix, stabbed her husband—gave opportunity for dramatic composition, as the temple scene for pomp and ceremony, song and dance, melodramatic intensity. Nor was the stern, yet mystical Tinel disturbed by the thought of ballet music. It will be remembered that he introduced a waltz in his "Franciscus."

It is a curious fact that when Gounod's "Polyeucte" was produced at the Opera, Paris, the chief feature was the first appearance of Rosita Mauri, the Spanish dancer, in the temple scene. Dancers costumed as Roman legionaries in blue and pink answered the fanfare of Bellona. The entrance of Venus Amphitrite was declared "delicious." A waltz of Nereids was one of the most successful numbers.

As for Rosita she danced a mazurka in a fine anachronistic spirit. She impersonated Venus, and there was a grave discussion at the time whether her legs were not too thin for ideal beauty. This amiable and entertaining discussion did not save the opera. Donizetti's "Polinto" is now forgotten. The iconoclast of Nicomedia cuts no figure today on the operatic stage. He still awaits a composer.

Tinel's overture and temple music are fortunate in this: They may pass in the concert hall as absolute music. Pauline's Dream is naturally in need of an interpreter. The overture might be concerned with any man or woman, for a choral does not necessarily have any definite, particular significance: It is used by composers of chamber music, symphonies, violin concertos, without any compelling reason. "Festival in Jupiter's Temple" might be any festival with march and dances—for the music that afterward deals specifically with Polyeucte is of less importance.

When the music is carefully examined it is for the most part conventional or unaffectedly cheap. The overture is sound and orthodox. It is also too long by reason of undue development and damnable iteration. There is one phrase—the more sentimental portion of the second theme—that fairly gets on the hearer's nerves before the composer, enamored of it, is willing to dismiss it in its original form. Nevertheless this overture is the best of the three "Pictures."

Tinel, a well educated musician, with orchestral fluency, is not dramatic. This lack of dramatic force is shown in his "Franciscus." When he came to write music for Pauline's dream, the task was beyond his ability, and as absolute music, the movement is uninteresting. Nor does the "Festival" music suggest the solemn rites, the sacred dances.

The march might have been sketched by any English doctor of music as a closing organ voluntary, and the dances have neither mystical significance nor voluptuous grace.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra did their utmost in the service of Tinel, but the material with which they had to work was ordinary, lumpish, insufficient.

rite is a Weber.

1 Concert next week.

THE EFFORT TO RETAIN DR. MUCK

The following paragraph appeared yesterday in precisely the same words in several of the New York papers. It confirms substantially the statements in the Transcript a month ago as to Dr. Muck's continuance in the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra. The paragraph runs: "Despite the printed reports that Dr. Muck has been reëngaged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a term of years, nothing of the kind has happened, and such announcements are, to say the least, premature. It is no secret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is most desirous of retaining the services of this distinguished musician, and efforts are being made to this end. Nor is it a secret that Dr. Muck wants to stay in America; but he is bound to [the] Berlin [Opera] by a contract of six years, which goes into effect next fall, for the condition on which his leave of absence was granted was that he should sign this contract. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether the German emperor will release him from his engagement in Berlin, for the release must come directly from William II. It is unfortunately doubtful whether this favor will be granted and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will probably have the difficult task of replacing him next season." We believe, however, that the effort to secure the imperial consent to another leave of absence for Dr. Muck is still quietly in progress, and that some hope remains of gaining it.

Trans. Feb. 4, 1905

SYMPHONY'S RETURN IS SIGNALIZED BY NEW WORK

Janet Feb. 11, 1907

Tinel's "Three Symphonic Pictures" Given for First Time in Boston—Mme. Samaroff as Soloist Gave Brilliant Performance.

At the fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening the soloist was Olga Samaroff. The program consisted of the brilliant Scherzo of Dukas, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Tchaikovsky's Concerto for Piano, No. 1, and three symphonic pictures derived from Cornille's Poly-eucte by Tinel.

The Tinel work was heard for the first time in Boston. It consisted of an overture, "Pauline's Dream," and the "Festival in the Temple of Jupiter." The overture is a well-developed and sonorous work, with Christian and pagan themes unmistakably evident. "Pauline's Dream" is an attempt to depict the wild scream in which her pagan lover, her Christian husband and her father figure, and in which her father kills her husband. Even with a program this picture is confused and difficult to follow; without it, it is not intelligible. The "Festival in the Temple of Jupiter" consists of three parts, a march of priests, dances and interruption by the Christians and overthrow of idols. Here the composer has little difficulty in telling his story. The march is stately and thoroughly pagan in character, the dances pleasing, and the Christian theme forceful and stirring.

Mme. Samaroff played the Tchaikovsky Concerto with great brilliancy. Her confidence was superb and she had all the fire and dash and technical power of a very great pianist.

The Scherzo proved most entertaining and was played by the orchestra magnificently, while Dr. Muck conducted with appreciation of the quaint work.

WORCESTER LOSES SYMPHONY BY SNOW

Concert Cancelled, as Players Feared Storm Would Hold Them in City.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.] WORCESTER, Feb. 5, 1907. The storm today was the worst that Worcester has experienced this season. Up to noon more than a foot of snow had fallen.

The drifts in outside towns are deep, and the lines from Southbridge, Spencer, Webster and Clinton are considerably off schedule. The Boston & Worcester is having one of its worst experiences since its opening on account of the drifts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance has been postponed owing to the inability of the B. & A. to guarantee it a return train tonight on account of the snow.

It was not until after the noon hour that there was any sign of a let-up in the snowfall. Freight traffic on the steam roads is practically abandoned.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

EDGAR TINELAND HIS THREE "TONE-PICTURES"

An Unfamiliar Composer and a New Composition at the Symphony Concerts This Week—Early Strauss by the Longy Club—Mrs. Beach's Recital—London Sees a "Shilling-Shocker"—Miss Farrar Warmly Praised in "Tannhauser"—Other News of the Day Trans. Feb. 7, 1907.

Edgar Tinel, whose name appears tomorrow for the first time upon the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is nevertheless a composer of long-established European reputation. He was born at Sinay in East Flanders, March 27, 1857, the son of a schoolmaster who was also an organist of some attainments. At the age of eight he began piano lessons with his father. Afterward he went to the Royal Conservatory at Brussels, when Fétis, who was then director, received him with marked kindness and interest. Here he studied under Gevaert, Kufferath and Brassin. His work was hampered by extreme poverty, and he was obliged to spend part of the time allotted for practice in mending and even making his clothes. At the age of thirteen he was allowed to give up his general studies, and this enabled him to earn money for his expenses by teaching the piano and singing in choirs. In 1872 he won a prize for piano-playing, and in the following year obtained the first prize. Then on a trip to Germany he made the acquaintance of Raff, the composer, and in consequence decided to devote himself wholly to composition. In 1877, he won the Belgian prix de Rome with a cantata, "De Klokke Roeland." It is recorded that when his trunk was searched for books that might help him in the competition, a procedure to which every candidate was subjected, the only one that was found was Thomas à Kempis's "Imitation of Christ."

The years of travel and study to which the Prix de Rome entitled him were spent in Germany, France and Italy. He became an enthusiast over the reform of church music, and the proper cultivation of the Gregorian modes. In 1881 he succeeded Lemmens as director of the Institute of Sacred Music at Malines. In 1889 he was appointed inspector of town music schools. In the following year (some say 1895) he published a treatise on Gregorian music and its proper interpretation. In 1896 he became professor of counterpoint and fugue at the Brussels Conservatory, a position he now holds. A correspondent of the Musical Courier has given the following description of his looks: "Tinel is of most striking appearance. In figure and demeanor somewhat reminding you of a thin, gaunt Jesuit priest, his face and head seem a combination of Berlioz and Schumann, if such a thing can be imagined. But his eyes have neither the dreaminess of the latter nor the vivacity of the former, they merely look at you in thoughtful intent way through evidently very sharp glasses."

Among Tinel's compositions are a Sonata for piano, for four hands; the prize-winning cantata, "De Klokke Roeland"; "Die Drel Ritter," a ballad for baritone, chorus and orchestra; a Te Deum for mixed chorus and organ, an organ sonata, several sets of violets and sacred songs, and the oratorio that gained him universal recognition, "Franciscus," which had more than one hundred performances in ten years. Originally produced at the expense of the city of Malines, in 1888, it gradually traversed Europe. In America it was performed for the first time in February, 1893, by the Oratorio Society in New York; in the following November portions of it were sung by the Cecilia Society in Boston; it was given at a Worcester Festival in 1895. The Flemish poem by Louis de Koninck tells, in three parts, the story of St. Francis's courtly life at Assisi, his renunciation of the world; his life in the convent, including his praise of the theory and practice of poverty; and finally his death, funeral procession and glorification. The music is a combination of styles, sensuous, severe, contrapuntal and modern. The orchestration is unusually sonorous and brilliant, and the music is often dramatic, as well as extendedly lyric in character. "St. Francis" was followed by a music-drama, "Godelive," which was first sung at Brussels on July 22, 1897, but which failed to leave the impression made by "Franciscus." It is too conservative, and essentially undramatic. Other music by Tinel comprises an "Alleluia" for voices and organ, a mass "of the Holy Virgin of Lourdes," some "Tableaux Symphoniques" and an overture and entr'actes for Cornille's "Polyeucte."

Presumably from these come the "three tone-pictures" that are to be played at the Symphony concerts tomorrow and Saturday. The programme enumerates them as an overture, "Pauline's Dream," and a "Festival in the Temple of Jupiter." The "Christian tragedy" of "Polyeucte" is counted one of Cornille's masterpieces, and once or twice a year it may still be seen on the stage of the Théâtre Français. The scene is a city of Armenia in the days of the later Roman emperors, and the characters are Roman and Armenian. Polyeucte, who is an actual saint in the Romish calendar and whose death the martyrologies record is an Armenian, wed to Pauline, the daughter of the Roman governor. His friend Néarque has converted him to Christianity. Full of new zeal and high exaltation Polyeucte obeys the governor's summons to the rites of the temple and there interrupts the sacrifice, insults the god and overturns his image. He is condemned to death and he approaches his fate with continuing fortitude and exaltation. His wife intercedes vainly with her father. A noble Roman, Sévère, who has once loved Pauline and whom she has loved in turn, adds his intercessions, but to no purpose. Polyeucte meanwhile presses his own faith upon his wife and the governor and their swift conversion glorifies his death. The power of the tragedy lies in the exaltation of Polyeucte, blazing with zeal, disdainful of every peril, even of death itself, breaking every bond of loyalty and affection, transported by religious ecstasies that Corneille's imagination lifts to heroic heights. The gentler appeal of the play springs from the devotion of Pauline, as loyal to Polyeucte, as piteous of his fate, as agonized to avert it, as though her love for Sévère had not rekindled at his coming.

Tinel is a devout man. What a few years ago it was the custom to call "Christian mysticism" stirs his imagination and colors his music. Time and again it flashes, like a soft white flame, in "Franciscus." It gives what little vitality there is in "Sainte-Godelive." The beginnings of "Franciscus" reveal also an imagination that answers to courtly pomps. It is easy to understand the appeal of "Polyeucte" to him, though its heroic vein and the characteristic grandeur of Corneille seem to lie beyond his gentler powers. "Pauline's Dream" makes an episode of the first act of the tragedy. In sleep a boding vision has come to her eyes of Sévère returning not from the shades, but from the victories of war, triumphant, threatening Polyeucte. The vision follows Polyeucte among the Christians, makes him the prey of his rival and of the governor, and Pauline may not save him.

"Le sang de Polyeucte a satisfait leurs rages." The incident in the temple is narrated in the third act of the tragedy. Before the altar stand the Roman governor and his train. The sacrificial rites begin. Polyeucte and Néarque are restless and disdainful. The assembly heeds and murmurs. Polyeucte breaks into open impleties and loud blasphemies. He overturns the sacred vessels, he mocks the god, he flings down its image.

"Les mystères troublés, le temple profané, Le fuité et les claméurs d'un peuple mutiné." Here at least is imaginative material for a tone-picture.

H. T. P. & E. B. H.

Chicago Courtesy Jan. 27. Herald To Maj. Higginson

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Chicago on Wednesday night. The programme book of the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Jan. 25-26 published this editorial and gracefully complimentary announcement:

"Twenty-five years ago Maj. Henry L. Higginson of Boston personally established, and has ever since maintained, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was the first American, not himself a professional musician, to give to the community the great music, greatly performed, without counting cost or considering box office receipts. His example and success were the original inspiration of the guarantors of our own beloved orchestra, and their success in turn has encouraged public-spirited men in establishing orchestras in other cities. Therefore, the trustees of the Orchestral Association deem it a pleasure to call attention to the coming visit, as elsewhere announced, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor; and they urge the music lovers of Chicago to testify by their presence both their appreciation of the artistic excellence of this great organization and their gratitude to its generous founder."

The programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Chicago is as follows: Overture to "Rienzi," Strauss; "Don Juan," Tschaiikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 (Mr. Ganz, pianist), and Beethoven's symphony No. 7.

Dr. Muck Talks of Strauss and Others

Dr. Muck strolled into the lobby of the Auditorium Wednesday afternoon looking tired and bored, having just finished a rehearsal for the concert of the evening. But though he must have felt like resting, the autograph seekers would not be denied. Neither would the interviewer, and with an expression of mock resignation Dr. Muck led the way to the row of chairs which stands stiffly against the marble wall and prepared to answer the usual questions. Of course, the conversation began with "Salome" and Richard Strauss. "Salome" is the sensation of the moment," said Dr. Muck, "like every new work of Strauss. It is only natural that it should be, when one considers that composer's eminence in the musical world. But I do not believe that it will live. His other operas have not endured. His 'Feuersnot,' for example, was a sensation when first performed. It has not proved lasting. That 'Salome' will meet with a similar fate is my firm conviction."

"Indeed, most of Strauss's later works I find of only passing interest. To three only do I return with pleasure—all of them early works. They are 'Til Eulenspiegel,' 'Tod und Verklärung,' and 'Don Juan.' And since I have frankly told Mr. Strauss my opinions of his compositions, I see no reason why I should hesitate to make them public. His 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' reveals a complete misconception of Nietzsche's philosophy, at least according to views on that interesting subject, and 'Heldenleben' is a curious instance of the evils of a technic one might almost call too great. Here, at least, one is justified in calling his inspiration meagre. His themes are fragmentary, 'short breathed,' and not worthy the marvellous technical development given them. In 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' he begins nobly. In the first measures, he builds a glorious tonal palace. But it sinks into his technical swamp. Of course, it is possible that Strauss feels what he writes. In that case one can only regret the inability to discover the emotional impulse that has moved him. It is buried in the mass of his technical complications."

Then the interviewer ventured a few questions about the programme of the concert that the Boston Orchestra was to give in the evening. Why had Dr. Muck selected the "Rienzi" overture for a beginning when there were so many more worthy and grateful examples of Wagner's art? And why had he chosen Beethoven's seventh symphony instead of one of the more important ones? "The 'Rienzi' overture is greatly undervalued," replied Dr. Muck. "My relations with the family of Richard Wagner are somewhat intimate, and I know that while Wagner thought little of his opera 'Rienzi,' he regarded the overture as a very respectable composition. It has unfortunately fallen almost exclusively into the domain of the brass band. But I think its many beauties worthy an artistic interpretation, and when I first rehearsed it I noticed with pleasure the surprise and interest it awakened among the members of the orchestra." Replying to the second question, Dr. Muck said that he had been prompted to play the seventh rather than the third or the fifth of Beethoven's symphonies by the desire to present one less often heard. "Some Beethoven symphonies have become warhorses for every conductor who appears before a new public. They are played so often that others almost as beautiful have fallen into neglect. Learning that the seventh had not been heard here frequently of recent years, I selected it for my concert in Chicago." This was disappointing. Dr. Muck found in the seventh symphony no markedly characteristic traits of Beethoven to distinguish it from his other great orchestral compositions, and when the talk turned to "standards of interpretation" he had little to say: "Standards of Beethoven interpretation? Yes, surely they exist. But to express them in words is a difficult matter. You will hear them tonight in the performance of the symphony. But I cannot attempt a definition. There are standards, but they vary. I do not believe I ever conduct a work twice alike. So much depends on the mood of the moment." [Chicago Inter-Ocean, Trans. Feb. 6, 1907.]

EXAMPLE FROM CHICAGO

Boston takes its orchestral concerts for granted. It has had so many of them, so long, and at their best. They have become a part of the pleasant routine of the winter. We are almost too accustomed to them. Chicago, in contrast, takes its orchestral concerts as New York takes its two operas—expectantly, almost excitedly and with no hiding of its eagerness. "All Chicago," from box-holder to "standee" goes to them, and the coming of a noted orchestra to play there stirs it as the coming of a noted singer to the Metropolitan or the Manhattan, stirs New York. If the newcomer has been long absent and returns in a new guise, so much the keener is expectancy. Last night the Boston orchestra appeared in Chicago for the first time in fifteen years, and on another page our despatches are telling how eager were the anticipations of its return, how warmly it was received, and what praise the listeners and the reviewers heaped upon it. To us with our tranquil acceptance of the orchestral gifts that the musical gods (in the shape of Mr. Higginson) bestow, Chicago may seem amusingly excited over what here in Boston would pass merely as "the visit of another orchestra," playing probably, as Mr. Damrosch's did last winter, to a small audience. Yet it is this interest and excitement that give orchestral concerts a vitality in the life of Chicago that is unique in American cities. Ours are an institution with the corresponding advantages and drawbacks. In Chicago they are still "events."

Moreover, as the extracts from the Chicago reviewers suggest, Boston enjoys elsewhere a prestige in orchestral music in America that we at home hardly appreciate. The Philharmonic Society in New York is the oldest orchestra in America, but like most things in that town it is as local as though New York were a parish and not a capital. In its sixty-odd years of existence it has had little influence upon the development of orchestral music elsewhere. Our Symphony orchestra is still in its twenties, but it has long been the example, the standard, and the encouragement of the similar orchestras that more and more American cities are fostering. A week ago when the visit of the Boston orchestra was still in prospect, the trustees of the Chicago Orchestra inserted in the programme books of the current concerts a leaf that praised Mr. Higginson as the "first American, not himself a professional musician, to give performed." It called "his example and success the inspiration" of the founders and the guarantors of the Chicago Orchestra, and it bespoke for our band a grateful and appreciative welcome. The courtesy was generous and unusual, and a search of the programme books of Europe and America might find no parallel to it. In the same generous fashion, the Chicago reviewers, speaking for the audience last night as well as for themselves, call our orchestra, in substance, the mother and the example of such bodies in America. The excellence of the orchestra and the ability of Dr. Muck have no need to compel their admiration. It was waiting expectantly, confidently.

224

Usually when we see ourselves as others see us, it is our shortcomings that the mirror displays. Generous Chicago has chosen to reflect our orchestral virtues and example, and the image of them is good to see. Praise, however, is for stimulus and not self-satisfaction, and in the eagerness with which Chicago has heard our orchestra, it has its example for us. When other orchestras venture hither our welcome has usually been chilly. Seldom do they come nowadays because they know the indifference that awaits them. Yet we might hear them with pleasure and profit, and our orchestra with all its virtues is not the sum of orchestral perfections. Other bands have their individual and interesting qualities. Yet, if the Chicago Orchestra should come next spring to Boston, would there be half a house to hear it? Chicago goes animatedly and eagerly to its weekly orchestral concerts as to a fresh, keen pleasure. Too many of us in Boston discharge a social duty at the afternoon concert on Fridays and a musical duty at the evening concert on Saturday. Our Symphony Orchestra was a pleasure before it was an institution. It has become an institution in a measure because it is a pleasure. Dr. Muck has put a new keenness into the band. The spirit of Chicago would put a new keenness into the audience.

225

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- | | |
|------------------|--|
| RICHARD STRAUSS. | SYMPHONIA DOMESTICA, op. 53.
(In one movement.)
(First time in Boston.) |
| BRAHMS. | CONCERTO in B flat major, No. 2, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 83.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro appassionato.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegretto grazioso. |
| BRAHMS. | ACADEMIC FESTIVAL OVERTURE, op. 80. |

Soloist:

Mr. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

to a community great music, greatly performed." It called "his example and success the inspiration" of the founders and the guarantors of the Chicago Orchestra, and it bespoke for our band a grateful and appreciative welcome. The courtesy was generous and unusual, and a search of the programme books of Europe and America might find no parallel to it. In the same generous fashion, the Chicago reviewers, speaking for the audience last night as well as for themselves, call our orchestra, in substance, the mother and the example of such bodies in America. The excellence of the orchestra and the ability of Dr. Muck have no need to compel their admiration. It was waiting expectantly, confidently.

Usually when we see ourselves as others see us, it is our shortcomings that the mirror displays. Generous Chicago has chosen to reflect our orchestral virtues and example, and the image of them is good to see. Praise, however, is for stimulus and not self-satisfaction, and in the eagerness with which Chicago has heard our orchestra, it has its example for us. When other orchestras venture hither our welcome has usually been chilly. Seldom do they come nowadays because they know the indifference that awaits them. Yet we might hear them with pleasure and profit, and our orchestra with all its virtues is not the sum of orchestral perfections. Other bands have their individual and interesting qualities. Yet, if the Chicago Orchestra should come next spring to Boston, would there be half a house to hear it? Chicago goes animatedly and eagerly to its weekly orchestral concerts as to a fresh, keen pleasure. Too many of us in Boston discharge a social duty at the afternoon concert on Fridays and a musical duty at the evening concert on Saturday. Our Symphony Orchestra was a pleasure before it was an institution. It has become an institution in a measure because it is a pleasure. Dr. Muck has put a new keenness into the band. The spirit of Chicago would put a new keenness into the audience.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- | | |
|------------------|--|
| RICHARD STRAUSS. | SYMPHONIA DOMESTICA, op. 53.
(In one movement.)
(First time in Boston.) |
| BRAHMS. | CONCERTO in B flat major, No. 2, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 83.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro appassionato.
III. Andante.
IV. Allegretto grazioso. |
| BRAHMS. | ACADEMIC FESTIVAL OVERTURE, op. 80. |

Soloist:

Mr. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

SPECIAL NOTICE

The "Symphonia Domestica," by Richard Strauss, will begin the concerts of next week. It will be played in one movement, lasting fifty minutes, WITHOUT PAUSE. For this reason, subscribers are urgently requested to be prompt in attendance.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

From — July 16, 1907
Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" for the First Time—A Notably Imaginative and Sympathetic Performance That Seemed to Give the Music Its True Voice—Two First Impressions: The Beauty of Much of the Tone-Poem and the Humanity of It All—Music of the Zest of Life

Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" was performed for the first time in Boston at the Symphony concert yesterday, and, by æsthetic standards, for the first time in America. True, a "scratch" orchestra played it in New York, with the composer conducting, three years ago; but with all allowance for the deceits of memory, theirs was not the "Sinfonia Domestica" that came to hearing yesterday. They skimmed the surface and barely entered the substance; they struggled with the letter and missed the spirit. Dr. Muck may care little for Strauss's later tone-poems; but for that very reason he sought the more to bring the "Sinfonia Domestica" to full, sympathetic and expressive utterance. The men of the orchestra may grumble as they will about the labor that Strauss lays upon almost every one of them. He does ask the difficult, but he never asks the impossible, and there is that in his way of asking and in the spur of actual performance that puts the players to their mettle. It is the fashion to call Strauss's music intricate, and in a sense it is so; but, given the conductor and the band, it can be made as luminous and integral as it was yesterday, when every part and almost every phrase seemed to spring organically from its predecessor and lead as organically into whatever followed. From beginning to end Dr. Muck found, guided and maintained the large melodic lines of the tone-poem. He seemed to follow and to feel every curve and convolution of them, every interplay contrast or conflict, every change in their motion or their pace, every lightening or darkening of their color, every intensifying of their weight. The composition and the adjustment of the harmonic background along which and through which these lines flowed was as lucid and imaginative. The blending or the contrasting of instrumental colors, the pointing or the subduing of instrumental detail, was as luminous and felicitous. The music seemed to vibrate spontaneously with Strauss's endless varieties and subtleties of intertwining rhythms. The introduction was as transparent exposition. The scherzo was nimble with fancy. The slow movement touched heights and depths of sustained and imaginative song. The final fugue was human and humorous sport with tones and the musical ideas they uttered.

Meanwhile, from the very beginning of the tone-poem, conductor and men had been crowning all these virtues by a very notable achievement of insight, imagination and expression. Steadily they gave the "Sinfonia Domestica" the quality of tone that is born of the spirit rather than the letter of the music and that imparts this spirit vitally. There are some who seem to believe that Strauss's music must always be played rudely, coarsely, noisily. There have been performances of his tone-poems in which the one object of all concerned seemed to be to cavort, shriek and shout. Now the "Sinfonia Domestica" is a lyric poem in tones, and those tones seek oftenest the lightness, brightness, iridescent quality and songful voice that Dr. Muck and the band gave to them. They bent their tone to rapt song that was still lyric rather than epic; they made it flicker with humor; they kept it buoyantly and brightly alive. Of course, moments come when Strauss would have this tone frankly delineative, and the players made it so, lightly, adroitly and fancifully. Those that are fain to hear the baby resent its bath or the clock strike the hour need miss no detail. Best of all, conductor and men charged this tone with the subdued and vibrant intensity which is the true voice of the "Sinfonia Domestica." They never thundered. They never tried to be ugly or bolsterous. They did not bawl out a lyric. Rightly did an audience that had listened with very eager and seemingly responsive intentness recall the conductor again and again and bring the men of the orchestra to their feet. The ears, even of doubters and scorn-ers, must have leapt to the true voice of Strauss's music.

Under such a performance of the "Sinfonia Domestica" two impressions were bound to be very clear, vital and transporting—one was of the beauty and imaginative power of much of the music; the other was of the humanity of it all. It is easy to grant Strauss's inability to invent melodic ideas that in themselves and in the first statement of them have penetrating beauty and significance. The melodies of the father, the mother and the child as the introduction to the tone-poem unfolds them and their divisions are not impressive. It is safest, perhaps, to say that they have character, as in the robustness of the man's melody, the capriciousness of the woman's, or the plaintive sweetness of the child's. It is good to invent beautiful and striking melodies, but it is also good to invent melodies that, as imagination plays upon them and varies them, treats them harmonically, rhythmically and instrumentally, and combines and contrasts them, shall become clothed with beauty and appeal. Of such are Strauss's melodies in the "Sinfonia." It is not what they are in themselves, but what they become under his brain and hand that is essential. Of them are born such exquisite and caressing minor melodies as that of the mother's care for her child (as the programmers have it) that flows in the scherzo and recurs in the fugue. From them spring under Strauss's imagination, the light, almost affectionate fancies of that same scherzo—a child's play idealized in tones that catch the very motion and breath of it, and that touch it with the soft, responsive emotion, again idealized, of the watching parents. Above all, out of these seemingly prosaic melodies comes the deep, changeful, and altogether transporting beauty of the first part of the slow movement—an orchestral song, if ever one was written, of the joy and the passion of living in the dreams and the work of imagination, in the zest and stimulus of affection. To hear is to yield mind and heart to it, to be upborne on its flow, to be encompassed and possessed by its emotions. It is the song at last of the thrill and the delight of life. And then it wavers and fades into vague and flitting "dream-fancies." The ear hears some of the very melodies which it has caught clearly and implicitly in shadowy, distorted, tremulous sounds, as the eye sees in night vision the images that have pre-occupied it by day. The illusion, the imagination, the ingenuity and the human plausibility of these tone-dreams are equal. They are one of Strauss's feats of poetry.

The other thrilling impression of the tone-poem was its essential humanity from first to last. Strauss has already put his philosophies and sardonic humors, his hero of romance and his hero of imagination into tones, depicting, illuminating, transfiguring. In the "Sinfonia Domestica," since his imagination ranges wide and many things touch it to creation, he would transfigure the routine of domestic life and affection and against the circumstances and episodes of it as against a background, he would set the deep emotions, the lyric feelings, the poetry, that underlie it. Those emotions invite expression in tones. They rise in suggestion from the very themes he has invented, to play through the scherzo and to flood the adagio. Yet half the essence of them lies in the realistic background against which they flow, with its details of the comparing aunts likening the baby to father or mother, of the bath, of the cradle song, of the awakening. Through his tones, and by equal power of imagination and expression Strauss imparts the incidents themselves and the emotions which lie as the idealization of them. Life has its affectionate play as in the scherzo. Life has its passions as in the adagio. It has also its animated humors, and hence plausibly the double fugue that leads into the closing passages. The programmers will have it that father and mother hold brisk and sportive debate of the child and its future, as it plays with them the while. The notion is plausible; Strauss has intimated that his own imaginative programme warrants it.

But the larger and perhaps the truer impression is that, as the adagio was the song of the deeper joys and passion of life, so here is the merry song of its lighter but still intimate delights. To and fro in the music go the characteristic voices of the husband and the wife, "giving and taking" in light debate and playful retort, making sport of each other's traits and weaknesses, chaffing each other, in plain English, merrily and intimately, and chaffing over and about the child. As Dr. Muck and the orchestra played this fugue yesterday with rare imaginative perception, it was no Broddingagian and meaningless clamor, no mere extended riot of polyphony and instrumentation, but a "mood picture" in tones and of one of the most intimate and human of domestic moods. Instead of din, there was agile lightness. Instead of melodic, harmonic and instrumental thunders, there was the briskest of merriment. Here the wife sought the last word in gay caprice. There the sturdy voice of the man intercepted her. Then both for an instant paused for softer thought (with a catch in their voices, so to say) of their child. And so gayly, into the tremulously happy and buoyant final measures—the joyful climax of what from beginning to end has been a tone-poem of the zest of life, not as heroes of epic or romance live it, but as it goes forward under every roof, if they that dwell beneath could only feel the elation, the passion, and the poetry of it as Strauss has felt and expressed them. He has put common humanity into tones, exalted it, and made it glow. So much for first impressions.

H. T. P.

Adm 18. 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Strauss, Sinfonia Domestica.
Brahms, Piano Concerto in B-flat. Soloist,
Mr. Ossip Gabrilowitch.
Brahms, Academic Festival Overture.

There was a discussion in the home of the O'Raffertys. Husband had put a heavy strain upon the English language in addressing Mrs. O'Rafferty. Wife had given some airy persiflage with a rolling-pin. Baby made some remarks in "altissimo." Husband had hurled a flatiron, which missed Mrs. O'Rafferty, but smashed the "God Bless Our Home" over the mantel. There were moments when these things were well-portrayed in Strauss's new symphony.

The subject is outside the realms of Art. One may quote many great idealizations of the commonplace Burns' poem about the Haggis, Dibdin's song about the sailor's tobacco box, Carey's "Sally in Our Alley," and Beethoven's village band in the Pastoral Symphony, but to spend many measures in depicting baby's bath, or his going to bed at 7 p.m. and waking up at 7 a.m., his crying, his stubbing his toe, etc., is as puerile as if the composer had gone further into his domestic affairs and given a "fried-potato motive" at half-past 7, or pictured the cook giving notice with a warning-motive on menacing trombones. And, by the way, no American housewife will have faith in a "Domestic Symphony" which, altogether omits the domestic!

And when one hears the mightiest orchestra of modern times picturing the nursery events (a few details excepted) in the life of the composer's baby, one dreads to think of what might have happened if he had had twins. "Ou peut on etre mieux qu'au sein de sa Famille?" does not apply to composers in search of a symphonic subject.

It has been said that no man is a hero to his valet; one can supplement this by saying that some modern composers seem to be heroes to themselves. Wagner set the fashion in his "Mastersingers of Nuremberg," but Strauss returns to his favorite topic more than once. Not content with picturing his own greatness in his "Heldenleben," he shows us, in this work, that he is easy-going, fiery, thoughtful and also masterful. His tonal self praise is certainly not an ideal art topic.

There is a rather cheap method in this madness. No one can blame Strauss that he receives far more for this work than Beethoven did for his entire nine symphonies, but that he should sweep at once from the exaggerated simplicity of this topic to the still more exaggerated lasciviousness of "Salome" shows that he is a shrewd merchant who knows how to advertise his wares and attract the public. There is strong commercial instinct mingled with Strauss's great genius.

Is it wrong to jest at the work of a genius? Not when he is using his great powers to betray his own Art. Wagner had a noble ideal constantly before him; amid all the defects, even crimes, of his career, one can never find him tampering even in the slightest degree with what he conceived to be the highest mission of Music. He craved money as intensely as ever a Richard Strauss did; but no amount of pecuniary reward could deflect him one iota from his highest artistic ideal. We may allow the public to judge whether the composer of the "Domestic Symphony" and "Salome," a man who can achieve as noble a work as "Death and Transfiguration," is dealing uprightly with his great gifts.

Regarded as a bit of musical humor, this symphony falls far below "Till Eulenspiegel," while judged as absolute music, utterly apart from the tales which Strauss has allowed to be connected with it, it is not to be compared with "Death and Transfiguration" or the above-mentioned scherzo. Weingartner justly says that the two last-named works would stand as absolute music, without any story or "programme" being attached, but that Strauss's later works lean very heavily upon their pictorial resources. Strauss is speedily settling the question as to whether he is the successor and rival of Wagner, and settling it in the negative.

One may also impeach the growing difficulties of music less to the composer, who may now break all harmonic and contrapuntal rules, than to the conductor and orchestral musician. The task of these men has more than doubled in difficulty in this generation. Add but a little more to the burden and music will be, for them, a path to the insane asylum. The auditor, too, has a heavier task than ever before.

Yet Genius remains Genius, even when pursuing a bad path. The "Sinfonia Domestica" is a revelation of the powers of modern orchestration. We can recall no such sumptuous color scheme in the entire repertoire of music. It is a new contribution to Art and, were it united with Wagner's wonderful figure invention, Brahms's unity, and Schubert's power of melody, it might place Music where it has never been before. The great work is not ugly at any time, and it is often wonderfully euphonious. It makes a profound impression, even upon one who disagrees with its scheme, its subject and its carrying out.

Its best part is that picturing the family at rest, which takes the place of the symphonic slow movement. Here there is something of a sustained character and of poetry, too.

In too many other parts the jugglery with figures (figures of no pregnancy of meaning) is scrappy and of short breath, a dire fault in so long a movement, and the entire attraction lies in the marvelous orchestration. Many are the new touches, from high clarinettes (Berlioz has used them in orchestra, however) to oboe d'amore. The latter instrument represented the baby, and was excellently played by Mr. Lenon. Its tone is not unlike that of the English horn with a dash of clarinette quality added. The orchestra was much augmented to give this picture of a quiet home, even two harps being present.

The contrapuntal skill of the composer, far behind that of Brahms, was shown in the double fugue, in which husband and wife are evidently at loggerheads, but the husband ends by having his way. "Charbonnier est maître chez lui," and why should not an eminent composer be! All the orchestra played with great conscientiousness. At the close Dr. Muck was recalled twice, and the whole orchestra also rose and bowed. The public seemed greatly interested in the work. We can only say, while hailing Strauss as the greatest orchestral colorist of the world, that we consider the symphony misleading, the tendency wrong, the art influence doubtful. We think this work and "Heldenleben," too, only a temporary phase in music. But the iridescence of the modern tone coloring has come to stay.

Its glare and splendor told heavily against the pure style of the Brahms concerto; Johannisberger does not taste well after Arrack Punch. Nevertheless, the musician could not help noticing that here the figures were united in a homogeneous whole; there was no patchwork. At first Gabrilowitch kept his instrument too much in the foreground. There was not that perfect abnegation to ensemble that Joseffy or Baermann have given the work and which it requires of the soloist. But in the andante this fault was not in evidence, and this was the most beautiful part of the concerto.

The violoncello solo, too, demands praise here, for it was given with much nobility. We found this movement more truly musical than anything in the preceding domestic picture. It was exactly the opposite in character, for Brahms is clumsy where Strauss is great—in orchestral scoring, and Brahms is great where Strauss is awkward—in thematic invention and development.

Perhaps Dr. Muck slyly wished to have people contrast the two schools and vote for common sense in music; if so, his plan failed, for people simply went home. As in the Scriptures, Exodus came before Revelation. Yet Mr. Gabrilowitch was recalled three times, and, excepting the fault chronicled above, deserved the applause. He proved himself more than a virtuoso in this concert—he was a true musician.

The faithful few, the rearguard who stood firm amidst the retreat, heard a simply exquisite reading of the "Academic Overture." Dr. Muck brought out every detail of the symmetrical, well-developed and humorous work. We are of the opinion that this overture will last longer than the "Domestic Symphony."

Tonight there will be an opportunity to contrast another orchestra with our own. Our old conductor, Emil Paur, comes to us with his men. Mr. Paur, of all our symphonic conductors, had most of Dr. Muck's enthusiasm and breadth. It will be interesting to compare the two men. Boston owes a debt of gratitude to them both.

Louis C. Elson.

HEAR STRAUSS BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Symphonia Domestica Played at 15th Concert Conducted by Dr. Muck.

COMPOSER SHOWS HE IS A FAMILY MAN

Gabrilowitsch Gives Brahms' Long-Winded Concerto - as Second Number.

Herald Feb. 17, 1907
BY PHILIP HALE.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphonia Domestica.....R. Strauss
Piano concerto No. 2.....Brahms
Mr. Gabrilowitsch, pianist.

Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms

Strauss' Symphonia Domestica was played for the first time nearly three years ago in New York. Emerson said in effect that a new book should not be read until it is at least a year old. At the end of the year the book may be dead without hope of resurrection and there will then be no curiosity concerning its contents. Strauss' symphony is now three years old. Wherever it is performed, as recently in Paris for at least the third time, it excites lively discussion.

Today Strauss is bitterly assailed by some on account of his magnificent opera "Salome," a great and surprising work of art which was taken from the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House in consequence of foolish and prurient chatter. Some of the articles written against it were foul in language and suggestion.

The hypocrite Olivia in Wycherley's "Plain Dealer" inveighs against that dramatist's "Country Wife" as a "filthy play," and in her virtuous indignation uses such vile terms and displays such an evil mind that Eliza exclaims: "Nay, no farther, cousin. We have had enough of your comment on the play, which will make me more ashamed than the play itself."

Not only the opera but the composer himself is now recklessly abused and taunted with the license of ink. He is a low and debased person, for he asks large sums of money from publishers and opera managers; he insists on orchestras of unusual size and makes unusual demands on the instruments; he actually goes so far as to write a part in "Salome" for the Heckelphone—the very name of this instrument is to the suspicious immoral. There is really no answer to these charges of heinous offences. It should be remembered that when the Symphonia Domestica was first performed Strauss was attacked for the employment of a huge orchestra to tell in tones a simple story; he was censured because he used instruments in an extraordinary fashion and indulged himself in strange combinations of timbres; he was denounced because he asked the publisher to pay him about $9000 for the work. Johannes Brahms, by the way, sold the copyright of his third symphony to a publisher for $9000 and a percentage on sums realized by performances; but Brahms was a good man, free from all orchestral eccentricities.

Is Strauss reproached today for his choice of Wilde's tragedy as a libretto? He was jeered at three years ago because he wished to illustrate by music a day in his family life. This monster, it seems, has a wife and child. He is said to be fond of them. That he should dare to interest the musical world in them was the height of impudence. What egotism! The protests were like unto those made against Walt Whitman for beginning his "Leaves of Grass" with the line, "I celebrate myself." Poor Strauss! Whatever he does is wrong.

Late in 1902 the composer said to a reporter in London: "My next tone-poem will illustrate 'a day in my family life.' It will be partly lyrical, partly humorous. The three subjects, he added, would be typical of papa, mamma and the baby. Should this statement, or should the plan of the work have excited ridicule? Neither at the time nor since has Strauss given out a long and minute analytical programme.

When the symphony was performed in certain European cities, the programme books published a simple synopsis. The husband's group of themes represent him as easy going, dreamy, fiery; the wife's as lively, gay, a graceful creature who can also be tender; the child's theme typifies him as a peaceful youngster, if let alone. The scherzo tells of parental happiness; the child plays till it is tired and is put to bed. The husband works and meditates.

There is a love scene. In sleep come dreams and cares. The family awakes, there is a pleasant dispute—possibly over the bringing up of the child—and there is at last a satisfactory and full agreement.

These scenes are not confined to the Strauss family. They occur in the house next yours, in the flat below you where Mr. and Mrs. Ferguson and little Johnny dwell. Is the subject a bizarre one? Does it not appeal to human nature? Does it not admit of lyrical and humorous treatment?

Why Not Add Instruments?

Who cares, pray, what sort of an orchestra is employed, the one known to Monteverde or Haydn, or the one dreamed of by Berlioz, provided the composer gain his effects? If by using an oboe d'armore he can the better bring the image of childhood before an audience, why should he not add the instrument to the conventional list? Was there any outcry when Mr. Loeffler added a viola d'amore—two of them in his original version of "The Death of Tintagiles"—or when Mr. Converse added a basset-horn to his orchestra in "The Pipe of Desire"? But Strauss is a dangerous man; he is not to be trusted with even a fiddle.

The composer gave fair warning when he stated that the symphony would be "partly humorous" and there is no excuse for those who insist on taking every page seriously and complaining because their sensibilities are now and then shocked. It must be confessed that the humor is generally rough and tumultuous.

Nor are the members of the Strauss family as portrayed in music restful persons. It has been easy for the indefatigable enemies of Strauss to be flippant over this symphony at his expense, but they base their jests and witticisms on non-existent facts. It is all very well to be funny about baby in the bath, baby being spanked, baby with the croup, etc., etc., but as I have said Strauss has never given out any minute analysis of the work. If any mad wag hearing the music finds in it portrayal of these incidents and other incidents, disagreeable or pleasant, in babyhood, he finds them by force of his own imagination.

Let me record only a few impressions, for this alone is possible after one hearing.

The themes are for the most part insignificant or common. The strength of Strauss in his orchestral works is never in thematic invention; it is in the extraordinary use he makes of his themes, in his polyphonic weavings, in dynamic intensity, and in unusually effective instrumentation. Occasionally he invents a theme of true and inherent beauty, but this theme is short, and, as it were, accidental.

A certain amount of explanation is absolutely necessary to any honest enjoyment of portions of the work. These portions without a clue are uninteresting. As absolute music they do not charm or impress. They give only the impression of much ado about nothing.

Have Orchestral Rhetoric.

There are portions, on the other hand, which without any indication and without even a vaguely comprehensive title are very effective, chiefly by the eloquence and passion of polyphonic treatment and orchestral rhetoric. The section that thus stands out in bold relief is the "Love scene" in the adagio. There is no haunting, compelling theme, the song of triumphant love, but typical themes that have preceded are here developed and joined together till passion is at its height, and the sonority of the orchestra is full and glowing and irresistible without a suggestion of delight in sheer, brutal noise.

Strauss is less successful in the expression of naivete in his portraiture of the child in the house. It is easier for him to be complex than to be simple. His airs of childhood are more or less sophisticated. Even the cradle song soon assumes undue proportions.

The Finale is first of all singular by reason of its reckless extravagance. The interest is aroused by surprising the hearer; it is maintained chiefly by adding to this surprise. The mastery of the composer in his treatment of the material is indisputable. But a surprise quickly becomes tiresome, and there is a long and dreary stretch before the astonishingly jubilant conclusion.

I much prefer to all this pother and din and stress and fury, the mysterious and highly imaginative measures that introduce the theme of the child in the introduction of the work. That episode is something more than novel and strange. It has rare poesy. Much of the scherzo is entertaining, but here again the enjoyment too often comes from the sense of incongruity, from hearing something intrinsically trivial swollen fantastically to enormous proportions yet moving with incredible lightness, as though little and familiar animals having partaken of Mr. H. G. Wells' food of the gods should dance as monstrous shapes a fantastic fandango in a broad highway.

Work Too Long Drawn Out.

The whole work is too long drawn out. The very ingenuity, the diabolical cleverness becomes wearisome. Cacophonous passages annoy, not because they are cacophonous, but because they produce no real effect—they serve no artistic purpose. Other hearings might remove the impression that there are passages where the intricacy of the voice weavings defeats the intention of the composer.

A work like this should be played more than once in the space of a month. A single hearing is unfair to the composer, the conductor, the orchestra and the audience.

The performance was, on the whole, one of extraordinary, incredible brilliance. There were a few slips, noticeably in the brass, but it must be remembered that the music is thick with extreme mechanical difficulties. Dr. Muck richly deserved the applause and the recalls, and the tribute was paid to the players as well.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch was unfortunate in that Brahms' concerto came after such a prodigious "machine." He was unfortunate also in his choice of the dry and drab concerto. He showed self-abnegation and courage by choosing it.

I was able to hear only the first two movements, and the finale is the movement in which a virtuoso has the most opportunity. In the first two movements Mr. Gabrilowitsch played with understanding and with solidity of style. It was a sound and musical performance. That it was not charming or engrossing or stirring was the fault of Johannes Brahms.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Drama: July 21, 07
A NOTE ON MR. GABRILOWITSCH'S PLAYING

An Interesting Recital and Its Impressions
—"Dinorah" of the Goat—Brahms and the Apollo Club—Humor of "About Town"
—The Programmes of Coming Concerts—
Langdon Mitchell Undertakes Another Play for the Fiskes—More "Early Shaw"

One charm of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's playing as he exemplified it once more in his recital at Jordan Hall yesterday afternoon is its continence. He seems very seldom to force himself, his music or his instrument. He would not have his piano an orchestra or goad it into thunders at one extreme and shrieks at the other. He comprehends and feels his music individually, but he does not find it necessary to prove his individuality by distortion or exaggeration. He does not rely upon the unexpected; he never seems to be wringing the last drop out of his own powers. Yesterday he played Beethoven's rondo in G major, for example, with a supple precision of rhythm and a clear and edgeless rounding of phrase that kept the formal grace of the music and gave it rippling flow. His touch and his tone were of a transparent and musing lightness. It is the delight of the ultra-modern pianist to proclaim his discovery of Bach by overdoing his music. Give ear, he says to his hearers, and you shall hear Bach played emotionally. It is equally the delight of the ultra-conservative pianist to prove his loyalty to Bach by underplaying his music—as though dry rigidity were the sign by which the classics conquer. Mr. Gabrilowitsch in the prelude, sarabande and gavotte that he chose avoided either extreme. He brought the music to the ear as a design might come to the eye—tonal pattern springing from tonal pattern and arabesque from arabesque, and each creating itself and falling into its place in the whole fabric with due rhythmic accent. In his playing were the charm of form, the zest of rhythm and the sense of music that is its own excuse for being, that needs no emotion but that of its own ordered spontaneity. He let Bach flow.

Again, in his playing of Schubert's sonata in A minor, Mr. Gabrilowitsch was persuasively continent. Many a pianist has a suspicion, not altogether unwarranted, that the years are emphasizing the prolixity of the music and that the tarnish of time has here and there dulled its gloss. Then he seeks to hide these spots by over-emphasis and to veil undue length by undue modulation. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was wiser. The listener noted the waste places less than usual, because no obvious labor obtruded them. The pianist slipped over them, as wise conductors now slip over the similar places in many a classic symphony, letting them, as Dr. Muck does, play themselves. By a similar sparing of labor Mr. Gabrilowitsch saved the variations of the slow movement from tedium. He did not strive to contrast them; but kept them in the vein of quick improvisations.

The particular charm, however, that Mr. Gabrilowitsch gave to the sonata and to some of the short pieces that followed was a charm of tone. It was clear, pure, transparent, rounded, supple, warm—beautiful sound in itself, but sound that was the more beautiful and vital because it was animated by poetic imagination and ordered by poetic discernment. The pianist's deliciousness of tone freshened the sonata; his contrasts and gradations kept the music undulating, while steady and unforced warmth played through it. The Schubertian charm and grace and fancy emerged again, and made their own beauty. Still more delicately suggestive were Mr. Gabrilowitsch's tonal snadings in Tschalkovski's little "Song of Autumn." The whole mood is of subdued and sustained melancholy, yet each phrase, almost, is a variation in pensive fancy for sensitive and supple tone to reflect. There are as many lights in the music as in a soft autumn sky, and Mr. Gabrilowitsch's tone caught them. It served as well the spottier coloring and the air of romantic improvisation of Rachmaninoff's prelude in G minor. It undulated to what little rhythmic grace and accent Glazounoff put into his gavotte. Then, in Liszt's study in E minor it had a fascinating and elastic brilliance. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's Liszt is not a Liszt that volleys and thunders up and down the keyboard; still less is it a Liszt of showy "stunts"; and least of all the softly clouded Liszt that Mr. Joseffy used to conjure out of his own temperament. The Russian's is a Liszt of kaleidoscopic brightness and animation, juggling ecstatically through these "transcendental studies."

This same continence and poise distinguished Mr. Gabrilowitsch's playing of Brahms's second concerto at the Symphony concert last week, in circumstances that were a temptation to transgression. The concerto is three-quarters of an hour long, and the music is of Brahms in his austerest vein. It happened to follow Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," fifty minutes long in its turn, flamboyant in contrast; and as new and much-heralded music, fastening and exhausting the attention of the audience. The situation was pitiless for the pianist; the temptation must have been nearly irresistible to do something, even with Brahms, to make the listeners "sit up." Yet Mr. Gabrilowitsch seemed to take thought only of the music before him. He saved it from dryness by the flowing and edgeless quality of his tone. He saved it from obscurity by a quiet clarity. He respected its reticence and in that reticence lies the sober power of the music. It is easy to say that Brahms achieved the concerto by persistent mental process. In it to excess is intellect that thinks in tones. But often this intellect is thinking with a pure and subdued passion of thought that throbs underneath the outward austerities of form and expression. It is possible to think with passion as well as to feel with it, and to make this passion potent by its very reticence.

Thus under all the superficial dryness and all the mathematical figuration of the concerto lies an austere passion of creation that is seemingly the mood of the whole. The music is its own reason for being, as a building, before it has a tenant or a purpose, embodies the art and the constructive passion of the architect. It was the merit of Mr. Gabrilowitsch that he played the concerto with a grave and reticent eloquence, as one who thoughtfully rears and shapes a musical structure before the ears and the imaginations of his hearers, and in the progress of the work finds and expresses sober emotion. He did not try to make the concerto sensuous when it is not so. He did not try to make it dry, hard, mathematical, mechanical, when it is not so. He did keep it austere, but in its kind impassioned. Doing so, he and his auditors with him, understood, felt and respected it as much as most of us may. In all his playing here, Mr. Gabrilowitsch has given no clearer token of widening and ripening powers, and he has still to turn his thirties.

STRAUSS PICTURES HIS FAMILY LIFE IN SYMPHONY

Boston's Orchestra Plays with Powerful Effect Sensational Work of Composer of "Salome."

Boston American

By Kent Perkins.

July 17, 1907

New York had its Richard Strauss "Salome" jamboree and the Gothamites of tender moral sensibilities called in the police. Boston last night, with the aid of Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra, had its Richard Strauss "Symphonia Domestica" racket. "A Day in the Strauss Family," and there were times when one wanted to call the Hub police, not as protectors of public morals, but to take the whole verdant Strauss family to the station house.

This wish was roused, when in the realistic bedlam of the music Herr Strauss was beating the baby, the young Strauss was yelling with all his titanic power and Frau Strauss was stridently arguing with Herr Doctor, while she rapped out a tattoo on his head with the stove lifter to emphasize her points.

Strauss's "Domestic Symphony" has attracted almost as much attention as "Salome" and roused nearly as much controversy. The first performance "on any stage" was in New York in March, 1904. Since then it has been heard in several European capitals and has been the subject of miles of discussion, both praise and condemnation. Last night brought its first hearing in Boston and Symphony Hall was jammed full by patrons eager to hear the piece.

Was Splendidly Produced.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra had given the work long and strenuous study and rehearsal, and it was played with magnificent power, splendid tonal effect and an intelligent artistry that made known all its beauties and all its garish realism.

The people were warned to be in their seats promptly on time, as it meant a wait of over three-quarters of an hour in the lobby for those who were late. There were a few dilatory ones, however, and they peered anxiously through the glass doors at the various crisis in the Strauss family, as if wondering what terrific tragedy was going on inside. At the close of the piece the great audience gave the orchestra and its conductor tremendous outbursts of applause and cheers, and they deserved generous reward, both for their artistic and their physical labors.

Work is Colossal.

For the "Domestic Symphony" is truly and makes terrific demands on the skill as well as the endurance of its performers. It is too big and too varied, too full of contradictions, beauties, blemishes and problems for detailed discussion in an article of moderate length or after a single hearing, consequently only a brief, general idea of it can be given here.

Strauss in the work has frankly attempted to give a musical picture of a day in his own family. It is built on three chief themes that represent himself, his young son when a baby, and his wife, with incidental thematic reference to aunts and uncles. Strauss professes to abhor programs for his music, yet he took care before this piece was first produced in New York to give a detailed analysis of it to a clever newspaper man who put it all in the paper.

It opens with the father in a calm and meditative mood. This gives way to more lively and strenuous thoughts, possibly roused by reflections of what will happen when Frau Strauss comes in. She does come in and there is "something doing" promptly. The baby is introduced by a lovely and tender melody played on the oboe d'Amour, an obsolete instrument that has been occasionally revived in recent years. There is argument over the baby, and all the varying possibilities of the situation are voiced by the orchestra. The aunts and uncles appear and according to a note in Strauss's score, the aunts of the baby say: "Just like papa," while the uncles chirp: "Just like mamma."

Baby Put to Bed.

Things calm down in the house of Struss. The child is put to bed with an exquisite cradle song and you know just what time it is, for the clock strikes seven. There is a long forceful and beautiful intermezzo and then Papa and Mamma Struss either have a lot of bad dreams or there is a hot curtain lecture in which the man of the house holds up his end with vigor. The dove of peace settles down again and there is some exquisite and passionate love music, as a relief from the Strauss squabbling.

The clock strikes seven again, this time in the morning. The baby cries and the household starts in again. There are those who can see the baby have his bath and go through all the little details of child life in the morning—and there is variety enough in the music to warrant any deduction. Apparently, after Baby Strauss begins his play, he falls and bumps his head and the worst trouble of all starts in between the father and mother. It develops in a regular Donnybrook fair, and one wonders that such awful scenes are possible in a sedate and respectable German family.

One of Richard's Dreams.

The "husband theme" finally dominates and rules the music as the symphony comes to an end, but those who profess to know the Strauss family in actual life say that this is a dream of Herr Richard's and not pure realism.

Granting what is perfectly true, that there are many beauties in the "Domestic Symphony," what is the use of such "music"? There is art in it, but this comes in small homeopathic doses, amid oceans of trash. There are bits of en-ment, but why should people have to sit nearly an hour to pick out these morsels from a vast conglomeration—of what? Hodge-podge!

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, OVERTURE to "The Betrothed of the Czar."

TSCHAIKOWSKY, CONCERTO for VIOLIN.

GLAZOUNOFF, SYMPHONY No. 5.
(First time.)

Soloist:

ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF.

colossal in length, breadth and thickness, and makes terrific demands on the skill as well as the endurance of its performers. It is too big and too varied, too full of contradictions, beauties, blemishes and problems for detailed discussion in an article of moderate length or after a single hearing, consequently only a brief, general idea of it can be given here.

Strauss in the work has frankly attempted to give a musical picture of a day in his own family. It is built on three chief themes that represent himself, his young son when a baby, and his wife, with incidental thematic reference to aunts and uncles. Strauss professes to abhor programs for his music, yet he took care before this piece was first produced in New York to give a detailed analysis of it to a clever newspaper man who put it all in the paper.

It opens with the father in a calm and meditative mood. This gives way to more lively and strenuous thoughts, possibly roused by reflections of what will happen when Frau Strauss comes in. She does come in and there is "something doing" promptly. The baby is introduced by a lovely and tender melody played on the oboe d'Amour, an obsolete instrument that has been occasionally revived in recent years. There is argument over the baby, and all the varying possibilities of the situation are voiced by the orchestra. The aunts and uncles appear and according to a note in Strauss's score, the aunts of the baby say: "Just like papa," while the uncles chirp: "Just like mamma."

Baby Put to Bed.

Things calm down in the house of Struss. The child is put to bed with an exquisite cradle song and you know just what time it is, for the clock strikes seven. There is a long forceful and beautiful intermezzo and then Papa and Mamma Struss either have a lot of bad dreams or there is a hot curtain lecture in which the man of the house holds up his end with vigor. The dove of peace settles down again and there is some exquisite and passionate love music, as a relief from the Strauss squabbling.

The clock strikes seven again, this time in the morning. The baby cries and the household starts in again. There are those who can see the baby have his bath and go through all the little details of child life in the morning—and there is variety enough in the music to warrant any deduction. Apparently, after Baby Strauss begins his play, he falls and bumps his head and the worst trouble of all starts in between the father and mother. It develops in a regular Donnybrook fair, and one wonders that such awful scenes are possible in a sedate and respectable German family.

One of Richard's Dreams.

The "husband theme" finally dominates and rules the music as the symphony comes to an end, but those who profess to know the Strauss family in actual life say that this is a dream of Herr Richard's and not pure realism.

Granting what is perfectly true, that there are many beauties in the "Domestic Symphony," what is the use of such "music"? There is art in it, but this comes in small homeopathic doses, amid oceans of trash. There are bits of entrancing loveliness and fine, strong sentiment, but why should people have to sit nearly an hour to pick out these morsels from a vast conglomeration—of what? Hodge-podge!

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF, OVERTURE to "The Betrothed of the Czar."

TSCHAIKOWSKY, CONCERTO for VIOLIN.

GLAZOUNOFF, SYMPHONY No. 5.
(First time.)

Soloist:

ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 2, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

DEBUSSY.

THREE ORCHESTRAL SKETCHES, "The Sea."

I. From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean.

II. Frolics of Waves.

III. Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea.

(First time at these concerts.)

ALEXANDER RITTER.

OLAF'S WEDDING DANCE. op. 22.

(First time at these concerts.)

LISZT.

EPISODE No. 2, from Lenau's "Faust."

Scene in the Tavern, (Mephisto Waltz.)

BERLIOZ.

OVERTURE, "The Roman Carnival." op. 9.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT
DEBUSSY'S ORCHESTRAL SKETCHES OF "THE SEA"

Music of Characteristic Fluidity and Suggestion That Yet Lacks Something of the Spontaneity and Sensitiveness of His Earlier Work—The Idiom of Debussy and His Seeming Aims in It—His Pictures and Secrets of the Sea

From Richard Strauss, whose later music he loves little, Dr. Muck has passed to Debussy, whose music he may love still less, and last Friday he and the Symphony Orchestra played for the first time in Boston and probably in all America the Frenchman's three "Orchestral Sketches" of "The Sea." They are Debussy's last published composition for orchestra, and they were first played in Paris sixteen months ago. He has named them "From Dawn to Mid-day on the Sea," "The Sport of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." Otherwise there is no printed hint of their poetic contents. Instrumentally they are scored for an ordinary modern orchestra with a celesta added, which is a very modest asking for an ultra-modern composer. Perhaps Debussy looks in his heart rather than in his instruments when he writes. In Paris the sketches met what the old theatrical records call a mixed reception. The devotees and the partisans of Debussy acclaimed the characteristic perfections of the music. Those who will have none of him spent their wit or their acrimony upon the sketches. The few to whom Debussy was neither a narrow cult nor a hateful thing suggested quietly that the sketches were not altogether of his best work. Yesterday the audience seemed interested but cold. Not a hand stirred after the first sketch; a very unusual incident at a Symphony concert; a few moved after the second; a few more after the third. The talk of the lobbies, outside a flash or two of blue-stockinged wit was of other things.

Debussy seems to need suggestion for his music. The making of tonal patterns for the sake of their own beauty and nothing else has seldom allured him, in spite of his ironical professions to the contrary. Dramatic ideas in the conventional sense (as the story of Francesca da Rimini is dramatic), or dramatic music-making for its own sake (as a symphony of Tschalkovsky's is dramatic) have seldom stirred him. His titles almost always hint at an impression as the reason and the purpose of the music. The impression may come from many sources, but often it springs from nature. Recall such titles as "Gardens in the Rain," or "Reflections in the Water." Recall especially "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the nocturne of "The Clouds." As they moved across the sky, their motion and color and contour touched his imagination, and out of the impression came his music. A chief virtue of that music is a lovely fluidity. The very clouds it would delineate are solid beside it. Now the sea is the most fluid thing in nature and Debussy's music is the most fluid thing in music. The affinity between all three is obvious. The fruit of it in some form or other was inevitable. Free as Debussy is in variety of impressions and in the choice of them for musical expression, he was almost bound in temperament to write sooner or later of the sea. Perhaps, for thought of this very obligation, the three symphonic sketches seemed less spontaneous than most of his music, less sincere and within the chosen idiom more rhetorical. In the other orchestral pieces the blending of impression and expression is of a perfect fulness. In the sea pieces there are moments when, as it seemed yesterday, Debussy turns rhetorical, and when his imagination falters. From beginning to end the listener fancies that the music has cost labor; that impressions have been summoned for it.

Of those impressions the responsive hearer may gather what he will. He may fancy, as he listens, the dawn over a shadowy and lapping sea. He may hear the morning breeze stir it or the morning light ripple it. He may feel the waves awakening to a playful animation and the sea expanding, as it were before his eyes. He may see the waves turn brighter, curl their crests, scatter their spray. He may hear them racing, eddying, dancing in their play, shaking themselves into prismatic spray, or pausing in momentary stillness, then undulating, then drawing circle around circle. Or he may listen to their voices, chiding, cajoling, mocking, wooing the wind that plays over them and with its voice makes answer. In the music of the familiar nocturne, the clouds move and light and the winds have their play with them. In the sea-pieces the waves move endlessly and light and the winds have also their play with them and every wave with its fellow. The tale used to go that Debussy had sat in barracks on the outskirts of Paris and watched clouds hour upon hour. He may have watched the sea as endlessly. But the clouds of the nocturne and the sea of the orchestral sketches are also and equally the clouds and the sea of a poet's vision. They are not the things themselves, like the delineations of Strauss's music. They are Debussy's dream of them, and the secrets that they tell him.

For Debussy, like other of the new Frenchmen, is a poet who happens to write in tones, rather than a composer who may nourish poetic ideas and receive poetic impressions. The composer would set his music to the expression of his poetry. The poet who would write in tones needs make a new music of his own that shall be as fluid, undulating, iridescent, fitful, and intangible as his dreams. The composer sets about intensifying his melodies, amplifying his polyphony, accenting his rhythms, diversifying his harmonies. Not so, retorts the poet; you are only forging your own fetters the tighter. The real virtue of music as a means of poetic expression is its perfect fluidity and incessant movement. It is all impalpable curves—flowing, flowing, flowing, and taking the shape and the color with which imagination may clothe them. If Debussy is the poet, who would write in tones because no medium would give him such freedom, he found it in the nocturnes, in the piece of the faun, and now again in the sea sketches. To listen to them yesterday was to receive little sense of melodies, of rhythms, of figures in the ordinary sense of the words, and none of the relations of music that custom has made arbitrary. Rather there came the sense of endless harmonies, endless modulations flowing one from another, flowing side by side, separating, converging, but undulating always. The music was of changeable and supple and sensitive curves of sound. And each curve had color according as the instruments that shaped it, and the colors blended or contrasted with infinite shadings.

The suggestion of these curves and colors was what Debussy's imagination willed. Out of them he wove the shining web of the sea. Or he made little waves to curl and dance in them. Or he wrought them of the spray. Or he gave them the voice of wind and sea at peace or troubled. Or he bade light take its sport with them. Or the music turned gray with the monotony, the melancholy and the loneliness of the sea. Then was Debussy most sea-poet in tones. For then into them he put the mysteries of the waters and pondered them perhaps overmuch. For the exquisite spontaneity and iridescence of "The Afternoon of a Faun" is not in the sea-pieces, nor in them is the perfect completeness and sincerity of the nocturnes. Yet even while it toiled a most sensitive imagination was writing a most sensitive music for hearers that might share a little in the same sensitiveness. Of the poetry of the sea Debussy was making a poetry of tones, and in it was the secret and the mystery of all poetry—the power to insinuate or to stir responsive emotions. They were not really of the sea or of imaginations concerning it. They were of the strange evanescent beauty of those harmonies, the strange iridescence of those modulations, the subtle and changeable tints of those shadings. It was a new pleasure of a new sort of ordered sound. And therein was its justification. It had brought freedom, emotion, suggestion, beauty. There was magic in it, and by this magic it had drawn into tones the voice of the sea and its secrets—a sea that it is easiest to hear as in a dream. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz that followed was coarse reveling beside it. Ritter's dance of the condemned lovers, with its "effective" climax, was melodrama in comparison. Music before it had been emancipated to a poet's needs. But, then, few poets write it. H. T. P.

The Symphony Concert

On Saturday evening, as on Friday afternoon, the playing of Debussy's "Sea Pieces" at the Symphony concert had exquisite understanding on the part of the conductor and exquisite fineness of expression on the part of the men. It is the custom to call Dr. Muck an objective conductor—one who would give, not himself, but the composer and his music true and characteristic voice. But there are objective conductors who, with all their effort and sincerity, cannot hear some voices, and thus fail to transmit them to their hearers. Debussy's, above that of almost any other living composer's, is a singularly evasive and baffling voice. Yet Dr. Muck heard it as clearly as he heard Strauss's in the "Sinfonia Domestica" a few weeks ago, as he has heard many voices, old and new, the winter through, and made it speak in characteristic tones. The music had its perfect plasticity, its endless glint, its glamor, its suggestion. More: it had a continuity that some conductors cannot find in Debussy. Subtle harmony flowed from subtle harmony, yet melodic contours never quite vanished; themes splintered or dissolved in fragments, like the very spray of the sea that Debussy would picture, and strange instrumental timbres blended or contrasted like the mysterious voices of Debussy's own wind and waves. Throughout the sound was as the surface of the sea ever the same, yet ever changeable. At every turn the virtuosity of the men obeyed the conductor's and the composer's will. They read the poetry of sound that Debussy would write in his music—and read it as though it were no new and strange idiom. The performance of the "Sinfonia Domestica" was a large achievement of orchestral eloquence. That of the "Sea Pieces" was a fine achievement of orchestral intuition. Each was like the re-creation of the music and each held the listeners rapt.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 16th Symphony Orchestra rehearsal, which took place yesterday afternoon, consisted of Debussy's three orchestral sketches, "The Sea," performed for the first time here; "Olaf's Wedding Dance," by Alexander Ritter, the author of the poem affixed to the score of Strauss' "Tod und Verklärung," also performed for the first time; Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," and Berlioz' overture "Le Carnaval Romain."

The feature of the concert was the performance of Debussy's sketches. They are three in number. The first is intended to represent "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean," the second "Frolics of Waves," the third "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea."

Surely Debussy has never penned a more marvellous and subtle score than this, and surely he has never more successfully exercised his incredible skill in the blending of color and the use of strange involved or conflicting rhythms which convey psychological suggestions and impressions in a manner only possible to this inimitable Frenchman. In this music there are rare and precious harmonies, shifting, evanescent play of light and shade, and we are strangely conscious of the indefinable mystery of the sea. This is a wonderful, unique art, and the composer has unquestionably enlarged the musical horizon. But is it a great, vital art? Is it elemental enough to appeal to succeeding generations and differing epochs of thought and expression? Is it not rather a new taste, a rarity, calculated to appeal to the refined sensuousness of a hyper-refined age? To us this music lacks the vast, elemental note, and with its prismatic opalescent hues seems rather the sea conceived by a dreamer, as lying on his couch in a sumptuously upholstered apartment and puffing blue rings of smoke into the air. "Olaf's Wedding Dance" is a rather surprising product when one considers the source from which it came. Ritter we had conceived to be a thinker, a scholar, and somewhat of an iconoclast. Did he intend this waltz to be seriously taken? It is a beer-garden affair, and scarcely worthy of a place on a serious programme.

The "Mephisto Waltz" has been dubbed "music of the bagnio," and alleged to be unfit for the chaste ears of a Symphony audience. Yet no one seemed offended yesterday afternoon, and it was warmly applauded. The performance, to borrow James Huneker's phrase, was one of "abounding devilry."

Globe March 2, 07
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of the four composers whose works made up the 16th Symphony program, two, Debussy and Ritter, were represented by pieces played for the first times at these concerts. The former, a Frenchman, is becoming quite conspicuous in the musical world, and his three orchestral sketches under the title of "The Sea," which opened the program, are less than two years old. Ritter's symphonic waltz, "Olaf's Wedding Dance," was composed about 15 years ago. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," completed the program.

To many minds Claude Debussy continues to be a puzzle, for his harmonic ideas are expressed in such strange forms that his modern musical activity and adroitness fail to satisfy the orthodox brain. The trio named, "The Sea," are termed impressionistic sketches of the ocean. The first is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of Wind and Wave." Each one is fantastic, the modulations are almost continuous and with few, if any, sustained melodies, and the orchestration is managed in such a way as to suggest an incessant restlessness, which of course is typical of Neptune's domain.

They are tonal pictures elaborately developed, with an immense amount of detail, deliberately bold and somewhat irritating at times because there are so few restful measures. The man is a wonder in conjuring up odd instrumental combinations and the composition is remarkable in this respect if in no other. Knowing the subject the musical illustration is vivid and typical. Dr. Muck guided his forces safely and dexterously through this ocean of harmony whose qualities met with reserved appreciation on the part of the auditors.

The Russian, Alexander Ritter, based his waltz, "King Olaf's Wedding Dance," on a Norwegian legend in which a youth falls in love with a princess. The king, the father of the princess, decrees that he shall marry her and be executed immediately. After the ceremony there is a dance, and at midnight the executioner appears. But when search is made for the bride and bridegroom, their bodies are found floating in the river. The main part of the composition is an old-fashioned German waltz.

In contrasting the dances with the somber incidents, Ritter shows considerable skill, for the interruptions are effective, the "atmosphere" is clearly suggested, and the whole work is effective. The orchestra played the work in splendid fashion and showed the skill of the band by interpreting the Liszt "Mephisto" waltz, which followed, in such a manner as to clearly define the breaks differently from those of the Ritter piece. The latter were gloomy and foreboding; in the "Mephisto" the diabolic was revealed. The Berlioz overture was given brilliantly. The concert was unusually brief.

The program this week will be devoted to the classics, the first three works being of the 18th century. The first number will be Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra, three violins, three violas, three cellos and three contra-basses. This work has never been played at the Symphony concerts, although others of the same series have appeared on the programs in the past. Other numbers will be Haydn's second symphony, the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. There will be no soloists.

SYMPHONY'S 16TH CONCERT OF SEASON

Herald Mon 3.07

Debussy's "Sea" Given Here for First Time and Is Ably Rendered at Most Brilliant Performance.

BY PHILIP HALE

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:
"The Sea": (1) "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; (2) "Frolics of Waves"; (3) "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea".....Debussy
"Olaf's Wedding Dance".....A. Ritter
"Mephisto Waltz".....Liszt
Overture, "Roman Carnival".....Berlioz

The compositions by Debussy and Ritter were played for the first time in this city. I believe the performance of Debussy's "Sea" was the first in the United States.

There are some who insist that music written even by the most imaginative, skilful and audacious composer cannot portray a scene in nature or a phenomenon of nature so effectively, either by an attempt at photographic realism, by "impressionism," or by subtle suggestion, as a painting or a page of printed words.

Raff wrote an "Autumn" symphony, with a dance of ghosts, a hunting scene, an elegy: with a first movement entitled "Impressions and Sentiments." What is all this music and that of other fall composers when weighed against this line of Collins: "While fallow Autumn fills thy lap with leaves?"

There are landscapists in music who have composed admirable pages, but what one of them could express in tones these lines from the same ode, the ode "To Evening"?

Or, if chill, blustering winds or driving rain
Prevent my willing feet, be mine the hut
That, from the mountain's side,
Views wilds, and swelling floods,

And hamlets brown, and dim-discover'd spires;
And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er all
Thy dewy fingers draw
The gradual dusky veil.

What symphonic poem entitled "Egdon Heath" could vie with the first chapter of Thomas Hardy's "Return of the Native"?

Look over the works of the seascape artists in music, Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Paul Gilson and others. Let them rage and howl and bluster or mimic the treacherous calm and deceitful merriment. How far are they from depicting "the spasm of the sky and the shatter of the sea?"

Thus do some cry out against this specific portraiture in music.

Some Music That Does.

But the sea is very old and it is still young; it is monotonous and it is terrible in its variety of expression. The same sea that was to Aeschylus as multitudinous laughter was so dreaded by John on Patmos that in the heaven he saw in the wondrous vision there is no sea. Is it not possible for a composer who is on intimate terms with the ocean to express in tones some of its characteristics? Are there no measures in two overtures of Mendelssohn in the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony, in "Scheherazade," in "Sadko" and in Gilson's symphonic poem that bring the sea irresistibly to mind, and that without aid of programme?

Nor is there any need of programme to catch the meaning of Debussy's "Sketches." Whether these sketches belong to music or to a new art is a question that need not now be discussed. Nor is it necessary to speak about Debussy's strange and surprising musical material. The question is simply this: Does he succeed in his purpose? And here the individuality of the hearer enters into the answer. There must be something more in the music than mere mimicry of hissing or roaring waves, of rising or falling tide, of angry response to raging wind, of monstrous playfulness? The composer, it is true, can literally reproduce in sound only sound; but he can suggest sight and savor to the hearer that is receptive.

The sketches are more than a remarkable tour de force; they are something more than essays in a strange language. The hearer must cast aside all theories about how music should be written; he must listen in good faith.

As heard last night, and the performance was one of extraordinary brilliance, the first and the second movements seemed the more poetic and at the same time realistic. The third, while it was impressive and at times admirably mimetic, did not seem so clearly imagined or so convincingly expressed. It would be impossible to give any analysis in the most general way of any one of the movements, for they are as shifting and capricious as the sea itself. There are fragments of themes; there are themes that might be called typical motives, which are of exquisite beauty, but all these themes float on the waves of sound; they are lost; they reappear.

It Meant Much to Many.

This music is to be heard, rather than talked about. To some, curious and expectant, but without prejudice, it was perhaps chaotic and unintelligible. Others were interested only in the unusual harmonic progressions and in the strange use of familiar instruments. And there were others to whom this music was a highly poetic expression of the sea and its mystery. The sketches are at least an answer to those who have insisted that Debussy's melodic vein is weak and that he lacks virility.

Music so strange, so fascinating, so perplexing, should be heard more than once in a season. It is a pity that the sketches are not on the programme of the concert this week.

Ritter's music to the grim Norse Saga, placed between "the Sea," and the familiar "Mephisto" waltz, was killed on the spot. The subject chosen by Ritter might well serve a composer of greater imagination and richer invention. Neither the dance music nor that which typifies the executioner is striking either in ecstasy of passion or in bodement. An inherently cheap waltz is heavily scored.

In Liszt's scene from Lenau's "Faust," the sensuousness is akin to sensuality, but how diabolically clever this music is! Not a point is missed. Familiar as the work is, it is always engrossing, and the performance last night was dramatic, euphonious, and eminently Mephistophelian. Nor even after Debussy and Liszt did Berlioz, the great forerunner, seem old-fashioned.

Dr. Muck and the orchestra were heartily applauded after the superno close of "The Sea," and even those who probably did not enjoy the music wondered at the splendor of the performance.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of the four composers whose works made up the 16th Symphony program, two, Debussy and Ritter, were represented by pieces played for the first times at these concerts. The former, a Frenchman, is becoming quite conspicuous in the musical world, and his three orchestral sketches under the title of "The Sea," which opened the program, are less than two years old. Ritter's symphonic waltz, "Olaf's Wedding Dance," was composed about 15 years ago. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," completed the program.

To many minds Claude Debussy continues to be a puzzle, for his harmonic ideas are expressed in such strange forms that his modern musical activity and adroitness fail to satisfy the orthodox brain. The trio named, "The Sea," are termed impressionistic sketches of the ocean. The first is entitled "From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean"; the second, "Frolics of the Waves," and the third, "Dialogue of Wind and Wave." Each one is fantastic, the modulations are almost continuous and with few, if any, sustained melodies, and the orchestration is managed in such a way as to suggest an incessant restlessness, which of course is typical of Neptune's domain.

They are tonal pictures elaborately developed, with an immense amount of detail, deliberately bold and somewhat irritating at times because there are so few restful measures. The man is a wonder in conjuring up odd instrumental combinations and the composition is remarkable in this respect if in no other. Knowing the subject the musical illustration is vivid and typical. Dr. Muck guided his forces safely and dexterously through this ocean of harmony whose qualities met with reserved appreciation on the part of the auditors.

The Russian, Alexander Ritter, based his waltz, "King Olaf's Wedding Dance," on a Norwegian legend in which a youth falls in love with a princess. The king, the father of the princess, decrees that he shall marry her and be executed immediately. After the ceremony there is a dance, and at midnight the executioner appears. But when search is made for the bride and bridegroom, their bodies are found floating in the river. The main part of the composition is an old-fashioned German waltz.

In contrasting the dances with the somber incidents, Ritter shows considerable skill, for the interruptions are effective, the "atmosphere" is clearly suggested, and the whole work is effective. The orchestra played the work in splendid fashion and showed the skill of the band by interpreting the Liszt "Mephisto" waltz, which followed, in such a manner as to clearly define the breaks differently from those of the Ritter piece. The latter were gloomy and foreboding; in the "Mephisto" the diabolic was revealed. The Berlioz overture was given brilliantly. The concert was unusually brief.

The program this week will be devoted to the classics, the first three works being of the 18th century. The first number will be Bach's third Brandenburg concerto for string orchestra, three violins, three violas, three cellos and three contra-basses. This work has never been played at the Symphony concerts, although others of the same series have appeared on the programs in the past. Other numbers will be Haydn's second symphony, the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8. There will be no soloists.

CURIOUS PROGRAM AT SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY

Journal Mon 4.07

Unfamiliar "The Sea" of Debussy
Had Right of Way and Consequently Made Its Legitimate Impression First of All.

In the curiously constructed program of the sixteenth Symphony concert—one without those contrasts that serve to bring out the best of that which is offered—the unfamiliar “The Sea” of Debussy had the right of way, and consequently made its legitimate impression first of all. There are three sections in this extraordinary tone-poem, entitled “From Dawn Till Noon on the Ocean,” “Frolics of the Waves” and “Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea,” respectively. They are remarkably unlike, considering that all are pictures of the same great scene—a scene, be it understood, not on the beach where there is a board walk and shouting bathers, nor on some huge and puffing liner, nor yet at a yacht race, with dinner at the club house afterward—but far out on some mystic ocean on a dream ship moving waywardly under sails set by no mortal hand and with rudder held by capricious fate. As an opium eater might behold the sea so is this music’s expression in strange tonalities, in weird and unearthly coloring and in almost inhuman orchestral effects.

Yet the work is not cloudy or uncertain. It is filled with that far-away beauty that Debussy inevitably achieves, and it rises to sonorous and impressive power at many points. Its most striking part was the first, where the gradual change from the mystery of dawn on the waters to the glowing of the noon-day sun is a marvelous upbuilding to a gorgeous climax. In the third movement there are big effects that wholly disprove the occasional assertion that Debussy is without virility. The whole was read and played with extraordinary poetic instinct and virtuosity.

Ritter’s “Olaf’s Wedding Dance” that followed ost by the propinquity to Debussy’s wonderful orchestral speech whatever chance it might have had to make any favorable impression. It is pretty poor stuff, however considered, consisting of but one salient theme, commonplace in itself, in the form of a heavy waltz, muddily orchestrated and generally disappointing.

Then another waltz, the fiery and diabolic “Mephisto” of Liszt. The brilliancy and sardonic suggestion of this bit of musical sneering is well known, and it has made a deeper impression on other occasions. Perhaps its wickedness is beginning to appear considerably like studied artifice.

But not Debussy or Liszt could dim in the slightest the ever fresh and glowing beauty of Berlioz’ “Roman Carnival” overture. Here is still the greatest Frenchman, and one of the very greatest orchestral painters of all time.

Boston Transcript

824 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

FRIDAY, MARCH 22, 1907

Debussy and Converse in New York

At the concert that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night in New York, Dr. Muck repeated Debussy’s symphonic sketches, “The Sea,” that he first played here three weeks ago. They were new to New York, and the reviewers there love not the new Frenchmen though they are a shade more kindly disposed toward Debussy’s music than they are to the hapless d’Indy’s. The sea pieces, however, plainly irritated some of them and they uncork their vials of contempt upon the composer’s head. Mr. Henderson, for example, writes in the Sun: “Mr. Debussy is a man of indisputable talent and his mastery of orchestral techniques is exceptional even in these days when every composer is expected to have perfect command of instrumentation. Furthermore his purpose is perfectly recognizable. He endeavors to avoid the old processes of thematic proposition and discussion and to substitute for them a plan of harmonic illustration with instrumental painting superimposed upon it. His music is the logical outgrowth of the school of impressionistic composition. Mr. Debussy’s artistic forerunners sought to employ the older processes but to add to them a pretentiously complicated scheme of harmonic expression and a palette of tonal color, of which the tendency was to substitute tints for form. It would be idle to deny that composition along these lines has certain possibilities. But when a composer abolishes from his outfit all the elementary units which have existed in music since its inception as an art form, when he kicks the diatonic scale into the street and puts his curse upon the major triad he asks us to give up all those points of basic structure on which we have been accustomed to rest our troubled souls. Just why Dr. Muck should have put himself to the trouble of rehearsing these three cacophonous examples of morbidity it is impossible to explain. The second had a certain charm and bizarre fascination, but the three gave the impression of no one of the seven seas known to man. Mr. Debussy’s sea is not even that over which the dawn comes up like thunder. It is more like the unexplored Sargasso Sea, full of decay and mystery and unknown horrors. Debussy can write and has written more inspiring things.”

Mr. Aldrich, who is much more open-minded and sensitive to this French music, was honestly disappointed and he writes in the Times: “The sketches are meant to be, evidently, impressionistic depictions of sights and sounds and sensations, vague and indefinable, perhaps, as to outline, but summing up the essential quality of the sea. Debussy’s signal failure in this, his failure to attain any real suggestiveness except in a few passages, or to convey any charm, is all the more striking after his signal success in such pieces as ‘The Afternoon of a Faun’ and ‘The Nocturnes.’ There is beauty in them, intangible, to be sure, but of a searching kind; imagination, glimpses, now dim and shadowy, now sharp, though fleeting, of things seen and heard in an inner vision. But ‘The Sea’ is persistently ugly, in its substance as well as in its orchestral investiture, which, with Debussy, are so nearly one, and it is prosaic in its reiteration of inert formulas of melodic and harmonic progression that are no longer filled with creative imagination. He fails to give any impression of the sea, either in mood or in pictorial suggestions. There is nothing of its vastness, of its mystery, of its tranquillity, next to nothing of its turbulence or of its broad sweep. There is more of barnyard cackle in it than anything else. There is not much of Debussy’s delicacy, richness, or subtlety of orchestration any longer discernible here. A mania for stopped horns, stopped trumpets, the staccato crepitation of oboes, seems to have seized him. There are patches of color now and again, and some sweeping phrases in a true instrumental idiom, but they are fleeting, and they lead nowhere.”

Mr. Krebbs in the Tribune thinks still more ill of the sketches, and the few sentences that he gives to them are also with quoting as an example of urbanity, temperance, imagination and desire to discover and to do justice to the composer’s point of view—ancient but not always honored means and methods of criticism. The programme, writes Mr. Krebbs, “began with a lot of impressionistic daubs of color smeared biggledly-piggledly on a tonal palette, with never a thought of form or outline or purpose (except to create new combinations of sounds) or logical procedure, but dignified with no less vast a title than ‘The Sea.’ There were three of these groups of daubs and splotches, but so far as a merely musical mind could determine, the order of the pieces might have been reversed and the music itself played backward without disturbing or changing in any way their significance, their effectiveness or the intellectual quality of the pretty rhapsodies of unmeaning words which the expositors of the French composer have superimposed upon all of his music. One thing only was obvious, and that was that Debussy’s ocean was a frog pond, and that some of its denizens had got into the throat of every one of the brass instruments and stayed there from beginning to end, with woful results.” After all, there is nothing like a preconceived and settled notion of the way in which music should be written.

Mr. Converse’s orchestral fantasia, “The Mystic Trumpeter,” followed the sea pieces. Mr. Aldrich, at least, thought well of it. “It was magnificently played,” he writes, and its strength as music and as a delineation of what Walt Whitman has put into his poem was amply set forth. It is full of imagination, and of a sustained power of musical expression, and it shows Mr. Converse at his best. It is not to be denied that there are passages that sound commonplace, where he has not maintained the height of his inspiration. It may be doubted whether his representation of “arm’d men hastening” has not a little too much easy realism. But the finer sections of his work are finely felt and strongly knit, and it is music that is a credit to the school to which it belongs.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

March 4.07

Programme.

Debussy.—Three Orchestral Sketches. “The Sea.”

Alex. Ritter.—Olaf’s Wedding Dance, Op. 22.

Liszt.—Scene in the Tavern. Mephisto Waltz.

Berlioz.—Roman Carnival Overture.

There was no soloist nor will there be one next Saturday. This is not a fault; our orchestra is a great enough attraction by itself.

When we read the title of the first of the sea-sketches by Debussy—“from Dawn till Noon on the Ocean”—we feared that, in accordance with modern realism, we were to have a movement seven hours long. It was not so long, but it was terrible while it lasted. We do not wish to treat a prominent composer flippantly; we find some musicians for whom we have the highest respect going into ecstasies over this work and we have honestly endeavored to put ourselves into a receptive mood and to discern its beauties. We have failed. We can find little else but shreds and patches, and the eternal bleatings of muted horns and cacklings of oboes breeds only contempt.

Even the despised Mendelssohn has given more graphic sea-music in his “Hebrides Overture,” while there is more of the flavor of the ocean in the first 50 measures of the “Flying Dutchman” overture than in the entire Debussy work. The first movement of Rubinstein’s “Ocean Symphony” also stands far above this tone picture and in the same field.

Frenchmen are notoriously bad sailors, and a Gallic picture of the sea is apt to run more to stewards and basins and lemons than to the wild majesty of Poseidon. There was, however, much glow of orchestration in the second movement and the brilliant performance of the finale was sufficient to arouse the audience. Dr. Muck was recalled twice at the end, and finally caused the orchestra to rise to acknowledge the applause. We were as mystified at the end as at the beginning. We clung, like a drowning man, to a few fragments of the tonal wreck, a bit of a theme here and a comprehensible figure there, but finally this muted horn sea overwhelmed us. If this be Music we would much prefer to leave the Heavenly Maid until she has got over her Hysterics.

After this the concert was given over to the dance. Each one of the three last numbers was a dance of some sort. Olaf’s Wedding Dance was not a very joyous matter. One thought of Sydney Smith’s description of the dancers at an English party.—“They looked as if they were hired to do it and were doubtful about being paid.” But it must be borne in mind that the unfortunate Olaf was to be executed at midnight after indulging in this revelry. When a man knows that the headsman is waiting for the final cadence he may be excused for losing his head beforehand. There was nothing remarkable in the themes of this waltz, but it was interesting to see how rigidly the 12 o'clock closing law was enforced at the end.

246

The two last numbers of the concert were of much more genuine character than the two first. Liszt and Berlioz have not yet been surpassed by their numerous followers in the domain of programme-music and scintillant modern orchestration. In the Mephisto waltz there was fantasy, diablerie and wonderful tone-coloring. The flute obbligato and the harp playing deserve especial mention. Yet on the whole the number did not make its due effect. Dr. Muck in his zeal for unity sometimes places compositions side by side that neutralize each other. We found this to be the case in this instance. The weak waltz of Ritter was yet sufficiently strong to counteract the effect of Faust's dance.

Up to this point the dancing had been sanguinary or fiendish, with a Carmagnole quality back of its merriment; but now, in the last number, there was honest lightheartedness. The English-horn serenade theme, beautifully played, was the first bit of genuine tune of the concert. We have never ranked Berlioz very high as a melodist, yet on this occasion one came upon the serenade as a weary traveller comes upon an oasis in the desert. The Salterello was full of animation and much applause followed the end of the work. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" had also been heartily recognized. The concert had the merit of brevity.

We can understand that a conductor must give us important new works whether he approves of them or not, but a single one might be quite enough at a sitting. Nor is the boredom consequent upon some of this modern iconoclasm the only bad result. We can state it as a definite fact that, while our orchestra is at present surpassingly brilliant, especially when imbued with Dr. Muck's great personality, its ensemble and precision is less than of yore. We can only ascribe this to the effect of some of these cacophonous compositions!

Louis C. Elson.

247
Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 9, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

J. S. BACH,

BRANDENBURG CONCERTO No. 3, in G major,
for three VIOLINS, three VIOLAS, three VIOLONCEL-
LOS, and BASS.

- I. Alla Breve.
- II. Allegro.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in D major, (B. & H., No. 2.)

- I. Adagio : Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Trio.
- IV. Allegro spiritoso.

MOZART,

OVERTURE to the opera "The Magic Flute."

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

- I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
- II. Allegretto scherzando.
- III. Tempo di menuetto.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

nothing remarkable in the themes of this waltz, but it was interesting to see how rigidly the 12 o'clock closing law was enforced at the end.

The two last numbers of the concert were of much more genuine character than the two first. Liszt and Berlioz have not yet been surpassed by their numerous followers in the domain of programme-music and scintillant modern orchestration. In the Mephisto waltz there was fantasy, diablerie and wonderful tone-coloring. The flute obbligato and the harp playing deserve especial mention. Yet on the whole the number did not make its due effect. Dr. Muck in his zeal for unity sometimes places compositions side by side that neutralize each other. We found this to be the case in this instance. The weak waltz of Ritter was yet sufficiently strong to counteract the effect of Faust's dance.

Up to this point the dancing had been sanguinary or fiendish, with a Carmagnolan quality back of its merriment; but now, in the last number, there was honest lightheartedness. The English-horn serenade theme, beautifully played, was the first bit of genuine tune of the concert. We have never ranked Berlioz very high as a melodist, yet on this occasion one came upon the serenade as a weary traveller comes upon an oasis in the desert. The Salterello was full of animation and much applause followed the end of the work. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" had also been heartily recognized. The concert had the merit of brevity.

We can understand that a conductor must give us important new works whether he approves of them or not, but a single one might be quite enough at a sitting. Nor is the boredom consequent upon some of this modern iconoclasm the only bad result. We can state it as a definite fact that, while our orchestra is at present surpassingly brilliant, especially when imbued with Dr. Muck's great personality, its ensemble and precision is less than of yore. We can only ascribe this to the effect of some of these cacophonous compositions!

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 9, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

J. S. BACH,

BRANDENBURG CONCERTO No. 3, in G major,
for three VIOLINS, three VIOLAS, three VIOLONCEL-
LOS, and BASS.

- I. Alla Breve.
- II. Allegro.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in D major, (B. & H., No. 2.)

- I. Adagio : Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Trio.
- IV. Allegro spiritoso.

MOZART,

OVERTURE to the opera "The Magic Flute."

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

- I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
- II. Allegretto scherzando.
- III. Tempo di menuetto.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

248

Symphony Hall.

249

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 9, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

J. S. BACH,

BRANDENBURG CONCERTO No. 3, in G major,
for three VIOLINS, three VIOLAS, three VIOLONCEL-
LOS, and BASS.

- I. Alla Breve.
- II. Allegro.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY in D major, (B. & H., No. 2.)

- I. Adagio : Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Trio.
- IV. Allegro spiritoso.

MOZART,

OVERTURE to the opera "The Magic Flute."

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

- I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
- II. Allegretto scherzando.
- III. Tempo di menuetto.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

150

The Boston Journal

ALL SERENITY AND CALM JOY AT SYMPHONY

From Bach to Beethoven There Was Nothing to Disturb the Mind of the Most Musically Virtuous—No
Discord of Any Sort.

If "happy is the country that has no history," so peaceful is the Symphony concert about which there is nothing to write. Such a one was that of Saturday night, when, from Bach to Beethoven, all was serenity and calm joy. There was nothing to disturb the mind of the most musically virtuous. The highly respectable citizen who regards Richard Strauss as immoral and holds Debussy in contempt was once more provided with his own beloved pabulum, and as the men who like and believe in modern music do not retaliate by denouncing the classicists, there was no occasion for discord of any sort.

The program was "educational," in that it collated the fairly representative works of men who followed one another in legitimate succession. It showed their likenesses and their differences and it showed the strides that each composer took in advance of his predecessor. If there was monotony in the scheme, it was of the pleasant kind, filling the heart with cheer and suggesting no more gloom than that which is provoked by an evanescent April shower. The Bach "Brandenburg" concerto for strings was all mellifluous charm and the popular Haydn D symphony as full of dainty charm as ever. A touch of modernity was imparted to the Mozart "Magic Flute" overture, but it seemed by no means out of keeping, for, with all his absolute adherence to form, Mozart was modern in thought. The Beethoven Eighth symphony sparkled and pleased as always, although it has had more perfect performances in other days.

251

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme of Light and Familiar Music in Which Conductor, Orchestra and Audience Take Their Pleasure

After their wrestlings with Strauss, Debussy, Brahms, and minor moderns and ultra-moderns, conductor, band and audience took their ease comparatively at the Symphony concert yesterday. For the second time in the course of the season, Dr. Muck chose his programme from music that was of the eighteenth century by date or in spirit. Two symphonies stood upon it—Haydn's in D major and Beethoven's eighth in F major—and each was very familiar. Between them was Mozart's overture to his opera, "The Magic Flute," familiar too, but hardly in the dramatic accents that Dr. Muck gave to it. New, however, to the Symphony concerts, but not to those that know their Bach, was his "Brandenburg" concerto, in G major for strings, that began the list. From first to last the music bade the listeners to the pleasure of beautiful, ordered, flowing and expressive sound. It bade the conductor to heed of the curves, arabesques and ornaments of the tonal patterns he and his men were weaving, to a care of perfect euphony and brightness, to songful charm and serene simplicity. It bade the men to the delicate liveliness, the rippling fluidity of tone and the light spontaneous precision that has long been their custom in such music. In their playing yesterday it was hard to find, in spite of some keen-eared listeners in New York, any decline in these qualities. Rather Dr. Muck, and the men themselves under his stimulus, have given their tone a warmer brightness, and a more sparkling fluidity. The sheer suppleness of it was fascinating. It seemed to run of itself into the edgeless arabesques of the music. The pleasure of the performance matched the pleasure of the programme, and it was an immediate, serene and effortless pleasure. Therein, says the paradoxical Debussy, is the ideal purpose and attainment of music. Bach, he admits, achieved it. He is not so sure seemingly of the homely Haydn or the "unbuttoned" Beethoven of the eighth symphony. The audience yesterday was much surer than it is with Debussy himself.

H. T. P.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Imm: ———— Mch 11. 07
The Concerts of Saturday

Even the Symphony concerts may not escape the New England conscience. If ever a programme was devised to give pure pleasure, it was that which Dr. Muck and the orchestra played on Friday and Saturday. It succeeded perfectly in its end. There was nothing, it seemed, for the reviewer to do but to testify to the pleasure that the two audiences received from programme and performance. Then, in the familiar form of the letter to the editor, enter the New England conscience that cannot take joy without questioning it. Should a concerto by Bach for a few stringed instruments in a small room be played in a large hall by the string choir of a modern orchestra? Should a programme of a Symphony concert consist entirely of music of the eighteenth century or of music that is akin to it in spirit? Should the overture to "The Magic Flute" be played with so much "operatic accent" as Dr. Muck gave it, and so forth. Clearly there are some among us that cannot take their pleasure for the pleasure's sake.

It is true that Bach wrote his concerto for the private orchestra and the music-room of the Margrave of Brandenburg. It is as true that were it to be played in a small hall by a small band, many a detail of its contrapuntal patterns might be finer than it was in the fuller voices of the string choir of our orchestra. So played, it would probably sound "quaint," and "quaintness," we suspect, is the unavowed desire of many of those who would have eighteenth century conditions. But they forget that this very concerto did not sound in the least "quaint" to the margrave and his guests. They came as naturally to it as we to the uncontroverted music of our own time. To them it was eloquent, fluent, brilliant, imaginative. The true aim of the conductor and the band who would play it today is to give it a similar eloquence and beauty to us. To do so he must use the instrumental means to which we are accustomed, or else he leaves us dawdling finically in the pretty and perilous meadow of "quaintness." And Bach was anything but "quaint." In fact, the vividest impression of this Brandenburg concerto is of the varied eloquence that Bach was drawing from a string choir in contrapuntal play. The moderns like to fancy that they have become exceedingly subtle and masterful in the manipulation of instrumental timbres. Yet it is hard to recall one of them who has attained such varied tonal color from a string choir as Bach obtains in this concerto, and so brilliantly and spontaneously. At moments it is like improvisation. After all Bach was the real parent of the fluency and the sensitiveness of line that is the goal of so much of our ultra-modern music. He accepted the musical paragraph that these moderns dislike, but within how supple and fleeting are his phrases and sentences.

252

Like or dislike for a concert of music of the eighteenth century is a personal taste about which argument is nearly futile. Such music quickly cloy some hearers. They resent its unemotional quality and its comparatively slender voice. They feel acutely its limitations—much more acutely than they do its characteristic beauties. A little suffices and they pine straightway for music that is more robustious of matter and manner. Others in their turn prefer a programme that keeps from beginning to end a mood, an atmosphere, a point of view. The surest way, they say, and reasonably, to dim and dull the essential qualities of eighteenth-century music is to sandwich it among the music of a later day. Does the discriminating collector hang his Watteaus and his Monets side by side? In the same way the discriminating conductor seeks to give each piece that he puts on his programme its peculiar quality unobscured by the appropriate qualities of its neighbors. Moreover, a distinctive virtue of this eighteenth century music is its insinuating charm. It penetrates the listener's fancy gradually, subtly, almost unconsciously. He passes from curiosity to interest, from interest to enjoyment, from enjoyment to exhilaration. He gains a new point of view and a new sort of pleasure by the magic of this music, and he is unaware of the spell until he is subject to it. The audience Saturday night listened to Beethoven's eighth symphony with the more zest because Bach, and Mozart and Haydn had been warming their ears and fancies to it.

And why should not the overture to "The Magic Flute" have all the "operatic accent" that Dr. Muck gave to it? If one sort of pedantic listener insists that all eighteenth century music shall sound " quaint," another sort—and still more pedantic—is as determined that it shall sound dry. As the true aim of a conductor with the Brandenburg concerto is to make it produce similar emotional effects upon us to those it produced upon the margrave's guests; so it should be the true aim of the conductor with the overture to "The Magic Flute" to make it sound emotionally to us as it sounded to the audience that first heard it in Schikaneder's little theatre in the suburbs of Vienna, nearly a century and a quarter ago. By every token of enduring human nature when it listens to music, those trombone chords must have been as irresistible as Dr. Muck made them on Friday and Saturday. They are thrilling. They are intended to thrill. The Mozart who wrote them was the Mozart who a few years before had brought the statue of the Commander stalking to the same instruments toward Don Juan's feast—the Mozart who could be musical dramatist. The thrill of the chords in a sense is obvious; but Dr. Muck went much further. He took the whole opening of the overture with slow solemnity. Then in the sharpest contrasts he flung the orchestra into the fugue and sent it whirling through the music, seizing every point for sharp accent and tonal high lights. The whole effect was as stirring and brilliant as that of the chords had been intense and sombre. In it were the two moods of the opera and the genuine dramatic genius that was ripening in Mozart. The overture was music of the theatre again, and by every sign Mozart intended it as nothing else.

Through all the winter in New York, as well as in Boston, the disposition of Mme. Melba's audiences toward her has been as interesting as the ripened fulness of her powers. No eminent singer of our time has made her way so slowly with the finest public of the opera and of concerts in America. When she appeared first at the Metropolitan Opera House, in the nineties, its audiences were curious and cold. For long afterwards she was only one of the eminent singers upon its stage—and a singer whom it was the custom oftener to reproach for the qualities that she lacked in voice and temperament rather than to praise for the rare virtues that were already and plainly hers. Then in another opera company she sang in many cities, and the same reserve continued in her audiences. For some strange reason, they would not surrender themselves to the most remarkable voice of our time. They recognized it coldly, dispassionately. They seemed, strangely, to wish that it might be something else. Concert tours followed—unusually dignified concert tours—but with little change in the temper of the public. Sickness and even a hint of declining powers clouded the last of them. Then long absence, and a few months ago, the return of Mme. Melba to sing as, in America, she had never sung before. Simultaneously the audiences to which she sang seemed to awaken to her, to yield to her voice, where before they had only listened. In New York, no singer—not even Caruso—has so stirred and held the public of the opera. Elsewhere when she has sung in concerts her audiences have exhausted seats and standing room, have listened rapt, and departed with praises, and not doubts and reserves on their lips. It was so on Saturday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and it has been so wherever and whenever Mme. Melba has sung since last December.

Mme. Melba has deserved this reward. Only by her voice and her artistry has she sought to gain it, and by no cheap or ill-timed means has she tried to speed its coming. She has kept her dignity, her poise, what the French call her "honneur d'artiste." And now that it has come in its fullness, there seems to be almost a touch of quiet pride in her singing. The quality of a singer's voice, the warmth of her tones, the transporting quality in her song, owe much to the mood that she brings to her work, and it is not altogether fanciful to trace to this new tide of warm appreciation something of the new warmth of Mme. Melba's tones. Staccati may be the more brilliant and trills more sparkling for high spirits in the singer herself. Her tones may be the richer and the more resonant under this new richness of public appreciation. Mme. Melba's voice may be the more undulating for the pride of just conquest that now stirs in her. It is to the responsive audience that singer and player give most, and perhaps it is this certainty of response that has made Mme. Melba's singing this year, and on Saturday in particular, seem of more emotional quality than it ever has before. Always and never more than now, it could awake the emotions of a thrilling beauty of tone, as of the voice of disembodied song. Always it could stir the emotions of an artistry that was unique in its spontaneity, surety, and its touch of rhapsodic inspiration. From that first night at the Metropolitan Opera House thirteen years ago, Mme. Melba's singing could always transport with the emotions of its own beauty. Now it transports as well with the peculiar beauty of the music that she sings and with the emotions—be they Gilda's, or Violetta's, or Lucia's—of which it is the voice.

H. T. P.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Bach. Brandenburg Concerto, for Strings.
Haydn. Symphony in D.
Mozart. "Magic Flute" overture.
Beethoven. Eighth Symphony.

Dr. Muck has had no half-measures in his programme. It is either all classical, or all modern, all Gallic, or all Teutonic, or all Slavonic. On this occasion it was entirely German and wholly classical. There was again no soloist. Of the last-named fact no one ought to complain, for our orchestra is sufficiently excellent, and our conductor sufficiently great, to be worth hearing quite by themselves.

We would have preferred the Brandenburg Concerto in a small hall and given with only ten or a dozen instruments. But even in its magnified state it had a beauty and indescribable dignity. Here is a symmetrical complexity that is built to last, which cannot be said of the modern 5-4 and 7-4 rhythms and zigzag modulations. There was much applause at its end, in fact a recall of the conductor.

We wonder whether Strauss, D'Indy, Debussy or Reger could create such a set of properly contrasted melodies as are found in a Haydn symphony! Haydn's first movements wear particularly well and his finales are almost always jovial and attractive in their rusticity. The formal variations which one often finds in his slow movements, and the set contrasts of tunes, in 3-4 rhythm, that form his Minuets, are less powerful to modern auditors. We found these two movements rather tepid on this occasion, not through any defect of interpretation, but simply because they represented a style that is tame to the modern listener.

253

But the "Magic Flute" overture made us sit up! It was the most original reading that we can remember. The introduction was taken so slow that it almost dropped apart. Per contra, the fugal exposition which constitutes the chief theme was whipped up to a furious Presto. The turns in this subject were accented very strongly (a full "sforzando" effect) which gave an entirely new result to the theme. We do not dislike this effect but it is quite new to us and, at first, it astonished us because of its audacity.

The fugal matter shows what diverse results can be produced from the same tonal material, for if our readers will look up the Fugue No. 7, in the second part of Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord," they will find a very similar subject, in the same key, but leading to entirely different development. And this fugue happened to be Mozart's especial favorite among the shorter fugues of Bach.

We thought that the melodic subordinate theme of the overture suffered somewhat by being over-driven. The Prestissimo speed was maintained throughout the work. The Coda was urged to the point of fury.

There was nothing essentially new read into the Beethoven symphony, the most playful of the nine. The Bassoons deserve praise for excellence in their work which is most prominent in this composition. Beethoven loved this clown of the orchestra and used it as the best vehicle to express his merry moods, which often ran into the grotesque. In the second movement the charming dialogue between violins and violoncellos was daintily given and the brusquerie of the end was well portrayed. The horns played well in the trio of the Minuet. In the Finale there was an occasional desire to push "piano" effects to the "ppp" point and some parts were almost inaudible, but the flying leap from flutes to contrabasses, and the duet between kettle-drum and bassoon, were as sportive as could be wished. The contrabasses deserve especial mention.

But all in all, the Bach movements, even in their "arranged" state, were the finest part of the concert. In such noble music the true art-lover can hear calm and serene deities "Who, as they sung, would take the prisoned soul

And lap it in Elysium."

Louis C. Elson.

17TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

It was held ———— Nov. 10, 07
Orchestra Plays Brandenburg Concerto for First Time.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall.
The programme was as follows:

Brandenburg concerto, No. 3.....Bach
Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2).....Haydn
Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Symphony in F major, No. 7.....Beethoven

The concerto by Bach was played for the first time at these concerts.
With the exception of this contrapuntal debauch the programme was made up of familiar and approved compositions that have long been recommended as safe for family use. There is also safety in applauding music of this kind. As the old French song has it, "Just tell me when they come to Mozart's music, so that I may show publicly my pleasure."

There was much pleasure in listening last night, for Dr. Muck's interpretation was constantly engrossing. Let three or four able conductors lead a symphony by Haydn in successive years, and each will bring out something fresh and beautiful. There is in the music certain phrases or certain movements that appeal with special significance to A, while the other conductors, Messrs. B, C and D, are similarly incited to poetic interpretation by other passages which leave A cold.

Then music itself has a way of surprising even the hardened listener. A phrase will pass unnoticed by him for a dozen hearings and then suddenly reveal its beauty. No matter how poor a performance of "Carmen" may be, some exquisite detail of instrumentation will then be heard for the first time.

Critics Become Eulogists.

Criticism of the concert last night would resolve itself inevitably into eulogy of Dr. Muck. There might be discussion of subjects suggested by the nature of the programme, by the performance of Bach's music, by the manner of reading the andante of Haydn.

Should Bach's little chamber concerto be performed by a large, modern orchestra, and does it gain or lose thus performed? To what degree should a conductor modernize or "poetize" music of the 18th century, music that in itself is not emotional as we now understand emotion? Should a programme be made up of only classic works and another of only romantic compositions? A week ago last night the programme was ultramodern, for Berlioz is still an ultramodern. Last night it was rigidly classic. Next Saturday the compositions are Polish, Czech and Russian.

These questions, however, are subjects for essays of chief importance in a report of a concert.

It should be remembered, however, that all the pieces played last night were once new, and they no doubt, in turn, astonished or perplexed when they were first performed. Bach was a man far ahead of his period. Harmonically he, too, is an ultra-modern. Haydn visited London and bought out works, as Richard Strauss visited the United States to conduct pieces already composed by him and to produce his "Symphonie Domestica," Mozart's music to "The Magic Flute" disappointed the Viennese at first. Beethoven's symphony did not please the audience when it was first performed.

Interpretation Admirable.

Dr. Muck treated the old music lovingly, but not in the spirit of an antiquarian, not with the piety which is sometimes called devotion, but in fact dull, half-witted appreciation. He was fortunate with all the composers alike in his conception of their spirit. He was not pedantic, nor was he extravagant in the effort to show originality of treatment. His readings were sane, elastic, full of life.

The performance of Haydn's andante, of Beethoven's allegretto, and of Mozart's overture will linger in the memory, and if the impression made by these pieces was the most striking, it is because the music itself was inherently more effective, for his interpretation was admirable throughout the concert.

Cincinnati and Our Orchestra

Is it meant as a joke at the expense of Boston, this story from Cincinnati to the effect that the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Karl Muck are to be secured to take the place of the moribund organization in that city? Certainly we have heard of no intention on the part of Maj. Higginson to remove his residence from the city of beans to the city of pork, and unless he goes the Boston Symphony Orchestra goeth not. This magnificent band, the pride not only of Boston, but of all America, is so essentially his child that a separation between the two is simply unthinkable.
Of course some weird mistake has been made, probably, as Mr. Ellis explains it, over the fact that Cincinnati folk may be intending to fill out their series of concerts with orchestras from other cities. That will do well enough, if arrangements can be made, for we are always willing to let our musical light shine in the darker places of the earth. If Cincinnati wishes to accept it in the spirit of gratitude for a more or less brief illumination, no one here could reasonably object. But as for permanency—she might as well ask for the removal of the capitol at Washington.

The Boston Post

The Representative Democratic Paper of New England 1907

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

(BY OLIN DOWNES.)

The programme of the seventeenth rehearsal by the Symphony Orchestra consisted entirely of compositions by the masters of the classic period, as follows:
J. S. Bach, third Brandenburg concerto, in G major, for three violins, three violas, three 'celli and bass, performed
for the first time at these concerts;
Haydn, symphony in D major (B. and H., No. 2); Mozart, overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven, symphony No.
8, in F.

Some consternation was felt at the opening of the season, when Dr. Muck announced for the first concerts four programmes of a daringly orthodox description. But to the surprise and delight of all, these concerts proved to be exceedingly interesting and stimulating to the attending audiences, and since then there has been much comment from all sides concerning this conductor's wonderful manner of "recreating" the classics; and in view of the many superb performances we have enjoyed, Dr. Muck can certainly be said to have justified this commendation. As a matter of fact, however, he has no more "recreated" the classics than he has the more modern works which have come under his baton.
The difference is simply that contrary to the average conductor of the day, Dr.
Muck is broad-minded enough to spend as much thought and energy on the production of a Beethoven symphony as on a new work by Strauss or d'Indy. In the production of novelties and the great creations of the period he bears in mind that music which has stood the test of years and evolution has an undeniable importance to the present generation, and brings the same fresh spirit and illuminating insight to bear upon it that he does on everything given under his direction. As a consequence, there is never that smug, correct, perfunctory style about the performance which kills any work, great or small, and we enjoy, as we did yesterday, music which is astonishingly vital and appealing to our unaccustomed ears.

The Bach concerto is the same which was later rearranged as introductory "symphony" to the Whitsunday cantata,
"Ich Liebe den Hockstein," for solo alto, tenor and bass. It is Bach at his jolliest, and after such music it becomes easy to understand that all classic forms are derived directly from the dance. This melody moves Mercury-like, on wings, and with its richness of invention, combined with an inexhaustible flow of polyphonic development, gives the sensation that it might continue for three times its real length, and yet not reach the bottom of that deep spring of harmony, which appears to proceed from the innermost source of all art. Here we have Bach, the broadest of humanitarians; and that he has something to say to each one was amply evidenced by the contagious enthusiasm of the performance as well as the hearty applause at the conclusion of the last measures.

The Haydn symphony is not as strong an example of this master's genius as the one given early in the season. Yet Dr. Muck took it as it was, made no attempt at modernizing, and by allowing the music to speak for itself, also allowed us to enjoy it at its best. The healthy, frank, open-air gayety of the introduction was cheerfully proclaimed;
there was courtly sweetness and courtly sentimentality in the andante, and the boisterous horn added its share to the rather provincial gayety of the last movement.

It was a rare treat to hear again the "Magic Flute" overture, which was played with delightful zest.

Beethoven's eighth symphony, one of his sunniest creations, provided an appropriate conclusion to a concert refreshing alike to the ears and the feelings.
The lusty joy of the allegro and the sly humor of the allegretto were admirably depicted. The third movement, marked "Tempo di menuetto," was, in our estimation, taken at too fast a pace. But before such a musician we can listen with respect, to receive new lights on old subjects. The finale was irresistible in its rush and exuberance.

"The Steppe."

IC POEM, "Vysehrad."

E to "Husitská."

Y No. 6, "Pathetique."

256

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 16, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

NOSKOWSKI,

SYMPHONIC POEM in the form of an OVERTURE, op. 66, "The Steppe."
(First time in Boston.)

SMETANA,

SYMPHONIC POEM, "Vysehrad." (No. 1 of "The Cycle and My Country.")

DVOŘÁK,

DRAMATIC OVERTURE, "Husitská." op. 67.

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor "Pathetic." op. 74.
I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo,
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

SPECIAL NOTICE. Because of GOOD FRIDAY, the next Public Rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, March 28

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

257

SLAV PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Jan. 18. 1907
Nowowski's Novelty, "The Steppe," Outshone by the Tschaikowski "Pathetique."

Conductor Muck set forth another program without contrasts for the eighteenth Symphony concert. The music was all Slavic and Czech, and not only so, but at least three of the works thus placed side by side bore so clear and certain resemblances in thought and form that not one of them made the effect that it could have produced if there had been interspersed selections of a gentler school. It was in most respects a roaring concert, an expression of blood and fire and gloom that once more aroused serious doubts that Dr. Muck, great interpreter and master of an orchestra though he be, knows how to make a program that does justice to the composers he calls together.

The novelty came first. It was Nowowski's "The Steppe," a symphonic poem depicting in tone colors the "majestic heath" of Russia, first in its beautiful serenity before man's passions vexed it, then resounding with the Cossack songs and the clash of arms, and again calm and untroubled. The work has charm and fascinating qualities, more especially in the early portion, where mystic and lovely orchestration really convinced of the sunlight brooding over the verdured plains. There was haunting rhythm and melody in the Cossack song, but the battle episode was merely noisy, and the finale seemed too flamboyant for the return of the "ever calm and beautiful" on the steppe. On the whole an interesting thing, but not a work that demands a re-hearing by any inherent greatness.

Smetana's "Vysehrad" and Dvorak's "Husitska" are familiar. The nobility and glorious simplicity of the former were admirably expressed by Dr. Muck and his men, while as much as possible was done for the latter, which is for the most part a dull and bombastic work, Dvorak in his least inspired moments. And each hurt the other, as has been said.

But nothing that had gone before could lessen the overwhelming effect of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony, that somberly beautiful outburst of the pessimist's "vanity of vanities." It was read with consummate mastery of form and a dramatically tragic appreciation of its message that made the performance perhaps the most memorable ever heard here.

THE MEN WHO PLAY

A NEGLECTED SIDE OF THE MODERN ORCHESTRA

The Positions of Honor in It and How They Are Filled—Its "Aristocracies" and Cliques—The Qualities of an Efficient Player—The Predominance of Foreigners in American Orchestras and the Reasons for It—The Lack of Training for Orchestral Work in America

Trans. — Mch. 16. 1907.

Those who look over the lists of members of the Boston, Pittsburg and other orchestras must be struck by the fact that they contain the names of very few Americans, and these not as a rule in important places. The orchestra management is sometimes criticised for not giving a larger place to American talent, and the answer is made that American talent is untrained. How, as a matter of fact, is a talented young musician to equip himself for serious orchestral work? Mere skill of execution is not enough, nor does drill in a conservatory orchestra carry him far. Playing in theatres and for dancing is likely to take him down hill rather than up. And where are the orchestras where he is to acquire professional standing as a preliminary for admission to the great permanent orchestras which offer the big prizes, as such things go, and are open only to players of talent, skill, training, experience and reputation—five distinct things, five stages of an artist's career. So far as orchestral work goes many American players start with the first; a good many attain the second; only a few get so far as the third.

Now what is to be said of orchestral playing as a profession? Is it worth while for a musician to consider it? "A dog's life," say some, thinking of its hardships and its weary routine. "Artistic suicide," assert others, thinking of the autocratic conductor, the "loss of individuality," the acquirement of habits and temper inconsistent with virtuoso bravura. "A beggarly trade," say those who think of the bare living which the rank and file earn and of the inadequacy of salaries even in big orchestras as compared with the income of the leaders in other professions. Perhaps the case is not quite so dark as it seems, but postponing that for a little, let us consider that, however hard it may be (1) orchestral playing is a profession which a good many people from choice or necessity pursue, and (2) that the Americans pursuing it are for the most part obliged to occupy the worst-paid, least honorable, most toilsome and sometimes positively degrading positions. The orchestral aristocracy, in short, is foreign born, foreign bred, and in large part foreign in speech. It is made up of the members of the great symphony orchestras, and a few other large orchestras of the type most familiar in New York. None of these orchestras is homogeneous; they are composed of cliques formed along irregular lines of rank nationality, instrumental grouping, wire pulling, job hunting—all are forces, in short, that operate in any society. Thus there is not that solidarity which might work effectively against native musicians, if, for example, the orchestras were chiefly German. Yet as a matter of fact in each group of instruments foreign influences prevail, and although there is no anti-American policy, the outcome is much the same. The few Americans who find a way in are likely to do so through the influence of their teachers, and most of them may be looked for in the back seats of each of the sections.

Now the positions of honor and emolument in an orchestra, it need hardly be said, are those of the principals. If a symphony orchestra is a little aristocracy separated by an immeasurable gulf from the small professional orchestras upon which the majority of musicians depend for their livelihood, there is within its ranks a higher aristocracy of king and nobles, which may be defined something like this: The conductor, the principal first violinist, the principal 'cellist, the first players of clarinets, oboe, flute, horn, the principals of the second violins, violas, basses. The question whether orchestral playing has anything to offer an ambitious young man depends largely, therefore, upon whether the prizes which it contains are open or closed. If an enlisted man may hope to rise to be admiral he has an incentive, even though the chances of attaining the goal are small.

What is the case in the orchestra? That question can best be answered by noting what the practice is in regard to promotions. When a principal drops out, does the man at his desk take his place? It is not the rule. In the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for example, when Mr. Kniesel retired with his quartet, the places of all four were filled by imported players. When Mr. Kniesel's successor left after a strenuous year or two, Mr. Willy Hess came from Germany to succeed him. When Mr. Schroeder's successor left, he also was replaced by a third 'cellist from Germany. As for conductors, it is a matter of course; Dr. Muck succeeds Mr. Gericke, and another famous man will be brought from abroad. And if in the string sections there is place only for a few Americans on the lowest steps of a ladder where there is no room at the top, in the wind sections the case is still worse because there is no place for understudies. When a clarinetist or oboist retires the management goes straight to Paris for a successor, or to Germany for a new horn player or trombonist. How is the native American to get even a start? The managers of the orchestras are not to be blamed: they have before all to "make good" with the public; they cannot afford to take chances. Sometimes they have failures even among their importations; the Boston orchestra once brought over a clarinetist from Vienna, credibly guaranteed, who proved so unsatisfactory that one rehearsal was enough; he was not allowed to play at the concert. But in the main players who are secured abroad can be confidently counted upon, because they have had the training that Americans lack.

200

Now how is this training to be made possible in this country? It seems clear that the only way is to provide more thorough school training and to multiply good minor orchestras where this special training can be converted into professional experience. American musicians are apt to "get into the game" too late; at nineteen a player should be fully equipped for solid, responsible work—Franz Kneisel was no older when he came to be concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. This presupposes the finest possible school training and actual experience of a solid and worthy sort. Our conservatories do something in the way of orchestra drill, but it is apt to be superficial; it must be made to match the work of our best technical schools if our young men are to compete with the splendidly drilled players of Europe. We have nothing to compare with the instruction given, for instance, in the Paris conservatory, and no orchestras where a graduate can make a professional beginning. Till we have these no one can say whether America can produce its own orchestral musicians. Here is a fit object for endowment, if Mr. Carnegie or Mr. Rockefeller should be moved to do something for the progress of musical art in America. An "all-American" orchestra was founded in New York some years ago, but it naturally expired of inanition. Yet something of the sort is very much needed, for the sake of training; let it be established in a city that has not already an orchestra. Give it a fine and stimulating conductor, who can take talented young men and in a year or two of serious work transform them into useful orchestral musicians.

How severe are the exactions which modern orchestral standards put upon the individual is not commonly realized. There is no mercy for the incompetent. An orchestra is "built like a watch," and every piece must fit. The conductor must feel that every man can be counted upon to do exactly the right thing at the right time. The team work of a football eleven is clumsy child's play in comparison. The individual player must have: (1) Perfect control of his instrument, (2) a facility in reading at sight which few players attain, (3) a large repertory of orchestral music, (4) great precision of execution, (5) the ensemble instinct, (6) quickness of perception and motor response, (7) a good tone, (8) a conventional orchestral manner of bowing, phrasing, etc., (9) the ability to grasp the conductor's intention from the merest hint and to carry it out instantly and skilfully, (10) a habit of obedience and of the surrender of individual choice. Some of these things are a part of artistry; others are purely professional and are summed up in the technic and "routine." This includes the things that a player of professional standing is supposed to know and do without being told, the ability to do things in the standard way and without special effort, a thorough knowledge of the conventions which govern orchestral playing. Without this knowledge even a talented player is as much at a loss as a landlubber at sea who does not know the ropes. The body of special knowledge required is not large, but it must be learned more thoroughly than most people ever learn anything. The fineness of precision needed to execute even the simplest passage in perfect unison is not generally realized; few artists as a matter of fact attain it unless they have been through the orchestral mill.

This brings us once more to the initial question—is the orchestral profession desirable for a young musician? It must be confessed that it is not so well paid as other professions that call for equal skill. A famous conductor may enjoy a very handsome income, $10,000, $20,000—the price seems going up. But one might as well begin life with the notion of being President. There are few, also, of the "fancy" positions, the places of the principals in the great orchestras, who may receive $5000 a year with a long vacation. There are plenty of men of high skill who count themselves lucky to be earning $40 a week through the season. It ranks, in short, with the worse-paid professions—teaching, for example, or authorship, or journalism, which no one would enter from merely mercenary motives. It means hard work, sometimes pleasant, sometimes tedious, and it does not, as has been seen, offer a very brilliant vista of promotions and honors. And yet some of the men whose experience is worth most are very emphatic in their opinion that an orchestral experience is the best possible thing for the young violinist or other instrumental performer. If he has talent, they urge, he can presently set up as solo player or work his way to the concertmaster's or principal's desk. If he proves to be of more modest abilities, his orchestral connection gives him at any rate an assured living. And while a lifetime of subserviency may cripple individuality, a few years of drill under a great conductor is, they urge, the best of training for a soloist or for an orchestral leader. It gives authority, self-confidence and poise. These are the two sides of the picture. But, for good or bad, orchestral playing is a necessary resource of the musical, and there should be better chances for Americans in this field. [From the Springfield Republican.]

Boston Transcript

324 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

MONDAY, MARCH 18, 1907

The Symphony Concert

With the Symphony concert of Saturday night, Dr. Muck completed three-quarters of the series, and in the six programmes that he has made, since he passed the middle concert in January, no one may fairly reproach him with neglect of music new to his audiences or with undue fondness for established classics. Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," Debussy's sea-pieces, Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Tinel's "Tone-Pictures" out of Corneille's "Polyeucte," Ritter's "King Olaf's Wedding Dance," and Noskowski's overture, "The Steppe," have all been played for the first times here, and each is modern or even ultra-modern music. Except for one programme from Beethoven and composers of the eighteenth century, and the overture and the concerto by Brahms that went with Strauss's "Domestica," modern and romantic composers in actual dates or in continuing and characteristic spirit have filled the lists—Berlioz, Tchaikovsky, Liszt, Dukas, Smetana and Lvorak. Once, and presumably for all, Dr. Muck has removed the reproach of a lack of catholicity and modernity in his programmes, and in the remaining concerts of the year there is much new music to come. His hearers may not always have agreed with him in the choice of new compositions—with Ritter's dance, for example, or with Tinel's tone-pictures. Yet even in them Dr. Muck is keeping his public musically informed, while in the "Sinfonia Domestica" and "The Sea" he has brought the most recent compositions of two of the most individual and influential composers of our time to exceptionally sympathetic performance. His unified programmes—"all Slav," "all eighteenth century"—remain, and his hearers are interested or restless under them according to their moods, tastes or prejudices, but the conductor has broken away from what seemed a stereotyped order of overture, concerto, symphony. More miscellaneous pieces in the freer modern forms have varied them. Finally in the abundance of modern, ultra-modern, highly imaginative or highly romantic music, Dr. Muck has revealed more fully than hitherto the answering imagination and emotion in him and his ability to bring such compositions to as full and potent expression as any of the classics. By every title he is now a dramatic and a poetic conductor. From Mr. Converse's tone-poem and Dukas's scherzo, through the "Domestica" and the "Sea Pieces," to the overture to "The Magic Flute" a week ago and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony last Saturday, performance after performance of glowing and significant beauty, of intense but ordered power has attested it.

201

In the pleasure and the emotion of the moment Dr. Muck's conducting of the "Pathetic" Symphony, and, indeed, of the whole concert, on Saturday evening seemed the climax for the time of all these things. On Friday afternoon he had been ill and depressed, conducting as one who struggles with untoward circumstances and yet making the symphony sound as it had never sounded here before. On Saturday strength and spirits returned, and the orchestra seemed to kindle with its conductor. Its voice at the beginning of Noskowski's "Steppe" had the melancholy of plains that were empty of everything but memories. Then it filled them with the battle, the march, the song of passing Cossacks. And again these images in tones faded into melancholy. Then the voice turned large and epic of Smetana's tone-poem of the Bohemian fortress. It sang as some glorified bard in a passion of pride and lament. The music sounded opulent with chivalric spirit or turned sombre and poignant with desolation. As nearly as they might, with music so faded, the conductor and his men would have ennobled Dvorak's "Husitska" overture. As it was they gave it moments of passionate and stirring glamor.

Yet all this was as preparation, in comparison, for their playing of Tchaikovsky's symphony. It is easy to turn it into wild and whirling Tartar melody. In Mr. Safonoff's ability to do so lies one of his chief titles to note. It is not difficult to try to make it conscientiously emotional as we have oftenest heard it in Boston. Dr. Muck held his course clear and straight between either pitfall. Seemingly he made not a deliberate "effect" in the whole symphony. Not once did he make his hearers "sit up" and wonder; but he caught them up into the music and held them marching with it as with some mighty drama in tones of fate, disillusion and despair. Nowhere did the listener take approving thought of a particular mood brought to fitting utterance or of a detail duly individualized. He heard indeed details that he had never heard so vividly or so thrillingly before, like the mocking drum beat under the trio of the scherzo, like the hurtling of the march melody through the orchestra before it swings into final motion, or like the physical and mental torture—it is no less—with which parts of the lament fetch the very breath of despair. They and twenty like them were as the passing lights and shadows of the whole tragedy of despair that Tchaikovsky wrote, and that Dr. Muck and his men were acting in tones that plucked and searched imagination as the acting of theatre may very seldom do. H. T.

Boston Sunday Globe.

First Issued Oct 14, 1877.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE.

Established March 4, 1872.

(Evening Edition), First Issued March 7, 1878.

SUNDAY, MARCH 17, 1907.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Once again the Symphony orchestra program was without a soloist, last week's concerts, like the two previous ones, being made up entirely of orchestral numbers. Three times in succession without assisting artists is rather unusual with this orchestra, whose 18th program consisted of a new symphonic poem by Noskowski, called "The Steppe"; "Vysehrad," by Smetana; Dvorak's dramatic overture, "Husitska," and Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. Noskowski's poem was played here for the first time. The program was decidedly Slavic in its selections, for the four composers represented either were Russians or showed the influence of the Slav in musical ideas.

Noskowski in his last work essayed to depict scenes upon the "steppes," whose face had resounded with the tramp of armed horsemen and where shepherds with their flocks once roamed. Wild songs of the fighting Cossacks mingled with the simple music of the shepherds and by these strong contrasts the composer has developed a tone picture vivid in contour, but not overwhelmingly harsh and deafening in its orchestration. The Cossack themes are melodious in a characteristic way, accentuated by tambourine, harp and strings in pizzicato, and the battle episodes are sufficiently vigorous to suggest war's alarms in fortissimo measures.

In speaking of the performance by Dr Muck's orchestra general praise, the oft-reiterated phrase, suffices to indicate results. In the first number the contrasts were few compared to the Smetana poem, for in the latter there was not only conflict and the pastoral phases, but also the atmosphere of a festal day clouded at times by songs of lamentations and forebodings of disaster. Then in Dvorak's "Husitska" overture "war" is the principal theme, solemn, bold and impressive. In each of these somewhat sanguinary works about the only defect appeared to be in the brass contingent, which sometimes was faulty in attack.

The program closed with a fine interpretation of Tschalkowsky's grand "Pathetic" symphony. The exquisite second movement, the interrupted waltz theme, was notably well performed.

The orchestra will be away this week, and as Good Friday falls on March 29, the rehearsal next week will be given Thursday afternoon, March 28. Mrs. Bertha Child, the soloist, will sing an aria from Rossini's "Mitrane" and an excerpt from "La Captive," by Berlioz. The orchestral pieces will include Cherubini's overture to "Les Abencerages," a double fugue by Oskar Fried for string orchestra and a repetition of the Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica."

SLAV MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"The Steppe" Is a Remarkable Tone Painting of a Battle Scene.

DVORAK OVERTURE IS TAME IN COMPARISON

Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" Is Forcefully Interpreted by Dr. Muck.

Herald March 17, 1907
BY PHILIP HALE.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows: Symphonic poem, "The Steppe".....Noskowski
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Dramatic overture, "Husitska".....Dvorak
Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic".....Tschalkowsky

Noskowski's symphonic poem, in the form of an overture, was played here for the first time. Little of this Polish composer's music is known in Boston, although he is now over 60 years of age. Ten years ago the Adamowski quartet played his quartet in D minor.

The "Steppe" is programme music. The argument in short is as follows: The heath still remains calm and beautiful after the warriors who fought on it have become dust: it was as indifferent to the "drums and trappings of three conquests" as it was to the shepherd's pipe or the songs of Cossacks.

And in like manner, when the strangest deeds were possible to Yeobright's mood after he had learned how Eustacia barred the door against his mother, he saw before him Egdon Heath: "Only the imperturbable countenance of the heath, which, having defied the cataclysmal onsets of centuries, reduced to insignificance by its seamed and antique features the wildest turmoil of a single man."

The fascinating monotony of an Asiatic steppe inspired Borodin to write an orchestral sketch which is familiar to our symphony audience. The piece was composed for performance at an exhibition of tableaux vivantes, and it pictures the approach and the passing of a caravan escorted by Russian soldiers.

Tone Painting of Battle.

Noskowski, some say, might have entitled his composition, "A Battle on the Steppe," for the greater part of it, according to them, is a painting in tones of a battle scene and the battle is not in this overture, merely an episode in the life of the heath.

This assertion is unreasonable, for the most striking portions of the work are the pages that may be considered as descriptive of the heath in its natural state, undisturbed by man, and the Cossack measures. Nor is the final impression one of stormy battle music. As Noskowski preferred to present his symphonic poem in the form of an overture he did not allow himself the fullest freedom in expression; the chief themes are developed, they reappear, as in any modern overture of orthodox nature, while the heath music serves as an introduction and also as an ending.

This introduction is the most original and individual portion of the work by reason of an unusual color effect obtained both by harmonic treatment and by orchestration. The introduction is impressive in this respect. The Cossack episode is melodically charming and it is also well colored. The other portions of the work are more conventional, but the interest is maintained throughout, with the exception of the battle pages, which are perfunctory.

Smetana's "Vysehrad," which is also programme music, has the splendor that falls on castle walls

And snowy summits old in story.

The musician, as well as the poet, saw the citadel of Libussa in its glory of gold-decked shrines and brave showing of warriors; he heard the sonorous chants of praise and knightly jubilation. He, too, saw the ravages of man crueler than Time, and heard the echo of Lumir's proud song. The music has ample majesty. It is Bardic in its rapt imaginative flight.

There is nothing that is pretentious or labored. There is no incongruous, disturbing detail. There are the superb lines of mural decoration and the glowing warmth of the canvas. This is music of which Smetana's countrymen may well be proud. The reproach that it is abominably national cannot be brought against it. Especially worthy of remark is the singular euphony of the dose.

Dvorak Suffers in Comparison.

Compared with this noble work, the overture by Dvorak seemed melodramatic and meretricious. The introduction has a certain force, but the main body of the overture is long drawn out, the chief musical ideas are of little worth and the treatment of them is conspicuous only for the fluency and the plausible but noisy brilliance that characterize so many of Dvorak's compositions.

It must be said, however, that the overture might have gained in effect, brutal as the effect might be, had it not followed two pieces that in a certain way had a somewhat similar mood—martial, blivallie, call it what you please.

Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony suffered inevitably from its immediate popularity. Its "particular and shaking motion" led some conductors to extravagant interpretation, while others, shrinking from the gloom and the de-pair of the music, endeavored to mitigate the message of woe. Tschalkowsky, as the late Vernon Blackburn finely said, was "the man in what appears to be as the ultimate condition of culture indissolubly united by the cohesion of a single brain to the man of primitive musical passion and savage musical desires."

His fantastical and inexplicable outbursts of merriment, his recklessness and madness, his naivete that is at times akin to childishness, his delight, which is that of the oriental, in repetition and insistence, his passion for color and rhythm, his groans and shrieks and still more terrible mutterings—these are not to be softened or explained away. They call for no apology. The man of the intimate journal and the letters to Mrs. von Meck is the composer of the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia and of the fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies. He must be accepted as he is or not at all.

Dr. Muck's Interpretation.

There was naturally curiosity concerning Dr. Muck's interpretation of his remarkable work, which while it may be inferior as an artistic composition to Tschalkowsky's fifth symphony, the logical continuity of musical thought and in its structure, is nevertheless a more intensely personal document.

The performance was forcible, poetic, dramatic. The expressive theme of the first movement, which is to some a tumbling-block, the theme that may perhaps typify the remembrance of youth with its transports and illusions of love, was not sentimentalized, and so throughout the symphony the dramatic contents were not emphasized, until passion became bombast.

On the other hand Dr. Muck's reading of the scherzo and of the mighty lamentation was highly dramatic without being theatrical. It is very easy to give a spectacular performance of the "Pathetic"; to out-Tschalkowsky Tschalkowsky; but Dr. Muck did not overstep the boundary of tragedy, and his passion was therefore the more moving and thrilling.

The second movement was played with unusual grace and the trio with its wails of anguish for the gaiety that precedes is after all half-hearted and its quiet and sinister tapping of the drum was extraordinarily impressive.

Dr. Muck not only brought out with great dramatic force the obviously dramatic pages; he was eloquent in matters of detail, in the innuendos and in the reminders that are peculiarly Tschalkowskian. Yet these points of detail did not assume undue importance. All in all, the performance was engrossing, deeply, not superficially, emotional, memorable in every way. Never has the threnody been performed here with such overpowering effect.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme, March 18, 1907.
Noskowski, Symphonic Poem, "The Steppe."
Smetana, Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad."
Dvorak, Dramatic Overture, "Husitska."
Tschalkowsky, Pathetic Symphony.

Again a concert without a soloist (which we regard as a merit), and again one of those unified programmes which Dr. Muck is constantly arranging. On this occasion it was a Slav-Czech affair and very "national" in its character. The first three works were all built upon the broad foundation of the folk song. The Noskowski work began impressively with that Muscovite melancholy that is so attractive. It is that sadness described by Longfellow—"that resembles sorrow only as the mist resembles rain."

The work, however, soon changed its character and turned to scenes of combat and war. Here there was a sketchy, unsustained treatment which did not compare with the military touches which came in the subsequent numbers of Smetana and Tchaikowsky. The Cossack dances brought the wild abandon of one phase of Russian music to the foreground. Noskowski is a Pole, but he has in this overture gone fairly into the Russian domain.

The mine of folk music that Russia possesses is the richest of any country except possibly Scotland. It is a guarantee that Russian music (even in the large orchestral forms) will remain melodic for a long time to come, while Germany and France are cherishing modulation rather than melody. And some day Scotland, too, will find a composer who is able to weld its wealth of little gems into a large musical art work. To return to the Steppe; the reading was a very broad and powerful one, the ending being especially vigorous.

The work of Smetana was the most sincere and the most masterly of the first part of the programme. Smetana had not the skill in scoring nor the contrapuntal knowledge of his pupil Dvorak, yet because of his great enthusiasm and his zeal for Bohemia, it is probable that some of his orchestral works will outrank those of his successor. One is plunged into a poetic atmosphere in the very first measures of "Vysehrad," when the harp begins its bardic prelude. Mr. Schuecker played this with a loftiness and power that deserves the most cordial recognition. The trumpets also gave their important passages with commendable vigor.

Dr. Muck read the work magnificently, working up its great climaxes with proper force and giving the free improvisational passages with an effective elasticity of tempo. It is evident that our conductor is not afraid of a "fortississimo" occasionally. At this concert he was determined that the brasses should earn their salary. That the fiery readings appealed to the audience was very evident, for we do not recall a symphony concert where the applause was so continuous and so evenly distributed, each work and each movement of the symphony being received with fervor.

Nevertheless, in the Dvorak overture, we began to be satiated with brass thunderings and we felt, with Shakespeare's Quince, that the lion had better roar more gently. For all its bombast this overture could not swell itself up to Smetana proportions.

It was the weakest of the three national numbers that began the programme. It was written for the opening of a Bohemian theatre in Prague, which reminds us that Beethoven made a somewhat better "Dedication of the House" overture with less brass, less fortissimo and less gloom. Yet the overture has much ingenuity of figure development, a striking trumpet call being transformed into almost everything from muted horn bleatings to growls upon the deepest wood-wind. Dvorak dealt better by us when he took up American nationalism in music.

The concert ended with the "Symphonie Pathétique," which wears well. Even after we are familiar with all its manifestations of sorrow of all kinds (it presents about 16 different sorts of woe), we still find it an impressive work. Some of its orchestral combinations are the best that Tchaikowsky has given us. Its free form is not to be counted as a fault; Liszt, Schumann and others have demonstrated that "sonata form" need not become a fetish. Nor is its popularity to be considered a crime; it is not essential to remove a symphonic work from the comprehension of the ordinary auditor. And it has attractive melodies. But the Russian composers are all steeped in the crime of being melodic.

The first movement seems the least powerful. Dr. Muck made more of it than we had deemed possible. His freedom of tempo, his sharp contrasts, his touches of extreme slowness, were all very effective. The trombones played magnificently in this movement.

The beautiful 5-4 movement, with its restlessness and unease even in the midst of its gaiety, has been better done. We missed something of the lightness, daintiness and elasticity of some previous performances. It was not technically perfect. But the third movement was so entirely successful that it seemed almost a new work. The trumpet figure that finally develops into a triumphant march was superbly worked up. Dr. Muck made it a march such as an Attila, a world-conqueror might step to. It was the most inspiring performance of the concert and the audience showed how much the music had excited them. There had been applause at the end of each movement, and the usual bowed acknowledgements. But at the end of this march there was a great outburst which would not be quieted until Dr. Muck had bowed many times and finally the orchestra had arisen and also bowed.

The finale was also nobly read and performed. It is not as great a picture of death as Richard Strauss has created in his best work, but its development of a wailing figure which is much like the first phrase of "Ombra mai fu" by Handel, is striking, and the canonic dialogue on this is skillful as well. The dramatic content of the movement is obvious and was clearly expressed in the performance.

And so the concert which had been indulging in fortissimo effects almost all through restored the average by ending "ppppp."

Louis C. Elson.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dr. Muck Makes a Second Programme from Slav Composers—Contrasts and Comparisons—The Waning Dvorak—A Remarkable Performance of Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony

Trans. — Mel. 16. 1907

For the second time in the course of the season Dr. Muck made his programme for the Symphony concert yesterday from the music of Slavonic composers. In his first venture all his Slavs were Russians; in the second he began with a Pole, Noskowski; proceeded with two Bohemians, Smetana and Dvorak, and ended with the Russian, Tchaikowsky. Thus he escaped the suggestion of monotony in musical traits and imaginative point of view that lurked in his "all-Russian" programme early in the winter, while there was not enough of the music of any one group of Slavs to make its characteristic virtues pall and its characteristic shortcomings glare. He had, besides, put far more interesting and impressive music upon his second list. Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony still seems one of the mighty symphonies of our time, while Glazounoff's of the first programme was only entertaining and not always that. There is no comparison in worth and interest between Rimsky-Korsakoff's pretty and showy overture to "The Betrothed of the Tsar" of the earlier concert and Smetana's finely imaginative and expressive tone-poem of the Bohemian fortress, "Vysehrad," and so on through the two lists.

True, in a broad sense much of the music of yesterday was delineative music. In Moskowski's overture, the composer bade us hear, see, and feel, the steppes and the tide of Cossack life flowing to and fro upon it. Smetana's tone-poem would suggest the pomp and the strength, the fall and the desolation of an ancient fortress. Dvorak in the "Husitzka" overture would have us hear the war-song and the tread of the fanatic horde of Hussites. And Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, as most imaginations hear it, is as the image of despair and death creeping upon men who struggle fitfully and fiercely against it. Here again so wide a range of delineation, from the tangible to the intangible, saved the programme from any monotony, and gave it persistent and diverse emotional appeal. Except Dvorak, finally, each composer held his own with his fellows and with his hearers. Time has not been kind to his music, and circumstance was unkind still when it crowded his "Husitzka" overture between Smetana's poetic "Vysehrad" and Tchaikowsky's dramatic symphony. At moments the overture sounded thin; at others noisy. Almost everywhere its instrumental colors had begun to fade. Time and again its movement seemed labored. Its sonorities rang hollow; its seeming power, which Dr. Muck sought to enhance at every turn, sounded often as rudeness. It had tarnished and stiffened, as so much of Dvorak's music is tarnishing and stiffening for lack of high or fine imagination. The blight of commonness had begun to touch it.

Noskowski's overture began and ended in the wan melancholy with which the steppes had touched the composer's imagination and his tones. Between, the music rumbled with the din of battle, rattled with the clatter of riding squadrons or turned plaintive with the pings of lonely shepherds or the wistfulness of a musing lover. Throughout it was music tinged with melancholy, music that would summon less the things themselves than the shadows and the memory of them, that would impart them as old and remote and that would lament their passing. The mood and the appeal of Smetana's "Vysehrad" is akin; but there is more passion in the melancholy of the poet. Lumir's, song as it summons the vanished glories of the fortress and the life that glowed within its walls. It is a full life, pompous, rich, chivalrous and the music glorifies it. Warriors keep their festivals, do their battles, raise their songs. Lumir, and the composer with him, hears and sees in exaltation. Dark is the fall of the fortress, the sombre overclouding of the vision, and through the ruins runs, faint and far, the echo of the minstrel's lament. Smetana's is the melancholy of grandeur departed, of the lustre of life faded, of the power of life spent. Where Noskowski was plaintive and musing, Smetana is stirred to a more intense and sombre passion.

The Pole and the Bohemian, however, wrought into their music the melancholy of departed things. Tchaikowsky wrought his symphony of the despair and the desolation of the hearts and the minds of men prisoners to a fate at which they mock, or with which they struggle, and equally in vain. Thereby, beyond its intrinsic power, it is many fold more poignant. How poignant, few of those who heard it yesterday had ever suspected when it has been played before. Now Dr. Muck quickened the pace, as is in the march movement. Again he retarded it as in the finale that is the image of desolation. Now he heightened one or another accent. Or he intensified a rhythm. Or he brightened or darkened the instrumental coloring. Out of all these details the symphony rose as it has never risen before at our concerts. It was the mirror of despair and about the reflection played dark and consuming fires. From beginning to end the performance was passion itself, and yet of a passion so ordered that it missed not one jot of what it would express.

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 30, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

CHERUBINI,	OVERTURE to "The Abencerrages."
FRANCESCO ROSSI,	AIR, "Ah! give me back that heart," from the opera "Mitrane."
OSKAR FRIED,	PRELUDE and DOUBLE FUGUE for GRAND ORCHESTRA OF STRINGS, op. 10. (First time at these concerts.)
BERLIOZ,	MELODY, "The Captive," op. 12.
RICHARD STRAUSS.	SYMPHONIA DOMESTICA, op. 53. (In one movement.)

Soloist:

Mrs. BERTHA CUSHING CHILD.

268

Boston American Mich 26. 1907

Muck in Boston for Another Year

By Charles Fleischer

(RABBI TEMPLE ADATH ISRAEL)

HAVE you heard the good news? By consent of the Kaiser, we are to have another year of Muck!

No, this is not to spite his royal cousin, Theodore of Washington, who has issued an edict against muckrakers.

Indeed, this is another kind entirely (and I am not responsible for the different meanings of the same letters in two different languages), for it is Dr. Karl Muck of whom I happen to be speaking.

Let "better Boston" rejoice and let the musical gods be glad, for we have just learned that, by royal permission, Dr. Muck is to stay with us.

The efficiency of that Boston institution, which shares with Browning, John L. Sullivan, baseball and beans the burden of blessing us with a better (if not a bigger and busier) Boston, is to be maintained.

Through grace of his majesty, Emperor William, Boston "culture" is secure—for at least another year!

The dispatches tell us, with rather comical gravity, the news that will be welcome information, not only in these parts, but wherever the Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard.

The cablegram makes pathetically joyous, serio-comic reading:

Emperor William some days ago gave his consent that Dr. Muck, director of the Royal Orchestra, who is now with Major Higginson in Boston (the italics are mine), shall stay another year in the United States.

Dr. Muck's absence is greatly felt, and the Emperor only consented to his further stay abroad when he was informed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was maintained, not for profit, but for the benefit of musical culture.

These facts may not be generally known even in Boston, which has long profited from the magnificent ministrations of this world-famous organization of masterly musicians.

Also it may not be generally known that, at every Friday afternoon concert, the 505 seats of the second balcony of Symphony Hall are at the disposal of music lovers, for the nominal sum of 25 cents.

Needless to say, our many students and others to whom this opportunity is a boon take full advantage of this, so that a vacant seat in the second balcony is a rare sight.

Though I realize that the people of Boston in general have frequent chances to hear good music at the Municipal Concerts (and that "without money and without price"), I wish it might be their privilege occasionally to hear our justly renowned Symphony Orchestra, an organization of masterful players co-operating, under the unifying influence of the leader's baton, to produce a body of interpreters of music without their superiors anywhere.

Such an experience would give still finer color to the dispatch already quoted, "that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is maintained, not for profit, but for the benefit of musical culture."

And it would be an object lesson in democracy, in that it tells musically the purpose of our country; the power of harmonious co-operation of independent and equivalent individuals (for each of these players is really a soloist) in the interpretation of an idea.

The Symphony Orchestra players, under excellent leadership (and Dr. Muck's leadership has been eminently efficient) interprets with marvellous fidelity and beauty, the ideas of master composers.

The American people, under varying leadership, and in the spirit of co-operation, though each is an independent individual, are also an orchestra of soloists, trying to interpret, with fidelity and beauty, too, our national idea—DEMOCRACY.

"The passive master lent his hand
To the vast Soul that o'er him planned."

Thebans may draw the web of his polyphony into every separate thread or that other of these same tolling Boeotians may pick instrument from instrument in his orchestration as they would separate a heap of jackstraws. All these are but the means to the imparting of thought, emotion and character, to the weaving of backgrounds, to the quickening of responsive understanding and to the stirring of responsive emotion in those that hear. Who, to return again to the statues of Rodin, except the sculptor and the handbook persons, notes the modeling of each muscle in the man and the woman? They are but the means of the sculptor's thought, feeling, characterization. The beholder, until he falls into the vice of analysis of his own emotions, feels but the passion and the truth of the whole. Recall the glowing walls of Turners in the National Gallery in London. Who analyses Turner's color-scheme and searches out the methods of his palette before the incandescence and the iridescence in which the eye is bathing? It is so with Strauss's music, which is often music of color in the instruments, of characterization in the melodies and harmonies and of passion, though always ordered passion, through and through.

And so, once more, with Strauss's choice of subjects. We who listen, or even those of us who compose music or are fain to compose it, might not choose Zarathustra or Don Quixote or a day in our lives for our tone-poems. Strauss, however, is writing his, and his temperament, imagination and ideals, his response to impulses from without and within, condition his choice. We who listen and judge have no right to question it. The chosen subject stirs ideas and emotions in him as he broods upon it, and these he would express in music, conditioning, naturally and legitimately, his form and means to them. Side by side with this utterance of feeling he would characterize in music the exciting causes of these emotions. Then we listeners may properly enter with our questionings. What is the goal he has sought? Has he attained it? Has he communicated his ideas and emotions to us and stirred in us the responsive feeling that was quick in him? Has he characterized when he sought to characterize? Has he gained the glowing color that he sought? True, characterization is a relatively new function of music. Yet no "unwritten law," so far as we know, forbids the extension of the expressive range of music, and not even the dicta of the chop-house and the pressrooms in New York will stay its widening. That Strauss has enlarged and intensified that range is cause for rejoicing and not for deprecation and attack. It is one of his contributions to the vitality of the art and a contribution that was bound to come in a time which in every art, in poetry and in letters, in painting and sculpture, seeks characterization. Strauss, being a man and an artist, and not a Frankenstein, can no more resist the voice of his time than can we listeners resist it when it calls in his music. He has departed from established canons of form; he has sought new harmonies, new rhythms and combinations of rhythms; he has pursued shifting tonalities. The more, the merrier. Thereby he is proving that music is still a living art, that grows and that the prigs and pedants may not crib and confine in their withered withes of pedagogy. Do all these innovations more truly and fully express the things that he would say and bring the emotions he would summon? If they do—and often there is no questioning their accomplishment of his ends—then is he justified of them, and then again has he widened and intensified his art.

It is all of the restless seeking of his time and ours; only Strauss, more than most of us, has found his goal and bidden us to it. Akin, to note a last objection, is his mingling of idealism and realism in his tone-poems, of the details of the baby's bath and comparing aunts with the intense and sublimated expression of the love of a husband and a father and of the joy of lusty life, for example, in the "Domestica." But is not this equally of our time and of all the arts in it and does it not intensify their appeal to us? In fact it is as old as Rembrandt in painting, as Shakespeare in poetry, as Bach in music. Yet in our own time Jean Béraud's "Supper at Emmaus" has not less appeal because in the room that the Christ's halo lights is an adoring figure in the frock-coat of our fashion. Rodin's Balzac is not less puissant and graphic for its mingling of an heroic figure of the imagination with the literal details of the novelist's grossness. There, as in the "Domestica," the "realism" is background, detail and characterization, while the idealism is the emotions that these things awake in the artist and that he would summon in his audience.

In a word, the chief, sane and legitimate inquiries as we listen to the "Domestica" or to any other of Strauss's tone poems and reflect upon them, are what end has he sought in them and how fully has he achieved it. In the "Sinfonia Domestica," say the "programmists" and the commentators what they will that end is luminously clear. The love of husband and wife, the love of a father for his child, the joy of domestic happiness, of affectionate reverie, of light and intimate play, the zest of the work that a man cherishes and the ambition he brings to it are very profound, universal and stirring emotions. They have the simplicity and the intensity of primitive things. They are very deeply and thrillingly human. Obviously they lend themselves to musical expression and idealization, unless music is to be reduced to mathematical pattern-weaving in tones. Whence at bottom do these emotions spring? From the daily round, from the common human experience and common human habit, and they are the more glorious and puissant for their humble source. With the more reason, therefore, may music touch them with its idealizing magic. Apprehending these things and feeling them, Strauss would write in the "Domestica" the tone-poem of them that others might see with the same eyes and feel with similar emotions. He would contrive his realistic background, make his melodies, his harmonies, his rhythms and his instrumentation characterize and delineate as are his wont and skill. Against this background and athwart these details should glow the emotions that this daily round may summon to intense, idealizing and poetic imaginations, until they possess all them that hear. Strauss would write the tone-poem of living, and still more of the joy, the variety, the zest of life. He would write it in the musical and the poetic terms of our time, and above all in the terms of humanity.

If this be Strauss's goal—and every repetition of the "Sinfonia Domestica" strengthens our faith that it is—he has, as it seems to us, altogether succeeded. There in the music is the realistic and suggestive background falling into its due place, wrought indeed by shifting tonalities, bold and incisive modulations, pricking combinations and differentiations of instrumental timbres, by acrid transitions and drastic dissonances. The means pass; the results remain, imaginative, vivid, characterizing. It matters little whether the listener notes and identifies each detail of this background. As soon ask him to separate each color in the light that irradiates Turner's Carthage. It suffices that the background is woven; the atmosphere compassed; the luminous color suggested. To any sympathetic hearer Strauss's music in the "Domestica" achieves these things. Still more does it impart, characterize, intensify and idealize the emotions upspringing from this background and illuminating it and us who hear. It were a late day indeed to dwell anew upon the suggestion of the melodies that characterize the father as mere sensual man, as man of action, and as a man of poetic and contemplative imagination, or of the two that characterize yet more vividly the innate capriciousness and the innate gentleness of the mother and the woman; or of that which sings the groping mystery of childhood. It is as superfluous now to dwell upon the charm of the scherzo of the child's play or of the insinuating and possessing beauty of the passages of the mother's tenderness. Still less is there need to recall the pulsing, power-music at the very white heat of melodic and instrumental incandescence—of the adagio of the zest, the dreams, the passion of living. Little enough music of our time has matched it in emotional compulsion. Yesterday, once more, it held the audience rapt; it gripped seemingly even the conductor and the band until the whole hall sang with it.

And near its close and thence almost to the end of the symphony is the humanity by which Strauss seems to set such store. It is present indeed in the very unfolding of the characteristic melodies at the beginning, and it quivers under all the play of the scherzo. But in the phantoms of the dreaming night, shadowy, fleeting, half real, half ghostly, the fitful images and echoes of the passions of the waking day—this humanity begins to dominate the music. Quickly it takes another turn in the joyous and lusty debate of the husband and wife in the double fugue that certainly makes clashing temperaments, and almost makes clashing human speech music. The humanity and the humor of it are equal; the exuberance of it in fancy and in expression swells both. It is fit preluding to the riotous joy of the close, to the pæan to the joy and the zest of living and of living here and now, in this time of ours, ours and ours. And the secret of this achievement from the beginning to the end of the "Sinfonia Domestica" is plain—plain as it is in every one of the Strauss's tone-poems. Admit all of his former limitations and he does not try to hide them; grant any just reproach against his aims and methods. Yet one salient fact remains; whatever the means, he has raised the expressive power of music higher than any composer has ever raised it before. He has widened its range. He has amplified and intensified its speech. He has made it the voice, not of a fixed and abstract art, of mathematical process, of circumscribed emotions, but of our humanity, of the time in which he and we, his audience, live, and of the thoughts, moods and emotions that stir in him and in us. He has written with the ordered power that is the deepest passion, and the response is sure—be it for the "Domestica" or for the crown of all his music, "Salome."

H. T. P.

It is becoming the established custom of the Symphony concerts to give new music, important in itself and difficult of comprehension, a second hearing in the course of the season in which it is first performed. Accordingly Dr. Muck and the orchestra are repeating Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" at the nineteenth pair of concerts on Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening next. It stands, however, at the end, and not at the beginning of the programme so that there need be no apprehension of closed doors during the fifty-five minutes that the "Domestica" consumes in performance. The other orchestral numbers of the programme are Cherubini's overture to his opera, "Les Abencérages" and a double fugue for string orchestra by the young composer, Oskar Fried, played for the first time in Boston. Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child, the contralto, is the singer at the concerts, making her first appearances with the Symphony Orchestra—a distinction that she has gradually and deservedly won by the qualities of voice and of imaginative artistry of which she has given proof in her career here. She sings the familiar air, "Rendimi," from the old Italian opera of Rossi, "Mitrane," and Berlioz's poetic air, "La Captive," both pieces beloved by rich-voiced contraltos.

SUNDAY, MARCH 31, 1907.

FRIED'S DOUBLE FUGUE IS GIVEN

Thoughts Suggested by an Old Overture at Symphony Harold Concert.

MRS. CHILD IN SONGS BY ROSSI AND BY BERLIOZ

Strauss' Domestic Symphony Is Given a Second Hearing Yesterday.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The Abencérages".....Cherubini
Air from "Mitrane".....Rossi
Prelude and double fugue.....Fried
Melody, "The Captive".....Berlioz
Sinfonia Domestica.....Strauss

The prelude and double fugue were played in Boston for the first time; Strauss' symphony was performed the second time this season "by request"; yet it might not be extravagant to say that the old overture of Cherubini was to some the feature of the concert, not so much by reason of the music itself as by the thoughts which the music suggested.

Let a composer today employ all the modern orchestral instruments, add instruments just invented and as yet untried, awaken ancient instruments from their sleep in museums; let him strive his utmost to be realistic or impressionistic; let him plot cunningly a harmonic system still more ingenious and more subtle than that of Mr. Debussy, and yet, even though he be a man of talent and imagination, he will not surpass, in all probability he will not equal, Cherubini with his overture to "Anacreon" or Gluck with his overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," two of the noblest works in the whole literature of music. Yet how apparently simple are the two overtures!

Bomphologia a Vice.

Old English writers on style warned their readers against bomphologia, the vice of pompous speech. This is the prevailing vice of many modern composers. Others have either the "over-heavy richness and encumbered gait" of the Asiatic style, or they are masters of the Corinthian, which, as Matthew Arnold characterized it, has "glitter without warmth, rapidity without ease, effectiveness without charm." But the style of Gluck and Cherubini is Attic.

Cherubini might be called the man in music without a country. An Italian by birth and training, he is not Italian in his works. He lived in Paris for over half a century, but he was not influenced one jot by French taste. The Germans fondly claimed him as their own, and Beethoven declared him to be the greatest of composers then living; but in what respect is Cherubini's music German? If his thought was at home in any one land, that land was Greece, for in form and in expression his best music is Attic, "perfect in lucidity, measure and propriety." Furthermore, there is no note of provinciality.

Suppose, for instance, that a modern composer of the advanced school were to write an overture suggested by a legend of the Abencérages. He would have his theme typical of the Moors and his theme typical of the Castilians. His chief aim would be to secure local color. He would introduce guitars, tambourines and castanets. There would be the traditional dance rhythms. He might use old Spanish themes which have been likened unto howlings of Tarshish. With all his apparatus, with all his historical research, with all his striving and straining, his music might be without suggestion of magnificence, romance, chivalry.

Simplicity of Sappho.

And thus the modern poet may put on perfumed singing robes and chant his love longing in Swinburnian rhythm and with Swinburnian gorgeousness and prolixity, while Sappho said simply and for all time: "The moon has set, and the Pleiades; it is midnight, the time is going by, and I sleep alone."

The overture to "The Abencérages" is not so noble a work as the overture to "Anacreon," yet it has calm strength, the strength that suggests reserve force, beauty of line and of general architecture, stately, clear sonority. There is also the elegance that is not frosty, that is not mere fastidiousness. It is the elegance of one accustomed to think large thoughts even when the exciting cause may in itself be insignificant. The libretto of "The Abencérages," they said at the time, was cold and dull. Nevertheless the title alone might inspire chivalric and superb music.

Mr. Oskar Fried, after a vagabond life, became famous in Berlin three years ago through the interest of Dr. Muck, who produced "Das trunkne Lied" at a concert of the Wagner Society. Mr. Fried is now a conductor and has little time to compose. The works that are published were written when he was poor and unknown.

New Wine in Old Bottles.

He is enamoured of scholastic forms. His delight is in canons. Yet into the old bottles, it is said, he pours new and heady wine. The contrapuntal wine of this Prelude and double fugue is certainly not madding; it is not a mild intoxicant. The prelude has a certain robustness; the fugue is honestly made; but the music is not such as to awaken an imperious desire to join Mr. Fried in his contrapuntal orgies.

Dr. Muck conducted an engrossing performance of Strauss' "Domestic" symphony. The work made, on the whole, a stronger impression than at the first hearing. It is easy to say that Strauss' themes are often trivial or vulgar; that in this symphony he delights in sudden contrasts between gigantic complexity and extreme naivete; that he obscures thought by turgid or pleonastic expression. These charges, after all, are only partially true, and often they are wholly false. The symphony needs no programme. "Parents and Child" would serve as a sub-title. Again the music of the child and its sports and that of the love scene seemed the most spontaneous and the richest pages of the work.

Unnecessary Chatter.

Again there seemed to be unnecessary chatter in the final section, which, by the way, was played even more effectively than it was before. The performance was a brilliant one, and the few slips were so apparent, and the difficulties which engendered them were also so apparent, that it would be folly to insist on them.

There are some in Europe and in this country who take the "Domestic" symphony too seriously. They wish to find every page illustrative of some episode in joyful or harassing domesticity. They forget that Strauss himself is not pontifical in this instance. Why not let him have his little joke, even if he is nearly an hour in cracking it? No one can deny the beauty and charm of the love music or the strength that is akin to insolence in the fugue of the finale. Grant that the humor is at times coarse or extravagant. There is much that is deeply emotional in this symphony, a work which is both overpraised and wantonly abused.

Whether the air attributed to Rossi was written by him late in the 17th century, or whether it was manufactured deliberately and with malice aforethought for one of Fetis' historical concerts in 1833, is a matter of interest only to the antiquarian. The air itself calls for a singer of the grand style, a mistress of tragic emotions, to give it true distinction. Mme. Scalchi used her assortment of voices in it and there were passages when she was effective by means of sombre tones.

Berlioz's "Captive" a Cameo.

Berlioz's "Captive," a very cameo of exquisite instrumentation, also demands a singer of a peculiar equipment. If there should be the expression of home-sickness, there should be no sentimentalism. The melody is languorous, yet there is a dash of coquetry. "L'Esclave" by Lalo is a very different woman from "La Captive" of Hugo and Berlioz.

Mrs. Child sang the air, which from its resemblance in certain points to the so-called air of Stradella might have been written by Niedermeyer or by Fetis himself, with more dramatic feeling and spirit than is her wont. On former occasions she has given pleasure by her interpretation of songs by Mr. Loefler, songs that suited the peculiar quality of her tones and also her musical mood.

She gave last night an intelligent interpretation of "The Captive." Although it is not difficult to imagine one that would be more persuasive, more sensuous, more oriental, her own interpretation had an aesthetic charm. On the other hand, her production of tones was not praiseworthy. Her attack was not always firm and decisive, and there were other faults of mechanism that marred the natural beauty of her tones and the general effect of her performance.

Boston Daily Globe.

Established March 4, 1872.

(Evening Edition), First Issued March 7, 1873.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE.

First Issued Oct 14, 1877.

FRIDAY, MAR 29, 1907.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The "Symphonie Domestica," by Richard Strauss Repeated at the Rehearsal Yesterday Afternoon.

On account of Good Friday the 19th rehearsal by the Symphony orchestra was set ahead one day and yesterday afternoon the following program was played: Cherubini's overture to "The Abencerrages," an opera almost forgotten; an aria from Rossi's opera, "Mitrane"; Oscar Fried's prelude and double fugue for grand orchestra of strings, first time here; "The Captive," a melody by Berlioz, and the "Symphonie Domestica," by Richard Strauss. Mrs. Bertha Cusling Child, contralto, was the soloist. Cherubini's overture is largely martial in character and is written in a bold, though rather conventional way as regards the brass contingent, which, of course, has plenty of loud declamations allotted it. Aside from the spirited style in which the work was performed the overture calls for no special praise.

Fried's prelude and double fugue for strings is an admirable example of the composer's skill in this kind of work, which lacking the contrasting instruments, is generally liable to be monotonous unless the forms are varied. The vigorous chord passages in the prelude were splendidly played and there was good material, too, in this introduction. In the fugue, which seems a bit old-fashioned by reason of being confined to strings, the contrasts in tempo and expression are well shown, the gradual working up to "dynamic intensity" making an effective finale. The ensemble playing of the string contingents was as near perfection as one can hope to hear and the beauty of tone was never marred even in the fortissimo passages, which are numerous and intricate.

Mrs. Child's two contributions to the program were received with hearty appreciation, the lower register of her rich contralto showing to particular advantage in the Berlioz melody, "The Captive." In this the various emotions enabled the singer to color her tones to suit the sentiments which were adequately expressed in her vocalism. A little more vivacity and flexibility in execution would have bettered the verse recalling the "Spanish music" and her dear companions, but the interpretation as a whole was artistic and

DR. MUCK REMAINS

It is the eminent fitness of Dr. Muck for his post as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra that makes the imperial clearing of the way for his continuance in it through another musical year the more welcome. With the hundred and more concerts that the orchestra gives each season, in and out of Boston, it is a post that asks long capacity for work and scrupulous conscientiousness in the doing of it. Dr. Muck has both these qualities, and the latter almost to excess. However long he may remain in Boston, no year's work can be as taxing as that of the season now nearing its end. From the beginning, in October, he has bent himself to the understanding of his orchestra and his public, and he has learned the temper of both more quickly than did any of his predecessors. In the same spirit, with each piece that he has put on his programme, he has re-marked the orchestral parts with his own indications of expression—a task of minute and exacting labor that a layman might hardly appreciate, and that repetitions of pieces already played under his guidance will diminish in succeeding years. His lamp, as his friends know, has often burned far into the morning while he worked at this revision, and time and again he has denied himself any distraction from it.

Our orchestra, long ago, attained a technical excellence and unity with which few bands in Europe and none in America may compare. It is necessary that each succeeding conductor shall have the "feeling" as painters say, for the qualities of tone, the euphony and the precision that are the audible tokens of this excellence. Dr. Muck has possessed that feeling of the misgivings that are in some doubting quarantined the technical quality of the familiar standard. He has the means to add a larger and warmer expression than the orchestra attained in the past. He has, singly or in mass, more and emotionally significant, he has proved himself not only the substance of the mood, the spirit, the individuality of the work. Yet his cooler traits might have steadily guided imagination and responsive he has united and held in balance the qualities that are essential to a conductor, who is to give forty-eight concerts in six months to a single public. He has worn well; he has ripened with the progress of the season, into ampler, finer, and more stirring achievements, and into a larger catholicity in the choice of his music. Throughout he has been all for his work and not at all for himself, except as the excellence of it was reward and praise, understanding and appreciation. He has won equally his men and his audiences, in the city that maintains the orchestra and in the cities that receive its visits gladly.

The Symphony Concert

For the last time, probably for a season for two, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" was repeated at the Symphony concert on Saturday night. Again Dr. Muck and the band gave it vivid and thrilling performance; and again the audience listened intent and rewarded the conductor and his men with very hearty applause. In power, nothing they have done the year through, not even their playing of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" compares with that of the "Domestica." Yet with all their abandon and ardor, details of momentary beauty or tenderness shone as they had not shone hitherto—like the cradle song of the clarinets, in the limpid tone of Mr. Grisez and his comrade or the passages of the mother musing over her baby as they came from Mr. Hess's violin. Not before has there seemed such spontaneous charm in the scherzo of the child's play with its endless variety of light instrumental timbres, and its changeful rhythmical accents. Akin, too, was the delicacy of the transitory passages. For a contrast in the veristic detail that Strauss loves, the orchestra shuddered and started in what has often seemed an obscure passage in the music of the night phantoms, as a sleeper stirs and "jumps" in some vague dream. Exuberant the orchestra were and exuberant Strauss is in the fugue. Perhaps there is too much of it; but what composer except him and what band but ours can seem so glorious, so uproariously drunk—there is no other word—with the power of sound.

For the rest of the concert: the delicate beauty of Mrs. Child's tones and the delicate suggestion of poetic fancy, of shadowy mood and veiled emotion that she can give them evaporated in the large spaces of Symphony Hall, with even a tempered orchestra behind her, and with the music that she had chosen. Rossi's "Ah rendimi!" asks a larger scope of voice and a more declamatory eloquence of style than has Mrs. Child. It is for the Schumann-Heink and the Scalchi of the operatic stage, albeit they lack the translucent purity of Mrs. Child's tones. Nor were the obvious and rather theatrical emotions of Hugo's and Berlioz's singing Moorish slave altogether sympathetic to the fineness and the exotic to join Mr. Muck in his contrapuntal orgies.

Dr. Muck conducted an engrossing performance of Strauss' "Domestic" symphony. The work made, on the whole, a stronger impression than at the first hearing. It is easy to say that Strauss' themes are often trivial or vulgar; that in this symphony he delights in sudden contrasts between gigantic complexity and extreme naivete; that he obscures thought by turgid or pleonastic expression. These charges, after all, are only partially true, and often they are wholly false. The symphony needs no programme. "Parents and Child" would serve as a sub-title. Again the music of the child and its sports and that of the love scene seemed the most spontaneous and the richest pages of the work.

Unnecessary Chatter.

Again there seemed to be unnecessary chatter in the final section, which, by the way, was played even more effectively than it was before. The performance was a brilliant one, and the few slips were so apparent, and the difficulties which engendered them were also so apparent, that it would be folly to insist on them.

There are some in Europe and in this country who take the "Domestic" symphony too seriously. They wish to find every page illustrative of some episode in joyful or harassing domesticity. They forget that Strauss himself is not pontifical in this instance. Why not let him have his little joke, even if he is nearly an hour in cracking it? No one can deny the beauty and charm of the love music or the strength that is akin to insolence in the fugue of the finale. Grant that the humor is at times coarse or extravagant. There is much that is deeply emotional in this symphony, a work which is both overpraised and wantonly abused.

Whether the air attributed to Rossi was written by him late in the 17th century, or whether it was manufactured deliberately and with malice aforethought for one of Fetis' historical concerts in 1833, is a matter of interest only to the antiquarian. The air itself calls for a singer of the grand style, a mistress of tragic emotions, to give it true distinction. Mme. Scalchi used her assortment of voices in it and there were passages when she was effective by means of sombre tones.

Berlioz's "Captive" a Cameo.

Berlioz's "Captive," a very cameo of exquisite instrumentation, also demands a singer of a peculiar equipment. If there should be the expression of home-sickness, there should be no sentimentalism. The melody is languorous, yet there is a dash of coquetry. "L'Esclave" by Lalo is a very different woman from "La Captive" of Hugo and Berlioz.

Mrs. Child sang the air, which from its resemblance in certain points to the so-called air of Stradella might have been written by Niedermeyer or by Fetis himself, with more dramatic feeling and spirit than is her wont. On former occasions she has given pleasure by her interpretation of songs by Mr. Loefler, songs that suited the peculiar quality of her tones and also her musical mood.

She gave last night an intelligent interpretation of "The Captive." Although it is not difficult to imagine one that would be more persuasive, more sensuous, more oriental, her own interpretation had an aesthetic charm. On the other hand, her production of tones was not praiseworthy. Her attack was not always firm and decisive, and there were other faults of mechanism that marred the natural beauty of her tones and the general effect of her performance.

Boston Daily Globe.

Established March 4, 1872.

(Evening Edition), First Issued March 7, 1873.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE.

First Issued Oct 14, 1877.

FRIDAY, MAR 29, 1907.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The "Symphonía Doméstica," by Richard Strauss Repeated at the Rehearsal Yesterday Afternoon.

On account of Good Friday the 19th rehearsal by the Symphony orchestra was set ahead one day and yesterday afternoon the following program was played: Cherubini's overture to "The Abencerrages," an opera almost forgotten; an aria from Rossi's opera, "Mitrane"; Oscar Fried's prelude and double fugue for grand orchestra of strings, first time here; "The Captive," a melody by Berlioz, and the "Symphonía Doméstica," by Richard Strauss. Mrs. Bertha Cusning Child, contralto, was the soloist. Cherubini's overture is largely martial in character and is written in a bold enough rather conventional way as regards the brass contingent, which, of course, has plenty of loud declamations allotted it. Aside from the spirited style in which the work was performed the overture calls for no special praise.

Fried's prelude and double fugue for strings is an admirable example of the composer's skill in this kind of work, which lacking the contrasting instruments, is the sweet and resonant quality of the voice made the work very enjoyable. In the aria attributed to Francesco Rossi, Mrs. Child sang as well as she did in the Bernoz melody, but the former was not so effective because of its more formal character.

The program closed with a repetition of the "Symphonía Doméstica" by Richard Strauss, the much discussed composition that was played at these concerts in February. Dr. Muck and his orchestra performed the gigantic work in a masterly manner, surmounting the 50 minutes of technical difficulties with an ease that only skill and experience develops and reaching the thunderous tonal climax midst showers of applause. Doubtless the players deserved this tribute to their endurance and abilities. As for the worth of the composition opinions differ.

Next week's program will comprise two works by American authors, the D major symphony by Howard Brockway and Edward A. MacDowell's "Indian Suite." Weber's overture, "Euryanthe," will complete the selections. There will be no soloist.

DR. MUCK REMAINS

It is the eminent fitness of Dr. Muck for his post as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra that makes the imperial clearing of the way for his continuance in it through another musical year the more welcome. With the hundred and more concerts that the orchestra gives each season, in and out of Boston, it is a post that asks long capacity for work and scrupulous conscientiousness in the doing of it. Dr. Muck has both these qualities, and the latter almost to excess. However long he may remain in Boston, no year's work can be as taxing as that of the season now nearing its end. From the beginning, in October, he has bent himself to the understanding of his orchestra and his public, and he has learned the temper of both more quickly than did any of his predecessors. In the same spirit, with each piece that he has put on his programme, he has re-marked the orchestral parts with his own indications of expression—a task of minute and exacting labor that a layman might hardly appreciate, and that repetitions of pieces already played under his guidance will diminish in succeeding years. His lamp, as his friends know, has often burned far into the morning while he worked at this revision, and time and again he has denied himself any distraction from it.

Our orchestra, long ago, attained a technical excellence and unity with which few bands in Europe and none in America may compare. It is necessary that each succeeding conductor shall have the "feeling" as painters say, for the qualities of tone, the euphony and the precision that are the audible tokens of this excellence. Dr. Muck quickly proved that he possessed that feeling, and, in spite of the misgivings that lingered for a while in some doubting quarters, he has maintained the technical qualities of the band at the familiar standard. More; he has made them the means to a finer elasticity and a larger and warmer pregnancy of expression than the orchestra has always attained in the past. He has made its voices, singly or in mass, more poignant, potent, and emotionally significant. By these tokens, he has proved himself a dramatic conductor, as the phrase goes, who imparts not only the substance and the form, but the mood, the spirit, the peculiar passion and individuality of the music that he plays. Yet his cooler traits of intellect and insight have steadily guided and ordered this imagination and responsive emotion, and thus he has united and held in balance the qualities that are essential to a conductor, who is to give forty-eight concerts in six months to a single public. He has worn well; he has ripened with the progress of the season, into ampler, finer, and more stirring achievements, and into a larger catholicity in the choice of his music. Throughout he has been all for his work and not at all for himself, except as the excellence of it was reward and praise, understanding and appreciation. He has won equally his men and his audiences, in the city that maintains the orchestra and in the cities that receive its visits gladly.

The Symphony Concert

For the last time, probably for a season or two, Strauss's "Sinfonia Doméstica" was repeated at the Symphony concert on Saturday night. Again Dr. Muck and the band gave it vivid and thrilling performance; and again the audience listened intent and rewarded the conductor and his men with very hearty applause. In power, nothing they have done the year through, not even their playing of Tschaikevsky's "Pathetic Symphony" compares with that of the "Doméstica." Yet with all their abandon and ardor, details of momentary beauty or tenderness shone as they had not shone hitherto—like the cradle song of the clarinets, in the limpid tone of Mr. Grisez and his comrade or the passages of the mother musing over her baby as they came from Mr. Hess's violin. Not before has there seemed such spontaneous charm in the scherzo of the child's play with its endless variety of light instrumental timbres, and its changeful rhythmical accents. Akin, too, was the delicacy of the transitory passages. For a contrast in the veridical detail that Strauss loves, the orchestra shuddered and started in what has often seemed an obscure passage in the music of the night phantoms, as a sleeper stirs and "jumps" in some vague dream. Exuberant the orchestra were and exuberant Strauss is in the fugue. Perhaps there is too much of it; but what composer except him and what band but ours can seem so glorious, so uproariously drunk—there is no other word—with the power of sound.

For the rest of the concert: the delicate beauty of Mrs. Child's tones and the delicate suggestion of poetic fancy, of shadowy mood and veiled emotion that she can give them evaporated in the large spaces of Symphony Hall, with even a tempered orchestra behind her, and with the music that she had chosen. Rossi's "Ah rendimi" asks a larger scope of voice and a more declamatory eloquence of style than has Mrs. Child. It is for the Schumann-Heink and the Scalchis of the operatic stage, albeit they lack the translucent purity of Mrs. Child's tones. Nor were the obvious and rather theatrical emotions of Hugo's and Berlioz's singing Moorish slave altogether sympathetic to the fineness and the exotic quality of Mrs. Child's voice and temperament. As the phrase of the theatre goes she was ill-cast. Dr. Muck's feeling for orchestral declamation served well Cherubini's overture to his opera of the noble Moors. "The Abencerrages," and the music kept its grave, clear power, its enduring heroic and chivalrous note, the note of knighthood as romance has glamored and glorified it and that composer upon composer with much more elaborate and showy means has sought in vain. Most interesting of all these preliminary items to the "Domestica" was Oskar Fried's prelude and fugue for string orchestra. It had, of course, the large and elastic eloquence that the string choir of the band brings to such music, but it had also—and it is a rare quality in a set piece in a set form—a sombre and penetrating eloquence of its own. It sang and it mused. It was as some grave reverie in tones that had shaped itself spontaneously. It had thought, which was not merely of musical form. It had a deep undertone of passion that was a passion of poetic mood and not of technical achievement. Consciously or unconsciously Mr. Fried was translating form into poetry—writing, so to say, a fugue of and with a future. H. T. P.

REPEAT STRAUSS FAMILY SYMPHONY

Baton — American
Colossal "Domestic" Work of Great Composer Has Second Performance in Boston.

Feb 31-07
By Kent Perkins.

At the close of a program decidedly mixed in character, yet interesting on that very account, Richard Strauss' forty-five-minute straight-away Family Symphony (Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53) was repeated by Dr. Muck and the Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall last night.

The leader was greeted with uncommon warmth when he took his place, as it was his first appearance in the hall since the announcement that the Kaiser had consented to let him stay in Boston another year.

The Strauss symphony was played a second time at the request of many patrons of the concerts. The discussion that it has aroused and its colossal proportions, which render it quite indigestible at one hearing, made this request natural, and Dr. Muck, though he is said to be no admirer of the work, accommodatingly yielded.

There were vacant seats here and there in the hall and many new faces were seen in the audience, indicating that numbers of regular patrons had stayed at home or bestowed their tickets upon friends.

Performance a Splendid One.

The conductor and the players gave their best efforts to the Strauss Colossus and the result was a magnificent triumph of musical art. Those portions of the work—and they are many—which possess delicacy and refinement or strength and beauty unspooled by noise and bluster or alleged humor, were played with a wealth of imagination and luminous coloring that made one wish that the composer had taken only twelve hours in the Strauss domicile instead of twenty-four for musical illustration and had also cut out large portions of the family strife.

If this had been done there would be less reason for criticism of the work on the ground of unmusical realism and the exaltation of the cheap and the commonplace. But Herr Strauss preferred to give the world twenty-four strenuous hours of his domestic joys and conflicts, and it is therefore pertinent to inquire if this is real musical art.

The fact that it is done by a skilled master of orchestration and tonal effects has no bearing on this inquiry. There have been Dutch masters who have painted quarters of beef hanging in a shop so skillfully and realistically that butchers, seeing the pictures, have itched to get at them with cleaver and saw. Is such work high art? If Raphael had given to the world a photographic reproduction of a peasant woman spanking her child instead of the Sistine Madonna, would it not be cause for regret?

Chances for American Composers.

If the Strauss family and its fierce bickering as well as its peaceful joys are worthy subjects for a great musical artist's best efforts, there are fine subjects open to American composers, who with the aid of the Symphony Orchestra might make Herr Strauss's "Symphonia" sound like a penny whistle. There is "A Day in the Fore River Shipbuilding Yard," for example. The "modern" musical possibilities in the riveting of armor plate on a battleship are immense. Then there might be "Twenty-four Hours on a New Hampshire Farm." How charming would be "the feeding of the cows at 4 a. m."! What gales of fun could be got out of "The bull chases the city visitors!" And, "when the favorite hen laid an egg," the cackling of the barnyard might be given with irresistible effect.

The variety in the first half of the program is seen by a glance at the list: Cherubini, overture to "The Abencerrages"; Francesco Rossi, of the 17th century, air "Ah, Give Me Back That Heart," beautifully sung by Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child; Oskar Fried, a living German composer and friend of Dr. Muck's, prelude and double fugue, heard here for the first time, and Berlioz, "The Captive," sung by Mrs. Child.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Advt PROGRAMME. April 10, 07

Cherubini—"Abencerrages" Overture.

Rossi—"Ah Rendimi."

Oskar Fried—Prelude and Double Fugue.

Berlioz—"The Captive."

Strauss—Symphonia Domestica.

Soloist, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child.

The overture to "The Abencerrages" was delightful in its clear and intelligible form, its broad themes and its conservative orchestration. Dr. Muck saw to it that the work did not sound antiquated and gave the Coda as a grand martial climax. In Music one school ought not to abolish another; the true musician will enjoy Richard Strauss (at his best) without allowing him to obscure Cherubini.

The song by the arch-enemy of Cherubini, Berlioz's "Captive," was ineffective on this occasion. We have heard Mrs. Child do much better. Berlioz's highly colored picture required more dramatic effect and the Italian "Ah Rendimi" more broad phrasing than were given them in this concert.

The Fried Prelude (this is not a culinary item) was rather sombre in character as was the double fugue that followed it. A double fugue is, like double pneumonia, a very dangerous matter and often fatal. This double fugue, however, did not thrust its learning obnoxiously under the auditor's nose, but lended a good amount of emotion with its complexity. It was a modernized example of contrapuntal display, not as eccentric as the other double fugue which soon followed in the domestic arrangements of the Strauss family, a family in which, according to the clock, they have double fugues for breakfast.

It was quite right for Dr. Muck to give us the "Domestica" a second time. Such a work repays study were it only for its wonderful lesson in orchestral scoring. If we state that there were several empty seats during the entire concert and several more were vacated just before the Strauss work, it is only a proof that the public is not unanimous in its verdict on the composition. But this does not mean much; the same public applauded Debussy's "The Sea" to the echo—a work which almost every American critic has found unbearable.

At this second hearing we tried to listen to the symphony as absolute music, keeping out of our mind, as far as possible, all stories of babies, stubbed toes, baths, aunts, uncles, and other banalities. As a result we found many more beauties than in trying to search for the silly plot. The night-scene was as romantic and charming as at first, the eccentric double fugue more effective than before, but after 7 a.m. (and we could not get away from the striking clock) matters became so mixed-up and ugly that we unconsciously thought of Mozart's letter to his father—"The passions, whether violent or not, must never be carried in their expression to the verge of disgust, and music, even in the most awful situations, must not offend the ear, but always please, consequently always remain Music!"—Poor, old, absurd Mozart!

There were some grand climaxes which were merely the apotheosis of Sound. Brahms could never have achieved anything so wonderful in scoring, but he could have made something much more homogeneous, more full of beauty, by the treatment of the chief figure (G, C, D, B) than Strauss has done in its many reiterations in all keys and manners.

In a word then, we do not believe that this work is to be a permanent classic, although it may continue for a long time as a landmark in the history of orchestration. Its humor is below that of "Till Eulenspiegel", its grandeur much below that of "Death and Transfiguration".

Dr. Muck gave it the reading of a genius and the orchestra played it in a manner that made it the greatest Strauss performance that we have yet heard. Dr. Muck was much applauded at the close but did not repeat the work. After all we still believe that Richard Strauss is misled by his own orchestral strength; he is allowing brilliancy of technique to take the place of that sane balance which should be the foundation of Art. He, who might have been the greatest living composer, is becoming an unhealthy influence in Music. We feel as much in doubt about the good of his work as little Wilhelmine did about the value of the Battle of Blenheim. Which has led us to versify the modern tendency as follows:

THE BATTLE OF HELDENLEBEN.

(With compliments to Robert Southey.)

One Saturday at evening,

The critic's work was done,

And he sat in the Music Hall,

The concert had begun:

And by his side there might be seen

His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

Young Peterkin was also there,

With programme-book in hand.

He asked the critic to explain

What ailed the noisy band.

To tell what Dr. Muck had found

That was so big and full of sound.

The critic gazed upon the boy

That stood expectant by:

He knit his brows, he scratched his head,

And heaved a natural sigh.

'Tis some poor fellow's score, said he

That tried to write a symphonie

I find them often hereabout,

When I to concerts wend:

Strange shapeless things with gongs and drums,

And trombones without end.

For many a tiresome bore, quoth he,

Thinks he must write a symphonie.

Now tell us what 'twas all about,

Young Peterkin he cries.

While little Wilhelmine looked up

In deafness and surprise:

Now tell us all about the score,

And what they make such racket for.

It was some Frenchmen, he replied,

Some Germans too, no doubt,

But what they write such discords for

I cannot well make out.

But everybody says, quoth he,

It is a famous symphonie.

With chords of ninth, eleventh, and worse,
With zigzags in all keys.
They turn the music inside out
With unknown harmonies.
But things like that, you know, must be
In every modern symphonie.

Great praise the big bass-tubas won,
And eke the wind-machine.
Why 'twas a very ugly thing;
Said little Wilhelmine.
Nay, that you must not say, quoth he,
It is a famous symphonie.

And praise they gave to Dr. Muck
For leading such a din.
But what good came of it at last?
Quoth little Peterkin.
Why that no man can say, quoth he,
But 'tis a modern symphonie.

Louis C. Elson.

Herald DR. MUCK, March 23, 1907

Many outside of Boston will hear of Dr. Muck's extended leave of absence from his duties in Berlin with a feeling of relief as well as pleasure. For the Boston Symphony orchestra is not only one of the most cherished institutions of this city; it is not too much to say that it is a source of national pride; it rivals, if it does not surpass, the few great orchestras of Europe.

A yearly change in the conductorship would be demoralizing to the players and to the listening public. An orchestra and its conductor are not quickly on intimate terms. The instrument is not soon tuned to his taste, it is not at once responsive to his will. Frequent changes are destructive to discipline and to the sympathetic relationship which must exist in an ideal organization.

There is no question about Dr. Muck's pre-eminent ability. His taste is catholic; his enthusiasm is contagious; he is imaginative, poetic, magnetic—and this without any disturbing exhibition of personality. Although he has not yet finished his first season, he has made himself respected and beloved even by those who do not know him. He is a Bostonian who modestly and in the discharge of his duty makes his adopted city illustrious beyond her gates.

The courtesy of Emperor William is more than a compliment to Maj. Higginson and to the orchestra; it is an expression of good will toward this country.

DR MUCK TO STAY.

Emperor William Consents to Another Year.

Symphony Leader's Absence From Berlin Greatly Regretted.

Herald — March 21, 1907

BERLIN, March 21—Emperor William, some days ago, gave his consent that Dr Muck, director of the royal orchestra, who is now with Maj Higginson in Boston, shall stay another year in the United States.

DR KARL MUCK,
Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr Muck's absence from Berlin is greatly felt and the emperor only consented to his further stay abroad when he was informed that the Boston Symphony orchestra is maintained not for profit but for the benefit of musical culture.

DR. MUCK REMAINS

It is the eminent fitness of Dr. Muck for his post as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra that makes the imperial clearing of the way for his continuance in it through another musical year the more welcome. With the hundred and more concerts that the orchestra gives each season, in and out of Boston, it is a post that asks long capacity for work and scrupulous conscientiousness in the doing of it. Dr. Muck has both these qualities, and the latter almost to excess. However long he may remain in Boston, no year's work can be as taxing as that of the season now nearing its end. From the beginning, in October, he has bent himself to the understanding of his orchestra and his public, and he has learned the temper of both more quickly than did any of his predecessors. In the same spirit, with each piece that he has put on his programme, he has re-marked the orchestral parts with his own indications of expression—a task of minute and exacting labor that a layman might hardly appreciate, and that repetitions of pieces already played under his guidance will diminish in succeeding years. His lamp, as his friends know, has often burned far into the morning while he worked at this revision, and time and again he has denied himself any distraction from it.

Our orchestra, long ago, attained a technical excellence and unity with which few bands in Europe and none in America may compare. It is necessary that each succeeding conductor shall have the "feeling" as painters say, for the qualities of tone, the euphony and the precision that are the audible tokens of this excellence. Dr. Muck quickly proved that he possessed that feeling, and, in spite of the misgivings that lingered for a while in some doubting quarters, he has maintained the technical qualities of the band at the familiar standard. More; he has made them the means to a finer elasticity and a larger and warmer pregnancy of expression than the orchestra has always attained in the past. He has made its voices, singly or in mass, more poignant, potent, and emotionally significant. By these tokens, he has proved himself a dramatic conductor, as the phrase goes, who imparts not only the substance and the form, but the mood, the spirit, the peculiar passion and individuality of the music that he plays. Yet his cooler traits of intellect and insight have steadily guided and ordered this imagination and responsive emotion, and thus he has united and held in balance the qualities that are essential to a conductor, who is to give forty-eight concerts in six months to a single public. He has worn well; he has ripened with the progress of the season, into ampler, finer, and more stirring achievements, and into a larger catholicity in the choice of his music. Throughout he has been all for his work and not at all for himself, except as the excellence of it was reward and praise, understanding and appreciation. He has won equally his men and his audiences, in the city that maintains the orchestra and in the cities that receive its visits gladly.

SUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1907.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS NEW YORK

Dr. Muck's Classic Program Is Finely Rendered in Carnegie Hall.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]
NEW YORK, March 23, 1907. One of the most artistic and enjoyable concerts of the present season was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Carnegie Hall this afternoon.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, arranged a historical programme such as the true music lover delights to hear. It contained nothing but classics; every number was a great work, and, furthermore, all were splendidly played.

The programme announced Bach's B minor suite for flute and string orchestra, but at the last moment Dr. Muck substituted the same composer's concerto for strings, which was composed for the Margrave of Brandenburg. It was played with that freedom and spontaneity which goes only with absolute confidence in the conductor, and the audience was quick to acknowledge the beautiful reading that Dr. Muck has given.

Mozart's favorite overture, that to "The Magic Flute," was given with great finish. Beethoven's eighth symphony was the closing number. Dr. Muck's performance of it was such as to excite envy in the breast of the ordinary conductor.

The musicians were entirely in touch with him and every department responded nobly to the appeals of the conductor, who certainly did not spare himself during a performance of sustained energy and uncommon eloquence.

Iron! The Symphony Concert Apr 1.07

For the last time, probably for a season or two, Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" was repeated at the Symphony concert on Saturday night. Again Dr. Muck and the band gave it vivid and thrilling performance; and again the audience listened intent and rewarded the conductor and his men with very hearty applause. In power, nothing they have done the year through, not even their playing of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic Symphony" compares with that of the "Domestica." Yet with all their abandon and ardor, details of momentary beauty or tenderness shone as they had not shone hitherto—like the cradle song of the clarinets, in the limpid tone of Mr. Grisez and his comrade or the passages of the mother musing over her baby as they came from Mr. Hess's violin. Not before has there seemed such spontaneous charm in the scherzo of the child's play with its endless variety of light instrumental timbres, and its changeful rhythmical accents. Akin, too, was the delicacy of the transitoral passages. For a contrast in the veritistic detail that Strauss loves, the orchestra shuddered and started in what has often seemed an obscure passage in the music of the night phantoms, as a sleeper stirs and "jumps" in some vague dream. Exuberant the orchestra were and exuberant Strauss is in the fugue. Perhaps there is too much of it; but what composer except him and what band but ours can seem so glorious, so uproariously drunk—there is no other word—with the power of sound.

For the rest of the concert: the delicate beauty of Mrs. Child's tones and the delicate suggestion of poetic fancy, of shadowy mood and veiled emotion that she can give them evaporated in the large spaces of Symphony Hall, with even a tempered orchestra behind her, and with the music that she had chosen. Rossi's "Ah rendimi" asks a larger scope of voice and a more declamatory eloquence of style than has Mrs. Child. It is for the Schumann-Heinks and the Scatchis of the operatic stage, albeit they lack the translucent purity of Mrs. Child's tones. Nor were the obvious and rather theatrical emotions of Hugo's and Berlioz's singing Moorish slave altogether sympathetic to the fineness and the exotic quality of Mrs. Child's voice and temperament. As the phrase of the theatre goes she was ill-cast. Dr. Muck's feeling for orchestral declamation served well Cherubini's overture to his opera of the noble Moors. "The Abencerrages," and the music kept its grave, clear power, its enduring heroic and chivalrous note, the note of knightly romance as romance has glamored and glorified it and that composer upon composer with much more elaborate and showy means has sought in vain. Most interesting of all these preliminary items to the "Domestica" was Oskar Fried's prelude and fugue for string orchestra. It had, of course, the large and elastic eloquence that the string choir of the band brings to such music, but it had also—and it is a rare quality in a set piece in a set form—a sombre and penetrating eloquence of its own. It sang and it mused. It was as some grave reverie in tones that had shaped itself spontaneously. It had thought, which was not merely of musical form. It had a deep undertone of passion that was a passion of poetic mood and not of technical achievement. Consciously or unconsciously Mr. Fried was translating form into poetry—writing, so to say, a fugue of and with a future. H. T. P.

CHERUBINI-STRAUSS PROGRAM BY THE SYMPHONY

Tomah Apr 1.07
Cherubini and Strauss, the beginning and the ending of a concert that was all the more fascinating from the enormous contrast of methods and musical thoughts! The marvelous journey of composition from the pure Grecian beauty of the old master to the barbaric opulence of the modern high priest of color made the nineteenth Symphony concert one of the finest of the season. Not for years has Cherubini's "Abencerrages" overture been heard here, and it therefore surprised and delighted a large majority of its listeners by the exquisite charm of its melody, the refinement of its rhythm and the perfect clarity of its most expressive orchestration. Such a thing should not be permitted to slumber for seventeen years more.

The wisdom of repeating the colossal "Symphonia Domestica" within a few weeks was apparent. The effort was finer by far than before; the scheme was more apparent, the innate humor more rational, the real and tender beauty more keenly felt. Spite of its prolixity, its passages of rather tedious garrulity, it must be set down, for the present at least as very great music. Divorce it from the "papa, mamma and the baby" stuff, which is non-essential and often misleading, and there remains absolute music of richness and overwhelming strength. Its performance was superb, better in many ways than at the earlier concert.

Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child was the soloist, singing first the aria, "Ah, rendimi" from the semi-mythical opera "Mittrane," and then Berlioz's "The Captive." With neither did she succeed unequivocally, for her voice often sounded hollow and her intonation was not always secure. In lovely and haunting Berlioz song, however, her sincerity and rarely poetic feeling did much to give her work effectiveness.

SYMPHONY Apr 4, 1907 Post REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 19th Symphony rehearsal consisted of Cherubini's overture to his opera "Les Abencerrages"; air "Ah, Rendimi," from Francesco Rossi's opera "Mittrane"; prelude and double fugue for strings, Op. 10, by Oskar Fried, performed for the first time here; Berlioz's setting of Hugo's poem, "La Captive," and Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica," which was repeated by general request, as the Debussy "Sea Pictures" will be later. Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child, contralto, was soloist.

Cherubini's overture is one of his stronger works, and a concert overture in the best sense of the word. It has been rarely given of late years, and the performance was one of the utmost fire and brilliancy. By reason of these qualifications it proved a capital number to open the programme with.

Mrs. Childs was apparently suffering from nervousness, on account of which her tones were at times unsteady, with an occasional slight, very slight, deviation from the pitch. She, nevertheless, sang Rossi's grandly pathetic old air with intense pathos and depth of feeling. She appeared more at ease in the Berlioz number, here coloring her tones with the utmost skill and appreciation of the text, while her performances throughout were distinguished by that high intelligence and artistry which have always been dominant factors of her work.

It is an excellent thing, and something which should be oftener done, to give audiences a chance to hear twice, in near succession, works of such import as the "Symphonia Domestica." Dr. Muck could have given no greater proof of his objectivity than he has in his splendid interpretation of this extremely difficult composition, which he is reported to dislike. And if the first performance was masterly, the second, making full allowance for the increased enjoyment consequent on closer acquaintance with the work, appeared to be incredibly wonderful in its revealing power. Dr. Muck has again and again shown remarkably illuminating insight into many compositions, but he can be fairly said to have surpassed himself in this case. It is a question whether the composer himself has ever enjoyed a finer production of his latest symphonic creation. The symphony increased, at this second performance, the impression made at the first. After hearing it one can well understand Strauss' remark that the most difficult requirement in the production of his works was a conductor with a sufficient amount of humor in his soul. This score bubbles over with the most mirth-provoking episodes, not the least of which was the intense seriousness of its reception by the esthetic audience present. Of greater importance is the fact that the music grows with acquaintance, revealing more and more of its incomparable nobility and copiousness of inspiration. The glorious conclusion, like the finale of Beethoven's fifth symphony, is long drawn-out in its exuberant triumph. Under some conductors such an ending might fall flat; under Dr. Muck's baton it mounted and mounted to a monumental climax which brought to an end an unforgettable performance.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, March 21, 1907. De Bussey's "The Sea," a series of three orchestral pieces, was the chief novelty at the Boston Symphony concert this evening in Carnegie Hall, the other numbers of the programme being F. S. Converse's "The Mystic Trumpeter," Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz and the overture "Roman Carnival," by Berlioz—all modern works.

It was not a scheme to merit entire approval, nor did it give unalloyed pleasure to the audience. Not one of the classical composers was represented—in fact, the programme of the musical feast lacked the main dish, the roast. Dr. Karl Muck conducted the concert with authority and distinction.

De Bussey's work is a very interesting composition which paradoxically contains no continuous melody. Mr. Converse's piece is written to illustrate Walt Whitman's poem, "The Mystic Trumpeter." It is a cleverly designed work, containing several beautiful melodies. Special mention must be made of the artistic manner in which Mr. Willy Hess played the beautiful violin melody in the first movement.

Dr. Muck Remains

The management of the Symphony Orchestra has received no information, beyond that contained in the despatch of yesterday from Berlin to the Associated Press, regarding the permission to Dr. Muck to remain for another year in Boston. It has, however, no reason to doubt the truth of the telegram, and for some weeks it has been hopeful of such an answer to the request for further leave for Dr. Muck that Mr. Higginson made to the German emperor last December. In due course of the mails it expects a confirmatory letter from the imperial household which, according to European and German ways in such matters, moves slowly. Long ago the management asked Dr. Muck to remain as the conductor of the orchestra for another season. He was ready to do so if the emperor would continue his leave of absence. Now that the imperial consent has been obtained, Dr. Muck will presumably continue in his present post for another musical year. In all Europe there seems to be no conductor better suited to it. Trans. Mch. 22. 1907

280 STRAUSS'S "DOMESTICA" FOR THE THIRD TIME

Trans. — Nov. 29. 07

A Thrilling Performance to an Excited Audience at the Symphony Concert Yesterday—A Little Clearing of the Ground Around Strauss—What He Has Sought in the "Domestica" and What He Has Accomplished—His Expression of His Own Time—Miss Doro as a Romantic Odalisque—George Cohan's New Play—A Word About Opera Hours—Other News of the Day

As usual in Holy Week the first of the Symphony concerts fell on Thursday, instead of Friday, afternoon, and after four short pieces—Cherubini's overture to his opera, "The Abencerrages"; a prelude and double fugue for string orchestra by Oskar Fried, once a musical protégé of Dr. Muck; the familiar air that custom rather than fact attributes to the Abbé Rossi's mythical "Mitrane," and Berlioz's melody, "The Captive," both sung by Mrs. Child—the conductor and the band passed to the promised repetition of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica." This time it stood at the end of the programme, instead of the beginning; but there were far fewer departures during the progress of the music than usually befall when a classic symphony closes the concert. The audience listened not only eagerly but intelligently. It plainly responded to the glowing beauty and throbbing instrumental power of the slow movement, and—still finer and rarer proof of its alert discernment—it plainly caught the humor and humanity of the double fugue of disputation. "If you try to follow the programme and hear the baby cry and splash, you get all excited. It's much nicer just to listen," said the discreet seventeen-year-old behind us, obviously at home for the Easter holidays. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. Clearly our audiences are learning to listen to Strauss wisely, and as clearly they hear him gladly. Dr. Muck and the band rewarded their listeners, yesterday, with a performance that had not quite the fineness of tonal texture and the luminous adjustment of those last month, but that much excelled them in freedom of feeling and ardor of utterance. Before the symphony was far under way, the conductor, the band, and the audience, all seemed to feel the excitement of the music; each acted and reacted upon the other; and for once there was genuine and pervasive abandon even at an afternoon concert. In such mood the slow movement turned incandescent, and conductor, men and listeners fairly flung themselves into the fugue. The élan of the music and the performance was irresistible.

equally riotous as Bacchante. The audience had no outlet for its own excitement but applause, and though the concert had been long, it stood in its place, recalled the conductor twice and thrice and once brought the whole band to its feet. And yet the prigs and pedants say that there is no public for Strauss's music and that it gives an average audience no pleasure! Since the season began there has been no such tumult at an afternoon concert.

The maid of the row behind—wise with the wisdom of youth. The true way to appreciate the music of Strauss and especially the music of the "Domestica," is to listen to it. Let Strauss contrive his realistic backgrounds and details as he will. He has done so in all his tone-poems from "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration" through "Quixote," "A Hero's Life" and the "Domestica." It is the spirit of the time and the nature of the man, eager for new musical conquests, to court them. But the minutiae of all these things really concern only the "eminent programmists" from Berlin even unto Boston, and those who will not listen imaginatively to delineate music, but by some fault of temperament must grub laboriously through it. Who when he looks at Rodin's "Kiss" or "The Spring," unless he is a sculptor or a maker of handbooks, examines every boss of the rock upon which the lovers are embracing. It is but the background to the passion and the humanity of the whole—the passion and the humanity that Rodin has wrought into his marble as Strauss has wrought them into the tones of the "Domestica." At every repetition of the tone-poem these details adjust themselves into the mass and framework of the whole, and pass little noted where they first seem to flare. Let the baby splash in the muted trumpets, let the clock begin and end the day on the glockenspiel; let the mother deal the "quick slap" of maternal restraint in the instruments of percussion. Let Strauss have his humorous play with these "realistic" details—for humor in music is rare and good; but what is really his concern and ours who listen is his idealization of the emotions that all these minutiae of domestic life awaken, and his human and musical expression of those emotions. Again, the only way to hear Strauss is to listen—and listen largely.

Equally so with his polyphony and his instrumentation. Every student of modern music knows those intricate and marvellous patterns in tones that fill the pages of Strauss's orchestral scores. They are indeed for study and meditation, by composers, by pedagogues, by theorists, by dilettanti. But the place for such study is the library rather than the concert-room, and the study itself is not for the average listener, even of musical intelligence and cultivation. Strauss's polyphony and his instrumentation are only his means to his ends. He has not written his tone-poems that learned musical

281 Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 6, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

HOWARD BROCKWAY, SYMPHONY in D major, op. 12.

- I. Allegro molto
 - II. Andante.
 - III. Scherzo: presto: Trio.
 - IV. Allegro molto.
- (First time in America.)

MACDOWELL,

ORCHESTRAL SUITE in E minor, No. 2, "Indian." op. 48.

- I. LEGEND: Not fast; with much dignity and character. Twice as fast; with decision.
- II. LOVE SONG: Not fast; tenderly.
- III. IN WAR TIME: With rough vigor, almost savagely.
- IV. DIRGE: Dirge-like, mournfully.
- V. VILLAGE FESTIVAL: Swift and Light.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to the opera "Euryanthe."

STRAUSS'S "DOMESTICA" FOR THE THIRD TIME

Trans. ——— in ch 29.07
A Thrilling Performance to an Excited Audience at the Symphony Concert Yesterday—A Little Clearing of the Ground Around Strauss—What He Has Sought in the "Domestica" and What He Has Accomplished—His Expression of His Own Time—Miss Doro as a Romantic Odalisque—George Cohan's New Play—A Word About Opera Hours—Other News of the Day

As usual in Holy Week the first of the Symphony concerts fell on Thursday, instead of Friday, afternoon, and after four short pieces—Cherubini's overture to his opera, "The Abencerrages"; a prelude and double fugue for string orchestra by Oskar Fried, once a musical protégé of Dr. Muck; the familiar air that custom rather than fact attributes to the Abbé Rossi's mythical "Mitrane," and Berlioz's melody, "The Captive," both sung by Mrs. Child—the conductor and the band passed to the promised repetition of Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica." This time it stood at the end of the programme, instead of the beginning; but there were far fewer departures during the progress of the music than usually befall when a classic symphony closes the concert. The audience listened not only eagerly but intelligently. It plainly responded to the glowing beauty and throbbing instrumental power of the slow movement, and—still finer and rarer proof of its alert discernment—it plainly caught the humor and humanity of the double fugue of disputation. "If you try to follow the programme and hear the baby cry and splash, you get all excited. It's much nicer just to listen," said the discreet seventeen-year-old behind us, obviously at home for the Easter holidays. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. Clearly our audiences are learning to listen to Strauss wisely, and as clearly they hear him gladly. Dr. Muck and the band rewarded their listeners, yesterday, with a performance that had not quite the fineness of tonal texture and the luminous adjustment of those last month, but that much excelled them in freedom of feeling and ardor of utterance. Before the symphony was far under way, the conductor, the band, and the audience, all seemed to feel the excitement of the music; each acted and reacted upon the other; and for once there was genuine and pervasive abandon even at an afternoon concert. In such mood the slow movement turned incandescent, and conductor, men and listeners fairly flung themselves into the fugue. The élan of the music and the performance was irresistible.

and at the end the orchestra was as joyously riotous as Bacchantes. The audience had no outlet for its own excitement but applause, and though the concert had been long, it stood in its place, recalled the conductor twice and thrice and once brought the whole band to its feet. And yet the prigs and pedants say that there is no public for Strauss's music and that it gives an average audience no pleasure! Since the season began there has been no such tumult at an afternoon concert.

The maid of the row behind was wise with the wisdom of youth. The true way to appreciate the music of Strauss and especially the music of the "Domestica," is to listen to it. Let Strauss contrive his realistic backgrounds and details as he will. He has done so in all his tone-poems from "Til Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration" through "Quixote," "A Hero's Life" and the "Domestica." It is the spirit of the time and the nature of the man, eager for new musical conquests, to court them. But the minutiae of all these things really concern only the "eminent programmists" from Berlin even unto Boston, and those who will not listen imaginatively to delineate music, but by some fault of temperament must grub laboriously through it. Who when he looks at Rodin's "Kiss" or "The Spring," unless he is a sculptor or a maker of handbooks, examines every boss of the rock upon which the lovers are embracing. It is but the background to the passion and the humanity of the whole—the passion and the humanity that Rodin has wrought into his marble as Strauss has wrought them into the tones of the "Domestica." At every repetition of the tone-poem these details adjust themselves into the mass and framework of the whole, and pass little noted where they first seem to flare. Let the baby splash in the muted trumpets, let the clock begin and end the day on the glockenspiel; let the mother deal the "quick slap" of maternal restraint in the instruments of percussion. Let Strauss have his humorous play with these "realistic" details—for humor in music is rare and good; but what is really his concern and ours who listen is his idealization of the emotions that all these minutiae of domestic life awaken, and his human and musical expression of those emotions. Again, the only way to hear Strauss is to listen—and listen largely.

Equally so with his polyphony and his instrumentation. Every student of modern music knows those intricate and marvellous patterns in tones that fill the pages of Strauss's orchestral scores. They are indeed for study and meditation, by composers, by pedagogues, by theorists, by dilettanti. But the place for such study is the library rather than the concert-room, and the study itself is not for the average listener, even of musical intelligence and cultivation. Strauss's polyphony and his instrumentation are only his means to his ends. He has not written his tone-poems that learned musical

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 6, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

HOWARD BROCKWAY, SYMPHONY in D major. op. 12.

- I. Allegro molto
 - II. Andante.
 - III. Scherzo: presto: Trio.
 - IV. Allegro molto.
- (First time in America.)

MACDOWELL,

ORCHESTRAL SUITE in E minor, No. 2, "Indian." op. 48.

- I. LEGEND: Not fast; with much dignity and character. Twice as fast; with decision.
- II. LOVE SONG: Not fast; tenderly.
- III. IN WAR TIME: With rough vigor, almost savagely.
- IV. DIRGE: Dirge-like, mournfully.
- V. VILLAGE FESTIVAL: Swift and Light.

WEBER,

OVERTURE to the opera "Euryanthe."

DR. MUCK PLAYS BROCKWAY'S YOUTHFUL SYMPHONY

Much Pains for Scant Returns—MacDowell's "Indian" Suite Again at the Symphony Concert—Reger's "Serenade" and Hadley's "Salome" to Come—More Unfamiliar Handel—The Many Concerts of April—A Repeated Wagner Programme for the Pension Fund

Trans. — Apr. 6, 1907

The programme of the twentieth rehearsal and concert, largely made up of American works, one of which was given for the first time in the United States, ran as follows:

Symphony D Major, Op. 12...Howard Brockway
Suite No. 2, "Indian".....MacDowell
Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber

Mr. Brockway, at present one of the faculty of the Peabody Institute of Music, is not unknown in this city as a composer, for Mr. Gericke gave his "Sylvan" suite in 1901; Mr. Félix Fox played his Ballade Op. 10, some years ago, and the Cecilia Society sang his part-song "The Wings of a Dove" quite recently. This symphony, composed nearly thirteen years ago when the composer was not yet twenty-four, is obviously the work of a student—one gifted with indisputable talent, but nevertheless markedly in the apprentice stage. It shows fluency and facility of invention, but the melodic vein is too often without distinction. There is no little skill in part writing, obvious command of form but in less degree that organic sense of coherence. The orchestration is pleasing, effective and well contrasted although within a narrower range of tone color and dynamic vigor than that to which the ultra-modern school has accustomed us. Taking it all in all it is a work which shows a greater development in the resources of technique than in depth and vigor of expression. The composer found himself in possession of an almost embarrassing facility without the requisite experience or maturity to render his musical thought vital. A cardinal point in César Franck's teaching of composition was that the pupil should not choose the first idea that came into his head, that he should strive patiently until his material was of that quality which is indispensable if a work is to endure. It would seem as if Mr. Brockway had ignored this valuable precept; his symphony is steadily but too facilely melodious, there is little sustained breadth of mood. On the other hand, there is much brilliancy in the first movement and in the finale, the codas to both are cleverly effective; there is much skillful and brilliant writing for the wind instruments. At the first hearing the slow movement and the scherzo are the most pleasing and musically interesting. Mr. Brockway should profit by this opportunity to hear his symphony, and it is to be hoped that he will embody this experience in a new orchestral work in which his gain in maturity of expression will be evident.

Mr. MacDowell's suite has been played here so often that there remains comparatively little that is new to be said about it now. It is said that the most ardent devotee of Indian folk-song regards it in somewhat the same light that members of "The Invincible Band"—Balakireff, César Cui, Moussorovsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff adopted towards the works of Tschai-kovski. That it represents an inevitable compromise between "European tradition" and the genuine aboriginal spirit, as Tschai-kovski was said to be too "cosmopolitan." It cannot be said that this assertion seems truly founded. In the first place, the members of "The Invincible Band" were themselves under patent obligations to Liszt, they were taking refuge in a glass house of criticism. MacDowell's suite seems the most vitally artistic presentation of the Indian spirit that an American has yet evolved. While others may have succeeded in more graphic delineation from the folk-lore point of view of native melodies, they have not arrived at an abstract realization of the essentially Indian spirit that is so convincing or so high a level of poetic beauty and humanity. Dr. Muck gave a stirring and dramatic performance of the suite. It was received with sufficient enthusiasm to compel the orchestra to rise and bow their acknowledgments. It was of extreme interest to compare in detail Dr. Muck's reading with those of his predecessors. He took the second theme in the first movement slower, to its intrinsic advantage, but somewhat to the detriment of the coherence of the movement as a whole. The second movement, "Love Song," was perhaps slightly deficient in lyric delicacy. "In War Time," on the other hand, was given with superb rhythmic vigor with the exception of lack of accent in the trombone chords accompanying the second presentation of the theme, which the composer has marked "roughly." The end was magnificent in its savage intensity. The "Dirge" was played with wonderful dramatic fidelity. It was a satisfaction to hear the chords for basses and violoncellos "divided" played pizzicato, and not with the bow as heretofore, that the solo horn was behind the scenes as indicated in the score, and not "stopped" in the orchestra. But it seems an unwarrantable violation of the composer's intention to have transferred the touching trumpet solo at the end, an octave lower to the horn. The "Village Festival" was given with magnificent sweep and verve throughout. On the whole, a memorable performance of a work that has not yet been surpassed by an American composer for poignant depth and eloquence of poetic sentiment. That Dr. Muck could absorb so entirely the intentions of a composer whose spirit is after all alien to him, speaks in the highest terms of the remarkable faculty for quick and searching assimilation.

There have been so many lifelessly brilliant performances of Weber's "Euryanthe" that its appearance upon a programme is generally a source of passive resignation. However, under Dr. Muck's baton it was played with such vital rhythm, dramatic accent, the ghostly episode was treated with such illuminating poetry that the overture seemed most unwontedly rejuvenated. Dr. Muck has compelled admiration by his enormously brilliant renderings of new and unfamiliar works, but his performances of the Brahms's C minor symphony, of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, of the Schubert C major symphony and of the Weber "Euryanthe" overture, to name a few among the more significant, all works which have figured in the repertory of the Symphony concerts for many years, must remain among the most abiding proofs of his rare capacity as a conductor.

E. B. H.

Post May 4, BOSTON SU

CINCINNATI BID FOR SYMPHONY

Couldn't Get Hub Organization Anyway, Higginson and Ellis Say

"No, of course not," said Major H. L. Higginson, when asked last night if it was true that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was going to Cincinnati to take the place of the Symphony Orchestra in that city. "Absolutely no truth in the report," he added. "I have nothing more to say."

A press bulletin to the Post early last evening from Cincinnati read as follows: "Boston Orchestra and Karl Muck to be secured to take place of Symphony Orchestra here." Mr. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said when shown the telegram: "I do not quite understand what this means. There is, of course, not even a possibility of the Boston Symphony Orchestra going to Cincinnati permanently. Perhaps it is the intent of the managers of the disbanded orchestra there to fill out their guaranteed season of concerts with orchestras from other cities. They may possibly try to secure the Boston Symphony Orchestra for one or two concerts. There have been no negotiations as yet, however."

RENDER SYMPHONY BY PROF. BROCKWAY

Dr. Muck's Orchestra Gives
Work Heard for the Second Time in America.

THEME DEVELOPMENT
SHOWS FAITHFUL STUDY

Composition of American Was Unfamiliar but Gets a Painstaking Rendition.

Herald Apr. 7, 1907.
BY PHILIP HALE.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony (in D major).....Brockway
Suite No. 2 "Indian".....MacDowell
Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber

The impressions of the music and of the performance are those formed at the public rehearsal, Friday afternoon.

Mr. Brockway's symphony was then performed for the first time in America. It was written in Germany in 1894 when the composer was 24 years old and it was produced at a concert given in Berlin Feb. 23, 1895, when the programme was made up exclusively of Mr. Brockway's works. Mr. Brockway was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and he has lived for nearly four years in Baltimore as a member of the faculty of the Peabody Conservatory of Music.

The American entering a German music school is at once impressed by certain students, who, he is told—and they are willing to admit the fact—have written two or three symphonies. It is true that these symphonies have never been performed. The years go by and the symphonies sleep on a shelf. Their rest is perpetual. If the composers amount to anything in later years they may look occasionally at their student work and smile, or they may earlier in their career throw the manuscript scores into the waste basket or into the fire. Fire and death are often private and public benefactors.

Mr. Brockway's symphony is now nearly 13 years old. He, no doubt, has grown steadily in musical stature. It is a pity that he could not have heard this symphony shortly before he gave it into the hands of Dr. Muck, for it certainly must have then sounded to him differently than it did in 1895. Dr. Muck is a man of catholic taste and he produces works without prejudice for or against the nationality of a composer. The chief question concerning a composer is not whether he is an American; it is this: "Is his music worthy of performance?"

Dr. Muck, it is said, took great pains in the rehearsal of this symphony, as though it were a composition by Claude Debussy or Richard Strauss. Painstaking rehearsal was necessary, not because the music is complex or unusual, but because in certain instances it is not well written for the instruments.

Passages for the violin, for instance, are written as though for the piano.

It is enough to say of Mr. Brockway's symphony that the themes are without marked character; that the development of them is that of a faithful student who, at the time, is not imaginative, whose musical thoughts are at the best only respectable and commonplace; that there are few evidences of emotional strength or beauty; that there is little, if any, effective use of orchestral instruments; on the contrary, the instrumentation is generally thick and drab.

Even in the simple exposition of a theme, as in what may be called the melodic theme of the finale, the motive is almost covered by its accompaniment. To speak more in detail of the symphony would be merely to say unpleasant things.

Dr. Muck gave a very impressive interpretation of MacDowell's "Indian" suite, an interpretation that was eloquent in its dramatic variety. The suite is now about 15 years old. We have heard much modern music since it was composed. Works contemporaneous with this suite have grown old within this time, and some, loudly applauded when they were first heard, are already forgotten.

MacDowell's music has not aged; it might have been written early in the season. The music has the characteristic force and tenderness of this composer when he was writing for himself and not directly for the general public. It is not necessary to lug in any question of whether this be distinctively American music, for the best pages of the suite are not parochial—they are not national.

They are universal in their appeal to sensitive hearers of any land. The movements that are the most poetically imaginative, that have the greatest distinction are the "Legend," "In War Time," and above all the "Dirge." Music like this would honor any composer of whatever race he might be.

After MacDowell's suite the "Euryanthe" overture, with the exception of the wonderful episode for strings, seemed cut-and-dried and only plausibly brilliant.

Soloist:

Mme. OLIVE FREMSTAD.

y Hall.

1906-07.

NY ORCHESTRA.

K, Conductor.

ICERT.

BER 3, AT 8 P. M.

mme.

to "Der Freischütz."

Freischütz," "Wie nahte mir der

ED SYMPHONY.

PIANOFORTE.

No. 1, in B flat major

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 13, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

MAX REGER,

SERENADE for ORCHESTRA, op. 95.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Vivace a Burlesca.

III. Andante Semplice, (sostenuto.)

IV. Allegro con spirito, (non troppo vivace.)

(First time in Boston.)

HENRY HADLEY,

TONE POEM, for FULL ORCHESTRA, after Oscar Wilde's Tragedy, "Salome."

(First time in America.)

TSCHAIKOWSKY,

OVERTURE-FANTASIA. "Romeo and Juliet."
(after Shakespeare.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REGER'S "SERENADE" AND HADLEY'S

From: "SALOME" April 12, 07

Two New Compositions That Made Sharp

Contrast—The Form and Substance of Reger's Music—Its Vivacity of Line and Charm of Arabesque—His Traits as the "Serenade" Exemplifies Them—Is There a Mild-Mannered Reger?—The Exceptional Vividness of Mr. Hadley's Tone-Poem as a Musical Narrative—The Shortcomings of an Easy Imagination

Again, when Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra played Reger's "Serenade," yesterday, for the first time here, the wonder was that half musical Germany should have been for three years past in hot battle over him. Once more, as in his trio of the Symphony Quartet's concert last year and, measurably, in the sonata for piano and violin that Mr. Marteau played in Boston, Reger's music was interesting, fluent, amiable, individual, amusing, but one of the last things in the world to provoke a strife of hisses and epithets. Perhaps Reger, who long ago disordered most of the normal steps in a composer's progress, preferred to begin formidably and to continue ingratiatingly. Certainly there is a formidable Reger. Listen to organists, talking of organ pieces by him that seem beyond the powers of human hands and feet to play; glance across and down the intricate pages of some of his chamber music teeming with difficulties and fairly spattered with perversities and feats of harmonic daring and agility; run through, or try to run through, the tortuous and detached phrases of some of his songs; and there is no doubting this strange and threatening Reger. Presumably it is of him that reviewers and amateurs, audiences and performers, war sharply, sourly, even furiously in Germany. It is quite another Reger, outside some of the songs that Mr. Sharpe sang eighteen months ago, that we have heard thus far in Boston—an agreeable, pliant, neat-handed, light-footed, smiling and altogether amusing Reger. The trio was all dexterity, playfulness and charm. The sonata indeed had a more taxing aspect and a graver content, manner and individuality. And yesterday the "Serenade," in spite of a rather "heavenly" length of forty minutes, was adroit, supple, graceful, musical entertainment and seemingly, at a single hearing, nothing else. It is easy to understand why the "Straussites" and the "anti-Straussites" rage in Germany; why the "Mahlerites" and the "anti-Mahlerites" have set themselves; but, even with allowance for Teutonic musical excitability, it is difficult to appreciate the warfare of the "Regerites" and the "anti-Regerites," so far as his music has been heard in America. "Everyone but the Wagnerites hates him," wrote the French correspondent in Stuttgart, whom we were quoting on Thursday. But why hatred for such pleasant trifles as the "Serenade" or the trio? Neither is substantial enough for such passion. Perhaps, however, our conductors are solicitously tempering the Regerian winds to their flocks, and will not yet venture his music, when it is acrid, threatening, perverse and yeasty.

The "Serenade" is the second of Reger's compositions for orchestra, though he has written copiously for nearly everything else; and, at a single hearing of a single piece, he seemed curiously lacking in instinctive feeling for what a painter would call instrumental "values." The music gave little impression of a fine and felicitous sense of instrumental combinations, contrasts and delicate differentiations, or of long and minute study of their possibilities. Reger, as they say in Germany, may feel in counterpoint and think in modulations, but as yet he does neither in instruments. He uses, it is true, a small and rather unusual orchestra for the "Serenade." He discards altogether the brass choir and the instruments of percussion, except two kettledrums. For a wind choir, two each of flutes, oboes, clarinets, horns and bassoons serve him. He adds a harp to the usual strings, and then divides them, except the double basses, into two groups—one muted throughout and the other unmuted—a condition that changed the seating of our orchestra yesterday and made it for the moment strange to see. Bach, when Dr. Muck put one of the Brandenburg concertos on his programme a few weeks ago, had only a string choir. Yet with it he gained much more variety, felicity and adroitness of instrumental voices than does Reger with wind instruments besides. And Bach, as Reger's own sayings go, is the inspiration and ideal of his music.

On the other hand, if Reger's orchestra for the "Serenade" is unusual, he is duly conventional in its form and structure. It runs practically in the symphonic mould—an opening allegro moderato, a short scherzo (Vivace a Burlesca), a long, slow movement, in the form of a romance, and a finale, allegro con spirito. Each movement, moreover, with themes and counterthemes, free fantasia, recapitulation, and all the rest, is orthodox enough in material and development to satisfy even an English lecturer on music. In fact, the "Serenade," by its form and length, might easily pass for a light and diminutive symphony—a study, perhaps, for the fuller-bodied one that surely Reger will write one day to the consternation, probably, of both the faithful and the doubters. And in all this modesty of apparatus and orthodoxy of structure is no apparent affectation of simplicity. Reger in the "Serenade" is by no means as one who crooks his elbow, cocks his eye and calls to all within earshot to hear him do "the regular thing in the regular way" and to mark the naïveté, grace and ease with which he does it. Apparently, and normally, what he would say has determined the means and the methods of his saying, and he easily shapes them to his purpose. Often there seemed to be delicate intricacies in the "Serenade," and once and again an attentive listener was quite sure of them. But they were fused into a whole effect of simplicity, spontaneity, ease and grace. As the music flowed forward, Reger seemed unconscious of form, rule and custom, so freely and deftly did he make them serve him.

There is no sign of the slightest delineative, dramatic, or deliberately poetic intent in the "Serenade," and not the faintest hint of even a vague "programme." It is as "absolute" as any music of Bach or Mozart. It contains no adventures, except those of themes and counter-themes, and tells no tale except that of modulation, figuration and development generally. It is as truly tonal pattern-weaving as any music of the eighteenth century—all line and arabesque and dependent for its appeal upon its intrinsic interest and beauty of design, invention and ornament. From first to last—and here is another of its eighteenth-century traits—it is singularly fluid music, not with the deliberate, suggestive, involved fluidity of Debussy, for example, but with a light spontaneous, on-flowing ripple of its own. Time and again it is almost Mozartean in its supple ease. Steadily it is animated music that quickly touches and keeps vivacity in the two allegros; that is playful—sometimes a little curtly—in the scherzo; and that goes not much deeper than saute musing in the slow movement. To invent a melody seems the easiest thing in the world for Reger; he has been fertile with them—and at forty-four—through nearly a hundred pieces. But they are not so far as the "Serenade" disclosed them, very distinguished or searching melodies. They do not on the instant beguile the ear or stir the imagination. Yet they have a curious titillating, elastic, almost "jumpy" quality, as of melodies that would be off and away. Thereby they serve Reger's purposes admirably. On and on he leads them through all sorts of modulation, figuration, ornament, combination and contrast, with the utmost surety and vivacity of invention and handling, seemingly unconscious of the easy lengths that spread the "Serenade" over a score of 221 pages. The mere fecundity, facility and agility of it all are good to follow in these days of music that often proclaims, instead of hiding, its laboring intricacies. Reger, however, does more; he clothes all this pattern-weaving with a light, bright, persuasive charm. Almost always, whether the tonal stream runs in long curves or widening ripples, it is shimmering music. Often it has grace, delicacy, and an alluring air of sparkling and happy improvisation. When it is most serious it is no more than suavely pensive, singing its lyric, and decorating it by the way, through long, soft, sinuous, shining curves of tone. When it is most vivacious, it sounds innocently gay with its own felicities. It seems simplicity itself—a simplicity perhaps of melted complexities. It has even tricks of manner it cannot cloak, like occasional lapses into a perilously thin and high-pitched tone, and a curious tendency to pianissimo endings. On the other hand Reger makes wholly unaffected, free and often adroitly suggestive play in tonal-coloring with his contrasted choirs of strings. Throughout, moreover, as in the trio of last year, the music has a capricious and brightly pungent individuality of its own. It was sport to hear, and music so seldom makes sport nowadays.

It is easy enough to take the cue of the learned Dr. Riemann and to say that Reger is "expressing his own individuality in a language that comes from deep study of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms," but in the individuality lies the secret of the persuasive charm or the significant expressiveness of all his music that has been heard hereabouts. He has cultivated and refined a natural fecundity of musical ideas and fertility in musical design and development. He has made conventional and orthodox forms seem spontaneous and elastic again. In a time when most music tends to be delineative, dramatic, literary, "programmatic" in twenty different ways, he has made it appeal again, as in the "Serenade" by beauty of design, grace of line and charm of arabesque. He has made the small adventures of a melody that expresses nothing but itself, interesting again, and the tracery of tonal patterns in old familiar forms as beguiling to the imagination as many a "proclamation" of striding tone-poems. In a musical day of sonorities and opulence he has sought seeming simplicities and reticence. So far as we know his music in Boston, he has cultivated charm and caprice, lightness and brightness, suavities and delicacies. No wonder he is unique in a time when even the youngest composer is fain to burst all the old bottles with the new and heady wine he pours into them, and to rejoice in the loud noise of the burstings. A musical age of Strausses and Mahlers—in posse and in esse—needs also its Regers and Debussys. But why, to end at the beginning, why wrangle over Reger's music in the prevailing German fashion? It is much keener pleasure just to listen.

Apparently Dr. Muck had made a programme of contrasts. After Reger's "Serenade" came the other new composition of the afternoon, Henry Hadley's tone-poem, "Salome," and, outside their position on the list, the two could hardly have been further apart. Except that he forgot the celesta, Mr. Hadley asks the resources of the modern orchestra, full to the last chair. His form, though he keeps the tone-poem an organic and developing whole, save for a strange and furlbund episode near the close, is of the freest. In purpose and contents he has written frankly delineative and dramatic music—delineative of the characters, the incidents and the atmosphere of Oscar Wilde's lush and searching play, and dramatic with the passions, conflicts, and fatalities that it looses. Mr. Hadley wrote his tone-poem before Richard Strauss's opera out of the play had come to performance or to print, but often he writes as one who has studied and assimilated the melodic, polyphonic and instrumental idioms of Strauss. Within its limitations, moreover, the tone-poem traverses the play almost as closely and completely as does the music-drama. There is the suggestion of the still, clear, palpitating Syrian night; of the coming of Salome from the palace; of the din of the feast and of the cackle of the disputing Jews; of the desire of Salome for Jokanaan, now surging, now baffled; of his large rebuke and his austere disdain; of the feverish entrance of the hysterical Herod; of his nervous, broken, babbling speech; of his rising and perverse passion for Salome; of her answers, her dance, and of the confusion and terror that stir at her asking for Jokanaan's head. The head falls; she spends her desire upon it, and the music transfigures her passion. There is a hint of the horror of the bystanders, a crash, a pause, and the melody of Salome's passion dies wan and empty.

Mr. Hadley's music is delineative to a surprising vividness, if the listener knows Wilde's play at all, and some acquaintance with it the composer has a right to presume in his hearers. There is no need of a very alert and responsive imagination to catch the spell of the music of the blue-and-silver night or the loud echoes of the feast; and to hear the string and woodwind choirs sing the passion of Salome, while the brass is eloquent with the answering prophet. Herod whines, babbles, wheedles, shivers, in short, ejaculatory, high-pitched, empty phrases that bring illusion, not unlike that which Strauss achieves by somewhat similar means. The dance pricks with rhythm and motion, faintly Oriental, pungently sensuous. The beheading is a curiously minute and vivid tonal suggestion of an action. The rest, except the details of turbulence and horror, intensifies and at last seems to idealize Salome's desire. On the other hand Mr. Hadley's music stops short at these rather remarkable delineative feats. It has characterized persons, suggested atmosphere, imparted passion, and almost told a tale. But it has not told it with the lush magnificence of exotic imagination, acrid sensuality, and cunning suggestion that are in the mood and the manner of Wilde's play and that should pass over into music that it kindles. The tragedy is at once fascinating and fateful. Mr. Hadley's music misses the fascination, but often and with true imagination, it keeps the note of mysterious and inevitable fate, in the boding drum-roll, for example, iterated and reiterated under the passionate music of desire. Mr. Hadley seems so eager to tell the tale in tones—and he has done that vividly—that he neglects to tell it as richly, ardently, potently as he might. To put the case rather extremely, he gives his hearers, in tones, all the facts about Salome as Wilde records them, and touches them with advancing and irresistible fate, but he forgets to enhance them, as well, with the intensest of musical speech. His "Salome" lacks magnificence of voice, poignancy of power, and except here and there in the dance, adroit exotic suggestion. Music to "Salome" should crush, bite, tingle, quiver. Mr. Hadley seems to imagine his too easily and to write it too readily to give it many subtleties of beauty, acidities of suggestion, or piercing or overwhelming power. H. T. P.

CONCERTS AND PLAYS OF A BUSY WEEK-END

Reger's "Serenade" and Hadley's "Salome"—Dr. Muck Makes Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Music Drama—A Concert by the Marine Band—A Prophecy About Gabrilowitsch—"Hamlet" with a Cast of Women—A New York View of the Significant Lemon—Mark Twain, the Ghetto Youngsters and a Sunday Matinee—Other News of the Day

Trans. — Apr. 15, 1907
The amusing incident—the saving grace, as some would have it—of the Symphony concert on Saturday night was the "anti-Regerite" yawn. The orchestra was in the full tide of the very celestial lengths of Reger's "Serenade," and the audience might easily have been thinking that art is long and time not fleeting with this particular example of his music. There was the usual stillness and then the unusual yawn—the yawn that has got out of hand, or rather out of mouth, in a too sudden and spasmodic effort to check a creeping drowsiness. The audience stirred from its languors with a start and a smile. Was the warfare between the "Regerites" and the "anti-Regerites" about to break forth in our decorous concert-room even as it has raged on occasions in the more excitable halls of Germany? Was the yawn the first, albeit the unpremeditated, shot of the "anti-Regerites"? But there were none of the opposing faction to return the long-drawn fire. Very probably there were not even any in the house; for the "Serenade" was much less warmly applauded than it was on Friday. Forthwith, the audience slipped back into listlessness and not the suspicion of a yawn broke the endless wavelets of the rest of the piece. Seemingly the "Serenade" was less well played the second time than it had been the first. For once the strings had distinctly an "off" night. Their tone wanted the vibrancy and elasticity, the lightness and the brightness that they gave it on Friday afternoon, that Reger's music palpably asks; and that in turn lent it a glamor and a suppleness that it lacked on Saturday. The listener felt the lengths of the piece, and repined under Reger's meagre skill in the differentiation of orchestral timbres and his lack of imagination in diversified rhythms. The changeful harmonies lost something of their charm. The whole seemed less spontaneous and more artificial. The freshness of interest on Friday waned. It was easy to suspect that curiosity once satisfied, Reger's orchestral music no longer pricks.

On the other hand, Mr. Hadley's "Salome" was played more eloquently and graphically than it had been on Friday. The distinctive trait of the tone-poem still seemed to be its graphic quality as a musical impression and a musical narrative. Remarkable, indeed, is its expression by contrasting and interwoven melodic ideas and instrumental voices, not only of the varying moods and the changing characters, but also of the dramatic contents of the temptation of Salome by Herod. It is the crux of a tone-poem "after" Wilde's tragedy. At the beginning and at the end the way is clear enough to a composer of Mr. Hadley's ready imagination. Between Jokanaan's denunciations of Salome and her dance lies the pitfall. Mr. Hadley not only bridged it, but filled it, and with music that was not merely delineative, but that had interest, worth and power in itself. Nowhere has he forgotten that even a tone-poem of the most modern fashion must stand upon its own musical legs as well as upon the props of its "programme."

For ending came Tschaikevski's familiar tone-poem—for in purpose and achievement it is nothing else—"Romeo and Juliet." Time and again it has been played here, but never before under a conductor, who, when he chooses, can be so operative in the best sense as can Dr. Muck. He made the fantasia into a tragedy in tones. With the beginning he brought atmosphere of fate and passion. No mimic strife on the stage can be half as vivid or thrilling as that which Tschaikevski, and he and each man of the orchestra whirled in clash and tumult through their tones. The voice of Romeo's song was of passion melting in its own heat. Every pause, every accent heightened the dramatic intensity of the whole, and the end was as tragedy, stilling her voice in sorrow and in pity averting her eyes. The music and the performance pierced with their beauty and stirred with their power—if only as Tschaikevski half persuades us, Romeo and Juliet were really Slavs.

H. T. P.

FITCHBURG ENJOYS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Plays at Annual Event of Smith College Club.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]
FITCHBURG, April 11, 1907. The musical event of the year was tonight in City Hall, when a representative music loving audience greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at the annual concert of the Fitchburg Smith College Club.

It was the eighth appearance of the orchestra in Fitchburg and the second time under Conductor Karl Muck and the auspices of the club.

The audience was the largest that ever greeted the orchestra here. It included a class of 25 from the Groton school, in charge of Prof. Nichols, and another nearly as large from Cushing academy, in charge of Miss Blanche Hardy, beside many from Gardner, Leominster, Athol and other nearby towns.

Mr. and Mrs. Muck were guests of Herbert I. Wallace, who has secured the orchestra for this and previous engagements.

The Smith College Club is composed of Smith graduates organized for the purpose of maintaining a scholarship at Smith College, and the proceeds of the concert will swell the scholarship fund.

Miss Helen R. Stratton was chairman of the concert committee, and Mrs. Walter F. Sawyer, president; and Miss Helen Rice, secretary, were on the general committee.

The imperial permission to Dr. Muck to continue as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, reported from Berlin a fortnight ago, has been formally confirmed, and the contract with him for another year of service has been definitely made. The last Symphony concert of the season falls on May 4. Ten days later, on May 14, Dr. Muck sails for Germany. In the month of June he is likely to conduct occasionally at the Opera in Berlin and possibly at some of the summer musical festivals. Through July and August he takes his usual holiday, and by the middle of September he returns to Boston again. Apr. 8, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Max Reger. Serenade for Orchestra. Op. 95.
Henry Hadley. "Salome." Tone poem for Orchestra.
Tschaikevsky. "Romeo and Juliet." Overture-Fantasia.

Are we having too much music? The reviewer counted twenty empty seats within a radius of four yards from his own, at this concert. It may have been that Reger's reputation for prolixity and mystifying modulations scared some timid ones away. If so their fears on this occasion were groundless, for the Serenade was good music, had many fine themes and was by no means as aggressive as some of the modern music we have had.

The work has a peculiar scoring and contains two string orchestras, one playing with muted strings, the other without the mutes. This new arrangement led to a reseatting of the orchestra so that the dialogic effect might be brought out more clearly. It led to another revelation. Our strings do not play with the perfection of a few years ago! A short time since we stated that the brasses were not as good in their ensemble as we had formerly heard them, and now we find the technique of the strings somewhat deteriorated. It is a pity that one cannot have all qualities united in a single conductor. We are paying for Dr. Muck's brilliancy and genius of interpretation by a loss of exquisite ensemble. Some day we will wake up and find the Chicago, the Pittsburg, the Philadelphia orchestras our equals or even possibly our superiors!

The first movement of the Serenade was neither ugly nor too complex. There were moments of much beauty, there were good figures well developed, and the strophe and antistrophe of the two string bands had often a pleasing effect. The second movement, "Vivace a Burlesca," was about as "burlesque" as a table of logarithms might have been. We have not yet found any humor in Reger, such as may be discovered in Richard Strauss and other moderns. Nor could we find the simplicity of the "Andante Semplice" which followed, although there were some beautiful moments in this movement.

The last movement had too much the character of a study in modulation and the work as a whole appeared too long. Reger has that facility of composition that wrecked Raff. He is to be sure a deeper music thinker than Raff, but his ease in creation leads him to become diffuse and unnecessarily prosy. All of his larger works that we have yet seen would gain by compression.

It is with real pleasure that we chronicle a powerful new composition by an American composer. Mr. Henry Hadley has not yet entered the sacred precincts of "Grove's Dictionary," but he is evidently to take rank with the best native composers. He has dramatic instinct, melodic as well as harmonic power, and a complete control of that mighty engine—the modern orchestra. He did not intend to compete with Richard Strauss in setting this sultry subject, for he had finished this orchestral work long before the opera was written.

The tone-poem began impressively, with passages of deep wood-wind that might have been composed by Tschaikevsky. The trumpets of Herod were most brilliantly scored and the events of the Oscar Wilde tragedy were so graphically set forth that there was not much difficulty in the layman following the tale without a score.

We found the composer less successful in picturing the passion and longing of Salome than in portraying the heroic or tragic points of the subject. Even the solo violin or the oboe phrases had not the intensity of Wilde's picture.

The dance, however, was both picturesque and original, and it fitted the scene like a glove. Here the bassoon is very cleverly employed. There are many points of Salome's character given to the oboe, which was very prominent in the earlier portions of the work. It was notably well played. The catastrophe, the beheading of John, called forth a cataclysm on muted horns, gong, and all the orchestral paraphernalia of evil. Then came anxiety on the kettle-drum and a mournful solo phrase on the bass-clarinet. The final outburst of Herod—"Kill that woman!"—and the death of the heroine was powerfully drawn. The score was of the largest modern sort, and the work is a fine addition to the modern repertoire. Yet the passionate, amorous and languorous traits of the heroine could be made more effective, should Mr. Hadley ever revise his work. It is a great advance over his symphony.

Then followed more programme-music in somewhat the same vein, for Tschaikevsky is less strong on the love-making side of "Romeo and Juliet" than in the heroic touches of the tragedy. Dr. Muck often follows soup with soup, and roast meat with roast meat, in his orchestral menus. He gave a splendid reading of the work, as fine as any we could imagine; yet it scarcely made its due effect after all the crashes of "Salome."

The concert was unnecessarily long, for it began almost ten minutes late and the intermission was extended fully five minutes after the audience had resumed their seats after the promenade. This defect might easily be remedied.

This week we are to have a new overture by Grieg, Maud Powell is to play a violin concerto new to Boston, one of Paine's compositions is to be given, and then—we are invited to take another voyage across Debussy's mud-puddle. Louis C. Elson.

FREMSTAD.

REGER'S ORCHESTRAL MUSIC FOR THE FIRST TIME ^{in U.S.} 1907

His "Serenade" Played in Chicago—The Reviewers' Impressions—The Full Casts of the Operas at the Boston—The Next Symphony Programme—The Concerts of April—Dr. Muck as a Pianist

In Chicago a fortnight ago, the first of Max Reger's compositions for orchestra to come to performance in America was played by the Thomas Orchestra—his "Serenade" (opus 95), published last year, dedicated to Felix Mottl, the conductor of Munich, running in four movements—Allegro Moderato, Vivace a Burlesca, Andante Semplice and Allegro con Spirito, and scored for a band of two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, one harp, two kettle-drums, two string choirs (each embracing first and second violins, violas and cellos)—one muted and the other "straight," and double basses, likewise unmuted—an unusual and far-fetched combination of instruments. In form the "Serenade" follows the normal course of such suites as the eighteenth century cultivated them, but in dimensions it makes a symphonic score of 221 pages. By the accounts, Mr. Stock and the orchestra played the music well, and the audience was duly pleased. For the reviewers, Mr. Gunn, writing in the Inter-Ocean, had these impressions: "The 'Serenade' proved to be a neat and pleasing composition; but it failed to reveal any qualities which would seem to justify either the enthusiasm or the fierce antagonism which Reger has aroused in Germany. Of all the novelties given in Chicago this year the Reger 'Serenade' is farthest removed from sensationalism. In it Reger appears as the apostle of simplicity. His only concession to the desire of the present for abundant orchestral color is represented by the division of the strings, with the exception of the basses, into two choirs, muted and unmuted. The contrasts made possible by the employment of the muted section of the strings are not many, and after the forty minutes consumed by the four movements they become very monotonous. Neither is there anything in the thematic material of the music which would seem to inspire these unusual color effects. Rather they impress one as forced and artificial."

"As for the inventive ability displayed, it was most meagre. The first movement is dominated by a theme which suggests the folk-songlike prayer from 'Hänsel and Gretel.' This appears again and again in different harmonic and instrumental guise, being treated with an elaboration entirely out of keeping with its importance. The other ideas are of the nature of figurations, excepting the very conventional second theme. All are rhythmically monotonous. Reger's contrapuntal profundity is displayed in an elaborate working out of the major scale against the broken chord, an effect reminiscent of Czerny. In the andante and finale it is shown to better advantage, but nowhere in the 'Serenade' does it justify the praise most frequently accorded him in Germany: that his art is founded on that of Bach. Indeed, to mention Reger and Bach in any connection seems, in the light of his 'Serenade,' entirely absurd. The work is chiefly interesting in its harmonic color. Reger is a master of modulation. The andante was especially attractive from this standpoint, for it had an occasional fragment of simple and eloquent melody to emphasize its subtle contrasts of key. On the whole, it impressed as a pretty but unimportant work, capable of being vastly improved by a liberal use of the blue pencil.

Mr. Griswold of the Record-Herald, who has often written warmly of Reger's music, was more interested and better pleased. "A ceaseless flow of ideas," he writes, "is one of the chief characteristics of the 'Serenade.' If one is entirely unfamiliar with Reger this work probably seems too long, and if it is possible to lay up such a charge a young composer must suffer. The instruments are cleverly handled and many of the effects are of great beauty. In the musical structure, however, Reger's abilities appear to best advantage. There is, possibly, a little too much repetition occasionally, yet, if one will take the pains to observe closely, it will be seen that the composer is handling some difficult contrapuntal problems with astonishing skill. All of the themes are strong and are admirably adapted to the changes of mood in the different movements. Harmonically the 'Serenade' is of the firmest fibre throughout, for Reger is never weak, whatever other charge may be brought against him. It chanced to be my good fortune to hear some parts of this composition at a rehearsal and the portions heard again at the concert seemed to take on added charm because of familiarity. The music demands close study before one can attempt to pass final judgment upon it, and by the time any average mortal would arrive at such an ultimate opinion Reger will probably have written something else that is entirely different. 'Here, in Boston, we believe, Mr. Gerike last winter, and Dr. Muck in the current season, has considered the performance of the 'Serenade,' but thus far Reger's music, outside his trio that the Symphony Quartet played a year ago and the violin sonata that Mr. Marteau disclosed to us last April, is still unknown to our audiences."

22ND CONCERT BY MUCK'S ORCHESTRA

Boston Symphony Heard in New and Harmless Serenade by Max Reger.

HADLEY'S "SALOME"
PLAYED FIRST TIME

Tone Poem After Oscar Wilde, an Interesting and Imaginative Work.

Herald April 14, 1907
BY PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Serenade for orchestra, op. 95.....Reger
"Salome," tone poem after Oscar Wilde's Tragedy, op. 55.....Hadley
"Romeo and Juliet," overture fantasia after Shakespeare.....Tchaikowsky

Reger's serenade was played in Boston for the first time. The performance of Hadley's symphony was probably the first. I say "probably," for although the work was rehearsed by Jehin's orchestra at Monte Carlo, the departure of the orchestra with the opera company of the Prince of Monaco for a short visit to Berlin probably postponed the performance.

The Serenade of Reger was produced at Cologne late in the fall of last year. The Theodore Thomas orchestra played it at Chicago the 16th of last month.

Unlike the composer's Sinfonietta, the Serenade was not hissed violently in Berlin when Mr. Nikisch produced it at a Philharmonic concert, nor has it awakened screams of protest in other cities of Germany. It is scored peculiarly. Two strong choirs are used, one muted, one unmuted. The double basses are unmuted. The other instruments are two flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, kettledrums and one harp.

We have heard little of Reger's music in Boston. A serenade for flute, violin and viola was played at a concert of the Boston Symphony quartet a little over a year ago. It turned out to be an amiable, agreeable composition, neither pretentious nor important. A year ago this month, Mr. Marteau introduced a much stronger work, the Sonata in F sharp minor, for violin and piano. The Sonata was distinguished by a charming allegretto and a finale in variation form which ended with an exceedingly brilliant fugue. The music was often intensely dramatic; the dramatic expression moved freely in old moulds. Songs by Reger have been sung here, chiefly by Mr. Sharpe in the semi-privacy of his dwelling house.

There are some who shout and do not grow weary of shouting the praise of Max Reger. According to them, he is a modern Bach, he is the greatest of all composers now living, he is already numbered among the immortals. These shouts naturally irritate sane persons and drive them to the other extreme. They deny all musical gifts to Reger except extraordinary facility and industry, qualities that are not praiseworthy, when the composer has nothing to say, qualities that may be justly considered as dangerous; they lead an exasperated public to demand that the composer be bound over to keep the peace.

Serenade Is Soporific.

But there is nothing to irritate any one in this serenade. On the contrary, music incites a disposition to sleep.

It is as blameless as the Ethiopians to whom Zeus paid visits when he was weary of the quarrels and revelling on Olympus. There is also nothing in the music to support the statements of the Regerites, for it is not emotional, it is not beautiful, it is not interesting except episodically, and then as by accident; it is not even discordant in an original and glorious manner; it is a long weaving of commonplace.

It flows along, now like a thick stream of cold molasses, and now with the lightness of slippery water. I know of no ancient or modern music that reminds a well disposed hearer so much of the summer drink recommended by John Phoenix: Three parts of water-gruel and two of root beer; thicken with a little soft squash, and strain through a cane bottom chair. The fatal facility of the man! One can see him writing counterpoint with both hands. His facility is equalled only by his long-windedness.

Mr. Henry Hadley, born in Somerville, has been living in Europe for the last three years, going about as a conductor of his works and those of others. It is said that he composed his "Salome" before he saw the score of Richard Strauss' opera, which, imported, shocked the sensitive feelings of certain professional critics in New York and aroused an edifying discussion concerning morality in life and art which ceased only with the full publication of the evidence in the Thaw trial.

It was fortunate for Mr. Hadley's peace of mind that his "Salome" was performed for the first time in Boston and not in New York. No protests in advance were sent to Symphony Hall; no letters from indignant citizens and citizenesses were published in the newspapers. Nor was there last night any exodus of persons with outraged feelings from the hall. The statues did not fall from the niches. There was no thunderbolt, there was no quaking of the earth. Yet Mr. Hadley had the courage to say frankly that his music was in illustration of the tragedy by Oscar Wilde, a tragedy, by the way, that is superb in its fantastical beauty and strange dramatic intensity.

296

This music is program music, but the programme is not of the interlinear nature so dear to lazy schoolboys who cared not for Caesar and Virgil. Mr. Hadley printed on a page of his score the argument of Wilde's tragedy. He gave only one title in the course of the score: "Salome's Dance." The hearer may find the opening pages illustrative of the moonlight night and the great terrace in the Palace of Herod and of the dialogue that begins:

The Young Syrian: How beautiful is the Princess Salome tonight!

The Page of Herodias: Look at the moon! How strange the moon seems! She is like a woman rising from a tomb. She is like a dead woman. One might fancy she was looking for dead things.

Must Remember Wilde.

But he must do his own task of identification. He may find a trombone theme typical of John the Baptist; he may associate certain pages with the desire of Salome, and connect trumpet calls with appearance of the sensual, superstitious, sly, neurasthenic Tetrarch, but he does this at his own risk. It is enough if the hearer, knowing Wilde's tragedy, is constantly reminded; if his imagination is quickened by the music.

Mr. Hadley's "Salome" made a marked and immediate effect, nor was this due to the fact that it came after Mr. Reger's soporific serenade, for there was an intermission between the works so that the audience had time to pinch itself or set its blood in circulation by a quick walk in the corridor. Mr. Hadley's music pleased because it has melody, rhythm and color; because it is poetical, dramatic, imaginative. It is not necessary to inquire how closely he reproduces the text of episodes in the tragedy; this would be foolish and futile. He has caught in a large measure the spirit of the tragedy, and that is the important thing.

There are a few pages here and there that he would no doubt write better a dozen years from now, or he would reject them. The music that may be supposed to typify John the Baptist is conventional. There is little suggestion of the wild man from the desert in it. But the perverse caprices, the desire, the passion of Salome are expressed amorously and ardently in the music. The dance is one of much distinction in its exoticism, not is it too realistically oriental.

The opening pages have mood, and this mood, changed as a landscape when the moon is clouded, makes an effective close with its tragic interruption, the command of Herod, unable through horror or jealousy to look longer on Salome's ecstasy. There is much individuality in the stronger portions of the work. There is freedom in thought and in expression. The music as a whole is a marked advance on Mr. Hadley's symphony that was performed here two seasons ago.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" has been played here several times. Dr. Muck gave a very dramatic reading of this overture, which must be reckoned among the greatest of Tschaikowsky's compositions. The feud music has seldom, if ever, had such significance, nor has the glowing love theme, the chant of triumphant love that mocks time and space, ever been sung with more overwhelming passion.

Concerts Next Week

For the twentieth pair of Symphony concerts Dr. Muck has nearly made an "All-American" programme. The symphony in D major that begins it and that is new to Boston is the work of Howard Brockway, an American composer still in his thirties, who was born in Brooklyn, studied in Berlin, and is now a teacher in the Peabody Conservatory at Baltimore. He wrote the symphony ten years and more ago, and it was played in Berlin in 1895. There, possibly, Dr. Muck heard it and has since cherished his memories of it. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" follows, in some respects the ablest of his compositions for orchestra and in all respects a lesson to those rampant folk-lorists who fancy that music can be made out of aboriginal scraps of tunes without such imagination as MacDowell brought to it. The scraps fortunately are few, but dull the imagination alert and abundant, and the music that it animates is interesting and pictorial. MacDowell transfigures his Indians. Your folk-lorist usually is as literal as the multiplication table. Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe," ends the concert—the third of Weber's overtures in the course of the current season. Others remain.

The Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck give the fifth of their current series of concerts in Cambridge on Thursday evening, at eight, with the assistance of Miss Lillia Snelling, a young alto singer from New York. The orchestral numbers on the programme are Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and Beethoven's eighth symphony, lately played at the symphony concerts in Boston. Miss Snelling sings the page's air from Wagner's opera, "Rienzi" and a group of songs.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

GRIEG.

OVERTURE, "Im Herbst."
(First time.)

SIBELIUS.

VIOLIN CONCERTO.
(First time.)

J. K. PAINE.

PRELUDE to "The Birds" of Aristophanes.

DEBUSSY.

ARIA, "La Mer."

Soloist:

Mme. MAUD POWELL.

This music is programme music, but the programme is not of the interlinear nature so dear to lazy schoolboys who cared not for Caesar and Virgil. Mr. Hadley printed on a page of his score the argument of Wilde's tragedy. He gave only one title in the course of the score: "Salome's Dance." The hearer may find the opening pages illustrative of the moonlight night and the great terrace in the Palace of Herod and of the dialogue that begins:

The Young Syrian: How beautiful is the Princess Salome tonight!

The Page of Herodias: Look at the moon. How strange the moon seems! She is like a woman rising from a tomb. She is like a dead woman. One might fancy she was looking for dead things.

Must Remember Wilde.

But he must do his own task of identification. He may find a trombone theme typical of John the Baptist; he may associate certain pages with the desire of Salome, and connect trumpet calls with appearance of the sensual, superstitious, sly, neurasthenic Tetrarch, but he does this at his own risk. It is enough if the hearer, knowing Wilde's tragedy, is constantly reminded; if his imagination is quickened by the music.

Mr. Hadley's "Salome" made a marked and immediate effect, nor was this due to the fact that it came after Mr. Reger's soporific serenade, for there was an intermission between the works so that the audience had time to pinch itself or set its blood in circulation by a quick walk in the corridor. Mr. Hadley's music pleased because it has melody, rhythm and color; because it is poetical, dramatic, imaginative. It is not necessary to inquire how closely he reproduces the text of episodes in the tragedy; this would be foolish and futile. He has caught in a large measure the spirit of the tragedy, and that is the important thing.

There are a few pages here and there that he would no doubt write better a dozen years from now, or he would reject them. The music that may be supposed to typify John the Baptist is conventional. There is little suggestion of the wild man from the desert in it. But the perverse caprices, the desire, the passion of Salome are expressed amorously and ardently in the music. The dance is one of much distinction in its exoticism, not is it too realistically oriental.

The opening pages have mood, and this mood, changed as a landscape when the moon is clouded, makes an effective close with its tragic interruption, the command of Herod, unable through horror or jealousy to look longer on Salome's ecstasy. There is much individuality in the stronger portions of the work. There is freedom in thought and in expression. The music as a whole is a marked advance on Mr. Hadley's symphony that was performed here two seasons ago.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" has been played here several times. Dr. Muck gave a very dramatic reading of this overture, which must be reckoned among the greatest of Tschaikowsky's compositions. The feud music has seldom, if ever, had such significance, nor has the glowing love theme, the chant of triumphant love that mocks time and space, ever been sung with more overwhelming passion.

Concerts Next Week incl. 30.07

For the twentieth pair of Symphony concerts Dr. Muck has nearly made an "All-American" programme. The symphony in D major that begins it and that is new to Boston is the work of Howard Brockway, an American composer still in his thirties, who was born in Brooklyn, studied in Berlin, and is now a teacher in the Peabody Conservatory at Baltimore. He wrote the symphony ten years and more ago, and it was played in Berlin in 1895. There, possibly, Dr. Muck heard it and has since cherished his memories of it. MacDowell's "Indian Suite" follows, in some respects the ablest of his compositions for orchestra and in all respects a lesson to those rampant folk-lorists who fancy that music can be made out of aboriginal scraps of tunes without such imagination as MacDowell brought to it. The scraps fortunately are few, but dull the imagination alert and abundant, and the music that it animates is interesting and pictorial. MacDowell transfigures his Indians. Your folk-lorist usually is as literal as the multiplication table. Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe," ends the concert—the third of Weber's overtures in the course of the current season. Others remain.

The Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck give the fifth of their current series of concerts in Cambridge on Thursday evening, at eight, with the assistance of Miss Lillia Snelling, a young alto singer from New York. The orchestral numbers on the programme are Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and Beethoven's eighth symphony, lately played at the symphony concerts in Boston. Miss Snelling sings the page's air from Wagner's opera, "Rienzi" and a group of songs.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

GRIEG.	OVERTURE, "Im Herbst." (First time.)
SIBELIUS.	VIOLIN CONCERTO. (First time.)
J. K. PAINE.	PRELUDE to "The Birds" of Aristophanes.
DEBUSSY.	ARIA, "La Mer."

Soloist:

Mme. MAUD POWELL.

Miss Maud Powell.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

GRIEG.

OVERTURE, "In Autumn." op. II.
(First time in Boston.)

SIBELIUS.

CONCERTO in D minor, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 47.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio di molto.
III. Allegro, ma non tanto.
(First time in Boston.)

J. K. PAINE.

PRELUDE to the "Oedipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles

DEBUSSY.

THREE ORCHESTRAL SKETCHES, "The Sea."
I. From dawn till Noon on the Ocean.
II. Frolics of Waves.
III. Dialogue of the Wind and Sea.
(Repeated by request.)

Soloist:

Mme. MAUD POWELL.

Miss Maud Powell.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

GRIEG.

OVERTURE, "In Autumn," op. 11.
(First time in Boston.)

SIBELIUS.

CONCERTO in B minor, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 47.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio di molto.
III. Allegro, ma non troppo.
(First time in Boston.)

J. K. PAWEL.

PRELUDE to the "Oedipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles

DEBUSSY.

THREE ORCHESTRAL SKETCHES, "The Sea."
I. From dawn till dawn on the Ocean.
II. Profiles of Waves.
III. Overture of the Wind and sea.
(Repeated by request.)

Soloist:

Mme. MAUD POWELL.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv: Programme. Apr 22, 07
 Grieg. "Autumn," Overture.
 Sibelius. Violin Concerto. D minor, Op. 47.
 Soloist. Mme. Maud Powell.
 J. K. Paine. Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus."
 Debussy. "La Mer." Symphonic Sketches.

It was a sombre and sometimes baleful programme, that of last Saturday, with groans of wood-wind, growls of brasses, walls of muted horns, and every other evidence of musical sorrow or agony. Yet Grieg's overture had its moments of brightness, for it presented some touches of the brusquerie of Norwegian music, occasional glimpses of the beautiful folk-music—the "Norske Folkvisor." This "Autumn," however had as many changes as a New England spring. It was an interesting work, but it was not as symmetrical or as clearly developed as many other of Grieg's compositions are. Nevertheless we were thankful that it was melodic and did not disdain to be intelligible. Dr. Muck brought out every point with excellent effect and the overture made a successful debut.

Now followed Sibelius's new concerto with Mme. Maud Powell as the soloist. Dr. Muck is educating us to get along without soloists at these concerts, and the orchestra is certainly able to give its concerts unaided by sporadic songs or piano pyrotechnics. But when such an artist as Mme. Powell appears, and presents a new and important concerted work, the proceeding is quite in line with the best traditions of our symphony concerts.

Yet we may amend part of this statement; we are not quite sure that the Sibelius Concerto is really a concerted work in the classical sense. Beethoven's great Concerto is a symphony with a thread of solo interwoven; Brahms' Concerto for violin, although not one of his most inspired compositions, carries out the same plan. But this work by Sibelius is one long solo for violin with orchestral accompaniment. At times, however, it is a dialogue between the violin and the orchestra. The latter idea, striking enough in its novel treatment, is presented in the very first measures of the work, which are for violin solo, practically unsupported. We do not find the improvisational character of this as strong as the Ossianic style of rhapsody which Bruch employs in the first movement of his G minor Concerto.

Such a work is a crucial test of the solo artist, and Mme. Maud Powell bore this test magnificently. In harmonic passages, in breadth of bowing, in intonation, in sympathetic quality of tone, in clearness of double-stopping, the finished artist was constantly revealed. And there was something more than this, there was a complete assimilation of the spirit of the work, most difficult to acquire in so rhapsodical, improvisational and unconventional a composition. The first movement, which was very long, seemed at times almost a succession of cadenzas. Once in a while, but rarely, there would be a touch of folk-song melody ("tutti") yet, in spite of the constant prominence of the soloist, the concerto is not of "popular" character. Its freedom of thought is too untrammelled.

The adagio does not attain the power of either Grieg or Sinding in similar movements. The orchestra here was almost always of neutral tint or of sombre color. The great beauty of Mme. Powell's work on the G string was the chief effect of this movement.

The Finale still kept the violin to the front, this time supported with a "ground-bass." Here at last a theme, the subordinate subject is wholly given to the orchestra. Mme. Powell had some telling passages in harmonics in this movement, which she gave with noble effect.

Altogether we find this concerto a new departure in its form, one that will appeal to the violinist, since it keeps him constantly in the lime-light. But in its contents it is not so majestic or lofty as the concerto by Sinding, and the constantly rhapsodical character of the solo violin passages begins to pall before the end is reached. Mme. Powell was recalled three times at the close, and her remarkable surety and poetry in a most trying part certainly deserved such a tribute.

We were glad it was decided to put Paine's "Oedipus" prelude on the programme, instead of "The Birds," which was first chosen. This "Oedipus" number is much the finer of the two. In fact, "Oedipus Tyrannus," as a whole, is one of the masterpieces of the American musical repertoire. The Prelude has never had so good a performance as Dr. Muck gave to it. It was graphic in every measure and lofty in the highest degree.

Since Dr. Muck decided to give Debussy's "Le Mer," a second chance, we conscientiously and with unbiased mind tried to find new beauties in it. We failed. There were a few "heave-hos" that suggested sailors pulling at the ropes and a few mighty billows in the finale, but the muted horn bleatings, the oboe cacklings, the disjointed bits of ugliness still presented only such a sea as Coleridge pictures in his "Ancient Mariner," (the "Rotting Sea," with its thousand, thousand slimy things"), and not the beloved, healthy ocean which we revel in and upon. We believe that Shakespeare mean Debussy's ocean when he speaks of taking up arms against a sea of troubles. We hope that Dr. Muck will continue his good work and give this composition in New York a second time. It would be a fair revenge for the recent performance of "Martha," by the Metropolitan Opera Company in Boston.

It may be possible, however, that in the transit to America, the title of this work has been changed. It is possible that Debussy did not intend to call it "La Mer," but "Le Mal de Mer," which would at once make the tone-picture as clear as day. It is a series of symphonic pictures of seasickness. The first movement is "head-ache." The second is "Doubt," picturing moments of dread suspense, whether or no!

A DAY OF MUSIC

MAUD POWELL AND SIBELIUS'S NEW CONCERTO

The Violinist Reappears at the Symphony Concerts After Six Years and Gives a Notable Performance of a Notable Piece—The Music-Drama That Sibelius Has Put Into a Concerto—A Forgotten Overture by Grieg—Early Brahms at Miss von Radecki's Chamber Concert—Wilhelm Heinrich's Song Recital

Trans. Apr. 20, 1907

For the first time in six years, Maud Powell, the violinist, reappeared in Boston at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and it was good to hear her warmly welcomed before she began Sibelius's concerto and heartily applauded after she had finished it. Mme. Powell is now and justly the most distinguished American violinist, and her distinction is international as well. Of late years, indeed, the musical capitals of Europe have known her oftener and more intimately than have our own cities, but there and here she has gained and held her position by sheer artistic probity. She has not asked us at home to hear and admire her because an accident of birth happened to make her American. She has not bidden her European audiences listen as to some wonder of the West. She has come to both as a violinist and as nothing else, and she has hidden her personality in her artistry. She has quietly waived aside the indulgences that rise almost spontaneously to meet her sex in every executive act except that of acting; yet she has not gone to the other extreme of a laborious and transparent assumption of masculinity. The listener hears her without thought of sex. She has been Maud Powell, the violinist, and a violinist who has sought not to glorify herself, but to unfold as clearly and to express as fully as lay within her powers the music that she was playing. She has never cultivated amplitude, elasticity and fineness of tech-

ELIJAH GEORGE, Register.
 COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.
 ss.—Probate Court.—To the heirs-at-law, kin, and all other persons interested in the estate of ALBERT CONANT, late of Boston, County, deceased: Whereas, certain instruments purporting to be the last will and testament and one codicil of said deceased are presented to said Court for probate, by RY W. CONANT and WILLIAM F. CONANT, both of said Boston, who pray that said testamentary may be issued to them, the same being named, without giving a surety official bonds:—You are hereby cited to appear at a Probate Court, to be held at said County of Suffolk, on the twenty-first day of April, next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause why said will and codicil should not be admitted to probate. Side by side with them stand the faculties of imagination that discover and feel its moods, emotions and individual accent; while of both intellect and imagination are the fusing and communicating faculties that weld together all these things and impart them to her hearers. She does more: she brings them to life; for the distinctive trait of Mme. Powell's mind, fancy, and artistry is their nervous vitality. It is that at bottom which has set her so often to the discovery and the trial of new concertos and smaller pieces; which has spurred her, as in this very concerto by Sibelius that she played yesterday, to the conquering of strange technical difficulties and intricacies and to the winning of obscure and evasive imaginings; and which in all things has kept her alert, eager, unsatisfied. The crowning touch of genius has not been hers. That, indeed, may fall only from the lap of Fate. But much else that only a full and fine artistry of intellect, imagination and execution and an underlying probity of artistic spirit may achieve, are hers deservedly. Mme. Powell's career has been quiet as the careers of virtuosi go, but its rewards have not been the less stimulating.

Naturally—one almost writes—it was a new concerto that Mme. Powell played, and that here in America she has made her own. Sibelius, the Finnish composer, whose dark, brusque, passionate symphony Dr. Muck made so impressive last winter, wrote it originally some years ago; then revised it until in many respects it was another composition, and gave it to Hallé, the German, for performance in the autumn of 1905. Quickly Mme. Powell discovered it, felt its fascinations, subdued its difficulties, and since last December has played it with one or another American orchestra. By the agreeing testimony of violinists Sibelius's music raises new and strange difficulties and asks new and strange feats. He has actually and surprisingly enlarged the technical possibilities of the violin, or as some choose to put it, complicated and distorted them. Yet as the comparatively inexpert listener, as he heard the music yesterday, took little heed of these prodigies of technique. They seemed only the means to eloquent and imaginative, large or adroit, expression. There in truly was the surprise and the delight of the piece. The fate of the concerto as an enduring musical form—and especially the fate of the concerto for stringed instruments—is hanging in the balance. It can still be written as a serviceable and agreeable vehicle for the display of varying degrees of virtuosity. It still is written as a part of the whole duty of a composer or as the filling, with what invention and dexterity the writer may summon, of an orthodox musical form. But if the concerto for violin is to keep its place in modern music, it must be made expressive in the modern sense. It must contain the poetry as well as the mathematics of tones. It must yield itself within its established outlines to the modern freedom of imagination.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv: Programme. Apr. 22, 1907

Grieg. "Autumn," Overture.
Sibelius. Violin Concerto. D minor, Op. 47.
Soloist. Mme. Maud Powell.
J. K. Paine. Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus."
Debussy. "La Mer." Symphonic Sketches.

It was a sombre and sometimes baleful programme, that of last Saturday, with groans of wood-wind, growls of brasses, walls of muted horns, and every other evidence of musical sorrow or agony. Yet Grieg's overture had its moments of brightness, for it presented some touches of the brusquerie of Norwegian music, occasional glimpses of the beautiful folk-music—the "Norske Folkvisor." This "Autumn," however had as many changes as a New England spring. It was an interesting work, but it was not as symmetrical or as clearly developed as many other of Grieg's compositions are. Nevertheless we were thankful that it was melodic and did not disdain to be intelligible. Dr. Muck brought out every point with excellent effect and the overture made a successful debut.

Now followed Sibelius's new concerto with Mme. Maud Powell as the soloist. Dr. Muck is educating us to get along without soloists at these concerts, and the orchestra is certainly able to give its concerts unaided by sporadic songs or piano pyrotechnics. But when such an artist as Mme. Powell appears, and presents a new and important concerted work, the proceeding is quite in line with the best traditions of our symphony concerts.

Yet we may amend part of this statement; we are not quite sure that the Sibelius Concerto is really a concerted work in the classical sense. Beethoven's great Concerto is a symphony with a thread of solo interwoven; Brahms' Concerto for violin, although not one of his most inspired compositions, carries out the same plan. But this work by Sibelius is one long solo for violin with orchestral accompaniment. At times, however, it is a dialogue between the violin and the orchestra. The latter idea, striking enough in its novel treatment, is presented in the very first measures of the work, which are for violin solo, practically unsupported. We do not find the improvisational character of this as strong as the Ossianic style of rhapsody which Bruch employs in the first movement of his G minor Concerto.

Such a work is a crucial test of the solo artist, and Mme. Maud Powell bore this test magnificently. In harmonic passages, in breadth of bowing, in intonation, in sympathetic quality of tone, in clearness of double-stopping, the finished artist was constantly revealed. And there was something more than this, there was a complete assimilation of the spirit of the work, most difficult to acquire in so rhapsodical, improvisational and unconventional a composition. The first movement, which was very long, seemed at times almost a succession of cadenzas. Once in a while, but rarely, there would be a touch of folk-song melody ("tutti") yet, in spite of the constant prominence of the soloist, the concerto is not of "popular" character. Its freedom of thought is too untrammelled.

The adagio does not attain the power of either Grieg or Sinding in similar movements. The orchestra here was almost always of neutral tint or of sombre color. The great beauty of Mme. Powell's work on the G string was the chief effect of this movement.

The Finale still kept the violin to the front, this time supported with a "ground-bass." Here at last a theme, the subordinate subject is wholly given to the orchestra. Mme. Powell had some telling passages in harmonics in this movement, which she gave with noble effect.

Altogether we find this concerto a new departure in its form, one that will appeal to the violinist, since it keeps him constantly in the lime-light. But in its contents it is not so majestic or lofty as the concerto by Sinding, and the constantly rhapsodical character of the solo violin passages begins to pall before the end is reached. Mme. Powell was recalled three times at the close, and her remarkable surety and poetry in a most trying part certainly deserved such a tribute.

We were glad it was decided to put Paine's "Oedipus" prelude on the programme, instead of "The Birds," which was first chosen. This "Oedipus" number is much the finer of the two. In fact, "Oedipus Tyrannus," as a whole, is one of the masterpieces of the American musical repertoire. The Prelude has never had so good a performance as Dr. Muck gave to it. It was graphic in every measure and lofty in the highest degree.

Since Dr. Muck decided to give Debussy's "Le Mer," a second chance, we conscientiously and with unbiased mind tried to find new beauties in it. We failed. There were a few "heave-hos" that suggested sailors pulling at the ropes and a few mighty billows in the finale, but the muted horn bleatings, the oboe cacklings, the disjointed bits of ugliness still presented only such a sea as Coleridge pictures in his "Ancient Mariner," (the "Rotting Sea," with its thousand, thousand slimy things"), and not the beloved, healthy ocean which we revel in and upon. We believe that Shakespeare mean Debussy's ocean when he speaks of taking an arrow against a sea.

The third movement with its explosive and rumblings has now a self-evident pose. The hero is endeavoring to up his boot-heels! We are sorry the busy hates the sea so bitterly and more sorry that he has put this dislike into symphonic form (or formlessness) but we again refer him to Wagner, Mendelssohn and Rubinstein, proof that some composers have and pictured the mighty ocean.

It makes a series of symphonic pictures of sickness. The first movement is "head-ache." The second is "Doubt," picturing moments of dread suspense, whether or not

A DAY OF MUSIC

MAUD POWELL AND SIBELIUS'S NEW CONCERTO

The Violinist Reappears at the Symphony Concerts After Six Years and Gives a Notable Performance of a Notable Piece—The Music-Drama That Sibelius Has Put Into a Concerto—A Forgotten Overture by Grieg—Early Brahms at Miss von Radecki's Chamber Concert—Wilhelm Heinrich's Song Recital

Trans. Apr. 20, 1907

For the first time in six years, Maud Powell, the violinist, reappeared in Boston at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and it was good to hear her warmly welcomed before she began Sibelius's concerto and heartily applauded after she had finished it. Mme. Powell is now and justly the most distinguished American violinist, and her distinction is international as well. Of late years, indeed, the musical capitals of Europe have known her oftener and more intimately than have our own cities, but there and here she has gained and held her position by sheer artistic probity. She has not asked us at home to hear and admire her because an accident of birth happened to make her American. She has not bidden her European audiences listen as to some wonder of the West. She has come to both as a violinist and as nothing else, and she has hidden her personality in her artistry. She has quietly waived aside the indulgences that rise almost spontaneously to meet her sex in every executive act except that of acting; yet she has not gone to the other extreme of a laborious and transparent assumption of masculinity. The listener hears her without thought of sex. She has been Maud Powell, the violinist, and a violinist who has sought not to glorify herself, but to unfold as clearly and to express as fully as lay within her powers the music that she was playing. She has never cultivated amplitude, elasticity and fineness of technique for their own sake, though she has long since attained them. Steadily they have been to her first the foundation, and then the medium, of expression. She has emphasized neither a dazzling brilliance nor a large sonority of tone, though both are now within her powers. She has chosen rather to make her tone the characteristic and the eloquent voice of her music. Behind her playing lie the faculties of intellect that grasp the form and the substance of music and search and adjust its design and proportions. Side by side with them stand the faculties of imagination that discover and feel its moods, emotions and individual accent; while of both intellect and imagination are the fusing and communicating faculties that weld together all these things and impart them to her hearers. She does more: she brings them to life; for the distinctive trait of Mme. Powell's mind, fancy, and artistry is their nervous vitality. It is that at bottom which has set her so often to the discovery and the trial of new concertos and smaller pieces; which has spurred her, as in this very concerto by Sibelius that she played yesterday, to the conquering of strange technical difficulties and intricacies and to the winning of obscure and evasive imaginings; and which in all things has kept her alert, eager, unsatisfied. The crowning touch of genius has not been hers. That, indeed, may fall only from the lap of Fate. But much else that only a full and fine artistry of intellect, imagination and execution and an underlying probability of artistic spirit may achieve, are hers deservedly. Mme. Powell's career has been quiet as the careers of virtuosos go, but its rewards have not been the less stimulating.

Naturally—one almost writes—it was a new concerto that Mme. Powell played, and that here in America she has made her own. Sibelius, the Finnish composer, whose dark, brusque, passionate symphony Dr. Muck made so impressive last winter, wrote it originally some years ago; then revised it until in many respects it was another composition, and gave it to Hallé, the German, for performance in the autumn of 1905. Quickly Mme. Powell discovered it, felt its fascinations, subdued its difficulties, and since last December has played it with one or another American orchestra. By the agreeing testimony of violinists Sibelius's music raises new and strange difficulties and asks new and strange feats. He has actually and surprisingly enlarged the technical possibilities of the violin, or as some choose to put it, complicated and distorted them. Yet as the comparatively inexpert listener, as he heard the music yesterday, took little heed of these prodigies of technique. They seemed only the means to eloquent and imaginative, large or adroit, expression. Therein truly was the surprise and the delight of the piece. The fate of the concerto as an enduring musical form—and especially the fate of the concerto for stringed instruments—is hanging in the balance. It can still be written as a serviceable and agreeable vehicle for the display of varying degrees of virtuosity. It still is written as a part of the whole duty of a composer or as the filling, with what invention and dexterity the writer may summon, of an orthodox musical form. But if the concerto for violin is to keep its place in modern music, it must be made expressive in the modern sense. It must contain the poetry as well as the mathematics of tones. It must yield itself within its established outlines to the modern freedom of imagination.

tion and treatment. A year ago Mr. Marteau played Jaques-Dalcroze's concerto for violin here, and it seemed an effort to gain some of these ends by the richness, variety and suggestion of instrumental coloring, contrasts and combinations. Our own Mr. Strube in his concerto that Mr. Adamowski played this season has sought one face of the same goal by lightness of fancy and handling. Dalcroze's concerto had more cunning contrivance than significance of idea, poetry of mood, or tensility of feeling. Mr. Strube's wanted seriousness. Sibelius's concerto, on the other hand, is almost steadily of grave eloquence. It is charged with emotion that is potent and communicative in all the means—instrumental, melodic, structural or technical—by which it comes to expression. It has individuality and it has poetry. It quickens the mind and it stirs the imagination. It puts the performing violinist to every sort of mettle and bountifully rewards him. From first to last the solo instrument dominates. Yet with all these qualities, and in spite of occasional suggestions of rhapsody or fantasia, the concerto is still a concerto in the established formal sense. Distinctly Sibelius's solution of the problem of the modernized concerto persuades.

Like the symphony of last January, the concerto is abrupt, concise, stern and passionate. Melody it has, and melody that, when the composer wills, can rise in long and poignant curves. But oftener it is like light dimly struggling out of mysterious shadows (as at the very beginning), slowly gaining intensity and flow, laboring into life as it were, and then breaking convulsively as though darkness were again choking it. Time and again, in the first two movements of the concerto, it gleams in the solo instrument against a sombre tonal background like a rift in the clouds in a cold autumn sunset. The rift broadens, brightens and then the clouds shut again. It is a precarious melody that falters even when it sets itself resolutely as it seems in the third movement, only to yield finally, abruptly—to go out in the surrounding darkness. Such melody, gleaming as it does through the whole concerto, touches the imagination with its profound melancholy. It is not the intimate, pensive, wistful melancholy of the newer French composers that is born of fine self-communing, and of a sense of the vanities of passing mortal things. Sibelius's is a sterner, larger, less introspective melancholy—the melancholy of a great and monotonous darkness, of grim waste places, of weather-worn rocks and a northern sea heaving blackly and blindly against them, of bare sweeps of plain under black sweeps of cloud. A melancholy of a wintry Finland that has entered and filled the composer's soul and forced itself to expression. It would be despair were he not of a primal strength of spirit that it cannot stifle. He would escape and the music labors; he struggles, and it turns convulsive; he sets all his forces, as one who goes to battle; he conquers and there is a flash almost of joy. Concerto though Sibelius has written, there is an action in it and a dramatic action as truly as Mr. d'Indy would have us find one in his symphony. The harmonic and the instrumental backgrounds are as the field of combat. There may the listener find a pervading darkness, grimness, even monotony. Across it, oftenest doing battle, go Sibelius's melodic ideas and his development of them, fighting their way tollsomenly even convulsively, beaten down, yet rising again, sustained by a primal vitality, winning moments of triumph that are deep in their joy, though the end be defeat. The concerto may be music of a north bound in rock, and sea, and darkness, and cold. It seems also music of passionate struggle through the sternness and the grimness of life for the brief joy of it. And surely it is music that has made a concerto eloquent with emotions and poignant of mood as are few concertos, old or new. Mme. Powell played it as thought she were its voice.

One other new composition stood up on the programme, and it, too, was of the north, but the little and impulsive Grieg, not the big and resolute Sibelius, and the norths are as far apart as their temperaments. In his early days Grieg wrote a song, "Autumn Storm." In the sixties, based an overture, "In Autumn," upon his first music for orchestra. Later, when his command of instrumental resources was ampler, he rescored it. Grieg's orchestral music is scanty, and somehow this particular overture has been overlooked all the two thousand and odd Symphonies concerts. It remained for Dr. Muck to discover it and to play it, but it ought not to have been played side by side with Sibelius's concerto. For Grieg would thrust his music in its turn with an insistent melancholy, and would give its voice an insistent wildness. But his melancholy is only a pensive autumnal mood, of the woods on a gray day, beside the deep and seated blackness of Sibelius's and the wildness of his melody is thin beside the Finn's passionately battling song. Grieg has wrought skilfully no more than an imaginative little overture of the moods and atmosphere of a Northern autumn. Sibelius has almost turned a concerto into a music-drama of northern passion. And then Professor Paine's prelude to Sophocles's "Oedipus the King," for honor to the composer's memory, at the anniversary of his death; and for the sheerest contrast to all that had gone before Debussy's orchestral sketches of "The Sea." They, however, shall make matter for Monday.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 22D CONCERT

Mme. Maud Powell Executes
Superb Violin Concerto
by Sibelius.

AN OLD GRIEG OVERTURE HEARD FOR FIRST TIME

Tribute to Prof. John K. Paine in Overture to Oedipus Tyrannus.

Herald Apr. 21, 1917

BY PHILIP HALE

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "In Autumn".....Grieg
Concerto in D minor for violin.....Sibelius
Overture to "Oedipus Tyrannus".....Paine
Symphony Sketches, "the Sea".....Debussy.

Grieg's overture and the violin concerto were played here for the first time. Debussy's "Sea" sketches were played for the second time this season by request.

Prof. John K. Paine died a year ago on the 25th of this month. It was meet and fitting that tribute should be paid his memory. The overture to "The Birds" of Aristophanes was first announced, but the overture to the tragedy of Sophocles was thought to be more appropriate to the occasion, and it was substituted; not, however, till the programme book had been made up by the printer. The hurried substitution accounts for the inadequacy of the notes on Prof. Paine's Sophoclean overture.

Thirty years ago Mr. Thomas Hardy declared that haggard Egdon Heath appealed to "a subtler and scarcer instinct, to a more recently learned emotion, than that which responds to the sort of beauty called charming." He questioned whether the exclusive reign of orthodox beauty was not approaching its last quarter. "The new Vale of Tempe may be a gaunt waste in Thule; human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a somberness distasteful to our race when it was young."

The violin concerto of Sibelius and in fact the symphonies of this composer recall this saying of Hardy. The somberness of this Finn is not an affectation; it is not worn as a costume for a masquerade; it is constitutional; it is the color of his natural speech. It is not the expression of a peevish pessimist; it is broad and deep and elemental. There is something titanic about it. It is as though the composer were still under the spell of the old northern mythology. There is the thought of the rhapsodic bard; there is the suggestion of the Saga. Look at the face of this composer. Mark the firmness, the determination, the grimness of the expression. Would you expect genteel phrases, sugared sensuousness, irresistible appeals to palpitating ladies from such a man?

The first movement is as a Bardic improvisation. It is in a sense emotional, yet its emotional effect on an audience will be slight until the audience is accustomed to this strange language. The second movement is one of grand and constant beauty. The long melody is as the large utterance of an early goddess. It is shot through with emotion of the noblest kind. This mood is established at once and it is not changed or lessened. There is no reminder of composer or interpreter.

The music is not laboriously invented, it did not come to Sibelius by accident as he was asking for a theme. The finale is not a perfunctorily brilliant ending written because no concerto should be without a finale. It has marked character, a character consistent with what has gone before. In the aggressive lightness of the opening measures there is the playfulness of a cave man, rude exultation at the sight of more friendly nature after long hibernation.

No mere virtuoso greedy for popular favor would choose this concerto for personal display. Mme. Powell has never been in the habit of setting applause-traps. I know of no violinist now before the public who is better entitled to respect and admiration. In whatever she has undertaken in the course of her long and honorable career, she has been true to herself and to art in its highest form. No merchant ever trafficked in her heart. To speak of her mechanism at this late day would be an impertinence, for her abilities have long been recognized by two continents.

The greater the task to which she devotes herself, the more quickly do her skill, her brains, her soul respond. It is enough to say that her performance of this exceedingly difficult concerto was worthy, both in mechanism and in aesthetic and emotional quality, of the high ideal which she has had steadily before her.

The concerto is not a concerto in the ordinary meaning of the term; it is rather a symphonic poem with a violin obbligato.

The task appointed for conductor and orchestra is also one of extreme difficulty, yet the ensemble performance was of such a nature that the composer was glorified and the occasion made memorable.

Grieg's overture, composed over 40 years ago, and long afterward robed in a fresh orchestral dress, is based on his song, "Autumn Storms," and a Norwegian harvest tune. There are charming bits in it, especially in episodic sections, and in orchestral detail. There is youthful fancy in it; there is youthful enthusiasm; there is possibly here and there a stroke of genius; but as a whole the overture seems to be made in a small way, and the greater Grieg is in the smaller pieces.

Prof. Paine's overture with its classic spirit was placed effectively between the concerto and the sketches of the extraordinary, unique Debussy. It was a good thing to hear these sketches again. The second was even more delightfully fantastical than at the first hearing and new and rare beauties were disclosed in the third. Whether this music portrays phases of the sea depends on how much of the ocean is in each hearer. To the majority of New Yorkers the sea is Coney Island.

To certain highly estimable Bostonians there is no sea except off Nahant. To those who understand the meaning of the saying, "The ever young and ever venerable sea; the sea, because there is no other name for it," the music of Debussy is full of charm and fascination. The true force and beauty of such music is in the hearer. We must never forget the line of Walt Whitman: "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments." There are some to whom instruments appeal in vain unless they are used in conventional, orthodox manner, in a way that is approved by both the selectmen and Mrs. Grundy.

DEBUSSY'S SEA SKETCHES AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Magic of the Music—Haendel's "Samson" as the People's Choral Union Revived It—An Oratorio That Keeps Tragic Vitality—Mr. Paur as a Conductor Turned Pianist—Hammerstein's Opera Ends Its Season—"The Three of Us" to Be Acted Here Next Month—Sothorn and Marlowe in London—Other News of the Day

Trans. — Apr. 22, 1907

Lie upon a warm rock by the sea on a summer day of passing cloud, glowing sunshine and fitful winds. Lie in solitude and stillness with half-closed eyes and half-shut ears, with dreaming fancy taking what swift path or slow meandering it will. Watch and listen and dream, and the outspread waters, as the sun glints them, as the clouds touch them with their shadows, as the wind stirs or seems to still them, as the waves play with each other, will take fantastic and changeable shape and color, and the sea become as a sea of iridescent or of darkling vision. And from it rise as fantastic and changeable voices, of ripple prattling to ripple, or wave calling to wave, of wind speaking to itself and to the waters, of voices that come and go and swell and still. Do these things, and if there is ever so little imagination and poetry watching and listening, the sea, the sky, the air, the light will seem now and again to curve and rise in some great unison and then to fall away in threads of sunshine and shadow, wave and wind. And the voices will be as some mounting chorus or as some phantoms of sound. Happen also to be a composer with such susceptibility to poetic impressions, such capacity of poetic expression and such ability to bend musical structure and orchestral resource to the very lines and colors of these visions and to the very sound of these voices as are in Debussy; will to fashion them into tones with endless patience and fineness; then give them to an orchestra of such understandingly and sympathetically tempered spirit as was ours on Saturday; and the resulting pleasure for them that hear will be as rare and keen, of poetry and music both, as transporting in its beauty, as enthralling in its fine power, as was that of "The Sea" in its repetition at the Symphony concert.

One thing more—dismiss all notions of the way in which music has been written, and of the way, consequently, in which fond pedagogues imagine that it should be written. Rejoice, rather, that a composer has come who can make it more graphic of dreams and visions and of the sights that the eye sees and of the voices that the ear hears in them than it has ever been before. Care not so much as the smallest aesthetic penny that someone has called this music "tonal dust" so long as the dust is iridescent with the beauty of those visions. Care as little whether the voices are strange sounds, for sooner or later—and perhaps that is the reason of Dr. Muck's repetitions and pursuit of passionate perfection of performance with "The Sea"—those sounds suddenly become as the voices heard in that nowhere of fantasy. Let us say in cold fact that these three orchestral sketches have more form and body, as the orthodox notion of such things goes, than have Debussy's "Nocturnes" or his "Afternoon of a Faun." The diligent, if they will, may trace in the music thematic "workings-out," ordered climax and all the rest that delight their dry minds and hearts. They may study at their leisure minute details of harmonic or instrumental texture. The incorrigibly robust may find pleasure if they will in passages of more vigorous and palpable music than Debussy has written hitherto for orchestra. Yet these are the external, the obvious things of "The Sea" and Debussy. It is easy to suspect, has achieved them only because they happened to suit his free purpose.

Not in them dwells the magic of the music. They are merely the means to it like the mirrors or the caldrons of the mediæval sorcerers. The magic of the music is the magic of tones that visualize to the fancy such a dream of the sea as may befall a happy few when they watch and listen and muse and stir until their hearts are full of the fancies that the vision has bred, and they look into them and write for us of narrower sight and fainter ear. The magic of the sea as light plays upon it, as clouds traverse it, as it sports with itself, as voices call from it and call to it, as it dwells with its brother, the wind, are in the music. It is music that at moments almost chokes with the suffusion of its many colored beauty and that at others almost pierces with the fineness of its call, music that winds and spreads in arabesques that are as filaments, bright or gray, of light, air and water, and that gives them as by enchantment faint, far, lonely voices; music that blends and fuses all these sights and sounds into a swelling unison that drops into the stillness of an awakened dream. Who but Debussy has wrought these things of the sea? Who but him even in our rich world of music, can?

H. T. P.

THE CONCERTS OF NEXT WEEK

Trans. — Apr. 13, 07

Sibelius's New Violin Concerto, with Maud Powell, and a Forgotten Overture by Grieg, at the Next Symphony Concerts—"The Children's Crusade" in Mr. Lang's Honor—Miss Radecki and Mr. Heinrich Reappear—Mr. Paur as a Pianist

Mme. Maud Powell, the ablest of American violinists, who, rather strangely, has not been heard in Boston for some years, reappears at the twenty-second pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. She plays, for the first times here, a new concerto by Jan Sibelius, whose symphony in E minor so interested and stirred the audiences that heard it here when Dr. Muck played it last January. In America, Mme. Powell has made the concerto her own, and when she played it with the Philharmonic Society in New York and the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, earlier in the season, both those who liked and those who disliked it agreed that it was unusual and impressive music. Mrs. Newmarch says of it in her little monograph on Sibelius from which we quoted liberally when his symphony was first performed: "With the advance of years, Sibelius has shown an increasing respect for the requirements of conventional form, without, however, becoming conventional in the contemptible sense of the word. The sign of this reaction has been the revision of many of his early pieces. The violin concerto (op. 47) is a case in point. We cannot judge it by comparison with its original conception, but the Finnish critics consider it to be far more acceptable in its revised form. Sibelius's violin concerto, like that of Tchaikovsky, has been pronounced 'impossibly difficult,' but it has not had to wait so long for its interpreter as the Russian concerto waited for a Brodsky. Its remarkable originality, and even the new technical difficulties which it presents, will commend this music to virtuosos in search of fresh laurels. The beauty and depth of this music are so well worth revelation that the executant will be more than compensated for the labor and long study it exacts." Mme. Powell seems to have found those laurels.

The other new piece of the programme is forty years old and more; and, though it was written by so noted a composer as Grieg, and is one of his few compositions for orchestra, it has not hitherto been played in Boston. It is his overture, "In Autumn," written, according to Mr. H. T. Finck in his life of Grieg, "at Rome in 1865, and based on the realistic and very effective song, 'Autumn Storms,' which was composed earlier in the same year in Denmark. It has been stated that the overture was rewritten two decades later, but this is an error; only the orchestration was altered. The orchestra naturally provides more powerful means than the piano and voice for painting the trees stripped of their leaves by the storm winds, as well as for singing the ensuing longings for spring; and the composer has made good use of his opportunities showing himself a master of the art of climax. The circumstance that the first phrase of the introduction (which often recurs in the allegro) is amusingly like the beginning of 'Yankee Doodle' in a minor mode, is a little disturbing to that seriousness with which large music by a sterling composer ought to be approached; but it does not preclude admiration for the original and ingenious orchestral effects which fill the overture. The spirit of the piece is unmistakably Norse, and its humor is mixed with the melancholy of the north country." The remaining numbers of the concert are repetitions:—of the late Professor Paine's brilliant and spontaneous prelude to "The Birds" of Aristophanes, first played at the Symphony concerts last season; and of the three "orchestral sketches" by Debussy, "The Sea," performed for the first times in America two months ago by Dr. Muck, and sorely puzzling to most of those that heard them.

Mr. Lang appears for the last time as the conductor of the Cecilia at the concert that the society is giving in his honor on Wednesday evening at eight, in Symphony Hall, and elsewhere in this paper is an account of his long, active, and generally remarkable career as an executive musician for will be sung by the same forces that performed it for the first time here in February, viz.: Mrs. Cabot Morse, Mrs. Edith Chapman Gould, Mrs. Clara Jackson, Miss Josephine Knight, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Miss Adelaide Griggs, Mr. Frank Ormsby, Mr. L. B. Merrill, and Mr. Earl Cartwright for solo singers; the adult choir of the Cecilia; a chorus of children from the schools of Somerville; and a band of sixty men from the Symphony Orchestra. Of Pierné's music, and of the episode, half of history and half of mediæval legend that it pictures poetically and pathetically much has already been written in the Transcript. The music, the charity to be benefited, and just honor to Mr. Lang at the close of his career alike commend the concert.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 27, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

VICTOR BENDIX.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 30. (MS.)

- I. Allegro animato.
 - II. Intermezzo: molto moderato.
 - III. Adagio non troppo.
 - IV. Finale: Allegro animato.
- (First performance.)
-

CHABRIER.

RHAPSODY for ORCHESTRA, "España."

SMETANA.

OVERTURE to the opera, "The Sold Bride."

Symphony Concert.

Dr Karl Muck offered an entertaining novelty to the Symphony orchestra patrons at the 23d concert of the season last evening, in the Victor Bendix symphony in D minor, No. 4. Not only was this composition given for the first time in Boston, but it is the most recent work of the composer, having been written last year. It has many elements of appeal to a Symphony audience, especially toward the close of the season, when one's spirits instinctively crave the lighter if not so substantial musical diet. The works of this composer are not very familiar to Bostonians, having been rarely played, although his brother, Otto Bendix, was for many years a member of the Boston colony of teachers of music. It is probable that more opportunities to hear the Bendix productions will be given, since Dr Muck is an admirer and a worthy interpreter of the music of the Danish conductor.

In the symphony played last evening the art of the composer is distinctly admirable in leading up to a climax, for the concluding movement is a tremendously forceful development of the preceding three. Only in the final movement does the composer utilize the full orchestra for his best effects, and therein he compels the outburst of enthusiasm which has been so steadily gathering.

From the opening bars of the first movement, allegro animato, the themes are apparent in their simplicity. Though rather delicately developed by the strings the composer reveals ingenuity of instrumentation in place of the strength of purpose in building about his themes. There is much of graceful writing in the intermezzo in the leading parts given to the flute and oboe, and the subordination of the strings in these movements leaves instead of lack of satisfaction just a suggestion of failure to be complete.

But the beauty of this symphony lays materially in the third and final movements. The predominance of the English horn in opening the third movement presages its breadth and freedom, and as the melody is taken up and developed by the violins, later augmented by flutes and clarinets, the thought of the composer is expressed with an almost bewildering facility of instrumentation. Hardly has this been appreciated when there comes a phrase for horn, then clarinet, then oboe with string accompaniment which brings the movement to a close with the first display of forceful expression of the composition.

In the last movement are fervid fortissimo passages with a particularly passionate theme for the violins, while the coda written in D major is so spirited that the symphony is ended with a rare volume of harmony.

Under Dr Muck's direction the Bendix symphony received more than favorable interpretation, in fact, appreciation of the earlier movements may be said to have been largely due to the orchestra.

The other two numbers on the program were the "Espana" rhapsody by Chabrier, with its manipulation of the typical dance music of Spain, and Smetana's rarely heard overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride." The audience was in a mood for the Chabrier work, for Dr Muck found the most enthusiastic response to this number.

The season will close with this week's rehearsal and concert at which the following program will be played: Volkmann's overture to "Richard III," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Battle of the Huns," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Globe Apr 28 1907

Chabrier's "Espana" Almost Breaks Rule and Custom at the Symphony Concert—A Gorgeous Splotch of Instrumental Color and Rhythm—A New Symphony from the North—Mr. Heinrich's Concert of MacDowell's Music

Trans

Apr. 27. 1907

Not within memory at the Symphony Concerts has a piece come so near to immediate repetition as did Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody yesterday afternoon. It is nearly ten years since Mr. Paur first put it on one of his programmes and then, if recollection runs rightly, it was nearly stifled by such an overwhelming neighbor as Strauss's "Zarathustra." In all the intervening time, Mr. Gericke, who may have disliked its frank flamboyancy, did not repeat it, and Dr. Muck apparently was rediscovering the music to his hearers. It fascinated and it stirred them until there was a thrill, almost, in the responsive listening. The hot glow of the music was even in the applause and that, too, of an afternoon audience. Once, twice, three times the conductor bowed his appreciation and then he called the orchestra to its feet. Still the applause continued little abating. Dr. Muck and his men made as if to continue with Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," and the clapping quickly swelled and sharpened. Clearly the audience wished to hear the rhapsody again. As clearly Dr. Muck hesitated whether to repeat it. All concerned were nearer to the forbidden "encore" than they may ever have been before at a Symphony Concert. But custom and discipline prevailed. Dr. Muck finally turned resolutely to "The Bartered Bride," and the audience made the best of its disappointment. Perhaps, for once, especially when there was no singer or virtuoso in question, the established rule might have been more honored in the breach than in the observation. After all, a chief purpose of the Symphony concerts is to give pleasure to the audience, and such repetitions, especially of unfamiliar and quickly-liked music have been frequent in even the august concert-rooms of Germany.

And "Espana" deserved the applause and even the repetition. There are few such gorgeous splashes of instrumental color and few such thrumming and titillating dances of rhythm in the whole range of modern orchestral rhapsody. Chabrier flings his music on the pages of his score as the best of the impressionist painters, in like flashes of inspiration, fling their color and light upon their canvas. Where they use paint, and palette-knives, he uses the varied timbres of the instruments of the orchestra and the sharp accents of new and strange harmonies. As they seek to make their pictures vibrant with strong lights and shadows, so he would make his music vibrant with the dance of the rhythms. Give an impressionist painter, like Monet in his pictures of the Riviera, the glow of the sun on cliff and sea and sand, and forthwith he dazzles eyes and imagination with the glorified flame of it. Give Chabrier his memories of Spain and of the melodies and the rhythms of the Jota and the Malaguena, as he saw them danced in the taverns of the byways, and he dazzles the ear with the glorified tonal flame of the music.

"Espana" is extravagant music—but should there not be extravagance in every rhapsody. It is brutal music as the over-nice may say, but who that has seen such dances in the purlieus of a Spanish city even today has not felt a brutal thrum in their insistent rhythms? Sensuous music it must be, else it would not be the Spain of the dances. It has its bare spots, but they pass so quickly. It has its moments when Chabrier seems to torture his means, but they do gain his ends. Never, seemingly, was music more the fruit of a single swift and fiery inspiration translating itself into as swift and fiery tones. It flames with instrumental coloring, bites with harmonic accent, and quivers with rhythms intertwined, over and underlaid, but vibrant always. There is no thought of form, for heat has melted and welded outline into the glow of the whole. The music is a riot of the power of sound, yet an ordered one, and a riot that has the very breath and color of the Spain that romantic imaginations deservy and hot temperaments feel. The painters have painted it. The novelists have toiled over it. Chabrier in one vivifying stroke has flung it into tones.

The wonted brightness of Smetana's familiar overture seemed dull beside these gauds of orchestral color, and its piquancies tame beside such bite and tang. Fortunate, indeed, was Victor Bendix's new symphony, and in its first performance in any concert, to precede and not to follow Chabrier's rhapsody. Mr. Bendix dwells in Copenhagen and works there at teaching, conducting, and composing. He comes of a family of musical attainments; he has cultivated these many years the instincts and aptitudes that he inherited. He has composed diligently, and in his own Scandinavia, and sometimes in the neighboring Germany his music has come to occasional hearing. The symphony of yesterday is indeed his fourth, and as new symphonies come and go, it reasonably justified its performance. It is by no means the music of a routine talent busy with routine work, and as little is it music of high invention and potent imagination. Mr. Bendix works freely, and with a measure of individuality, in established forms. He is capable of suggestive harmonies and he is sensitive to instrumental coloring and accent. He courts oftenest a robust, bold musical speech, large-voiced, as of the North. His opening allegro and his finale march. There are vitality, propulsive power and an iterated—sometimes a too-much iterated—dramatic force in them. In the slow movements of the intermezzo and the adagio—for the symphony has no scherzo—he is less interesting. There is more imagination in the development than in the invention of his melodies, and he pursues his sober elegiac moods to lengths that do not always rise in proportionate appeal. The commanding quality of the symphony is its largeness of plan, mood, voice. At least these composers of the North, of whom Dr. Muck is so fond, do not grope and finicke. Their music has robustness and vitality. It is the music of men who are still fresh to their art and fresh to their emotions.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 23D CONCERT

New Composition by Victor Bendix, a Dane, Is Performed by Orchestra.

Herald Apr. 28, 1907
BY PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Bendix
"España," rhapsody for orchestra.....Chabrier
Overture to "The Sold Bride".....Smetana

The performance of the Symphony by Bendix was the first. The symphony has not yet been published.

Victor Bendix, a younger brother of Otto Bendix, who was for some years well known in Boston as a pianist, was born in Copenhagen nearly 56 years ago. He is a conductor and a pianist. His fourth symphony was composed last year.

It is a work that appeals more to the eye than to the ear. If you look over the score, you see contrapuntal problems deftly solved, you recognize the ability of a man who is versed in theory and has routine experience. When you hear the music played, you become aware that the solution of the problems was often a matter of little importance or that the result was not effectively stated.

Of the four movements the finale is the most interesting, as far as impressions on the nerves are concerned, although the third movement has occasionally a placid beauty; not beauty of a high degree, not beauty of marked originality; it is mild and contemplative. The finale, however, has a certain force that commands respect.

Needless Complexity.

The first movement suffers from needless and harassing complexity in the expression of simple and conventional thought. The intermezzo has a chief theme which has somewhat the character of a folk tune. Whether the theme be wholly original or suggested by a song of the people, it is peculiarly melancholy, and the melancholy is not of the pleasing, not of the tragic sort; it is rather a long drawn out complaint.

The symphony is heavily scored. There are few agreeable or striking contrasts of orchestral timbres; there is little sense of orchestral color. The work as a whole is monotonous in color, and the drab is thickly applied. The composer seems disinclined to allow any of the players moments for rest and recreation. There are the instruments; why should they not be constantly in service? At the beginning of the intermezzo there is an endeavor to gain effects by discretion in the choice of instruments. The endeavor is at first successful, and unusual harmonization aids in producing a peculiar, I might say a depressing color.

Labor Rather Than Inspiration.

The symphony is an honest work. It is a work of labor rather than of inspiration. There are many notes in it, for Bendix has not the gift of reticence; they often jostle each other, and a melodic line will be almost obscured by injudicious instrumentation or by the harmonies that should throw it into bold relief.

As a whole, the symphony, like many other honest and respectable things and persons, is tiresome. Dr. Muck did everything in his power to make it effective, but the music itself has little true emotional quality.

One can gain a vivid idea of Spain by reading the books of George Borrow and Richard Ford and by hearing Chabrier's "España." The stay-at-home may see the fairer country. Would that this superbly brilliant and audacious rhapsody were more familiar! I hear that there are some who think it "hardly worthy" of a place on a "symphony programme."

Technical Skill.

There would be no use in arguing the question. Yet it might surprise these men and women, if they were to learn that there is more technical skill displayed in the composition of "España" than in the great majority of solid and estimable pieces which have been written during the last 50 years, symphonies, symphonic poems, preludes and fugues, symphonic prologues and the like. Think, too, of Chabrier's harmonies, rhythms and dazzling orchestra.

Furthermore, there is the marvelous imagination of the man displayed here as in his "Gwendoline" music. The death of Bizet is acknowledged to be a most severe loss to musical France. The death of Chabrier—and he was dead as to his mind before his body released the unfortunate soul—was perhaps even a greater loss.

The performance of "España" was brilliant, irresistible, but not always flawless in the matter of precision. The audience was moved to genuine enthusiasm.

Smetana's ever delightful overture was taken at an appropriately lively pace, one that, like the rhapsody, tested the virtuosity of the orchestra.

Whether it be wise to introduce more than one important novelty in a concert is a question. It seems injudicious. A new work is perhaps more easily judged, its merits recognized, its faults disclosed, when the attention is not forced again on other music that is unfamiliar.

When Dr. Muck came here he was unacquainted with the history of Symphony concerts in this city, and the library of the orchestra. He had not been in the habit of arranging programmes for a series of 24 concerts in one season. It was natural that he should endeavor to ascertain in a measure the tastes of the symphony audience.

A programme-maker will never satisfy everybody. He is lucky if he will satisfy six in every ten hearers.

Dr. Muck has been thoroughly consistent in this: that the public should become acquainted with important modern works irrespective of his own likes and dislikes. He is not a Regerite, yet he produced the composer's serenade. Much of Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica" is repugnant to him, yet he was eloquent in the interpretation of it.

Fewer Soloists.

The number of soloists in the Symphony concerts was smaller than usual. The singers were Mmes. Melba, Fremstad, Child. The violinists were Mme. Powell, Messrs. Adamowski, Hess, Petschnikoff. Mr. Wranke, the cellist, appeared and Mr. Ferir played the viola solo in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." The pianists were Mmes. Goodson, Samaroff, Szumowska and Messrs. Gabrilowitsch, Neitzel, Rosenthal.

The list might be made still smaller to advantage. Suppose that the concert master fiddles ex-officio. Why should it be the custom for other members of the orchestra to play annually? If a violinist is chosen, why should not a flutist, or an oboist, or even a trombone be a soloist?

An ideal symphony concert is without a soloist, unless that soloist play in ensemble, as the pianist in d'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." Otherwise the individual assumes undue prominence, the programme is not balanced and effective, the musical continuity is disturbed or broken.

Unfortunately soloists are needed to secure subscriptions, for we have not reached the ideal state when a composition is more eagerly anticipated than a virtuoso. Twelve soloists a season should be enough, provided they be of the first rank.

Sundry Comments.

There has been talk of Mr. Frank Kneisel as leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Should he become Mr. Scheel's successor, the Kneisel quartet would be only a glorious tradition. The Kneisel concerts in Boston have deepened the sense of loss occasioned by the departure of the members from this city. If the club should come to an end in consequence of Mr. Kneisel becoming an orchestral conductor, Boston would have to content itself with the concerts of the Hoffmann quartet and the Longy Club.

It is true that the receipts of the Kneisel concerts in Boston were less than in the several preceding years and that the character of the audience has changed. The Kneisels suffered as other clubs and as visitors have suffered from the strange apathy of the public that has been supposed musical. It is no longer "the thing" for a young woman in society to attend recitals and chamber concerts when they take place in public halls. Private musicales and concerts given in the halls of hotels—these concerts are of a somewhat exclusive nature and the prices of admission are high—satisfy the musical longing of many. Then there are musical clubs of a private nature with entertainments which resemble "society functions" and should be discussed by the "society editors."

In consequence of all this, an unenlightened patronage is often given to mediocrity, shrinking or pretentious, and true artists and music itself are shabbily treated or wholly neglected by those who prate and chatter about their devotion to the art.

THE LAST CONCERTS OF THE YEAR

The Symphony Orchestra Ends the Season with Three Concerts Next Week—Minor Announcements

Trans. — Apr. 27, 1907
Earlier than in any other city in America, the Symphony Orchestra begins the musical season in Boston at the middle of October, and rarely do other concerts come before November. Now, a week later than the season runs elsewhere, and after other concerts are well behind us, it will end our musical year. Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening it gives its last pair of concerts for the current season with a programme of familiar pieces—Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Liszt's tone-poem, "The Battle of the Huns," with the climax of its battle hymn; and Volkmann's overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III.," which may tax all Dr. Muck's power of reanimation. Beethoven's symphony tempts expectation that the conductor may make his playing of it as stirring as was that of Brahms's first symphony or of Beethoven's seventh at past concerts. With it he takes leave of his public here until next autumn.

Tomorrow evening, besides, at eight o'clock, in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck and the orchestra give the second concert of the year for the profit of the Pension Fund of the men when the years or chance disablement take them from their work. Three overtures, four preludes and one orchestral fragment, all from Wagner's operas, make the programme. Dr. Muck has arranged them in chronological order—the overture to "Rienzi," the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the overture to "Tannhäuser," the prelude to "Lohengrin," the prelude to "Tristan," the prelude to "The Mastersingers," Siegfried's apotheosis from "Götterdämmerung" and the prelude to "Parsifal." It is, indeed, a repetition of the programme of the earlier concert for the Pension Fund last December when Dr. Muck's audience first discovered his powers as a conductor of Wagner's music. The stir that the concert made among those who heard it and in widening circles since has amply justified, as we tried to explain in this column on Thursday, a repetition.

On Thursday evening, likewise, the Symphony Orchestra gives the last concert of its series at Cambridge with the assistance of Miss Olga von Radecki, the pianist, who has lately reestablished herself here. She will take the piano in Arenski's concerto in F minor. The purely orchestral numbers of the programme are Weber's overture to his opera, "Euryanthe," and Brahms's first symphony—Dr. Muck's masterpiece of the year in his performances of the classics.

Naturally Dr. Muck anticipated the demand for a repetition of Chabrier's "Espana" at the Symphony concert on Saturday, and though it was even more insistent than it had been on Friday, he was quietly resolute and swung his men into the first measures of the overture to "The Bartered Bride," while the applause was still little abated. If we could not hear "Espana" a second time, at least there is more of Chabrier's music that we can hear and that has been heard only occasionally, if at all, at the Symphony concerts. There is the overture to his opera, "Gwendoline," for example, that Mr. Paur played on occasion; rhapsodic dances from his operettas, and Mottl's sympathetic scoring for orchestra of his piano piece, the "Bourrée Fantasque." In all this music, moreover, even in the operettas, his instrumental coloring is almost as glowing, his command of rhythms as varied, vivacious and irresistible, the sense of sensuous power and sensuous fire in the music as sweeping and keen as it is in the gorgeous "Espana." Small as Chabrier's work is in mere bulk of pages, short and clouded, desultory and interrupted as his working life was, his music is almost unique in its flaming command of instrumental timbres and in the passion of its rhythm. As the power of melody is to many an Italian composer, so was the power of rhythm to Chabrier. As weight of thought and eloquence of design gives much German music its life, so the eloquence of orchestral timbres animates Chabrier's. In him, besides, was a heat of imagination that fused all his means to the purpose that was burning in him and that he would burn into his music and through it into his hearers. It is easy to write of Czech fire in Smetana's music, but it seemed flickering in the prelude to "The Bartered Bride" beside the flame of Chabrier's rhapsody. The Bendix of the new symphony, with all his vigor of voice and manner, was cold beside either. The three composers and their music made indeed a little triptych of racial and individual temperaments—the Latin fire, expansiveness and shrillness of Chabrier, the Northern cold, roughness and reserve of Bendix, and the fitful intensities—of the South in their brightness and of the North in their vigor—of the Bohemian Smetana.

Returning as a practiced and ripened violinist to the city in which he first appeared twelve years ago as a prodigy, Arthur Hartmann gave most pleasure in his recital at Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon by the quality of his tone. It had in more or less degree—and usually more than less—nearly every quality that the tone of a violinist should have. It was just in intonation; it was undulating in its flow; it was supple to whatever the technique or the feeling of Mr. Hartmann asked of it; it had warmth, vibrancy, transparency, a sufficient largeness, and at moments a very delicate fineness. It had beauty and purity; it was unfettered in either its depths or its brilliances. It was the tone of a virtuoso who understands and respects his instrument and who summons to its peculiar voice. It was equally the tone of a musician with understanding and feeling for the voice of instrumental song, for the curve of a melodic line, for the graces of figure and ornament, and for the rounded and significant phrase. Mr. Hartmann's tone and playing were, besides, those of a musician of warm, sensitive, discriminating and imparting temperament. His playing of Bach's concerto in E Major had a quiet continence and justness of comprehension that nowhere forced the music and nowhere stiffened it. Mr. Hartmann kept it music of arabesques sufficient in their own contrasting life and beauty. On the other hand his warmth of feeling and his response to the romantic quality of modern music was clear in his playing of shorter pieces by Goldmark and Henriques. Yet in them he did not force the emotional quality to the blurring of the music. Again in Hubay's "Zephyr" and in his own transcription of a song of MacDowell's he was capable of lightness of fancy and grace of light execution, while Hungarian dances proved his sensitiveness to rhythm and to rhapsody. In all these things his technical resources were as unobtrusive, obedient and adroit servants. For once by every sign a prodigy had ripened into a musician as well as a virtuoso. Apr 9. H. T. P.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Apr 9.

Victor Bendix. Symphony No. 4, D minor.
Chabrier. "Espana." Rhapsody for Orchestra.
Smetana. Overture. "The Sold Bride."

We are getting along bravely without soloists at most of our symphony concerts, and we thank Dr. Muck for impressing this lesson upon the public. We cannot so unreservedly praise his choice of new symphonies, however, taking Mr. Bendix's as an example. As Bendix was a pupil of Gade (whom the irreverent called "Mrs. Mendelssohn"), it was to be expected that he would not be very heterodox in form. Nor did he go quite as far as Richard Strauss in the amplitude of his orchestral forces. He has scored the work about as heavily as Beethoven did his ninth symphony,—and he has made it about as long. Unfortunately, however, he has not as much to say as Beethoven had.

The first movement opens promisingly with a rugged chief theme in which trumpets and kettle-drums play an important part. There is a good tributary passage which ends with an impressive diminuendo and ushers in the subordinate theme. Here matters begin to fall off in interest. This subordinate subject is not either striking or well-contrasted with what has preceded. One seeks in vain for the lyric character which should relieve both the masculine style of the chief theme and the intellectual character of the development. There were the usual modern complexities of rhythm, skilfully made and skilfully played.

There was no scherzo in this work, which remained either gloomy or warlike throughout. The intermezzo, which came second and took the place of the scherzo, was of a melancholy and semi-pastoral character.

It gave many opportunities to the woodwind instruments which were taken full advantage of. There was much figure treatment, until one felt like charging Bendix, as Falstaff charged Prince Henry,—“Oh, thou hast damnable iteration!”

Matters grew somewhat better in the last two movements. There was much excellent work for the French horn to do in the adagio and it was excellently played. But here again there was an excess of thematic development. It seemed as if Mr. Bendix were aspiring to become a Danish D'Indy in what Wagner would have called "ciphering with notes." It was all quite as logical as if one were doing a sum in arithmetic, and about as interesting as if the sum were worked out in 10 different ways.

The finale seemed to be the best movement. It was more martial than any other part of the symphony and its march-like theme, its fugal touches, its antiphonal effects for horn and trumpet and its earnestly worked-up climax made a good impression.

But Czerny's velocity studies, or even Schmitt's finger exercises, would have seemed fairly romantic after some portions of the symphony, and it was followed by one of the most popular of selections. Small wonder therefore that Chabrier's Spanish omelette was found savory. It was a work in which the imagination could not go astray.

We have heard of auditors who managed to weave romantic and beautiful sea-dreams out of Debussy's muted horns, oboe shrieks and unresolved dissonances, which is about as difficult as to imagine a snow-storm on seeing a canvas covered with green paint; in this work no such mental gymnastics were necessary, for the jota and the fandango stood out until one could almost smell garlic. The work reminded of Bizet's style in its frank abandon, its hearty animal spirits. Chabrier uses his orchestra as if it were a great guitar. By the use of harps combined with pizzicato string effects, the effect of the bandurria (the great guitar of Spain) is attained in a magnified degree. There are other audacious effects in the color scheme of Chabrier, rapid bassoon work and the most blaring of trombone and tuba phrases, and the entire score is ingeniously made.

"Vulgar?" Yes, but only as some phases of national music ought to be. To refine this picture would be to spoil it, and Dr. Muck had the wisdom to see this and give it with an abandon that was glorious. He spiced the dish until all the pepper was used up. The orchestra played with an "elan" that was marvellous.

Public applause is not a test of true merit. Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," or Wagner's "Master-Singers" prelude, have never been applauded as this orchestral sketch was on this occasion. But, while we cannot quite join in the frenzied delight of the audience, we can still pay honest tribute to a work that is entirely successful in its school. Chabrier and Bizet would both have scorned the modern French "cerebral music."

Smetana's "Sold Bride" must have felt badly sold, poor young lady, to have been forced to march in the train of these Spanish gypsies. But she did not march, she ran! for Dr. Muck took the pace quicker than we have ever had it. Even that catchy "Fugue of Imitation," which begins the overture, was taken furiously fast. Yet it was effective and clear and the work ended a remarkable concert in a sprightly manner. Louis C. Elson.

Amme.

E to "Richard III."

IC POEM. "Battle of the Huns."

Y No. 3, in E flat major. "Eroica."

rio.
re: Adagio assai.
gro vivace: Trio.
ro molto.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

THE CONCERTS OF SATURDAY AND SUNDAY

Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra Repeat Their Concert of Wagner's Overtures—Chabrier's "España" Misses Another Encore—Arthur Hartmann Proves Himself a Prodigy Who Has Become a Virtuoso and a Musician—Edna May's Last Appearance on the Stage—Miss Lawton Re-engaged for the Castle Square—Other News of the Day

Trans. — Apr. 29, 1907

It was one of the notable concerts of the year when Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra played last December, for the benefit of its Pension Fund, the seven overtures and preludes to Wagner's operas and Siegfried's apotheosis from "Götterdämmerung." They repeated this music at another concert for the profit of the Pension Fund, last evening in Symphony Hall, and, as memory made the inevitable comparison, the second performance seemed in almost every respect to excel the first. Flag-end of the season though it is, the conductor, the band, and the audience were all "on edge." The house listened with still intentness and applauded with the quickness, heartiness and insistence that was partly appreciation and partly the answering reaction from the emotional strain of the hearing of such music so performed. The men of the band, swelled to its fullest force and increased even by the "Baireuth tubas" of Bruckner's symphony, were so eager that now and then Dr. Muck had to restrain their ardor. Time and again, in the climaxes of the overtures, their tone was wave-like in its long sweep and plangent sonority. Yet in the prelude to "Lohengrin" it had an exquisite fineness of texture, a subdued undulation, a perfect euphony, a vibrantly transparent quality that belied conclusively the notion that the string choir is losing a little of its fineness and precision, or that there is any decline in the virtuosity of the players upon the woodwinds. Both choirs served Wagner as well in the gathering glow and the slow fading of the prelude to "Tristan" and in the piercingly ejaculatory phrases of the prelude to "Parsifal." There, indeed, and throughout the concert, another ability of the men that Dr. Muck has steadily stimulated, shone—the ability to seize and individualize a significant motive, a telling phrase, or an incisive instrumental detail and project it with keen dramatic and musical accent upon the ears and the imaginations of its hearers. Of such, for example, was the glorification of Senta's melody at the end of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; the emphasis of Tannhäuser's song in praise of Venus which makes personal what hitherto have been the impersonal revels of the goddess's cavern; or the accentuation of some of the wan, fitful, gleaming phrases of the passion of the dying lovers at the end of the prelude to "Tristan." In contrast, in the orotund declamation of the overture to "Rienzi," in the epic eloquence of Siegfried's death-music, and in the spontaneous fire and leap of the prelude to "The Mastersingers," was the new power that Dr. Muck has given the band. Then, in truth, it sang out.

And the task that Dr. Muck had set himself was unusually and curiously difficult. In concert, at least, Wagner's overtures and preludes are no introductions to the operas to come, establishing their mood, foreshadowing their musical and dramatic contents. Rather, to an audience that must in large measure be familiar with the operas in the theatre, they are as little epitomes of the music-dramas themselves. By the magic of the music and by the magic of such a performance as they had last night, they evoke, as in an enchanted pantomime, the very scenes and characters and speech of the opera and its essence and spirit. The conductor and his men should be singing and acting the music-drama before the eyes of our imaginations, and clothing it with its tangible aspect and its intangible atmosphere. The overture to "Rienzi" is of another sort; but, that aside, there were six music-dramas from "The Flying Dutchman," through "Parsifal" so to be isolated, as the chemists say, and vivified last night. And in all of them Dr. Muck did not merely give the music general dramatic air and purport as the older generation of German singers used to give their Wagnerian declamation, but he gave to each overture or prelude its characteristic accent. He invoked in his conducting the magic that seemed to play out the drama, summon its scene, establish and maintain its atmosphere.

Take the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," for example—early Wagner, as some conductors seem to think it to be played with a conventional tameness of which they would never dream with the later preludes. Yet without any forcing of its matter or its manner, Dr. Muck made it as eloquent as those. With the beginning he summoned the sea. As he proceeded with the music of Senta and the Hollander, they rose vividly from it. In it, as it advanced, was the musical conflict of the drama and at the end the tonal apotheosis of the release that Senta's devotion had wrought. Often in the theatre the whole three acts of "The Flying Dutchman" have seemed less a music-drama. Again, in the overture to "Tannhäuser," Dr. Muck attained a poignancy of dramatic speech, so to say, that is rare except with the finest of singing-actors in the theatre. So his hearers heard the minstrel's song to Venus.

and the pulsing of the music of the Venusberg as the Pilgrims' song creeps and then marches to still it. Venus and Tannhäuser discourse long in the opera; long is his struggle between the flesh and the spirit. Here was the concentrated moment, the concentrated essence of it. Similarly at Dr. Muck's summons, the whole atmosphere of "The Mastersingers" rose like magic vapors out of the prelude. There was Nuremberg in the moonlight and in the many-colored fete in the meadows. There were the portly masters and the bustling apprentices, the amorous Walter, the eager Eva, the fatherly Sachs. The romance and the homeliness, the zest and the tenderness of the whole opera, the endless beauty of it, the endless ardor of it sprang from this prelude. And it can be played as a glorified orgy of counterpoint. Recall the burning or the languishing phrases of the lovers in the garden of "Tristan" as their passion kindles, mounts, stills, and then burns anew. Recall the phrases of varied ecstasy in "Parsifal"—of pain, of hope, of adoration. The two preludes are music of these phrases, and Dr. Muck brought them last night as from the lips and the souls of Tristan and Isolde, of Parsifal, Amfortas, and the choirs of the Grail. Here was no dramatic conducting in the conventional sense of the complimentary word; no operatic conducting or Wagnerian conducting in the ordinary sense of their attributes. It was conducting so masterful and magical that not an overture but a whole music-drama leapt to life under it.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The season's second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting, repeated last evening, by general request, the Wagner programme of Dec. 30, which was:

Overture—"Rienzi."
Overture—"The Flying Dutchman."
Overture—"Tannhäuser."
Vorspiel—"Lohengrin."
Vorspiel—"Tristan und Isolde."
Vorspiel—"Die Meistersinger."
Funeral March from "Die Gotterdammerung."
Vorspiel—"Parsifal."

Last evening's concert, to a crowded and demonstrative house, gave a superb showing of Wagner overtures. Dr. Muck conducted with the divine fire of genius and with unsurpassed Wagnerian authority. Wagner, no longer of uncertain standing or merit, is well known to concertgoers. "Motives," climaxes and vivid bits of color are all more or less anticipated by the listeners, but Dr. Muck with his wonderful interpretive ability throws new light upon these richly colored tone pictures. His interpretations are like the finest possible hangings for great pictures, where tempered light subtly reveals the soul of the artist through his work.

The evening's programme, chronologically arranged, gave excellent opportunity of showing the composer's evolution from "Rienzi" up to "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Gotterdammerung."

"Rienzi," with slow, dramatic beginning, worked well to its bombastic climax. "The Flying Dutchman," descriptive of wind, waves and mystery, was followed by a superb performance of "Tannhäuser," where the warring religious and pagan elements were depicted with great art. Dr. Muck received prolonged applause at its conclusion.

"Lohengrin," delicate and finely spun, but with values of strength as well as delicacy, and the human love music of "Tristan and Isolde" exquisite numbers. In the sombre yet crashing tragedy of the Funeral March from "Die Gotterdammerung" was the climax of the concert reached, for the final "Parsifal" selection was as a spiritual downpouring to restore the Sabbath calm. J. K. H.

SECOND CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra Repeats
Its Wagner Programme
Before Big House.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, gave the second concert in aid of its pension fund last evening in Symphony Hall. The programme was the same as that of the first Pension Fund concert this season, and consisted of the following works by Wagner: Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser," preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers," "Parsifal," and the funeral march from "Goettermärchen."

The size of the audience last evening fully justified the decision to repeat the former programme, for the hall was crowded, and many stood throughout the concert. Whether the audience consisted mainly of those who were "turned away from the box office" at the previous performance, or of Wagnerites who came eagerly a second time, it is evident that the Wagner cult in Boston has not been run into the ground. Nor is it dependent upon the capricious support of visiting opera companies, as used to be predicted. It is a wonder that Wagner's music ever survived its phase of injudicious exploitation; but it has survived, proving its fitness, and what was once a morbid taste has at last developed into a healthy appetite.

The top gallery at the opera is no longer the scene of an orgy on Wagner nights; the Wagnerite of today is not the curious specimen he was; and last evening's audience was the same audience that today finds pleasure in earlier and later composers, and would even admit the possibility of musical salvation for such as Debussy, or Richard Strauss.

The performance was one of extraordinary brilliance, such a performance of these works as is really heard in concert hall or opera house. The audience was quick to appreciate the work of the orchestra and of Dr. Muck, and paid a greater tribute than applause in the absolute silence with which it listened. After certain numbers, Dr. Muck was repeatedly recalled, and at the end of the "Tannhäuser" overture he made the orchestra rise to share the honor.

Pension Fund Concert.

The last opportunity that the general public will have this season to hear the Symphony orchestra under Dr. Muck will come tonight at the second pension fund concert which will be given in Symphony hall. The program will comprise Wagner's seven overtures and preludes and the funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods." This program was given Dec. 30, and that there has been a very general desire to have it repeated finds evidence in the very large sale that has been going on at Symphony hall for the past week.

The program in full is as follows: The overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser"; the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; funeral march from "Dusk of the Gods" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

The triumph of Dr. Muck's second Wagner programme, fully as great as the first giving of it, emboldens the Clerk to trench upon the preserves of the musical editor and explain just why that programme won and in general the secret of opera success. This may sound like a titanic task but it is really very simple. The secret all lies in the one word—melody, which to my untutored mind is synonymous with music. Wagner's earlier works are all melody, melody, melody. He did not try the impossible and not even the bizarre, radical and revolutionist that he was. He strove for beautiful melodies and grand effects. He got them most markedly in Tannhäuser, which must remain in the minds of those who heard it given by the Conried company a few weeks ago one of the most thrilling and soul-satisfying feasts of their lives. Harmony and melody—that's it. I know a man who will go any distance and forswear any other engagement just to hear that overture to Tannhäuser and I venture the assertion that most of those who filled Symphony Hall Sunday night had chiefly that number in mind. And they wanted to hear that old Rienzi, the overture of a practically never heard opera, and Lohengrin. Over the "Parsifal" and the "Dusk of the Gods" numbers they were not so enthusiastic. Each of these needs the stage illusions, and the story and the singers to give it mastery over one, for they are not pure melody and harmony.

"Aida" crowds every opera house whenever sung. It is unlike "Tannhäuser" in many ways, but like it in glorious chords, magnificent ensemble and ringing orchestration, and of these things the public never tires—the public that down deep in its heart thinks of music and loves it for its free harmony and wholesouled tones such as each of us heard in an old organ at home on the prairie or the hills. It hates pyrotechnics or acrobatics. It cares little for the Jewel Song of "Faust" but splits its gloves over the immortal sextette from "Lucia" which to many of us will ever be linked with the thrill of Patti's voice. It has its love, too, for the dainty things like the prelude to "Lohengrin" at the end of which, Sunday night, one could almost see and hear the curtain roll up on the Holy Grail story. Mr. Hammerstein saw all this very clearly and while he could not give Wagner he produced those operas in which choruses and simple melody were supreme. Let others experiment, said he, I will give the tone delights—and he won. It is, isn't it, a simple secret, really no secret at all.

Dr. Carl Muck emerged from a strenuous orchestral rehearsal, his eyes flashing, every line of the face and tense, wiry figure aglow with nervous energy, and spoke with a Post reporter yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

"The season I have spent here, and the results of my work," said Dr. Muck, "have been exceedingly gratifying to me. The American public I have found to be an enthusiastic and intelligently receptive one. Of your orchestra I only say that there are but two in Europe capable of comparing with it—the Royal Orchestra of Berlin and the institution of the same name at Vienna."

"And has Mrs. Muck found conditions here to be equally satisfactory?"

"Ausgezeichnet!" and the eloquent look which accompanied the word spoke volumes.

It may here be said that in the annals of Symphony Hall there have been few such satisfactory seasons as the past one. The relations between conductor and players have been of the warmest and most cordial description, and there is the utmost harmony between all parties concerned.

Dr. Muck leaves this city on the 19th of the month, proceeding directly to Berlin, where he will conduct performances at the Berlin opera until the close of the season there June 20. From Berlin he will retire to his "palace" at Dobelbad bei Graz, in Styria, to rest from his labors, and to recuperate for the work of next winter.

Y No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

e e con brio.
herzando.
nuetto.
e.

SYMPHONY HALL
SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 28, 1907
AT EIGHT O'CLOCK

CONCERT
BY THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS
PENSION FUND

... WAGNER PROGRAMME ...

OVERTURE, "Rienzi"
OVERTURE, "The Flying Dutchman"
OVERTURE, "Tannhäuser"
PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"

PRELUDE, "Tristan and Isolde"
PRELUDE, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
FUNERAL MARCH from "Dusk of the Gods"
PRELUDE, "Parsifal"

After the Prelude to "Lohengrin" will be an intermission of ten minutes.

Wagner for the Pension Fund

For the first time in the records of the Symphony Orchestra, it is to repeat next Sunday evening in Symphony Hall a concert for the profit of its Pension Fund. Last December, when the time came for the first of the two annual concerts to increase it, Dr. Muck and the managing committee of the fund made a programme that comprised seven overtures or preludes to Wagner's operas and the orchestral apotheosis of Siegfried in the last act of "Götterdämmerung." The list began with the overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" and continued through the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal." The committee wished to give a "Wagner concert" with Dr. Muck conducting. He is firm in the righteous objection to the "lifting" of fragments of Wagner's operas from their place on the stage and diluting them with the conditions of concert form. Wagner, he reasons justly, intended his operas for performance in the theatre and nowhere else. He wrote accordingly and with accumulated knowledge and adroit instinct of the theatre. There and there only may the music, unless it is purely orchestral, and nearly independent of the action on the stage, accomplish the ends Wagner designed for it. Accordingly Dr. Muck would conduct in the overtures or the preludes to the operas and in such distinctively orchestral fragments as Siegfried's glorification; but beyond them he would not go.

On paper, last December, the programme so made seemed strange and rather forbidding. In performance, on the contrary, it proved surprisingly interesting. The studious might, if they liked, follow in the successive numbers one path of the evolution of Wagner as a composer from the frank conventions of the overture to "Rienzi" to the poignant subtleties of the prelude to "Parsifal." To the average hearer, who had come purely for the musical and the emotional pleasures of the concert, the whole impression was rather of the variety of appeal in the matter and the manner of the music. There was little sense of overture following overture, or of prelude succeeding prelude. Instead, each brought its own particular impression of fitting eloquence. Something of this impression it owed to the conducting of Dr. Muck. For the first time his new public heard him from the beginning to the end of a concert as an operatic conductor, and as a conductor of Wagner's music, and he justified the reputation as both that he had long enjoyed in Germany. "He disclosed," said the Transcript, in its review of the concert, "the unmistakable signs of an operatic conductor of discernment and power—in the march of his climaxes, in the justness and the adroitness of his proportions, in the skill of his weaving of backgrounds against the main current of orchestrating, and in the quiet resting and accenting of the dramatic elements of the music. . . . Throughout he avoided the many pitfalls of Wagnerian conducting, and throughout he kept himself and his men the voice of Wagner's music eloquent with the power of it, vital with the passion of it." The whole impression of the concert was deep, keen and lingering. Some recalled and still recall the particular delights of it like the pictorial power and the emotional tensility with which Dr. Muck clothed the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" or the songful ardor of the prelude to "The Mastersingers," the plangent close of the overture to "Tannhäuser" or the piercing intensity of the prelude to "Parsifal." Others have remembered only the thrilling pleasure of the whole. From within and without the regular public of the Symphony Orchestra have come sufficient requests for the repetition of the concert to warrant the venture. Therefore the seven preludes, Dr. Muck and the orchestra are all to serve their hearers and the treasury of the men's Pension Fund again next Sunday.

TO TAKE PLACE OF ADAMOWSKI

Julius Stwertka of Vienna to
Be Second Concert Master of Symphony.

Herald — May 12, 1907

Mr. Julius Stwertka has been engaged as the successor of Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who resigned a few days ago his position as the second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Stwertka is the second concert master of the Vienna court opera and of the philharmonic concerts given by the court orchestra. He is also a teacher of the violin at the Conservatory of Music in Vienna. Inasmuch as Mr. Arnold Rose, the first concert master of the Opera House and the Philharmonic concerts, is often away from Vienna on tours with his string quartet, Mr. Stwertka has had much experience in the important position of chief violinist.

He will arrive in Boston in the fall to be ready for the rehearsals which precede the first Symphony concert on Oct. 12.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, MAY 4, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

VOLKMANN.

OVERTURE to Shakespeare's "Richard III."
F sharp minor, op. 68.

LISZT.

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. II, "The Battle of the Huns."

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major. "Eroica." op. 55
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo; Allegro vivace: Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Wagner for the Pension Fund

For the first time in the records of the Symphony Orchestra, it is to repeat next Sunday evening in Symphony Hall a concert for the profit of its Pension Fund. Last December, when the time came for the first of the two annual concerts to increase it, Dr. Muck and the managing committee of the fund made a programme that comprised seven overtures or preludes to Wagner's operas and the orchestral apotheosis of Siegfried in the last act of "Götterdämmerung." The list began with the overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhäuser" and continued through the preludes to "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "The Mastersingers" and "Parsifal." The committee wished to give a "Wagner concert" with Dr. Muck conducting. He is firm in the righteous objection to the "lifting" of fragments of Wagner's operas from their place on the stage and diluting them with the conditions of concert form. Wagner, he reasons justly, intended his operas for performance in the theatre and nowhere else. He wrote accordingly and with accumulated knowledge and adroit instinct of the theatre. There and there only may the music, unless it is purely orchestral, and nearly independent of the action on the stage, accomplish the ends Wagner designed for it. Accordingly Dr. Muck would conduct in the overtures or the preludes to the operas and in such distinctively orchestral fragments as Siegfried's glorification; but beyond them he would not go.

On paper, last December, the programme so made seemed strange and rather forbidding. In performance, on the contrary, it proved surprisingly interesting. The studious might, if they liked, follow in the successive numbers one path of the evolution of Wagner as a composer from the frank conventions of the overture to "Rienzi" to the poignant subtleties of the prelude to "Parsifal." To the average hearer, who had come purely for the musical and the emotional pleasures of the concert, the whole impression was rather of the variety of appeal in the matter and the manner of the music. There was little sense of overture following overture, or of prelude succeeding prelude. Instead, each brought its own particular impression of fitting eloquence. Something of this impression it owed to the conducting of Dr. Muck. For the first time his new public heard him from the beginning to the end of a concert as an operatic conductor, and as a conductor of Wagner's music, and he justified the reputation as both that he had long enjoyed in Germany. "He disclosed," said the Transcript, in its review of the concert, "the unmistakable signs of an operatic conductor of discernment and power—in the march of his climaxes, in the justness and the adroitness of his proportions, in the skill of his weaving of backgrounds against the main current of orchestral song, and in the quick seizing and accenting of the dramatic elements of the music. . . . Throughout he avoided the many pitfalls of Wagnerian conducting, and throughout he kept himself and his men the voice of Wagner's music eloquent with the power of it, vital with the passion of it." The whole impression of the concert was deep, keen and lingering. Some recalled and still recall the particular delights of it like the pictorial power and the emotional tensy with which Dr. Muck clothed the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" or the songful ardor of the prelude to "The Mastersingers," the plangent close of the overture to "Tannhäuser" or the piercing intensity of the prelude to "Parsifal." Others have remembered only the thrilling pleasure of the whole. From within and without the regular public of the Symphony Orchestra have come sufficient requests for the repetition of the concert to warrant the venture. Therefore the seven preludes, Dr. Muck and the orchestra are all to serve their hearers and the treasury of the men's Pension Fund again next Sunday.

TO TAKE PLACE OF ADAMOWSKI

Julius Stwertka of Vienna to
Be Second Concert Master of Symphony.

Herald — May 12, 1907

Mr. Julius Stwertka has been engaged as the successor of Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who resigned a few days ago his position as the second concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Stwertka is the second concert master of the Vienna court opera and of the philharmonic concerts given by the court orchestra. He is also a teacher of the violin at the Conservatory of Music in Vienna. Inasmuch as Mr. Arnold Rose, the first concert master of the Opera House and the Philharmonic concerts, is often away from Vienna on tours with his string quartet, Mr. Stwertka has had much experience in the important position of chief violinist.

He will arrive in Boston in the fall to be ready for the rehearsals which precede the first Symphony concert on Oct. 12.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1906-07.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

SATURDAY, MAY 4, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

VOLKMANN

OVERTURE to Shakespeare's "Richard III."
F sharp minor, op. 68.

LISZT.

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 11, "The Battle of the Huns."

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." op. 55

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace: Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Symphony Hall.

Twenty-Seventh Season, 1907-1908.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor.

Opening Concert

Saturday Evening, October 12, 1907.

GIVE GODSPEED TO SYMPHONY HEAD

Herald May 5, 07
Last Night's Concert Was the 24th and Last of the 26th Season.

BEETHOVEN'S MIGHTY DIRGE MOVES AUDIENCE

Music of Battle, Murder and Sudden Death Feature of Programme.

BY PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last concert of the 26th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III." Volkmann
Symphonic poem, "The Battle of the Huns" Liszt
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" Beethoven

The Herald discusses elsewhere in this issue the programmes arranged by Dr. Muck during the season.

Was the thought of heroism and of battle, murder and sudden death in the conductor's mind when he arranged the programme of last night? First we have Richard III., the Richard of Shakespeare and Colley Cibber, the boggy man as impersonated by Kean, Kirby—"Wake me up when Kirby dies!"—and Barry Sullivan, not the monarch whitewashed by the latest historians and by the most recent biographer, Sir Clements R. Markham, the philanthropic ruler who lived happily with the Lady Anne and would not have murdered the princes in the Tower for crown on crown and untold gold. There is the Battle of Bosworth Field, the singularly anachronistic tune, "The Campbells are Comin'," the thought of Richard shouting wildly for another horse.

And lo! immediately another battle scene, the music of Liszt to translate the legendary fight pictured by von Kaulbach into tones. There are ghosts of Richard's victims in Volkmann's overture; there are ghosts of Huns who arise to the combat in Liszt's symphonic poem. If the English soldiers arrayed against the tyrant are typified by a Scottish tune, called by Volkmann an old English war song, the Christians as opposed to the Huns are typified by the church melody of "Crux fidelis."

A Hymn of Triumph.

In overture and in symphonic poem the ending is a hymn of triumph and exultation. Righteousness has prevailed. And after these works came a frankly heroic symphony, though to some the symphony is not so heroic in character as the fifth. Here the hero is borne to the grave, and what is supposed to happen in the finale, with its variations Beethoven only knew.

Volkmann's overture was never fully appreciated here until we heard Smetana's symphonic poem with Richard as the hero. The subject impressed the Bohemian deeply, but at the time Smetana was not a master of expression. Volkmann, unlike Smetana, gave no programme with his overture, and the few commentators quarrel among themselves about the significance of certain themes. The composer wrote his overture and incidental music for the theatre. "For Shakespeare's tragedy" is clew enough. If you find Rubinstein's "Ivan the Terrible" on a concert programme, you know at once what you have a right to expect, a suggestion of cruelty, horror, suffering; and in this instance you, hearing, are tortured in turn.

Liszt, as was generally his habit, talked and wrote much about "The Battle of the Huns" before it was performed, and even before it was completed. He said it would be no "guitar piece," and he evidently thought well of it. But unless Dr. Muck had set his heart on a row of heroic, battle pieces—he might have added Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture—it might have been a pleasure to hear still more familiar symphonic poems by Liszt, or those that have not been played here. In the former case, "Tasso" or "Mazeppa"; in the latter, "Hamlet." (By the way, Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" is unknown to the Symphony audience.) How many have heard Liszt's "Ce qu'on entend sur la Montagne" and "Heroide Funebre"? The "Hungaria" has been played here only once, I believe, and the inadequate performance was nearly 16 years ago.

Cause for Rejoicing.

Beethoven said nothing about the programme of his "Eroica." There is a story that the title page of the manuscript bore the word "Bonaparte" and that when the death of Napoleon at St. Helena was announced the composer remarked grimly that he had foreseen the catastrophe when he wrote the funeral march in the symphony. Does Dr. Muck accept the theory of Wagner; that the hero in this symphony is "the whole, the full-fledged man"? The music remains the same, whatever the explanation may be. As Dr. Muck began the season with a symphony by Beethoven, so he ended it.

Let us rejoice that in the programme, however singular it may have seemed to some, there was no attempt at a spectacular close with the full strength of the company and a grand pyrotechnical display. Let us also be thankful that there was no "sadness of farewell"; for Dr. Muck will return to us in the fall.

A man of the opera house, he undoubtedly chose the pieces by Volkmann and Liszt for the dramatic effects he finds in them. It is not necessary to hold that a conductor of the rare force and intelligence which characterize Dr. Muck believes in the plenary inspiration of every work he chooses for performance. Volkmann was a man of the utmost sincerity, but he was seldom inspired. And how about Liszt? Did he always believe in his own inspiration? Was he sincere in the works which were suggested to him by religious subjects?

Read the interminable letters he wrote to his princess and you would infer that his sole thought in life was concerning the good of the church and his own salvation. Was he honest in all this? Probably at the time he wrote, for he was a sentimentalist as well as a mighty influence, a man of indisputable genius, which is sometimes shown even in his musical compositions.

Questions Suggested.

All these questions might easily have been suggested by the programme itself. The performance, the interpretation justified the programme. Volkmann's overture has aged, and that which was picturesque in it when it was produced is now as common-place as any pages by a naturally inferior man. The fact that the workmanship is better in a routine way does not save the battle scene. Only the suggestions of moods, what might be called the psychological portions are of importance today.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of Liszt's symphonic poem gave a character to the work that has been missed on former occasions. The poem was less episodic and of a higher quality. There was no need of programme to any one who had seen von Kaulbach's picture. There were the opposing forces and the final triumph of the Cross. Romantic in itself, the poem was read romantically.

Was Vivid and Virile.

The performance of the "Eroica" must be ranked among the great performances of the season. It was one of uncommon and sustained eloquence. It was virile and vivid throughout. In treatment of detail and in general breadth and sweep. There was no forced intrusion of the conductor's individuality. The hearer was conscious of Beethoven's mighty voice, which came direct and not as through a ventriloquist. Grandeur and tenderness, nobility of lamentation, titanic sportiveness and mirth, these made their irresistible way. Nothing stood between the composer and the hearer.

Thus ended a most interesting and brilliant orchestral season, a season that will be memorable in the history of the organization, a season conspicuous, not by reason of the assisting singers or players, but first of all by the performance of the orchestra under Dr. Muck.

That the audience appreciated his ability and his work was shown by the prolonged welcome at the beginning of the concert and the hearty God-speed at the end. May he return to us refreshed and in high spirits for the 27th season!

Close of Symphony Season.

Last night's symphony concert, the 24th and final concert of the 26th season of this organization, wound up a year which has been one of delight so far as the conducting was concerned, which has seen 14 soloists—and an unusual number of people who live in Boston—an unusual number of new works presented, a well-chosen series of programs and more than the usual enthusiasm from the audiences. Altogether it has been a good year, and at its end Boston loses Prof. Willy Hess from the concert master's seat, it retains Dr. Karl Muck on the conductor's platform, and so is to be congratulated.

Last night's program moved backward through the years, beginning with Robert Volkmann's overture to Shakspeare's "Richard III.," pausing to review Liszt's battle of the shades of Huns, grunting and clanging in the air above, and emerging finally into the clear air of the heroic symphony. Had the evening been long enough, it is conceivable that Palestrina might have been reached.

All three works were played with force and fire, the symphony being taken faster in every movement than conductors in Boston have been wont to do. It was well done; the work lost not a whit of dignity—except possibly in the funeral march, which had the air of perfunctoriness, as though the composer was not sorry for the death he was recording.

Liszt's symphonic poem (No. 11), "The Battle of the Huns," has been played here five times before last night by the symphony orchestra, since its first performance in 1885. Without the program notes, and with merely the title to help to its understanding, the work would be impressive, indeed, and indubitably the picture of a battle of savage foes, fighting desperately, and a triumph for what may be expressed by religious music; the story of Kaulbach's painting of the battling ghosts known, the music takes on a thrilling realism that even Liszt did not often attain.

The first number, Volkmann's description of the misshapen villain-hero of Shakspeare, is as powerful in its own way. More modern in treatment than either of the other two works, it is still coherent and has unity of thought and expression; the picture is not violated by its contrasts.

Except for the sentimental reasons involved in closing the season with the "Eroica," the program might well have been reversed, or rather the symphony would have been well placed at the beginning, the more intense music after it.

DR. MUCK'S FIRST YEAR

Frank May 4, 07
HIS PROGRESS AT THE SYMPHONY
CONCERTS

The Obstacles at the Beginning—The Quickness and the Openness of Mind with Which the Conductor Has Come to Know His Men, His Public and the Traditions of the Orchestra—The Gradual Influence of This Knowledge Upon His Programmes—The Appeal of His Personal Traits—The Qualities of His Conducting as the Year Has Ripened It—The Maintaining and the Broadening of the Standards of the Orchestra

Nearly seven months ago on a Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck conducted before his first American audience. It received him cordially; it watched him with eager curiosity; it listened to his reading of Beethoven's fifth symphony intently; and it departed well pleased with the first new conductor the orchestra had had in seven years and warm in anticipation of the future. Yesterday, at the last afternoon concert of the musical year, and with Beethoven's third symphony, Dr. Muck took leave, until next October, of the same audience. It applauded him warmly when he came first to the stage; it listened with an attentive animation, that neither the end of the season nor the familiarity of the programme had dulled; and at the close of the concert, it remained in its place until it had twice recalled him very heartily. By every sign that an audience might give, the anticipations of last autumn had been fulfilled, and Dr. Muck stood firmly established with half his public here. The other half, at the concert of tonight, is as sure to testify to its liking and appreciation. Thus Dr. Muck has won his place more quickly and surely than there was reason to expect last October, and in the face of considerable obstacles.

Like all the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra, except Mr. Henschel, Dr. Muck came to a public to whom he was practically unknown and of whom he himself was no better informed. Like them, too, he came with more reputation as a conductor of opera than of orchestral concerts. Outside short journeys in Europe, he had made his career wholly in Germany and practically as one of the conductors at the Opera House in Berlin. In Germany he was of established rank; elsewhere in Europe he was known and esteemed; but in Boston and in New York, except to a few informed connoisseurs, he was barely a name. Orchestral concerts, moreover, had been only incidents in his work, and in them he had followed the rather rigid rules and customs of musical Germany. Report, however unjustly, represented him as a classicist and a conservative, disliking most of the music that had been written since the death of Wagner, and making no secret of his distaste. Noted operatic conductor though he was, rumor also denied him warmth of temperament and elasticity of style. On the other hand, Dr. Muck himself was coming to an orchestra of which he knew only the prestige and to a public of whom he knew still less—a public accustomed to very catholic programmes and to the frequent hearing, in particular, of ultra-modern music. He was, moreover, succeeding a conductor who in his thirteen years of service had made the Symphony Orchestra one of the finest instruments of its kind in the world; who had established it and its public in certain traditions, and whom especially in the broadening of his later years his audiences warmly cherished.

From the very start Dr. Muck has proved his alert intelligence and openness of mind. More quickly than any of his predecessors he has come to know his men, his audiences and the enduring traditions of the Symphony concerts. Almost from the beginning his men have respected and liked him. He has exacted much and sedulous work from them, but he has exacted more from himself. He was a conductor, as they speedily discovered, who knew more of the technic and the possibilities of the different instruments of the orchestra than did any of his predecessors. On occasion he has instructed the brasses in the capabilities of their instruments as though he himself had played them. Or he has summoned a single choir, like the strings or the woodwinds, to rehearsal by itself and surprised the men by his knowledge of its resources. He has maintained discipline and enforced authority, but he has been neither querulous nor fussy. No conductor could be quicker than he to bid his men share in any unusually warm applause after mutual conquest of many difficulties. At moments, as in the playing of some of the classic symphonies, he has even left the orchestra to itself. He has asked of his men the same alacrity of spirit and the same pursuit of perfection that he has brought to his own work. He has come to know not merely their skill, but their temper and idiosyncrasies, and he has judged them accordingly, with friendliness, but also with justice and with regard for work and for the standards of the orchestra above all else. In a season, by this use of one instinctive capacity that goes to the making of a conductor, he knows his men.

In the same way and with the same quickness and breadth of intelligence Dr. Muck has come to know his public and the traditions of the Symphony concerts. For a month or two at the start, he and it were practically discovering each other, while he also had to learn and measure his forces. As any conductor would do under like circumstances, he confined himself to familiar pieces and often to the older classics. As any conductor of his antecedents would do, he shaped his programmes at first on the rather stiff and narrow German model. Through December and beyond, the more impatient of the audiences doubted and feared. Were we to move in a round of established classics, mainly German? Were they to move in a weekly order of overture, concerto, symphony or the reverse? Were we to hear no new music, no French, no American, no ultra-modern music and so forth and so on? Little by little, especially through the second half of the season these alarms have vanished. As soon as Dr. Muck had mastered his forces, grasped the traditions of the concerts, and understood the long musical training, catholicity and curiosity of his public, and the varied likings that it represents, he has discreetly adjusted them all. The tone-poem and the miscellaneous piece have regained their established place. New or unheard music has come to performance, and for the most part justified itself either by its intrinsic interest or by the prestige of its composer. Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica" and Debussy's "The Sea" have been played for the first times. Reger has found a place on the programmes. Our audiences have practically discovered Sibelius with interest and pleasure. Bruckner has been made known afresh to them. The music of the Scandinavian symphonists has had unusually ample hearing. American composers from Paine to Hadley have not been neglected. The list of the classics runs from Bach to Wagner with few missing names. Except the new Englishmen, there is hardly a group of composers unrepresented in the final enumeration of eighty-six pieces.

Thus has Dr. Muck broadened his point of view and assimilated the desires of his public as he has gradually learned them. In one respect, however, his programmes have been thoroughly his own. He believed at the start, he still seems to believe, in the "unified" programme—that is a programme that contains music of a similar mood and spirit; that belongs to a single epoch; or that represents a single group of composers. There is much to be said for such unity of design. There is something to be said against the lack of contrast and variety by which this unity may weaken or dull a single programme. The American tradition from Theodore Thomas through Mr. Gericke has been that of more diversified programmes, in which the several "numbers" were as foils to each other and as spurs to the varying interests of the listeners. In this respect Dr. Muck has chosen his own "unified" way and oftenest followed it. His public, according to its tastes, has liked, or in almost equal numbers frankly disliked it.

Long before the audiences at Symphony Hall could fairly estimate Dr. Muck's worth as a conductor, they found him interesting as a man. Some conductors cultivate a romantic aspect like that of heroes of "musical" novels; others would display a dishevelled energy; others still have advanced to their work as to a solemn ceremonial; while yet others have courted the slightest whiff of applause. Week after week his public has seen Dr. Muck come unobtrusively to his place and leave it as unobtrusively, hesitating even to acknowledge applause unless it were plainly warm and insistent. His aspect and bearing have been those of a cultivated, finely bred and finely poised man of the world, who esteems its conventions neither too highly nor too lightly. To see, he has suggested the absorbed and eager, more than the musician. No idiosyncrasy or trick of the concert-room has tarnished the quiet aristocracy of his bearing. The least of his desires has been to ask attention to himself. In his absorption in his work he has seemed to forget his audience. His beat, with all its precision and nervous vitality, and his gestures, with all their clear suggestion of rhythmic and tonal shadings, have been steadily of an unostentatious authority. Yet from the first concert of last October, many in his audiences have felt the charm, the distinction and the fine individuality of the man, and nearly all have found in him the intangible qualities that make a personality interesting and not commonplace. Every able and individual conductor must have a force of personality that sways his men. A few of them have also a similar fascinating force for their audience, and it is the more potent when the conductor himself seems unconscious of it. It is a legitimate attribute, and to many of his hearers it dwells in Dr. Muck.

From these traits of the man have sprung some of the qualities of the conductor. It is the high and fine tradition of our orchestra that the conductor must subordinate all else to his work. He must not spare himself or his men. Whatever his mood, he must subdue it to its task. Whatever his own liking for particular music, he must give to it the utmost of his powers. He may miss neither the large effect nor the significant detail. He must work as one who courts perfection as a mistress and as an ideal. Steadfastly Dr. Muck has maintained and strengthened this tradition. His industry in study of scores, in the preparation of parts for the players, and in actual rehearsal has been zealous and unflagging. He has frankly told his friends that through the season he had little time for aught but work. He has come as tirelessly and with as little heed of the mood of the moment to the weekly and (on the journeys to other cities) to the daily, concerts. Upon music that he little esteems, like Strauss's "Domestica," or Debussy's sea-pieces, he has lavished the largest and the finest of his powers, striving at each repetition to disclose more clearly and intensely every significant quality it may contain.

Another tradition, another necessity indeed, requires the maintenance of a very high technical standard in the orchestra. One of its glories is the technical resources and the technical felicity of its men. From their virtuosity spring the mellowness, transparency and vibrancy of tone, the balance and euphony, the range of shading, the fine precision that have long been distinguishing traits of our orchestra. Mr. Gericke's unusual and exquisite fineness of ear and sensitiveness to tonal adjustments steadily fostered them. On the whole, Dr. Muck has maintained these qualities, but hardly heightened them. There have been occasions, indeed, when the perfect euphony has seemed a little to wane, when the precision has been a little less absolute and the mellowness a little roughened. But in the next concert the familiar perfections have returned, and almost from the beginning Dr. Muck has added others to them. The mellow tone has become more elastic, and gained time and again a larger sonority. The orchestra has learned a new incisiveness of accent alike in the isolated phrase and the long progression. It can be at need more "songful," more declamatory, more piquant to the ear, more potent to the imagination. In a word, Dr. Muck has infused into it a fresh vitality, and out of that vitality have come a new suppleness and fire. Its technical and executive qualities are distinctly more alive.

Again, from Dr. Muck's personal qualities may come his fine objectiveness as a conductor. Some of his brethren seem to begin in their hearts with congratulations to the composer that he and his music are to be the means through which they will "interpret" themselves. They can leave no passage unmarked with some token of their insight, and not a measure escapes their preternatural sense of "inner meanings." Two or three minutes of unmodified pace, unvaried rhythm or steady accent vex them. Thus do they contrive and establish their "individual" readings. Dr. Muck, in contrast, has sought only to give the music before him its fullest and most characteristic voice. He has kept himself steadily the unobtrusive medium of its utterance. He has sought to serve the composer and no other, and to serve him in the composer's own way.

There is a kind of routine objectiveness that takes all things, with detached literalness, for what they are on the surface. Dr. Muck's is of a finer penetration and discrimination. A symphony of Mozart has its characteristic manner, accent, flow—the qualities that make it Mozartean and of its time. A symphony by Beethoven or Brahms has its peculiar and distinguishing eloquence. A symphony by Tchaikovsky or Sibelius speaks in yet other tones; and a "poem" by Strauss or a "sketch" by Debussy runs almost in a musical dialect of its own. Dr. Muck's objectiveness first discovers, then differentiates, and finally heightens, these characteristic traits. He does not merely give the music an unforced voice, but he gives it the peculiar voice with which the composer seems to speak in the score. The range, the sensitiveness and the discrimination of Dr. Muck's objectiveness are its distinctions. Never, moreover, has his continence been the continence of listlessness. If he has let the music flow placidly in some of the older pieces it is because they plainly demanded it, and always that flow has been undulating. When the composer has asked elasticity, incisiveness, contrast, vividness, Dr. Muck has been as quick to understand and achieve his purpose. With the classic symphonies in particular, the crown of his objectiveness has been its vitalizing quality. Whatever music he has played, he has given it propulsive and communicating power.

By its results we listeners know unmistakably this power. "Vera incessu patuit Dea." It is the sign of the born and made conductor, but like most such results, it is singularly baffling of analysis. Perhaps, with Dr. Muck, the secrets of it are four. In him surely are those qualities of musical intellect, so to say, that enable him to grasp the structure, the design, the architectural and proportioning qualities of a symphony, an overture or a tone-poem. He has a very keen sense of the form, the organic development, the gradual evolution from and within itself of a composition. He apprehends equally its large contours and significant details. By the same musical intellect he grasps the melody which is the thought and the fibre of the music. Thereby he enters into its very spirit and substance, and finds the pace that most truly and significantly imparts them. Equally in Dr. Muck is the power of musical temperament and imagination that keeps melodic lines undulating, stirs rhythms, rounds phrases and gives to all that it touches the songful quality that has been one of the distinctions of his conducting. Then may enter, perhaps, the element of responsive poetic and dramatic imagination—the discovering and sympathizing, the discriminating and communicating, power by which Dr. Muck has given to almost all the music that he has played a characteristic and intense eloquence and a pervading and individual atmosphere. A suite by Bach, an overture by Brahms, a symphony by Tchaikovsky or a tone-poem by Strauss, each in its kind has "sounded" with poetry or beauty, with significance or power. And last there is in Dr. Muck the sense of the instinctive and practised conductor, and especially of the able operative conductor, for just effect upon the ears and the imaginations of his hearers. Almost from the beginning he has proved his feeling for the incisive phrase, the searching instrumental voice or contrast, the heightened or the insinuating emphasis, the long sweep and the final break of climax. These are the qualities of a conductor who first imagines and then orders his imaginings, and whose largest power still leaves a sense of power controlled. It is this blending of many traits in Dr. Muck and the excess of none that has made him so satisfying a conductor for the purposes of our forty-eight concerts and the range of music they must traverse. He has met to the full the first necessity of them—to wear well and ripen in the wearing.

H. T. P.

DR. AND MRS. MUCK SAIL.

Symphony Director and Wife Depart from New York for Austria Home.

Herald May 15, 1907
Dr. Karl Muck, director of the Symphony orchestra, and Mrs. Muck, sailed yesterday from New York on the Kaiser Wilhelm II.

They go directly to Berlin, and later will go to Styria, Austria, where Dr. Muck has a small country place.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck are due to return to this country about Oct. 1.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv! PROGRAMME: May 6, 07

Volkman. Overture, "Richard III."
Liszt. Symphonic Poem. "The Battle of the Huns."

Beethoven. Heroic Symphony.

Dr. Muck must have felt rather combative when he made up this programme. There were three battlefields in it, for the development of Beethoven's Symphony, first movement, is as much a battle as that of Bosworth Field, in which Richard dies to a Scotch tune written a century later than the fight. It was a very interesting programme and any soloist would have been an intruder in this earnest orchestral concert. The audience appreciated this, and recalled Dr. Muck, at the end of the concert, over and over again. At the beginning, also, there was a very decided ovation. The public have evidently varied Shakespeare ("Coriolanus") a trifle and regard our conductor as "The uncommon Muck of the World."

"Richard III." received a fine reading. It was a picturesque interpretation from first to last, and it was legitimate programme-music, for any intelligent auditor could follow the main incidents of the plot from the brooding, sinister portrayal of the hero to the fanfares of Richmond's victory; and the elasticity of the reading, the dramatic power of the contrasts, could not have been improved upon.

"The Battle of the Huns" was a revelation. When it was performed here three seasons ago (Nov. 26, 1904), it made no very marked effect. The audience then received it calmly and it seemed one of Liszt's more artificial works. Saturday it impressed one as even more powerful than "Les Preludes," which we have always held to be the best of Liszt's Symphonic Poems, and the auditors were aroused to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

This work is perhaps the first orchestral composition that employs a painting as inspiration to music. Since that time the Swiss painter Boeklin has inspired both Huber and Weingartner, and a couple of paintings by J. Appleton Brown brought forth Paine's "Island Fantasy."

Naturally enough the work is founded upon the battle of two themes. It is far above the conflict of two themes with which Mendelssohn pictures the strife of Protestant and Catholic, and it is far more intelligible and impressive than the musical row in which dissimilar themes, chords and rhythms, black each other's eyes in Strauss's "Heldenleben." People may prate "Realism" as much as they please, but it is not necessary to smear the conductor's baton with blood, or to fill the hall with smoke, in order to picture a battle. Music is a stimulant to the emotions and the imagination, and an intense suggestion of combat, such as Liszt has created, is truer Art than any amount of mere dissonance and noise, scored for orchestra, would have been.

The orchestra played magnificently in this and the cymbalist certainly earned his salary. Dr. Muck's reading was, as already intimated, a revelation. It was the loftiest imaginable interpretation.

Beethoven's Heroic Symphony could not but sound slightly archaic after the brilliant modern orchestration of Liszt. The work is now over a century old. We can only wonder how the concert-goer of 2007 will regard "Heldenleben," the heroic symphony of the present, in which the composer is his own hero and vehemently praises himself.

Dr. Muck did not omit a single repeat. He did not even cut out the repetition of the exposition of the first movement, as is sometimes done by modern conductors. We fancy that he thoroughly enjoyed the work. Yet it was impossible to read anything new into it; we have had many great performances of the Heroic symphony, by Nikisch, Paur and Gericke.

We always dissent from the excessive softness of the strings when the horn enters (tonic chord against dominant) at the end of the development. In this abrogation of the laws of harmony we imagine Beethoven to have pictured his hero as defiant of all rule or precedent—a law unto himself,—and to glide over the dissonance, by softening one of the harmonies, is to destroy the radical effect desired. It would seem the most innocent of dissonances to our modern composers.

The Funeral March was nobly read and played. Dr. Muck here was careful to avoid the dawdling slowness which might have sentimentalized what Coleridge called "A Funeral in purple." Especial praise may be given to the oboe in this and also to all the woodwind in the Trio. The sobbing, broken-hearted Coda was given very graphically.

The Scherzo was brilliant, as it ought to be. This is practically the first Scherzo movement ever composed, for, although the Scherzo of the second symphony came two years earlier, that has yet much of the character of the Minuet (which the Scherzo was to replace), but in this the Minuet character has entirely disappeared. The horns seemed unnecessarily loud in the Trio of this, and their tone-quality was not as good as we have had it heretofore in the same passages.

The Finale was most effectively given. It seems, even at its best, a falling-off from the rest of the work. Conductors imagine many things about it. Here is Weingartner's vaticination regarding this set of variations on a ballet theme,— "In the last movement the peoples come together from the ends of the earth, bringing building-stones for a worthy monument to the now fully-recognized hero—a monument which cannot be more beautiful than is the love paid to his memory. This movement surpasses the first two in its boldness of conception and its polyphonic working-out, and makes the so much admired fugue-finale in Mozart's 'Jupiter Symphony' seem like a child's toy. When at last the veil falls from the monument, when the strains of the consecration music arise, and all eyes, filled with tears, look up at the image of the deified hero, then ring upon our ears the sounds that tell us that, with this symphony, music has learned to speak a language for which it hitherto seemed to possess no organ."

All of which is "important if true," yet we always feel that the finale of the fifth symphony would have been more in line with the three first movements of the Heroic symphony. But Dr. Muck's reading brought out something like the loftiness which Weingartner has imagined.

Altogether, this single season of Dr. Muck has been a very great one. He has been broad and liberal in his programmes. His readings have been poetic and elastic. He has abnegated his own preferences in music in order to give us every important modern work that was possible. Sometimes theatrical in his overture readings and given to extremes of slowness in these, he has nevertheless given us performances of some well-known works that became surprising in their novelty because of his great interpretations. We have learned from him the real meaning of the Brahms C minor symphony and of several other works which we thought we fully understood. He has taught us that soloists are not so essential to these concerts as we had imagined. Altogether Dr. Muck has become an important figure in Boston's musical history and will doubtless be even greater in his second season.

Louis C. Elson.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Familiar Music for Dr. Muck's Leave-Taking—An Eloquent Performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony—Two Minor Announcements

Trans. May 4, 1907
In another part of this paper a long article reviews Dr. Muck's conducting with the Symphony Orchestra for the musical year that ends with the concert of tonight. There is little need therefore to enter into details of the concert of yesterday. Familiar music made the programme—Volkmann's overture to Shakspeare's melodrama, "Richard III."; Liszt's tone-poem, "The Battle of the Huns," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Perhaps Dr. Muck "unified" them into a single list as the dramatic music of warlike heroes. Volkmann's overture is thoughtfully dramatic. It characterizes the end of Gloster with calculating pains. Happily for it, Dr. Muck, with his quick feeling for music of the theatre, gave it sharpness of accent and at moments declamatory power. Declamatory as well, and properly so, was his playing of Liszt's musical melodrama, "The Battle of the Huns"—sacred melodrama, perhaps, with the peace of the Church triumphing over the battling warriors. With Beethoven's symphony the conductor passed from declamation to a lofty eloquence of beauty and power. In it all the notable qualities of his conducting, especially in established classics, shone, and of these enough is said in the other article. For the orchestra and the conductor it was a performance to stand beside those of Beethoven's fifth and seventh symphonies and Brahms's first; but fittingly it was larger of design, ampler of voice, more significant of detail and contrast, more sweeping of melodic line, vital of rhythm and pregnant of phrase. Epic mood filled it, and the music marched in heroic song. Dr. Muck had found its impassioned nobility and given it voice. He could have taken no finer or more characteristic leave, for a few months, of a public that was quick to testify its understanding and appreciation. H. T. P.

Dr. Muck's First Year

The twenty-sixth season of the Symphony Orchestra came to an end on Saturday night with a stirring outburst of applause and lingering on the part of the audience that made an impressive "bon voyage" to Dr. Muck, who leaves for his European vacation next week. The demonstration was strongly suggestive of the artistic and popular favor the conductor has won by his year's work. No other man in the history of these concerts has made so deep an impression during one season, not even Mr. Nikisch, who aroused a deal of hot hostility from persons who were not at the time of his supremacy here sufficiently intelligent to appreciate his flaming genius.

Dr. Muck has shown himself to be a man of both temperament and catholicity. Less a drill-master than Mr. Gericke, he has made the orchestra far more eloquent. As an interpreter of Wagner, of Berlioz, of Brahms, he has achieved his chief triumphs, but he has also shown a disposition to give his Boston hearers a great variety of the music of new men, including Americans. It is not his fault that much of this has been a weariness to the spirit. A noticeable feature has been his tendency to give programs of all-of-a-kind music, and this has at times made for monotony and a mutual "killing" of one work by the rest.

As a man, Dr. Muck has charmed by his personality and made himself respected by his admirable qualities. It is a pleasure to know that for another year, at least, he will remain at the head of our great orchestra. Meantime all may unite to wish him "a calm sea and a prosperous voyage." Journal May 6, 1907

CONCERT MASTER ADAMOWSKI, WHO LEAVES SYMPHONY

BOSTON SYMPHONY LOSES ADAMOWSKI

Famous Violinist and Conductor Resigns as Second Concert Master.

Herald May 8, 1907
Mr. Timothee Adamowski, the well known violin virtuoso and conductor, has resigned his position as second concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The last season saw his 22d year of continuous service as violinist in the orchestra.

Mr. Adamowski will continue to conduct the "Pops" for one-third of the present season as was arranged. Next season he expects that the activity of the Adamowski trio will be greater even than it has been in the past. He will also revive the Adamowski quartet and his associates will be Messrs. Kuntz, Zach and Josef Adamowski. It is said that Mr. Josef Adamowski will also resign his position as violoncellist in the orchestra.

When Messrs. Kniesel and Loeffler withdrew from the orchestra, Messrs. Arbos and Adamowski were appointed concert masters in their place. This was in 1903. Mr. Arbos in 1904 was succeeded by Mr. Hess.

Mr. Adamowski's connection with the orchestra has been a brilliant one. He has been engaged as soloist in Boston at Symphony concerts 21 times. He has introduced at these concerts the following works: Saint-Saens' concerto No. 1, Bernard's concerto in G major, Moszkowski's concerto, Saint-Saens' concerto No. 3, Paganini's caprice in A minor (arranged and orchestrated by Gorski), Dvorak's concerto and Strube's concerto No. 2. His first appearance with the Symphony orchestra as soloist was on March 7, 1885. His last was on Dec. 29, 1906.

But he was known in Boston as a violinist before the Symphony orchestra was organized. He played here for the first time on Oct. 24, 1879. He was then in his 22d year, for he was born at Warsaw March 24, 1858. He studied at Warsaw with Kontchi and later with Massart at the Paris Conservatory. He came to the United States in 1879, and travelled as soloist with M. Strakosch, Clara Louise Kellogg, and at last with a company of his own. His string quartet was organized in 1888 and reorganized in 1890. He has long been known as a conductor of the "Pops."

Nor is his reputation as a solo violinist confined to cities of the United States; he has played on various occasions in London, Paris and Warsaw.

Mr. Adamowski has been so intimately associated with the Symphony orchestra that he will be sorely missed. It is a pleasure to know that he will continue to make Boston his dwelling place and that the chamber clubs which bear his name will here be at home.

Trans. Mr. Adamowski's Plans May 8, 1907

Mr. Timothee Adamowski, who has been for twenty-two years one of the first violins of the Symphony Orchestra, and for nearly twenty-eight a virtuoso of repute here, has given in his resignation from the orchestra, to take effect on May 24, when he ends his present term as the conductor of the "Pop" concerts. He writes us of his future as follows: "I have found it impossible to combine the work of the Adamowski Trio and my solo work with that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on account of rehearsals and such a large number of concerts away from Boston. I have decided to devote my time entirely to chamber music and solo work. We have a new manager—Mr. Bigelow—who is taking hold of the Trio and the Quartet, and we expect with hard work to do as artistic work as is in our power." It is interesting and agreeable news that Mr. Adamowski intends to revive his quartet—the more because, with the dissolution of the Symphony Quartet, the field is open and the opportunity ripe for the establishment of a new series of chamber concerts here. In the revived quartet, Mr. Adamowski himself will play the first violin; Mr. Kuntz the second; Mr. Zach the viola, and Mr. Josef Adamowski, who has also resigned from the orchestra, the cello. As for the trio—Messrs. Adamowski and Mme. Szumowska—it has already won its place in Boston, and of late has made its way in other cities. The increasing liking for chamber concerts throughout the country opens a future to Mr. Adamowski and his associates that would have been impossible a few years ago. Here in Boston, no figure in the orchestra has been longer or more generally familiar to the public of the Symphony Concerts than Mr. Adamowski's, and almost every season it has applauded him in one or another concerto as a solo violinist.

JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY, MAY 8, 1907.

ADAMOWSKI LEAVES THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Famous Violinist and Second Concert Meister Resigns to Devote Attention to the Adamowski Trio. Conductor of "Pops."

New York, May 7.—Changes in the constitution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra continue to be made. Timothee Adamowski, the second concert-meister, has resigned his post and will no longer be seen at the first desk of the first violins. Mr. Adamowski has been twenty-three years a member of the orchestra, which he joined soon after his debut in this country as a violin virtuoso. He has frequently appeared as a soloist at the concerts of the organization and has been warmly praised.

Mr. Adamowski retires from the orchestra to devote his entire time to the increasing engagements of the Adamowski trio. This organization consists of Mr. Adamowski as violinist, his brother Josef Adamowski as cellist, and the latter's wife, formerly Miss Szumowska, pianist. Mme. Adamowski is a pupil of Paderewski and her playing is much admired. The Adamowski trio will be heard in this city oftener in the future.

A LEADER OF BOSTON'S EXCLUSIVE SOCIETY

The idol of the "Pops," Timothee Adamowski, and one of the first violinists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is one of the best musicians in the country. For nearly twenty-three years he has been a leading member of the Symphony Orchestra and has won hundreds of admirers throughout the country.

This favorite of music lovers was born in Warsaw in 1858, and there at a tender age he studied the violin under A. Kontchi, and, going to Paris in 1876, he became a pupil of the famous Massart. Three years later he came to America and was soloist with Strakosch and Clara Louise Kellogg.

Soon after this he formed a company of his own and toured the United States with great success. For a long time he was connected with the New England Conservatory of Music and proved to be one of the most promising instructors in the institution. As a violin soloist he has traveled extensively, appearing with great success.

TIMOTHEE ADAMOWSKI, WHO RESIGNS FROM
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

In 1888 he organized the Adamowski Quartet, which found much favor with the musical people and drew thousands of enthusiastic people to the many concerts given while he was the leader. A few years ago the Adamowski trio was formed. On Sept. 4, 1903, Timothee Adamowski was married to Miss Gertrude Lewis Pancoast, daughter of Dr. William H. Pancoast of Philadelphia. This wedding was attended by hundreds of society people from all over the country.

Endowed with rare combinations of charms Mrs. Timothee Adamowski secured the entree of the most exclusive social set in Boston and won the hearts of all the "400." As her husband had already played his way into recognition the smart set took a liking to the happy couple and today they are classed among the leaders of society.

A HEARTY END OF THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Much Applause for Dr. Muck and a Remarkable Performance of the "Eroica" Symphony—Mr. Kneisel Declines the Philadelphia Conductorship and His Quartet Is to Continue—Arenski's Piano Concerto in Cambridge—Mr. Bryce's Faulty Theatrical Memory—News of the Day

Trans. May 6, 1907

As the way is at the Symphony concerts, Dr. Muck's second leave-taking on Saturday evening was heartier and more festive than that of Friday afternoon. His music-stand was covered with greenery and decked with a large bouquet. Before he could begin Volkmann's overture, he had twice to acknowledge the applause of his audience. It recalled him as many times after Liszt's tone-poem; and at the end of the concert, his audience and his men both lingered. The conductor shook the departing Mr. Hess warmly by the hand, bowed and smiled to the clapping players who were now on their feet and then turned to the eagerly applauding audience. Twice and three times it recalled him, even to cheers, and from first to last the spirit of the leave-taking was very spontaneous and sincere. It was the just reward of all the stimulus Dr. Muck has given to the orchestra and of all the high, keen and varied pleasure he has given his audiences through the long season—the testimony to expectations fulfilled, the anticipation of fine achievements to come.

It pleased Dr. Muck to end the season somewhat as he began it. Last October the fifth symphony of Beethoven and shorter pieces that disclosed his powers as a dramatic conductor made his programme. On Saturday he ended the concert with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and before it came Volkmann's overture to "Richard III." and Liszt's tone-poem of "The Battle of the Huns," to confirm again those dramatic talents. More even than Wagner's "Faust" overture and the prelude to "The Meistersingers" at the first concert, it proclaimed them. Wagner's music is dramatic in itself. Whoever the conductor, it speaks. Volkmann's, on the other hand, needs the vitalizing touch of a conductor who can give by ingenious emphasis a momentary vividness to its thoughtful "effects." Liszt's tone-poem in turn may easily fall away into thunderous scraps of musical melodrama. Again on Saturday night Dr. Muck gave it the large proportions and coloring of a tonal fresco and the large voice of grandiose declamation. It sounded big, and it did not sound empty.

Often in the concerts of the winter has Dr. Muck seemed so to amplify and exalt essentially dramatic music.

The glory of the leave-taking, however, was the performance of Beethoven's symphony. Dr. Muck spared none of its lengths, and there was no need to spare them. In not a classic symphony of the year has his conducting been at once of more integrity and of more vitality. The symphony rose in its large outlines and its intimate details before the ears and the minds of his hearers. The music seemed to spring on and on, out of itself into spontaneous fullness and rounded completeness. Yet within this impression of creating design and within all this integrity of structure was adroit variety of melodic line and transformation, of rhythmic accent and contrast, of supple modulation, of tonal weight and color, of adroit transition, of gathering climax. Not once did Dr. Muck seem to be forcing the music. Rather, so spontaneous did it all seem, he was seizing its transparent possibilities. Recall the variety of orchestral song with which he filled the first movement; the dramatic accent in gradations and colorings and contrasts of tone with which he intensified the funeral march; the keen rhythmic zest of the scherzo; the elation of movement and of mood that made the variations of the finale high rhapsody. Throughout the symphony moved on large and lofty planes; throughout its voice was noble. The listeners felt the exaltation of such beauty and power of sound. The symphony needed no speculations as to the hero of Beethoven's imagination. It was heroic in its own right.

H. T. P.

Journal May 8, 1907

Yesterday's at home given by Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck at the Tuilleries was one of the most congenial, decorative and best managed of any I have attended this year. It called out a large number, largely representative of the musical and social set. An attractive feature was the bountifully laden table, adorned with marguerites and white candles, besides being presided over by Mrs. Hugo Munsterberg and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, the former in white silk and white picture hat, Mrs. Chadwick in green chiffon and velvet, with pink flower trimmed hat of gray. Near at hand was Mrs. William Dana Orcutt serving frappe.

It was a pleasure to be so graciously welcomed as all were by the Messrs. Adamowski, Wallace Goodrich, Frederick Converse, Clayton Johns and Otto Roth, who were the ushers.

Mrs. Muck wore a white silk gown en Princesse, enriched with rare lace and further adorned with a few well placed jewels. She carried valley lilies and was assisted by Dr. Muck.

Some of the Guests.

Conspicuous among the guests were Mrs. Henry M. Whitney, in gray crepe, with stunning hat of leghorn, trimmed with bands of violet velvet and yellow plumes; Mrs. John L. Gardner, in black crepe de chine, with embroidered yoke, and odd-shaped hat, with bird of paradise plumes; Mrs. Richard Hamlin Jones, in white crepe and flowered toque of valley lilies and pink roses; Mrs. F. L. Milliken, in white lace, very dainty; Miss Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Stasny, Mrs. Philip Hale, Miss Elfrieda Schroeder, Mr. and Mrs. Heinrich Warnke, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. H. G. Tucker, Otto Sonne, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Francis W. Kittredge, William Kittredge, E. Fiske Beebe, Mrs. Charles A. Cheney, Mrs. Frederick Converse, in dark blue and white veiling and becoming toque; Mr. and Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, the latter in golden brown chiffon silk; F. R. Comee, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Parkman B. Haven, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Arthur Foote, Mrs. Stanley P. McCormick.

Miss Anita Calef, Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Mrs. Bazely, George Proctor, Frau Augusta Schmidt, Mrs. B. L. Robinson, Mrs. Henry Lee Morse, Mrs. Robert D. Evans, Mrs. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Robert M. Morse, Mrs. Jessie Leonard, Mrs. Walter Wesselhoeft, Mr. and Mrs. John Devlin, Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Quincy, Mrs. S. Parkman Blake, Mr. and Mrs. Thacher Loring, Miss Loring, Mrs. George Dudley Howe, Mrs. Edward W. Converse, Mr. and Mrs. Franz Zerrahn, Holker Abbott, Mrs. George Stoddard, Mrs. T. Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. E. V. Mitchell, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. James Delano, Mrs. Everett Burdette, Mrs. Paul Revere Frothingham, Mrs. Charles Hellier and Miss Hellier, Mrs. Herbert Wallace, Miss Wallace, Mrs. William Lindsey and Miss Leslie Lindsey, who was a picture in coral pink. The Mucks are leaving us in a few days for Germany.

MR. ADAMOWSKI'S FAREWELL

His Final Appearance Last Evening as Conductor of the Pops

Trans. May 24, 1907

An audience that filled Symphony Hall from floor to gallery assembled last evening not merely to listen to the music and to enjoy the social entertainment, but also to applaud and to bid farewell to Mr. Timothee Adamowski. It was Mr. Adamowski's last evening as the leader of the Pop Concerts, and as he has resigned from the Symphony Orchestra, it was virtually his farewell performance before the Boston public as a Symphony player.

Mr. Adamowski was warmly received, his entire programme was generously applauded, and at its conclusion he was given a reception that he will always hold in memory. During his career in Boston, which began a quarter of a century ago, he has been a leading figure in our musical circles, and it is certain that his retirement from the Symphony Orchestra will in no wise lessen either his activities or his influence here in this city. Mr. Adamowski first led the orchestra at the Pop Concerts in 1891, continuing in that position for four years through the season of 1904. After a considerable interval, he returned to the leader's desk in 1903, and has shared it with his associates, Mr. Zach, Mr. Steube and others, up to the present time. Last night's Pop Concert was the 1110th time since the beginning, and of these Mr. Adamowski has conducted nearly three hundred, which is something over one-quarter of the entire number.

(Photo by Post artist.)

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck, who are going abroad for the season and a black and white toque with yellow aigrettes; Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Quincy, Mrs. Quincy in pearl gray with stunning hats with bands of white plumes; Mrs. John crepe de chine, and odd-shaped lilies; Mrs. Jones, in white of valley lilies; L. Milliken, in white; Miss Foote, Mr. Mrs. Philip Hale, der, Mr. and M.

Maj. Henry L. H. H. G. Tucker, O. Astor Carey, M. tledge, William Beebe, Mrs. Ch. Frederick Converse, white velling and and Mrs. L. H. golden brown ch. Dr. and Mrs. H. B. Haven, Mr. a Arthur Foote, M. mick.

Miss Anita Cal Stevens, Mrs. B. Frau Augusta Robinson, Mrs. Robert D. Evans, Robert M. Morse, Mrs. Walter W. John Devlin, Quincy, Mrs. S. and Mrs. Thache, Mrs. George Dud W. Converse, Zerrahn, Holker Stoddard, Mrs. Mrs. E. V. Mitch rich, Mrs. Jame Burdette, Mrs. ham, Mrs. Cha Hellier, Mrs. Wallace, Mrs. W. Leslie Lindsey, coral pink. The in a few days f ail ers fully ed

Boys' Stylish Suits

200 Boys' Double Breasted Suits, with two pair pants, in four beautiful patterns, absolutely $4.00 each, for Friday and Saturday 2.

Boys' Sailor and Russian Suits, in light and dark cy Scotch material, ages 10 years, were $4.00, special at 2.

Boys' Odd Knickerbocker Pants, $1.25 and $1.50 each, in corduroy and chev for Friday and Saturday 7

Special Young Men's Suits, blue serge and fancy cassim double breasted coats, worth $10.00, at 7.

PRESIDENT SPEAKS IN PRAISE OF MOTHERS

Continued From First Page

son of the general, and Dr. George McClellan of New Jersey, a nephew, who pulled the string releasing the flags in which the statue was enveloped, occupied seats on the President's stand.

The diplomatic corps, the army and navy, and civil and military were largely represented at the gathering.

Brigadier-General Henry C. Dwight, U. S. Volunteers, the president of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, presided.

The President delivered a typical speech, in which he touched upon a variety of subjects, including war, peace, national pride, the family and the qualities that make for brotherhood and fraternity. After extending a greeting on behalf of the nation to Mrs. McClellan and her son and others, the President said, in part:

"To General McClellan it was given to command in some of the hardest fought battles and most campaigns in the great war of this hemisphere, so that his name will be forever linked with the mighty memories that arise when we speak of Antietam and South Mountain and Malvern, so that we never of the great army of the Potomac out having rise before us the General McClellan, the man who led and first led it. There given to him the peculiar gift is possessed by but very few combine the qualities that we enthusiastic love and admiration soldiers who fought with and and the qualities that in dearer him peculiarly to all in contact with him.

"We have listened recently deal of talk about peace. It of all of us to strive for peace that it comes on the right to believe that the man who really work for the State in peace man who at need will do well.

"If peace is merely another self-indulgence, for sloth, for the avoidance of duty, have Seek the peace that comes man armed, who will dare to rights if the need should arise.

The President said there was son in this country he put all soldier—"the really good good wife and mother who ha full duty."

Dr. and Mrs. Muck Give an At Home at the Tuileries Before Sailing for Germany, and Many Friends Bid Them Au Revoir.

Herald May 12, 1907

Over 150 people representing equally the best musical and social contingent, passed in and out of the Tuileries, Tuesday afternoon, from 4 to 6:30, in response to Dr. and Mrs. Karl Muck's cards of invitation. It was a most interesting reception from every point of view and a gracious way of saying au revoir to the many friends the Symphony orchestra leader and his wife have made here during this, their first year in Boston, before leaving for their holiday in their German home. Mrs. Muck, who has an attractive face and is of the blonde type, was looking exceedingly well in an empire gown of cream crepe de chine with pailletted lace, and turquoise and diamond ornaments. Just back of Mr. and Mrs. Muck, as they stood to receive, were arranged baskets and clusters of blooms which had been sent by friends. At the tea table, which was done with daisies, Mrs. Muensterberg, Mrs. George Chadwick and Mrs. Dana Orcutt presided. Mrs. Munsterberg was in gray and a hat of the same tone with white plumes; Mrs. Chadwick in a pale green gown and hat, and Mrs. Orcutt in gray chiffon and a green plumed hat. Mr. Josef and Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, Mr. Otto Roth and Mr. Frederick Converse were the ushers.

Some of the many who called were Mrs. Paul Revere Frothingham, in black silk with jetted lace and a jet toque with black plumes; Mrs. Henry M. Whitney, in pearl gray chiffon and a yellow plumed hat banded with purple velvet; Mrs. James J. Storrow, in green cloth and a white hat with pink roses and black velvet; Mr. and Mrs. Franz Zerrahn, the latter in dark blue cloth, with white Irish lace collar and cuffs, and a black and white toque with yellow aigrettes; Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Quincy, Mrs. Quincy in pearl gray voile with a mauve embroidered dot, the bodice of mauve liberty and lace, and a large white hat with black plumes; Mrs. Thomas Russell, smoke-colored cloth with touches of black velvet, and yellow on her white hat; Mrs. Frederick S. Converse, dark blue silk figured in white, the bodice almost entirely of white lace, and a pale blue hat done in mauve; Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, dark gray cloth and a large black hat with white marabout feathers; Mrs. Stanley McCormick, in Gobelin blue cloth and a pearl gray plumed hat; Mrs. T. Adamowski, black cloth with Persian embroidery and a black plumed hat; Mrs. Josef Adamowski, blue cloth and a leghorn hat with yellow roses; Mrs. William Lindsey, in black chiffon and lace with pompadour insets over white and a large pale blue hat; Miss Leslie Lindsey, in coral colored chiffon cloth and a plumed hat to match; Mrs. William A. L. Bazeley, dark blue voile with silk straps and a white hat with brown feathers; Mr. and Mrs. Philip Hale, Mrs. Hale wearing pale blue silk with lace and a large black hat; Mr. Arthur Foote, Miss Katherine Foote, who wore blue cloth and a black toque with pink roses; Mrs. Robert M. Morse, in cream-colored cloth with insets of lace and embroidery and a shaded red toque; Mrs. Henry Lee Morse, in dark blue voile with white lace and a black plumed hat; Miss Anita Calef, French blue voile with white lace and a black hat with black and white plumes; Miss Ida Vose, a dark blue princess gown with white lace and a blue hat with pale blue flowers and shaded plumes; Mrs. John L. Gardner, all in black, excepting the purple paradise aigrette on her toque; Mr. George Proctor, Mr. and Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Mr. F. R. Comee, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, Dr. William Sturgis Bigelow, Mrs. R. D. Evans and Miss Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Lang, Mr. Parkman Haven, Mr. George W. Chadwick, Mr. William P. Blake, Mr. E. Pierson Beebe, Mr. Holker Abbott, Mrs. A. A. Carey, Mr. and Mrs. Vinton, Mrs. Charles Cheney and Mr. and Mrs. C. Howard Walker.

WHO SHALL CONTROL THE SYMPHONY?

To the Editor of the Transcript:

May 11, 1907

There is a rumor abroad that some fifteen of the present players of the Symphony Orchestra are to be discharged at the end of the current season and their places filled by new importations. As a concert-goer whose attendance on Saturday night has been, since 1889, nearly as constant as the recurring weeks upon the calendar, and as a lover of the members of the orchestra jointly and severally, I find this rumor disquieting from several points of view.

First, a year ago the orchestra was declared the peer of almost any European Orchestra. Is it possible that in the short time since such deterioration can have taken place as to require that percentage of expulsions? Or does the reason for such deterioration lie elsewhere? Is it possible, if the tenure of office is in the power of the conductor, that he can in one year sufficiently judge the players' individual powers as to justify many summary dismissals? Is it advisable, in view of the short contract of the conductor, that fifteen vacancies be created that may readily recur one year hence, shall the incoming conductor see fit? Amalgamation of new material takes time; will the orchestra at the end of Dr. Muck's service be improved by the substitution of even better players perhaps at one-seventh or one-sixth of the desks?

Second, the effect on the men of a loose tenure of office is of the very worst. The feeling that a slip, or even several slips, may cause discharge, creates a nervous condition conducive to the making of those slips. No one wishes to introduce the life tenure said to obtain in Germany, but some middle ground giving reasonable assurance of continuance in office may be found. The falling-off in skill of the players under this strain occasionally works great hardship in our orchestra. The members deserve special consideration owing to the difficulty in obtaining new positions. Having resigned from the Musical Union, they must seek readmittance, which is at best problematical and accompanied by a severe fine.

The very pension fund is endangered. If ten years' service (as I understand) is required, what reason is there for enthusiasm in playing, and rehearsing for two or three extra concerts, when any one of the players may at any time find himself out of the organization and all its benefits? It is sincerely to be wished that the rumor is false and that the men whose loyalty and endeavor are undoubted may find assurance and stability in office.

CHARLES PEABODY

Cambridge, April 29.

[The facts in the case are briefly these: The players of the Symphony Orchestra are engaged under contracts of varying length, without understanding of any kind as to their renewal. At the end of the current musical year several of the expiring contracts will not be renewed, but the number is considerably less than fifteen. The sole reason for this action is want of due efficiency on the part of the men affected. Of that efficiency in a body of ninety-five men, someone must be the final judge and authority, and that one in an orchestra, organized as is ours, is necessarily the conductor. No one knows so well as he by daily and intimate knowledge the capacity of his men for the work in hand and the spirit in which they approach it. No one is so directly responsible for the maintenance and the raising of its standard of proficiency. If he believes that certain of his men are inefficient, when abler men can be found to take their places, and acts accordingly, there can be no appeal from his decision. If he were to be swayed by the preferences of one or another of his hearers, by personal considerations or by sentimental sympathies, there would be an end to the discipline and decision necessary to the control of such an organization as the Symphony Orchestra. High as its rank is, it may still be possible to make it better, and no orchestra can stand still, however painful personally changes in it may be. The conductor in such matters acts like the head of any other organization in business or in the professions, who is responsible for its efficiency and sets that efficiency above every other consideration. As for the Pension Fund, the ordering of it from the first has been in the hands of the men. Retiring players receive its benefits, if under its rules they are entitled to them, or else their own contributions to the fund.]

PROF HESS RETIRES.

Slobe — Apr 23, 07
As Concertmaster of the
Symphony Orchestra.

Work Too Hard—Carl Wendling of Germany Succeeds Him.

At his own urgent request Prof Willy Hess has been released from his duties as concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. With his family he will sail for Germany next month and will spend next winter in Europe. His reasons for leaving Boston are that his three years here have entailed a vast quantity of very hard work and he wants to rest, and incidentally fill numerous solo engagements on the continent which have been offered to him.

PROF WILLY HESS.

His successor for next season will be Carl Wendling, who comes to Boston next fall on a year's leave of absence from his duties as concert master at the Hoftheater in Stuttgart. Mr Wendling has the reputation of being one of the best violinists and best concert masters in Germany. He was concert master at the last festival in Bayreuth.

THE HOMAGE OF VERSE

The Minor Poet Sings, After Some Misadventures, to Dr. Muck and Heinrich Gebhard, and of Sibelius and Cesar Franck, with a Woful Complaint for a Beginning Trans. Apr. 27, 1907

Once upon a time, in fact in the winter that is just past, the poet heard Sibelius's symphony in E minor as Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra played it and, at a chamber concert, Cesar Franck's quintet in F minor for piano and strings as Mr. Heinrich Gebhard and the Symphony Quartet played it. Straightway the poet wrote verses of the symphony that he inscribed to Dr. Muck and of the quintet that he inscribed to Mr. Gebhard. And in due course he sent the verses to the musical editor of the Transcript. A chance pigeon-hole, bidden to detain them for a day, has held them with the depravity of its kind in the full tide of a season, for many a week. It might be holding them still, if the magic of the "Complainte" of the poet had not set them free. By its spell the verses to Sibelius and Franck have leapt their prison. It is an appealing "complainte," akin to the "prières" that the song-mongers are hawking in these spring twilights in the lanes and alleys of Montmartre. It deserves, therefore, to herald the captives it has released.

THE "COMPLAINTE"

Dear H. T. P.,
When night shades flee
And dawn leaps o'er the hills,
My first thought gropes about for thee
And, 'twixt quick sarugs and chills,
My voice intones a litany!
And at broad noon,
When roses swoon,
Still will I pause to say:
"I wonder whether, very soon,
Kind H. T. P. will pay
Respect to my wild Ugrian croon?"

And, H. T. P.,
In revery,
When eve returns again,
"Sibelius and his symphony"
Are ever my refrain,
My moan, my plaintive psalmody!

And now the freed verses:

SIBELIUS'S E-MINOR SYMPHONY

(To Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

I.

Andante, ma non troppo—Allegro energico
Fog-laden, lo, a blare and rush of winds
From highlands where the June day dwells bereft
Of night and moon and stars! And from that blare
Comes forth, ghost-like, a lonely, bleating call—
Is it a minstrel piping ancient tales

Of combats won, and battles bravely lost?
Mirrored in ponds and interlinking lakes;
The rocks and fir-tree forests listen, too;
And, islet-locked, the dull, gruff Finnish sea
Its foam-coat shakes; as it were, a mighty bear
Of mythic Northern lore; while frosty blasts Sweep from the tundras far beyond those heights
Where June beholds no stars nor moon nor night.

II.

Andante, ma non troppo lento
Hush! The lone minstrel lays aside his pipe,
And tunes a harp, that he may softly chant
Heroic deeds of singlehanded might;
Or, a still gentler legend fraught with love;
How a grave, simple youth grew lean and sad
With yearning for the unknown outer world,
Till the red lips of some grave, simple lass
Whispered him that in Finland he must stay;
Whilst thick larch-boughs concealed close-twining arms,
And summer breezes muted many a kiss
And ardent vow. But hark! Whence comes this wail
For hearts, once happy, grown all cold and still?
Oh, the sad beauty of the minstrel's chant,
Subdued & rising, dusky with strange shade,
Or wel-ly ch with twilight-crimson tints
And gleams of gold through interlacing pines,
Which turn to silver 'mongst the reedy fens!

III.

Allegro

A clash and clatter mixed with roll of drums!
It is a rude, smoke-scented fishers' fair,
Where greasy Lapps, come from the Arctic wastes,
Barter deer-skins for strings of Venice beads,
And drink or join in some rough peasant dance;
While boats are hauled high on the dull-
white sand,
And flaxen-haired, grave men spin sailors'
yarns,
Or tell ghost tales about the marshy wilds,
Until they smoke and drink themselves to sleep,
Nor hark the clatter, nor the roll of drums!

IV.

Finale (Quasi una Fantasia) Andante— Allegro molto

Yet once again the minstrel takes his pipe
To wake anew the wildwood's savage breast.
But hark! Not nature only answer makes:
The deep, keen passion of a people's wrongs Takes up the primal strain, and moans and grieves
In soul-o'erwhelming ecstasy of woe:
The tyranny of Swedish lords and Russian czars;
The fox and wolf, in human guise and garb;
The age on age of strife and agony;

War for one's life and war for liberty;
A flood, a torrent, whose fierce, tingling rush
Smothers and drowns all tones of lesser power
In its herculean roar of victory!

CESAR FRANCK'S QUINTET IN F MINOR (To Heinrich Gebhard)

I.

Molto moderato quasi lento—Allegro
Gray, cloud-swept northern skies;
Brown, wind-swept northern heaths,
With scruboaks hung with wreaths
Of bronzed, frost-shrivelled leaves—
A place for memoried sighs,
Where the lone spirit grieves
Until its pent-up tears
Break from the thrall of years
And, in a bitter flood,
Rouse the long dormant blood!

II.

Lento con molto sentimento
Is this a vision? Hush! What may it be?
An echo, and uncertain whispering?
What tribute do these shadowy pilgrims bring
From combats or from triumphs of the past?
Whence come they, over what storm-haunted sea,
To seek heart solace on still slopes at last?
With folded hands, to quench mad passion's fire
In waters of mystic, sunset-calm desire;
To feel the thrill of olden, troublous dreams
Renewed, transfigured, sanctified by gleams
From Love's celestial, glorious sacristy;
Robed all in samite stoles of revery,
They pass through pillared cloisters dimly lit
Before their coming—walks where ivy weaves
Dark runes; where white doves, cooling, flit
From sculptured pavements to moss-girdled eaves.
Ah! shall they stay to smile where Love's cheek glows
Faintly as a dawn-kissed damask rose,
Or as the opalescent blush that twines
Round marble filigree of Orient sarine?

III.

Allegro non troppo, ma con fuoco

A swirling of dense mist—
And hark! a rush of wings,
Flashing, lightning swift:
As when a courier brings
A message or a gift,
Then far away has sped
Ere one's ear scarce may list
His steed's receding tread!
Whilst, as wind-voices fly,
So leaps the heart to cry
Anew its deep refrain
Before life's pulse shall wane!

WILLIAM STRUTHERS

Fewer Soloists Than Usual at the Symphony Concerts; "Erminie" in Jordan Hall; the "Pops" Commence Again.

Heard May 5 BY PHILIP HALE. 1907

THE season of 1906-07, which was brought to a close by the Symphony concert last night, was a distinguished one in certain ways.

The Symphony orchestra played under a new conductor; another orchestra was established here; Mr. Lang, the conductor of the Cecilia Society from its foundation, laid down the baton.

Foreign composers visited us. Mr. Leoncavallo came first with a queer orchestra and a still queerer assortment of Italian singers. He behaved in a dignified manner and took his music seriously, even when he was conducting the overture to "Roland of Berlin." A brave man, too, for he did not turn a hair during the performance of the grand septet from "I Medici."

Mr. Camille Saint-Saens, who was used by the critics in New York as a club to lambast his countrymen of the ultra-modern school, beamed on us and played three of his own waltzes in rapid succession; but even his Canary waltz did not console us for a programme which did not include any one of his symphonic poems.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor came and did not conduct any one of his choral works at a Cecilia concert. His chamber music did not turn from the error of their ways those who do not believe that the American music of the future must be based on Negro, Indian and Creole tunes.

The Handel and Haydn performed Handel's "Belshazzar" for the first time, it is said, in America. After the performance this statement was readily believed by some, who forgot that "David," by the Chevalier Neukomm, was once a favorite oratorio in Boston.

The Cecilia performed for the first time in this city Pierne's "Children's Crusade" and an abridged version of Paine's "Azara."

The end of the season saw the death of the Choral Art Society, for its leader, Mr. Goodrich, is now the conductor of the Cecilia.

There were visiting prima donnas, who gave song recitals and concerts:
Mmes. Melba, Sembrich, Eames, Galski, and Schumann-Heink. Mme. Melba shone resplendent. Nor should Mme. Nordica be forgotten, who gave one of the most entertaining vaudeville shows ever seen in the town.

Pianists visited us for the first time; Mme. Goodson, who came prudently provided with letters to patrons and patronesses of art; Miss Schultzer, who brought no letters and revealed a surprisingly developed mechanism and a poetic, fiery, imaginative soul; Dr. Neitzel, a scholarly critic with a pretty wit.

Mr. Macmillen of Marietta played the violin and showed that the reports of his proficiency which were published in the London journals were not wholly incredible. Mr. Hartmann, known here some years ago as a child wonder and then as a student, returned a well equipped virtuoso.

"Madam Butterfly" was performed here (in English) for the first time by Mr.
Savage's company and later (in Italian) by the Metropolitan Opera House Company. "Hansel and Gretel" was performed here for the first time in an adequate manner and in German. Mr. Converse's music to "Jeanne d'Arc" was heard in connection with Mr. Mackaye's play.

The week of grand opera vouchsafed to us by Mr. Conried was made conspicuous chiefly by the impersonations of Miss Geraldine Farrar, the vocal wealth of Mr. Caruso, the pluck and intelligence of Mme. Jacoby, the general excellence of the performances of "Madam Butterfly" and "Tosca," and the unspeakably poor performance of "Martha," which was after all a worthy response to the "wishes of prominent subscribers," who insisted on hearing again the "delightful old tunes."

There were excellent chamber concerts, and the announcement was made that in future there will be no Boston symphony quartet, no quartet supported directly by the Boston symphony orchestra.

But the true feature of the season was the performance for the first time in this city of Debussy's "Sea," the symphony and violin concerto of Sibelius—the superb performance of the concerto by Maud Powell is naturally included—and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Performances of familiar orchestral works as led by Dr. Muck were also memorable.

The True Features.

For greater than virtuoso, operatic heroine, prima donna in song, orchestral conductor, is the work performed.

Dr. Muck brought out compositions that justly provoked the question: "Why did he do it?" Was there any good and sufficient reason for spending time and labor on the symphonies by Bendix and Brockway, and "Olaf's Wedding Dance" by Ritter?

There was good reason for producing Reger's Serenade. The man is much discussed; he has hysterical followers and bitter foes. It was only fair to the composer and to the audience that his music should be heard. The "Polyeucte" music of Tinel will in all probability not be played here again, but Tinel was already known as the composer of the oratorio "Franciscus," and there might have been curiosity to become acquainted with his chief orchestral work.

No doubt there are many who did not like the compositions by Debussy, Sibelius and Strauss, which have been named above. No doubt there are many who were bored by them. This was natural and to be expected. Music of this radical nature must inevitably provoke stormy opposition. The ultra-moderns are sharing the fate of Monteverde, Gluck, Beethoven, Berlioz, Schumann, Verdi, Wagner, Franck, Brahms, Tschaiikowsky.

I do not say that the works by Debussy, Sibelius and Strauss are immortal or that they will be as impressive 100 years hence as they are today, for there is nothing more uncertain and also more laughable than prophecy in matters of art. The gaunt and terrible old man smiles at the prophet and with a stroke of his scythe cuts him down together with those for whom the prophet had already shaped pedestals. I do say that this music should be heard under the best possible conditions; that it should be judged not in comparison with music by Beethoven or Brahms, not with music by Bach and Schumann, but by itself or in comparison with music of those contemporary in thought as in life. For there are composers who are even now publishing though they are dead.

Unless there be fierce discussion over art, that art is commercial, critical or stagnant, and there is no judgment in the hearer.

Every phase of development in music should be as interesting as any phase of development in chemistry, electricity, surgery. Does any one believe for a moment that form in music was established long ago, rigidly and forever? Does any one believe that a melodic thought must always have an orthodox contour; that an experimenter in harmonic schemes is necessarily a dangerous person; that a new colorist is a blasphemer; that the impressionist in music should be led to the stake?

No one, on the other hand, is so foolish as to insist that the newcomers should drive out the classics who in their own day were revolutionaries. Can there not be evolution in music, in musical taste? Should we all be obliged to grovel in the dust before the shrine of the sonata form?

Dr. Muck's Programmes.

It is a good thing also that the programmes arranged by Dr. Muck have excited debate.

The Herald has often discussed the question of programme-making, and it does not now purpose to inquire curiously into this art.

If any one without prejudice should look over Dr. Muck's programmes of last season, he would be struck first of all by the catholicity of the man. The classics, old and new, the romanticists from Bach to Debussy, were impartially represented. Dr. Muck has welcomed the Finn and the Frenchman, the Pole and the Norwegian. That most sensitive person, the American composer, has every reason to applaud this admirable conductor. Brockway, Chadwick, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Palne are the names of the Americans whose works were heard, and their music was rehearsed as diligently and performed with as much care as though they had all received foreign wreaths and diplomas.

However singular the arrangement of some of the programmes may have appeared, Dr. Muck had undoubtedly a purpose in the arrangement. One programme was classical; another was modern and romantic; one was of an almost strictly national character; another was a study in the development of the symphony. Probably the least effective was the one in which Smetana followed Noskowski, and Dvorak followed Smetana, with Tschaiikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony as the final number. That two Bohemians were thus grouped with a Pole was unfortunate, for a similarity in tonal color brought monotony. Dr. Muck's dramatic insight and his imaginative faculty were never better displayed than when he placed Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" immediately after Chabrier's dazzling "España." There was no anti-climax; there was a contrast without a loss of intensity; neither composition suffered.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1906-1907.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
BACH: Suite No. 2, in B minor, for Flute and Strings (von Bülow's Arrangement), October 20, 1906	87
Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, in G major, for Three Violins, Three Violas, Three Violoncellos, and Bass, March 9, 1907	1291
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, May 4, 1907	1841
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67, October 13, 1906	7
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92, December 22, 1906	692
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93, March 9, 1907	1327
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72, December 1, 1906	542
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84, December 22, 1906, Concerto in G major, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 (OTTO NEITZEL *), December 22, 1906	677
BENDIX, VICTOR: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 30,† April 27, 1907	1747
BERLIOZ: "Harold in Italy," Symphony in Four Movements, with Viola Solo, Op. 16 (Viola Solo by E. FERIR †), January 26, 1907	1011
Brahms *), November 2, 1906	208
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9	1262
Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps, Ballet of Sylphs, and Rákóczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," October 27, 1906	208
Melody, "The Captive," Op. 12 (BERTHA CHILD *), March 30, 1907	1465
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68, October 27, 1906	167
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80, February 16, 1907	1184
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A, December 29, 1906	735
Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 83 (OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH *), February 16, 1907	1157
BROCKWAY: Symphony in D major, Op. 12, April 6, 1907	1519
BRUCKNER: Symphony in E major, No. 7, December 1, 1906	495
CHABRIER: "España," Rhapsody for Orchestra, April 27, 1907	1750
CHADWICK: Symphonic Poem, "Cleopatra,"  December 15, 1906	584
CHERUBINI: Overture to the Opera, "The Abencerrages," March 30, 1907	1443
CHOPIN: Concerto in E minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 11 (ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA), November 17, 1906	342
CONVERSE, F. S.: "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy (after the Poem by Walt Whitman), Op. 19, January 26, 1907	975
DEBUSSY: "The Sea," Three Orchestral Sketches, March 2,

excellence of the performances of "Madam Butterfly" and "Tosca," and the unspeakably poor performance of "Martha," which was after all a worthy response to the "wishes of prominent subscribers," who insisted on hearing again the "delightful old tunes."

There were excellent chamber concerts, and the announcement was made that in future there will be no Boston symphony quartet, no quartet supported directly by the Boston symphony orchestra.

But the true feature of the season was the performance for the first time in this city of Debussy's "Sea," the symphony and violin concerto of Sibelius—the superb performance of the concerto by Maud Powell is naturally included—and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." Performances of familiar orchestral works as led by Dr. Muck were also memorable.

The True Features.

For greater than virtuoso, operatic heroine, prima donna in song, orchestral conductor, is the work performed.

Dr. Muck brought out compositions that justly provoked the question: "Why did he do it?" Was there any good and sufficient reason for spending time and labor on the symphonies by Bendix and Brockway, and "Olaf's Wedding Dance" by Ritter?

There was good reason for producing Reger's Serenade. The man is much discussed; he has hysterical followers and bitter foes. It was only fair to the composer and to the audience that his music should be heard. The "Polyeucte" music of Tinel will in all probability not be played here again, but Tinel was already known as the composer of the oratorio "Franciscus," and there might have been curiosity to become acquainted with his chief orchestral work.

No doubt there are many who did not like the compositions by Debussy, Sibelius and Strauss, which have been named above. No doubt there are many who were bored by them. This was natural and to be expected. Music of this radical nature must inevitably provoke stormy opposition. The ultra-moderns are sharing the fate of Monteverde, Gluck, Beethoven, Berlioz, Schumann, Verdi, Wagner, Franck, Brahms, Tschalkowsky.

I do not say that the works by Debussy, Sibelius and Strauss are immortal or that they will be as impressive 100 years hence as they are today, for there is nothing more uncertain and also more laughable than prophecy in matters of art. The gaunt and terrible old man smiles at the prophet and with a stroke of his scythe cuts him down together with those for whom the prophet had already shaped pedestals. I do say that this music should be heard under the best possible conditions; that it should be judged not in comparison with music by Beethoven or Brahms, not with music by Bach and Schumann, but by itself or in comparison with music of those contemporary in thought as in life. For there are composers who are even now publishing though they are dead.

Unless there be fierce discussion over art, that art is commercial, uncritical or stagnant, and there is no judgment in the hearer.

Every phase of development in music should be as interesting as any phase of development in chemistry, electricity, surgery. Does any one believe for a moment that form in music was established long ago, rigidly and forever? Does any one believe that a melodic thought must always have an orthodox contour; that an experimenter in harmonic schemes is necessarily a dangerous person; that a new colorist is a blasphemer; that the impressionist in music should be led to the stake?

No one, on the other hand, is so foolish as to insist that the newcomers should drive out the classics who in their own day were revolutionaries. Can there not be evolution in music, in musical taste? Should we all be obliged to grovel in the dust before the shrine of the sonata form?

Dr. Muck's Programmes.

It is a good thing also that the programmes arranged by Dr. Muck have excited debate.

The Herald has often discussed the question of programme-making, and it does not now purpose to inquire curiously into this art.

If any one without prejudice should look over Dr. Muck's programmes of last season, he would be struck first of all by the catholicity of the man. The classics, old and new, the romanticists from Bach to Debussy, were impartially represented. Dr. Muck has welcomed the Finn and the Frenchman, the Pole and the Norwegian. That most sensitive person, the American composer, has every reason to applaud this admirable conductor. Brockway, Chadwick, Converse, Hadley, MacDowell, Palne are the names of the Americans whose works were heard, and their music was rehearsed as diligently and performed with as much care as though they had all received foreign wreaths and diplomas.

However singular the arrangement of some of the programmes may have appeared, Dr. Muck had undoubtedly a purpose in the arrangement. One programme was classical; another was modern and romantic; one was of an almost strictly national character; another was a study in the development of the symphony. Probably the least effective was the one in which Smetana followed Noskowski, and Dvorak followed Smetana, with Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony as the final number. That two Bohemians were thus grouped with a Pole was unfortunate, for a similarity in tonal color brought monotony. Dr. Muck's dramatic insight and his imaginative faculty were never better displayed than when he placed Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" immediately after Chabrier's dazzling "Espana." There was no anti-climax; there was a contrast without a loss of intensity; neither composition suffered.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON OF 1906-1907.

Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

	PAGE
BACH: Suite No. 2, in B minor, for Flute and Strings (von Bülow's Arrangement), October 20, 1906	87
Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, in G major, for Three Violins, Three Violas, Three Violoncellos, and Bass, March 9, 1907	1291
BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, May 4, 1907	1841
Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67, October 13, 1906	7
Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92, December 22, 1906	692
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93, March 9, 1907	1327
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72, December 1, 1906	542
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84, December 22, 1906, Concerto in G major, for Pianoforte, Op. 58 (OTTO NEITZEL *), December 22, 1906	655
BENDIX, VICTOR: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 30,† April 27, 1907	677
BERLIOZ: "Harold in Italy," Symphony in Four Movements, with Viola Solo, Op. 16 (Viola Solo by E. FERIR †), January 26, 1907	1747
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9	1011
Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps, Ballet of Sylphs, and Rákóczy March, from "The Damnation of Faust," October 27, 1906	208
Melody, "The Captive," Op. 12 (BERTHA CHILD *), March 30, 1907	1465
BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68, October 27, 1906	167
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80, February 16, 1907	1184
Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn, Op. 56A, December 29, 1906	735
Concerto in B-flat major, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 83 (OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH *), February 16, 1907	1157
BROCKWAY: Symphony in D major, Op. 12, April 6, 1907	1519
BRUCKNER: Symphony in E major, No. 7, December 1, 1906	495
CHABRIER: "Espana," Rhapsody for Orchestra, April 27, 1907	1750
CHADWICK: Symphonic Poem, "Cleopatra,"  December 15, 1906	584
CHERUBINI: Overture to the Opera, "The Abencerrages," March 30, 1907	1443
CHOPIN: Concerto in E minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 11 (ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA), November 17, 1906	342
CONVERSE, F. S.: "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy (after the Poem by Walt Whitman), Op. 19, January 26, 1907	975
DEBUSSY: "The Sea," Three Orchestral Sketches, March 2,

1907, and April 20, 1907	1215, 1706
DUKAS: Scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (after a Ballad by Goethe), February 9, 1907	1055
DVOŘÁK: Dramatic Overture, "Husitská," Op. 67, March 16, 1907	1389
ELGAR: Overture, "In the South," Op. 50, December 15, 1906	575
FRIED: Prelude and Double Fugue, for Full Orchestra of Strings, Op. 10, March 30, 1907	1462
GLAZOUNOFF: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55, November 24, 1906	445
GOLDMARK: Overture to "Sakuntala," Op. 13, January 5, 1907,	815
GRIEG: Concert Overture, "In Autumn," Op. 11, April 20, 1907	1671
Concerto in A minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 16 (KATHARINE GOODSON ), January 19, 1907	906
HADLEY: "Salome," Tone Poem for Orchestra, after Oscar Wilde's Tragedy, Op. 55,† April 13, 1907	1600
HAYDN: Symphony in D major (B. & H., No. 2), March 9, 1907,	1298
Symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13), October 20, 1906,	104
LISZT: Symphonic Poem, No. 11, "The Battle of the Huns," May 4, 1907	1830
Episode No. 2 from Lenau's "Faust": Scene in the Tavern (Mephisto Waltz), March 2, 1907	1254
Shepherds' Song at the Cradle  and March of the Three Holy Kings, from the Oratorio "Christus," December 29, 1906	770
Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra (MORITZ ROSENTHAL), December 1, 1906	532
MACDOWELL: Orchestral Suite in E minor, No. 2, "Indian," Op. 48, April 6, 1907	1524
MENDELSSOHN: Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21, January 19, 1907	895
MOZART: Symphony in C major, with Fugue Finale, "Jupiter" (K. 551), October 20, 1906	130
SPOHR: Concerto No. 9, in D minor, for Violin and Orchestra (WILLY HESS †), October 20, 1906	118
STRAUSS, RICHARD: "Symphonia Domestica" (in One Movement), Op. 53, February 16, 1907, and March 30, 1907	1135, 1480
Tone Poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), Op. 26, October 27, 1906	180
STRUBE: Concerto in F-sharp minor, No. 2, for Violin and Orchestra (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI †), December 29, 1906,	742
TINEL: Three Symphonic Pictures for Orchestra, derived from P. Corneille's Tragedy, "Polyeucte," Op. 21, February 9, 1907	1089
TSCHAIKOWSKY: Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74, March 16, 1907	1402
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-fantasia after Shakespeare, April 13, 1907	1638
Concerto in D major, for Violin, Op. 35 (ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF), November 24, 1906	431
Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23 (OLGA SAMAROFF), February 9, 1907	1066

VERDI: Recitative and Aria, "Ah! fors' è lui," * from "La Traviata" (NELLIE MELBA), January 26, 1907	1000
VOLKMANN: Overture to Shakespeare's Tragedy, "Richard III.," F-sharp minor, Op. 68, May 4, 1907	1819
Concerto in A minor, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33, (HEINRICH WARNKE †), January 5, 1907	824
WAGNER: A "Faust" Overture, October 13, 1906	29
A Siegfried Idyl, October 13, 1906	44
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," October 13, 1906	50
Overture to the Opera "Rienzi," December 15, 1906	624
WEBER: Overture to the Opera, "Der Freischütz," November 3, 1906	247
Overture to the Opera "Euryanthe," April 6, 1907	1566
Overture to the Opera "Oberon," November 17, 1906	327
Scene and Aria, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischütz" (OLIVE FREMSTAD*), November 3, 1906	256

SUMMARY.

BACH	2	MENDELSSOHN	1
BEETHOVEN	7	MOZART	3
BENDIX	1	NOSKOWSKI	1
BERLIOZ	4	PAINE	1
BRAHMS	4	REGER	1
BROCKWAY	1	RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF	1
BRUCKNER	1	RITTER	1
CHABRIER	1	ROSSI	1
CHADWICK	1	SCHUBERT	3
CHERUBINI	1	SCHUMANN, G.	1
CHOPIN	1	SCHUMANN, R.	3
CONVERSE	1	SIBELIUS	2
DEBUSSY	*2	SINDING	1
DUKAS	1	SMETANA	2
DVOŘÁK	1	SPOHR	1
ELGAR	1	STRAUSS, R.	†3
FRIED	1	STRUBE	1
GLAZOUNOFF	1	TINEL	1
GOLDMARK	1	TSCHAIKOWSKY	4
GRIEG	2	VERDI	1
HADLEY	1	VOLKMANN	2
HAYDN	2	WAGNER	4
LISZT	4	WEBER	4
MACDOWELL	1

The Sea" was played twice.
† The "Symphonia Domestica" was played twice.

WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

SYMPHONIES.

BENDIX: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 30, April 27, 1907.
BROCKWAY: Symphony in D major, Op. 12, April 6, 1907.
GLAZOUNOFF: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 5, Op. 55, November 24, 1906.
SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 1, in E minor, January 5, 1907.
STRAUSS: "Symphonia Domestica," Op. 53, February 16, 1907.	5

SYMPHONIC POEMS, ETC.

CHADWICK: Symphonic Poem, "Cleopatra," December 15, 1906.
CONVERSE: "The Mystic Trumpeter," Orchestral Fantasy (after the Poem by Walt Whitman), Op. 19, January 26, 1907.
DEBUSSY: "The Sea," Three Orchestral Sketches, March 2, 1907.
HADLEY: "Salome," Tone Poem after Oscar Wilde's Tragedy, Op. 55, April 13, 1907.
LISZT: Shepherds' Song at the Cradle, from "Christus," December 29, 1906.
NOSKOWSKI: "The Steppe," Symphonic Poem in the form of an Overture, Op. 66, March 16, 1907.
RITTER: "Olaf's Wedding Dance," Op. 22, March 2, 1907.
TINEL: Three Symphonic Pictures derived from Corneille's Tragedy, "Polyeucte," Op. 21, February 9, 1907	8

SUITES, VARIATIONS, ETC.

BACH: Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3, in G major, March 9, 1907.
FRIED: Prelude and Double Fugue for Strings, Op. 10, March 30, 1907.
REGER: Serenade, Op. 95, April 13, 1907.	3
SCHUMANN, G.: Variations and Double Fugue on a Merry Theme, Op. 30, December 15, 1906	1

OVERTURES AND PRELUDES.

GRIEG: Overture, "In Autumn," Op. 11, April 20, 1907 . . .	1
--	---

CONCERTOS.

SIBELIUS: Concerto in D minor, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 47 (MAUD POWELL), April 20, 1907	1
	19

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED THIS SEASON.

Mr. TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI,† Violinist, December 29, 1906, Strube's Concerto in F-sharp minor, No. 2	742
Mrs. BERTHA CUSHING CHILD,* Contralto, March 30, 1907, F. Rossi's "Ah! give me back that heart," from the Opera "Mitrane"; Berlioz's "The Captive," Op. 12 (Sketch), "Mitrane"; Berlioz's "The Captive," Op. 12 (Sketch),	1451
Mme. OLIVE FREMSTAD,* Contralto, November 3, 1906, Scene and Aria, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischütz"; Schumann's "Ich grolle nicht" and "Mondnacht"; Schubert's "Erlkönig." (Sketch)	256
Mr. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH,* Pianist, February 16, 1907, Brahms's Concerto No. 2, in B-flat major, Op. 83 (Sketch)	1155
Mme. KATHARINE GOODSON, Pianist, January 19, 1907, Grieg's Concerto in A minor, Op. 16 (Sketch)	904
Professor WILLY HESS,† Violinist, October 20, 1906, Spohr's Concerto No. 9, in D minor	118
Mme. NELLIE MELBA, Soprano, January 26, 1907, Aria, "L'amerò, sarò costante," from Mozart's "Il Rè Pastore"; Recitative and Aria, "Ah, fors' è lui,"* from Verdi's "La Traviata"	992

Dr. OTTO NEITZEL,* Pianist, December 22, 1906, Beethoven's Concerto in G major, No. 4, Op. 58 (Sketch)	675
Mr. ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF, Violinist, November 24, 1906, Tschaiakowsky's Concerto in D major, Op. 35 (Sketch)	4
Mme. MAUD POWELL, Violinist, April 20, 1907, Sibelius' Concerto in D minor, Op. 47  (Sketch)	1679
Mr. MORITZ ROSENTHAL, Pianist, December 1, 1906, Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major, No. 1 (Sketch)	531
Mme. OLGA SAMAROFF, Pianist, February 9, 1907, Tschaiakowsky's Concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23 (Sketch)	1064
Mme. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA, Pianist, November 17, 1906, Chopin's Concerto in E minor, Op. 11	342
Mr. HEINRICH WARNKE,† Violoncellist, January 5, 1907, Volkmann's Concerto in A minor, Op. 33	824

**

Sopranos: Mme. Fremstad,* Mme. Melba	2
Contralto: Mrs. Child *	1
Pianists: Mmes. Goodson, Samaroff, Szumowska; Messrs. Gabrilowitsch,* Neitzel,* Rosenthal	6
Violinists: Mme. Maud Powell, Messrs. T. Adamowski,† Hess,† Petschnikoff	4
Violoncellist: Mr. Warnke†	1

**

Incidental Solo: Mr. E. Ferir † played the viola solo in Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

Mr. Max Zach † played the pianoforte accompaniments of the songs by Schumann and Schubert sung by Mme. Fremstad.

14

ENTR'ACTES AND EXCURSIONS.

ANONYMOUS: Dr. Karl Muck, a biographical sketch	22
"AUTOLYCUS" IN PALL MALL GAZETTE: Dancing	928
BALTIMORE (MD.) SUN: Programme Notes to Johann Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube"	1323
BAUGHAN, E. A.: Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" and Absolute Music	1166
BEATTY-KINGSTON, W., on Goldmark	820
On Volkmann	826
BELLOC, HILAIRE: The Singer	833
BERLIOZ: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony	12
BLACKBURN, VERNON: Beethoven, A Phase of	25
Music by Principle	1178
Opera v. Drama	1171
Songs and Ballads	611
BRUNEAU, ALFRED: Chabrier	1772
Claude Debussy	1223
CHESSON, NORA HOPPER: The Carol of Three Kings	757
FILLMORE, J. C.: Harmonic Structure of Indian Music	1541
FINCK, H. T.: Notes on Grieg	1674
FORD, RICHARD: Spanish Dances	1778
FRANCE, ANATOLE: Balthazar and the Star (Englished by P. H.)	748
GILMAN, LAWRENCE: Claude Debussy	1234
HALE, PHILIP: Beethoven and Goethe	662
Beethoven as a Pianist	686
Bruckner, Anton	503
Chabrier, Emmanuel	1764
Chadwick's Compositions played in Boston	606

Cleopatra's Beauty	592
Cleopatra in Music	602
Concerts in Paris in the Eighteenth Century	106
Debussy as Critic	1228
Don Juan in Music	192
Drum, Significance of the	1417, 1532
Finland, Music in (see also Ingman)	846
France, Anatole (see)	748
Glazounoff, Alexander	447
Grieg and Tschaiakowsky	920
Haydn in England	1306
D'Indy's "César Franck"	120, 198, 351
Mälzel, J. N.	694, 1330
Music of the North American Indians	1532
Polyeucte in Music	1100
Rákóczy March	215
Rimsky-Korsakoff	414
Rossi: Did he compose the Opera "Mitrane"?	1454
Salome in Drama and Music	1604
Salome's Dance	1628
Satan and Dancing	1260
Smetana's Deafness	1384
Star and Magi	786
Tinel, Edgar	1105
Triangle, The	538
Whitman, Walt, in Music	983
Wood, Mrs. Joseph (Mary Anne Paton)	334
HENDERSON, W. J.: The Critic's Gentle Art	1552
HENLEY, W. E.: Byron's Influence in France (apropos of Berlioz)	1006
HEYWOOD, THOMAS: The Story of Oedipus	1693
INGMAN, A., AND P. HALE: Music in Finland	846
MANGAN, J. C.: A Vision of Connaught in the Thirteenth Century	1376
NEWMAN, ERNEST: The Critic	839
NEWMARCH, ROSA: Music in Finland	860, 1684
NEW YORK SUN: Original American Music	1550
PALL MALL GAZETTE: The Cuckoo's Want of an Ear for Music, by one who despises him	1396
See "Autolycus."
PLUTARCH: Cleopatra	588
RUNCIMAN, J. F.: Concerning Grieg	1702
SANDYS, WILLIAM: Legend of the Three Kings	762
SCHUMANN, R.: Schubert's Symphony in C major	940
WHIBLEY, CHARLES: Artist and Critic	1084
WHITMAN, WALT: "Beat, beat, Drums"	1418

INDEX TO SUNDRY REFERENCES AND FOOTNOTES.

BIOGRAPHICAL (MEN): Adamowski, T., 436; Auer, 439; Balakireff, 414, 1638 seq.; Bargaglia, 1293; Beethoven, N. J., 1328; Belaieff, 463; Billroth, 1159; Böttger, 289; Boise, 1522; Borodin, 416; Bouilly, 547; Brodsky, 440; Bülow, 44, 46, 1073, 1077; Burney (in Paris), 107; Chelard, 1154; Christian Ludwig, Margraf of Brandenburg, 1291; Collan, 852; Crusell, 852; Czerny, 686; Desmarests, 1476; Dietrich, A. H., 167; Dingelstedt, 1838; Drouet, 898; Duncan, 271; Ehrström, 852; Eichendorff, 280; Falten, 852; Ferlendis, 1304; Fétis, F. J., as inventor of "ancient" music, 1460; Fortunatus, 1839; Fischer, W., 629; Gasveaux, 547; Genetz, 856; Gerl, 1316; Girard, 1011; Görner, 346; Goethe, 210, 281; Greef, 919; Gregorowitsch, 858; Greve, 852; Guiraud, 129, 1063; Gymnich, 284; Hanslick, 519; Heine, H., 278, 1185, 1610; Heine, F., 629; Helder, 281; Heller, R., 684; Herbeck, 265, 510, 512; Hinton, 906; Hüttenbrenner Brothers, 264; Ingelius, 852; Jackson, J. P., 185; Järnefelt, 854; Joseph II. of Austria, 132; Jouy, 1445; Kajanus, 854; Kaulbach, W. von, 1836; Kitzler, 510; Kotek, 433; Krohn, 856; Legros, J., 114; Lekeu, 1233; Leland, C. G., 278; Lenau (see Strehlenau); Leopold of Anhalt-Cöthen, 87; Listemann, 436; Liszt, Ed., 536; Louis, Dr. R., 503; Ludwig, Aug., completer of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, 267; Mamertus, 1839; Marxsen, 1162; Mathieu, E., 1089; Mayrhofer, 283; Meß, 411; Melartin, 856; Merikanto, 854; Mieldi, 854; Möhring, K. J., 852; Morelli, 1302; Muck, Dr., 22, 1463, 1747; Nordraak, 906; Pacius, 851; Paganini, 1016, 1018; Palmgren, 856; Petschnikoff, 436; Rolle, 1322; Rovedino, 1302; Rubinstein, N., 1070; Salgé, 851; Samain, 594; Schantz, 852; Schleinitz, 900; Schikaneder, 1311, 1318; Schneevoight, 858; Sechter, 508; Siboni, 1336; Silcher, 1189; Sivori, 1834; Soliva, 344; Spaun, 281; Strehlenau, 182, 1254; Tanéieff, S., 446, 1079; Torelli, 1293; Urhan, 1011; Vainomöen, 849, 860; Viotti, 1304; Wagner, C. A., 1248; Wagner, R. (in London), 41; Wagner, S., 46; Webb, J. W., 338; Wegelius, 852; Weinmüller, 1336; Weissheimer, 52; Wolf, H., 514.

BIOGRAPHICAL (WOMEN): Ackté, Aino, 856; Achte (see Strömmer); Achte, Irma, 856; Artôt, 1640; Banti, 1299; Basilier, 856; Bernard, 255; Campi, 9; Czinka, 216; Engdahl-Jägersköld, 856; Falcon, 1011, 1476; Fohström-Rode, 858; Fohström-Tallqvist, 858; Forsten, 858; Gerl, 1315; Gladkowska, 345; Gottlieb, 1316; Hillebrand-Laussot, 782; Hofer, 1315; Järnefelt, 858; Kelly, Lydia, 255; Kilitzky, 9, 679; Krebs, 1157; Leander-Flodin, 858; Lie-Nissen, 908; Mercy-Argenteau, 418; Milder, 7, 679; Morichelli, 1300; Obermeyer, 1328; Paton (Mrs. Wood, see Entr'acte); Powell, Maud, 436; Recio-Berlioz, 1267; Sayn-Wittgenstein, 1830; Schoultz, 856; Scio, 549; Seidler, 262; Stoltz, 1478; Strömmer-Achte, 856; Sundgrén-Schneevoight, 858; Synnerberg, 858; Szymanowska, 672; Topp, 532; Vestris, 898; Viardot, 1477; Wagner, C., 44; Wagner, F., 1248; Wagner, Rosalie, 32; Weldon, 1105; Wolkow, 345.

MUSICAL AND POETIC FORMS: Badinerie, 102; Canzone, 1293; Capriccio, 1293; Concerto in Bach's period, 1293; Continuo, 87; Cretic, metrical foot, 578; Fantasia, 1293; Fire has form (see Plotinus), 1217; Modes, old, and Grieg, 1676; Parties, 89; Ricercare, 1293; Rondo, 90; Simfonia, 1293; Sonata, 1293; Suite, 89.

DANCES: "Baile Nacional," 1778; Bergomask, 902; Bourrée, 96; Comparsas, 1783; Dancing-girls of Cadiz, 1784; Fandango, 1760; Jota, 1752; Malagueña, 1758; Minuet, 100, 139, 1341; Morris dance, 1783; Polonaise, 98; Rondo, 90; Saltarello, 1264; Sarabande, 92; Sedlák, 1797; Sousedska, 1797.

INSTRUMENTS: Bagpipe, 1676; Drum of North American Indian, 1532; Drum of Ziska, 1392; Drum (see Entr'acte); Fele (Norwegian), 1674; Guitar in Paris ballet at the Opéra, 1450; Gusslee, or Gusli, 860; Kantele (Finn), 849; Lyre of Russia, 1080; Melophone, 295; Oboe d' amore, 1137; Triangle, 538; Whistle of North American Indian, 1536.

SONGS AND HYMNS: "Campbells are comin'," 1824; "Crux fidelis," from "Pange lingua," 1839; "Gaudeamus igitur," 1185; "Il faut s'amuser," etc., 1080; Catlin on music of the North American Indians, 1536; Cherubini (see Martine, Mendelssohn); Cleopatra (see Collins, Plutarch, Samain, Shaw); Closson on Grieg, 908; Collins, Churton, on Cleopatra, 593; Collier, Jeremy, quoted, 592, 1090; Constable on Corneille's "Polyeucte," 1098; Damrosch, L., on Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, 658; Da Ponte on Banti and Morichelli, 1302; Debussy (see d'Udine); Deiters on Brahms's First Symphony, 178; Dukas on César Franck, 352; Duncan on Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, 271; Dwight on Prelude to "The Mastersingers," 61; Eckermann on Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," 210; Ehlert on Volkmann, 1828; Flaubert's Salome (see articles for Hadley's symphonic poem; Miss Fletcher, music of North American Indians, 1538; Franck's (César) pupils, 366; Fuller, Thomas, quoted (Duke of Alva), 657; Garaudé on Haydn in Paris, 116; Gilman, L., on MacDowell's "Indian Suite," 1527; Gracian quoted, 201; Grétry on Haydn, 116; Grieg (see Closson, Maubel, Peladan, van der Stucken); Grimm on Metastasio's "Il Rè Pastore," 997; Haydn (see Garaudé, Grétry, Reichardt); Henley on poets of the ocean, 1218; Hood, Thomas, quotation from "Elm Tree," 1226; Hrubby's "Bruckner," 520; Hugo's "Les Orientales," 1470 (see de Musset, Moore, Swinburne); Indy, d', and Zola, 375 (see Vuillermoz); Kautz, Schumann and Böttger, 290; Kelly on Music in Vienna, 134; Kinglake's choice of adjectives, 203; Kufferath on Prelude to "Mastersingers of Nuremberg," 55; Laforgue's "Salomé" (see special articles on Hadley's symphonic poem, "Salome"), translator of Whitman, 975; László on Rákóczy March, 215; Laurencie, de la, 115; Legouvé, quoted about Berlioz, 1012; Leland, translation of "Ich grolle nicht," 278; Liszt on Rimsky-Korsakoff, 418; Litzmann, 288; Longfellow, 1185, 1220; Lucian, "The Lie Fancier," 1058; Markham, Richard III., 1821; Marlowe's "Faust," 215; Marnold, Rimsky-Korsakoff, 420; Marteau on Sinding, 379; Martine on Cherubini, 1448; Maubel on Grieg, 910; Mendelssohn on Cherubini, 1450; Metastasio, his "Il Rè Pastore," 993 (see Grimm); Moore, George, on Hugo's "Les Orientales," 1472; Mozart (see Nägeli, Runciman, Schumann, Saint-Saëns; de Musset, 1470; Nägeli, Mozart's "Jupiter," 139;

348

Newman, Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," 1146; Newmarch on Glazounoff, 461; Sibelius, 863; Parke, "Der Freischütz," 249; Peladan, Grieg, 910; Perry's Life of Walt Whitman, 975; Planché, Weber's "Oberon," 329; Pudor, Rimsky-Korsakoff, 419; Reichardt, Beethoven's Fifth, 9, Haydn in Paris, 116; Rimsky-Korsakoff (see Liszt, Marnold, Pudor, Tchaikowsky); Rowbotham, music of savages, 1537; Spanish dancing-girls at Rome, 1784; Runciman, Mozart, 135; Saint-Saëns, "Magic Flute" overture, 1322; Samain, "Cléopâtre," 594; Sand, George, sonnet to Soliva, 344; Satan's musical taste, 1262; Schubert (see Duncan, Weingartner); Schumann, Mozart's "Jupiter," 139; "Magic Flute," overture, 1322 (see Zola); Servières, "Euryanthe" overture, 1573; Shakespeare, "Antony and Cleopatra" quoted, 599; Shaw, G. B., Cleopatra, 593, persons who might produce "posthumous mignonette," 1234; Sibelius (see Newmarch); Sinding (see Marteau); Spazier, against the minuet, 139; Specht, Wagner's "Columbus" overture, 34; Swinburne, Hugo's "Orientales," 1470; Tiersot, Prelude to "The Mastersingers," 59; Traubel, Whitman in music, 988; Tchaikowsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, 422; Udine, d', Debussy, 1217; van der Stucken, Grieg, 914; Verlaine, quoted, 902; Volkmann (see Bülow and Ehler); Vuillermoz, d'Indy, 364; Wagner, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, 709, Third Symphony, 1852 (see Blanchard, Kufferath, Specht, Tiersot); Wanley, Richard III., 1819; Weber (see Parke, Planché, Servières); Weckerlin, Fétis as inventor of ancient music, 1460; Weingartner, Bruckner, 530, Schubert's C major Symphony, 944; White, R. G., Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Wood, 336; Whitman, Walt (see Laforgue, Perry, Traubel); Zola on Schumann, 296, d'Indy's attack on Zola, 375.

MISCELLANEOUS: Freemasonry in Mozart's "Magic Flute," 1313, 1320; Rákóczy March, origin, 215; Wagner's transcription of Largo from Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, 1571.

SUNDRY NOTES.

Professor Willy Hess conducted the concert of December 29, 1906, in consequence of the sickness of Dr. Muck.

The concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on December 30, 1906, and April 28, 1907. The programme was the same: Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan and Isolde," "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods"; and Prelude to "Parsifal." Dr. Muck conducted.

The orchestra gave a concert in Symphony Hall with Mr. Camille Saint-Saëns, November 26, 1906. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was made up of works by the visitor: Overture to the Opera, "The Barbarians"; Concerto in G minor No. 2, Op. 22, for pianoforte (Mr. Saint-Saëns, pianist); pianoforte solos, Valse nonchalante, Valse mignonne, Valse canariote (Mr. Saint-Saëns, pianist); Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78.

ERRATA.

Date of first performance of Reger's Serenade (p. 1595), p. 1801.

Insertion of omitted name of Schillings as composer of symphonic prologue to "Edipus Rex" (p. 1700), p. 1801.

VOLUME 27

1907-1908

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION.

★★M 125.5.27

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1907-1908 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS
COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. Spence, del.

TIGHT BINDING

Index

Composer	Name of Work	Concert	Date of Performance
Albini, E.	Ouv. to "The Impresario"	XXII	Apr 18, 1908
Ambrosio A.	Concerto in B min: op 29 V ^o & Orch: Richard Czerwenky	IX	Dec 21, 1907
Bach C.P.E.	Symphony No. 2 B b maj:	XXI	Apr 11, 1908
Bach J.S.	Suite No. 3 D maj: Toccata No 4, D min: for Organ Wallace Goodrich	I X	Oct 12, 1907 Dec 28 "
Berlioz	Ouv. to "Benvenuto Cellini"	XXIX	Mar 28, 1908
Balkinoff, Mili	Symphony in C major	XVIII	Mar 14, 1908
Beethoven	Symphony No. 1 " " 2 op 36 " " 4 " 60 " " 5 " 67 " " 6 " 68 Ouv. to "Leonora" No. 1 op 138 " " " " 3 " " "Coriolanus" op 62 Concerto Piano & Orch. No. 5 Jg. Paderewski Harold Bauer	XXII VII XII XXIV I IV Chelsen Relief Fund XXI Pension Fund Chelsen Relief	Apr 18, 1908 Nov 30, 1907 Jan 18, 1908 May 2 " Oct 12 1907 Nov 2 " Apr 27, 1908 " 11 " Dec 29, 1907 Apr 27, 1908
Bischoff H.	Symphony E maj: op 16 " " " "	XI XVI	Jan 4, 1908 Feb 29, "
Bizet G.	Dramatic Ouv. "Patrie" in C min: op 19	VIII	Dec 14, 1907
Boche	Tone Poem "Taormina" op 9	VII	Nov 30, 1907

TIGHT BINDING

Bossi, M.E.	"Intermezzi Goldoniani" op 127	IX	Dec 21. 1907	Kayden	Symphony in G maj: "The Surprise"	XII	Jan 18. 1908
Brahms J.	Symphony No. 2 op 73 D min:	V	Nov 16. 1907	Hinton	Concerto Piano + Orchestra op 24	XVII	Feb 7. 1908
	" " 4 " 98 E min:	XIX	Feb 28. 1908		Miss Katherine Goodson
	Concerto V ^o + orch. op 77	III	Oct 26. 1907
	Carl Wendling			Humperdinck	Ouv: to "The Forced Marriage"	IX	Dec 27. 1907
Chabrier	Ouv: to "Gwendoline"	XVIII	Feb 14. 1908	D'Indy V.	"Wallenstein Trilogy" op 12	II	Oct 19. 1907
	"Espana" Rhapsody for orch.	VI	Nov. 23. 1907		"Summer Day on the Mountain" op 61	XXIII	Apr 25. 1908
	" " d. to	endless relief	Apr 27. 1908	Lalo	Ouv. to "Le Roi d'Ys"	VI	Nov 23. 1907
Chadwick G.W.	"Symphonic Sketches" Suite for orch.	XIV	Feb 8. 1908		"Symphonic Capriccio" for Violin + orch	VII	" 30 "
					Fritz Kreisler
Chausson E.	Symphonic Poem "Viviane" op 5	XIII	Jan 25. 1908	Liszt F.	Concerto No 1 E b maj: Piano + orch	XX	Apr 4. 1908
Converse F.S.	Dramatic Scenes from "Joanne d'Arc"	XVII	Feb 7. 1908		Mme Olga Samaroff
					Concerto No 2 + Piano + orch	II	Oct 19. 1907
					Rudolph Ganz
Dohnányi	Concert Piece in D maj for orch +	XVI	Feb 29. 1908
	"Cello obligato - op 12
	Heinrich Warrke			MacDowell	Suite in A min: for orch. op 42	VIII	Dec 14. 1907
					Orchestral Suite "Indian" op 48	XVI	Feb 7. 1908
Dvořák	Ouv: "Carnival" op 92	XI	Jan 4. 1908		Concerto D min op 23 Piano + orch.	XI	Jan 4. 1908
					Mad. Teresa Carreño
Ertel, Paul	Symphonic Poem "The Midnight Revue"	XXII	Apr 18. 1908
Frank E.	Symphonic Movement from "The Redemption"	X	Dec 28. 1907	Moór	Concerto Piano + Orchestra } op 57	XXII	Apr 18. 1908
					Harold Bauer
Gluck	Rec. + Aria from "Orpheus + Eurydice"	XIV	Feb 8. 1908	Mendelssohn	Symphony No. 3 A min op 56	III	Oct 26. 1907
	Miss Jeanne Gerille-Réache
Gaetz H.	Symphony in F maj: op 9	VIII	Dec 14. 1907	Mozart	Symphony G min K 550	I	Oct 12. 1907
					" D maj: K 504	IX	Dec 21. "
Goldmark	Ouv: "In the Spring" op 36	XIV	Feb 8. 1908		Ouv. to "The Marriage of Figaro"	XXI	Apr 11. 1908
					Three German Dances K 605	XII	Jan 18. "
Hadley, Henry	Symphony No. 3 B min: op 60	XXI	Apr 11. 1908	Pfitzner	Ouv: to "The Christ. Elf" op 20	V	Nov 16. 1907
Handel	Concerto F maj: for strings + wind	X	Dec 28. 1907	Reger, Max	Var. and Fugue on a Merry Theme	XV	Feb 15. 1908
					by J.A. Hillis op 100

Reznicek	'Adagio & Scherzo Finale' from Symph. Suite in E min	VI	Nov 23. 1907
Rheinberger	Concerto op 137 in F maj: for Organ, 3 Horns & Strings Wallace Goodrich	X	Dec 28. 1907
Rimsky-Korsakoff	Capriccio on Spanish Airs op 34	XV	Feb 15. 1908
Rubinstein	Concerto No 4 in D min: Piano & Orch Ignaz Paderewski	V	Nov 16. 1907
Saint-Saens C.	Rec: Aria from 'Samson & Delilah' Miss Jeanne Germain-Réach	XIV	Feb 8. 1908
Schelling E.	Fantastic Suite for Piano & Orch. Ernest Schelling	XIII	Jan 25. 1908
Schubert F.	Symphony No 5 in Bb maj: The Young Man Death & the Maiden The Eve King Mad. Schumann-Heintz	XXIII	Apr 25. 1908
Schumann	Ouv. to 'Genevieve' op 81 " to 'Mansfeld' op 115	III XVI	Oct 26. 1907 Feb 29. 1908
Strauss R.	Five Eulenspiegels 'Merry Trick' op 28	XIII	Jan 25. 1908
Strube G.	Two Symphonic Poems for orch & Viola Solo. Mr R. Feriz	XIX	Mar 28. 1908
Schjelderup	Two Pieces for Orchestra	XV	Feb 15. 1908
Tchaikowsky	Symphony No. 5 op 64. " " 6 'Pathétique' op 74	XX Pension Fund	Apr 4. 1908 Dec 29. 1907

Wagner R.

Kaiser March	II	Oct 19. 1907
Ouv. 'Flying Dutchman'	Pension Fund	Feb 9. 1908
" 'Jannhäuser'
Prelude 'Lohengrin'
Erda's Scene from 'The Ring'
Waltham's Scene from 'The Ring'
Sung by Mad. Schumann-Heintz	Chelsea Relief	Apr 27. 1908
'Funeral Music from The Dust of the Gods'
Prelude to 'Parsifal'
Ouv. 'Jannhäuser'	XXIV	May 2. 1908
A Faust Overture
Liedfried Idyll
Prelude 'The Meistersingers'	XX	Apr 4. 1908
Symph. Poem: 'Penthesilea'

Woff, Hugo

Symph. Poem: 'Penthesilea'

Soloists

Piano:

Bauer, Harold

"
Carreño, Mad. Teresa
Ganz, Rudolph
Goodson, Miss Katherine
Paderewski, Ignaz
Tamaroff, Miss Olga
Schelling, Ernest

Violinists

Czerwenk, Richard
Kreisl, Fritz
Wendling, Carl

Violoncello

Warntke, Heinrich

Apr 18. 1908
" 27 "
Jan 4 "
Oct 19. 1907
Mar 7. 1908
Dec 27. 07 Nov 16. 07
Apr 4. 1908
Jan 25. "
Dec 21. 1907
Nov 30 "
Oct 26 "
Feb 29. 1908

Viola

Feriz, R.

Mar 28. 1908

Vocalists

Gervillo. Réache, Miss
Schumann. Heintz, Miss

Feb 8. 1908
Nov 2. 1907 - Feb 9. 1908

Organist

Goodrich, Wallace

Dec 28. 1907

Herminie Gebhard played the Piano for a D. Indy's symphony
Summer day on the mountains

Apr 25. 1908

Carl Wendling acted as Con. ductor during Mr Muck's illness

Conductor

Dr Karl Muck

Dec. 28	Dec. 21	Dec. 14	Nov. 30	Nov. 23	Nov. 16	Nov. 2	Oct. 26	Oct. 19	Oct. 12
10	9	8	7	6	5	4	3	2	1

Jan. 4
11

Jan. 18
12

Jan. 25
13

Feb. 8
14

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

CONCERTS:
SATURDAY EVENINGS AT 8 O'CLOCK
TWENTY-SEVENTH SEASON, 1907-1908

SECOND BALCONY

RIGHT

A

7

15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24
Feb. 15	Feb. 29	Mar. 7	Mar. 14	Mar. 28	Apr. 4	Apr. 11	Apr. 18	Apr. 25	May 2

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The owner of this ticket will please write name and address on the lines below as an aid to its recovery in case of loss.

NAME

Alfred Brown
1 Boston

ADDRESS P.O. Box 1802

or Public Library

This ticket must be presented to the door-keeper at every performance. Persons neglecting to bring tickets will be admitted to the hall only by purchasing an evening ticket.

SYMPHONY HALL
HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

TWENTY-SEVENTH SEASON, 1907-1908

The Boston
Symphony Orchestra

98 PERFORMERS

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

(Of the Royal Opera, Berlin)

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS on consecutive SATURDAY
EVENINGS from October 12, 1907, to May 2, 1908, omitting
November 9, December 7, 1907, January 11, February 1 and
22, and March 21, 1908, and TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC RE-HEARSALS on consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from October 11, 1907, to May 1, 1908, omitting November 8, December 6, 1907, January 10, January 31, February 21, and March 20, 1908.

SOLOISTS

Mesdames
Melba
Schumann-Heink
Samaroff
Goodson

Messrs.
Paderewski
Kreisler
Bauer
Ganz
Wendling
Thornberg

and others

TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS and for the series of REHEARSALS, $18 and $10, according to location.

The $18 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, MONDAY, September 30, at 10 a.m.

The $10 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction
at Symphony Hall, TUESDAY, October 1, at 10 a.m.

The $18 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY, October 3, at 10 a.m.

The $10 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, October 4, at 10 a.m.

SECOND BALCONY.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD (OVER)

MUSIC LOVERS LONG IN LINE

Globe — Oct 12, 07

Stand Many Hours to Get Symphony Seats.

Millinery Display is Feature of First Rehearsal.

New Members of Orchestra Able Musicians.

The broad steps of Symphony hall, Huntington av side, were for several hours yesterday banked with fall millinery of many shades, surmounting dainty tailor mades, and all in honor of the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 27th season.

The profusion of living decorations extended south along the sidewalk as far as the children's hospital, and was for the most part resplendent in autumnal brilliancy, excepting where the somber black of masculine dress refused absolutely to blend itself into the general color scheme.

No season's opening is complete without the throng of waiters. It is they who think that time is money, but also that the gain is theirs when, after the exercise of much patience, they are admitted—at least 505 are admitted—to the upper balcony for just 25 cents.

At 9:30 yesterday morning the economical enthusiasts began forming a line and as the minutes grew to hours had increased it to wide proportions. It was a great day to be outdoors. The sun was friendly and made everybody feel better by its warm smiles.

There were jolly girls, fresh from the conservatory—music conservatory, of course, though they bloomed like roses—serious-minded teachers, studious musicians, demure maiden ladies, placid mothers and grave-looking men of all ages.

Jostling? Not a bit of it. There was much conversation, but all allegretto. It might have provided a theme for a good composer. At any rate it was pleasant to hear. Music cases—rolls are tabooed—violin boxes, textbooks, shopping bags, some candy boxes and a in line and helped to add interest to the attractive picture.

Just at 1:30 the big center door was swung open and slowly and decorously the crowd filed into the hall. It was like a primary school at the close of the morning recess; no noise, no shoving and no rush. It seemed that each was willing to take the place that the right of possession gave and there was not a single effort to break the regularity and evenness of the procession. There were men on hand to prevent just that thing, but they really didn't have much to do.

At 1:42 the man at the door had counted the 505th admission and the 506th in line, with at least 100 more in the rear, was turned away.

Subscribers and holders of tickets for that particular rehearsal did not begin to arrive much before 2 o'clock. However, all who had planned to be there had reached their seats before the doors were closed, and the concert was begun at 2:30.

There were a few vacant seats. It wasn't because they hadn't been sold. O, no, the people who have subscribed for them haven't come back to town yet, but they will probably be there next time.

The "regulars" were there. Some had their old seats and some didn't. They looked about, each to see one another and to reassure themselves that another season was to be auspiciously opened, not exactly because they were there, but because the "atmosphere" was quite the same.

It seems that the appeal that the women in the audience refrain from wearing large hats has had some effect. The number of "obstructionists" yesterday was comparatively small. Of course there was no end of hats, but fortunately these were no larger than the prevailing style demands. One man who has been attending rehearsals for many years, commented upon that fact, and felt that it should be duly recognized by the press.

Dr Karl Muck, the conductor, received much applause when he came forward to take up his baton. No one has ever said that the handclapping at a Friday afternoon rehearsal was "thunderous." Yesterday it was just the same as ever, and there was no record of anyone splitting a glove.

There have been changes in the personnel of the orchestra. The permanent addition of two men to complete the double quartet of horns has been brought about, and 14 new men to fill the places of others have been engaged, making actually 16 changes.

The new members are nearly all from abroad, and are Dr Muck's personal choice. This gives one the right to assume that they are men of highest ability. In fact, it was proved yesterday afternoon.

Carl Wendling, formerly concert master of the Court theatre of Stuttgart and of the Wagner festival theatre of Bayreuth, has succeeded Mr. Hess as concert master. He is regarded as one of the very few great concert masters of the world.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS SEATS

DD, 10, 20, $40 each; Z 24, 25, $50 each; KK 10, 11, $35 each; Balcony G 12, 13, $34 each. Address J.N.F., Boston Transcript. 41(A)

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

TICKETS WILL BE DELIVERED IN THE HALL, AND MUST BE PAID FOR AS SOON AS BOUGHT, OR THEY WILL BE IMMEDIATELY RESOLD (OVER)

MUSIC LOVERS LONG IN LINE

Globe — Oct. 12, 07
Stand Many Hours to Get Symphony Seats.

Millinery Display is Feature of
First Rehearsal.

New Members of Orchestra
Able Musicians.

The broad steps of Symphony hall, Huntington av side, were for several hours yesterday banked with fall millinery of many shades, surmounting dainty tailor mades, and all in honor of the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 27th season.

The profusion of living decorations extended south along the sidewalk as far as the children's hospital, and was for the most part resplendent in autumnal brilliancy, excepting where the somber black of masculine dress refused absolutely to blend itself into the general color scheme.

No season's opening is complete without the throng of waiters. It is they who think that time is money, but also that the gain is theirs when, after the exercise of much patience, they are admitted—at least 505 are admitted—to the upper balcony for just 25 cents.

At 9:30 yesterday morning the economical enthusiasts began forming a line and as the minutes grew to hours had increased it to wide proportions. It was a great day to be outdoors. The sun was friendly and made everybody feel better by its warm smiles.

There were jolly girls, fresh from the conservatory—music conservatory, of course, though they bloomed like roses—serious-minded teachers, studious musicians, demure maiden ladies, placid mothers and grave-looking men of all ages.

Jostling? Not a bit of it. There was much conversation, but all allegretto. It might have provided a theme for a good composer. At any rate it was pleasant to hear. Music cases—rolls are tabooed—violin boxes, textbooks, shopping bags, some candy boxes and a good supply of newspapers were also in line and helped to add interest to the attractive picture.

Just at 1:30 the big center door was swung open and slowly and decorously the crowd filed into the hall. It was like a primary school at the close of the morning recess; no noise, no shoving and no rush. It seemed that each was willing to take the place that the right of possession gave and there was not a single effort to break the regularity and evenness of the procession. There were men on hand to prevent just that thing, but they really didn't have much to do.

At 1:42 the man at the door had counted the 505th admission and the 506th in line, with at least 100 more in the rear, was turned away.

Subscribers and holders of tickets for that particular rehearsal did not begin to arrive much before 2 o'clock. However, all who had planned to be there had reached their seats before the doors were closed, and the concert was begun at 2:30.

There were a few vacant seats. It wasn't because they hadn't been sold. O, no, the people who have subscribed for them haven't come back to town yet, but they will probably be there next time.

The "regulars" were there. Some had their old seats and some didn't. They looked about, each to see one another and to reassure themselves that another season was to be auspiciously opened, not exactly because they were there, but because the "atmosphere" was quite the same.

It seems that the appeal that the women in the audience refrain from wearing large hats has had some effect. The number of "obstructionists" yesterday was comparatively small. Of course there was no end of hats, but fortunately these were no larger than the prevailing style demands. One man who has been attending rehearsals for many years, commented upon that fact, and felt that it should be duly recognized by the press.

Dr Karl Muck, the conductor, received much applause when he came forward to take up his baton. No one has ever said that the handclapping at a Friday afternoon rehearsal was "thunderous." Yesterday it was just the same as ever, and there was no record of anyone splitting a glove.

There have been changes in the personnel of the orchestra. The permanent addition of two men to complete the double quartet of horns has been brought about, and 14 new men to fill the places of others have been engaged, making actually 16 changes.

The new members are nearly all from abroad, and are Dr Muck's personal choice. This gives one the right to assume that they are men of highest ability. In fact, it was proved yesterday afternoon.

Carl Wendling, formerly concert master of the Court theatre of Stuttgart and of the Wagner festival theatre of Bayreuth, has succeeded Mr Hess as concert master. He is regarded as one of the very few great concert masters of the world.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS SEATS

DD, 19, 20, $40 each; Z 24, 25, $50 each; KK 10, 11, $35 each; Balcony G 12, 13, $34 each. Address J.N.F., Boston Transcript. 41(A) o 23

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BRUCKNER, SYMPHONY No. 9, (Unfinished).

SCHUBERT, { "THE YOUNG NUN."
"DEATH AND THE MAIDEN."
"THE ERL-KING."

BEETHOVEN, OVERTURE to "Leonore" No. 1.

Soloist:

Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

THE RETURN OF DR. MUCK

HIS PLANS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The First Six Programmes and a List of the New Pieces and "Revivals" to Come
—A Word About Them and the Writers
—A Little Conversation with the Conductor in New York—The Probability That He Will Not Remain in Boston After This Season

Late last evening, Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York from Berlin and Bremen on the steamship Kronprinz Wilhelm. The voyage has been rough and two or three trifling mishaps had prolonged it. The conductor, however, is an excellent sailor, and he had fully taken his part as pianist in the usual concert on the night before the ship made port. He had indeed been impetuous as well, enjoying the cooperation of Mme. Galski who was also aboard, and playing her accompaniment. Dr. Muck was in capital health and spirits and he talked pleasantly with Mrs. Muck's aid to a correspondent of the Transcript who met him at the port. He is as keen, it seems, as he was last winter to gain a speaking knowledge of English. He has been studying the language again this very summer in Berlin. Already as he hears or reads it, he understands what the page or the speaker would say. But he is still wary when he must use it himself and when the talk concerns music. His sentences are still only six words long and oftentimes he prefers that Mrs. Muck speak for him.

TALK WITH THE CONDUCTOR

The conductor was pleased, as he said to the Transcript correspondent, to return to Boston to lead the musicians of the Symphony Orchestra and to work before and with a public that understands and appreciates music so readily and so keenly. He has heard and read much new music in the course of the summer, and some of the best of it he will put on his programmes in Boston in the hope that audiences here will enjoy it as heartily and receive it as warmly as did those of Europe. In particular, he spoke warmly of d'Indy's symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein" of a symphony by Hans Eschhoff of Berlin, which he praised warmly of the overture to Humpelback's opera, "Das Heirat wider Willen" and of Hans Pfitzner's overture, "Christ-Elflein," which piece he first heard at the festival of the General Musical Association of Germany at Dresden in July. There also he discovered a set of variations, "The Kaleidoscope," by a new composer, Noren, which was one of the notably successful pieces of the festival and which he intends to play in Boston. Continuing, Dr. Muck spoke warmly of the music of American composers and of its future. He had played several of their pieces last winter, and he should play more in the winter to come, notably Henry Hadley's third symphony, and C. M. Loeffler's new composition for the piano.

THE UNCERTAINTY OF HIS RETURN

Touching, finally, on the future, Dr. Muck said that he expected to return next May to the Royal Opera in Berlin. He had not, he added, received permission from the emperor to continue his work here, and for that reason he believed that he should not return to America for another season. To a reporter of the New York Sun Dr. Muck was equally frank on this score: "I am afraid," he said, "that this will be the last time that I shall be allowed to come here, though the kaiser very graciously gave permission for me to come this year. I regret this (the unlikelihood of return) very much, as I am very fond of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and think it has a great future."

THE FIRST SIX PROGRAMMES

The hour was too late to continue the journey to Boston, and Dr. Muck will leave New York at one o'clock today, reach here at six, and go at once to his rooms at the Hotel Empire, which are awaiting him. Meantime, he sends from New York the programme of the first six Symphony Concerts for the new season. They are:

Oct. 11 and 12—

Suite in D-major.....Bach
Symphony in G-minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Symphony in F (Pastoral).....Beethoven

Oct. 18 and 19—

Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein".....d'Indy
(First time.)
Concerto in A-major for Piano.....Liszt
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner
Soloist: Rudolph Ganz.

Oct. 25 and 26—

Overture, "Genevieve".....Schumann
Concerto for Violin.....Brahms
Symphony in A-minor "The Scotch".....Mendelssohn
Soloist: Carl Wendling.

Nov. 1 and 2—

Symphony No. 9 (Unfinished).....Bruckner
Aria.....
Overture, "Leonore" (No. 1).....Beethoven
Soloist: Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Nov. 15 and 16—

Overture, "Christ-Elflein".....Pfitzner
(First time.)
Concerto for Piano in D-minor (No. 4) Rubinstein
Symphony in D-major (No. 2).....Brahms
Soloist: Mr. Paderewski.

Nov. 22 and 23—

Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
Concert-Piece for Orchestra with Piano, Loeffler
(First time.)
Adagio and Scherzo-Finale.....Reznicek
(First time.)
Rhapsody, "Espafia".....Chabrier

For the new pieces on these programmes of a fourth part of the season, d'Indy's symphonic trilogy is one of his earlier compositions, suggested, as the title acknowledges, by the three plays in which Schiller follows the fortunes of Wallenstein. As long ago as 1874 d'Indy

THE RETURN OF DR. MUCK

HIS PLANS FOR THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The First Six Programmes and a List of the New Pieces and "Revivals" to Come
—A Word About Them and the Writers
—A Little Conversation with the Conductor in New York—The Probability That He Will Not Remain in Boston After This Season Trans! Oct 2, 1907

Late last evening, Dr. Muck, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York from Berlin and Bremen on the steamship Kronprinz Wilhelm. The voyage had been rough and two or three trifling mishaps had prolonged it. The conductor, however, is an excellent sailor, and he had duly taken his part as pianist in the usual concert on the night before the ship made port. He had indeed been impresario as well, enlisting the coöperation of Mme. Gadschl who was also aboard, and playing her accompaniment. Dr. Muck was in capital heart and spirits and he talked pleasantly, with Mrs. Muck's aid to a correspondent of the Transcript who met him at the pier. He is as keen, it seems, as he was last winter to gain a speaking knowledge of English. He has been studying the language again this very summer in Berlin. Already, as he hears or reads it, he understands what the page or the speaker would say. But he is still wary when he must use it himself and when the talk concerns music. His sentences are still only six words long and oftenest he prefers that Mrs. Muck speak for him.

TALK WITH THE CONDUCTOR

The conductor was pleased, as he said to the Transcript correspondent, to return to Boston to lead the musicians of the Symphony Orchestra and to work before and with a public that understands and appreciates music so readily and so keenly. He has heard and read much new music in the course of the summer, and some of the best of it he will put on his programmes in Boston in the hope that audiences here will enjoy it as heartily and receive it as warmly as did those of Europe. In particular, he spoke warmly of d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein," of a symphony by Hans Bischoff of Berlin, which he praised eagerly; of the overture to Humperdinck's opera, "Das Heirat wider Willen," and of Hans Pfitzner's overture, "Christ-Elflein," which piece he first heard at the festival of the General Musical Association of Germany at Dresden in July. There also he discovered a set of variations, "The Kaleidoscope," by a new composer, Noren, which was one of the notably successful pieces of the festival and which he intends to play in Boston. Continuing, Dr. Muck spoke warmly of the music of American composers and of its future. He had played several of their pieces last winter, and he should play more in the winter to come, notably Henry Hadley's third symphony, and C. M. Loeffler's new composition for the piano.

THE UNCERTAINTY OF HIS RETURN

Touching, finally, on the future, Dr. Muck said that he expected to return next May to the Royal Opera in Berlin. He had not, he added, received permission from the emperor to continue his work here, and for that reason he believed that he should not return to America for another season. To a reporter of the New York Sun Dr. Muck was equally frank on this score: "I am afraid," he said, "that this will be the last time that I shall be allowed to come here, though the kaiser very graciously gave permission for me to come this year. I regret this (the unlikelihood of return) very much, as I am very fond of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and think it has a great future."

THE FIRST SIX PROGRAMMES

The hour was too late to continue the journey to Boston, and Dr. Muck will leave New York at one o'clock today, reach here at six, and go at once to his rooms at the Hotel Empire, which are awaiting him. Meantime, he sends from New York the programme of the first six Symphony Concerts for the new season. They are:

Oct. 11 and 12—

Suite in D-major.....Bach
Symphony in G-minor (K. 550).....Mozart
Symphony in F (Pastoral).....Beethoven

Oct. 18 and 19—

Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein".....d'Indy
(First time.)
Concerto in A-major for Piano.....Liszt
Kaisermarsch.....Wagner
Soloist: Rudolph Ganz.

Oct. 25 and 26—

Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann
Concerto for Violin.....Brahms
Symphony in A-minor ("The Scotch").....Mendelssohn
Soloist: Carl Wendling.

Nov. 1 and 2—

Symphony No. 9 (Unfinished).....Bruckner
Aria.....Beethoven
Overture, "Leonore" (No. 1).....Beethoven
Soloist: Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Nov. 15 and 16—

Overture, "Christ-Elflein".....Pfitzner
(First time.)
Concerto for Piano in D-minor (No. 4) Rubinstein
Symphony in D-major (No. 2).....Brahms
Soloist: Mr. Paderewski.

Nov. 2 and 23—

Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
Concert-Piece for Orchestra with Piano, Loeffler
(First time.)
Adagio and Scherzo-Finale.....Reznicek
(First time.)
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier

For the new pieces on these programmes of a fourth part of the season, d'Indy's symphonic trilogy is one of his earlier compositions, suggested, as the title acknowledges, by the three plays in which Schiller follows the fortunes of Wallenstein. As long ago as 1874 d'Indy wrote an overture to Schiller's play, "Die Piccolomini." Six years later he rewrote it and joined it to a second piece, "Wallenstein's Camp," and to a third, "The Death of Wallenstein." The three make the symphonic trilogy that Dr. Muck has put on his second programme. Bruckner's ninth symphony, on the fourth programme, has been played once here, but it is still little known. It is the last of his compositions in the larger forms; and he finished only three movements of it. The fourth and final part was to follow the example of Beethoven's ninth symphony, and be choral as well as orchestral; but Bruckner was never able to bring his design for it to expression, and he left only sketches and draughts. At least, with Dr. Muck's understanding and sympathy for Bruckner's music, the three movements that he did finish will sound as he intended them. Pfitzner, whose overture "Christ-Elflein," stands on the fifth programme, is a German composer and teacher of Russian birth who is now settled in Berlin. On the sixth programme are Mr. Loeffler's new concert piece for orchestra with piano, noted the other day in this column; and a considerable part of an orchestral suite, new to Boston, by Reznicek, whose opera, "Donna Diana," made much stir in Germany a few years ago. For the rest, it will be interesting to hear Dr. Muck's reading of one of Mendelssohn's symphonies, none of which he played last season; while his puissant performance of Brahms's first symphony last October will raise expectation high for the hearing of the second.

THE "NOVELTIES" OF THE SEASON

For other new music to be heard in the course of the season Dr. Muck has chosen thus far the following pieces:

H. Bischoff: Symphony.
Henry Hadley: Symphony (No. 3).
Max Reger: Variations.
E. Bossi: Intermezzo Goldoniani.
Schjelderup: Concert Piece for Orchestra.
Ertel: Symphonic Poem.
Ernest Boehe: Symphonic Poem.
Hugo Kaun: Suite.
Szekles: Serenade.
Humperdinck: Prelude to the Opera, "Das Heirat wider Willen."
Franck: "Redemption" (Symphonic Poem).

Of these new men, Hans Bischoff, if we are not mistaken, is a composer, pianist and conductor in Berlin, whose music is practically unknown on this side of the Atlantic. Henry Hadley is the prolific and able young American whose tone-poem, "Salome," Dr. Muck and the orchestra played last year and which made a keen impression. Reger "Variations" are presumably a new piece for orchestra, and they promise interest after his highly individual "Serenade" that our audiences heard last spring. Enrico Bossi is an exceptional Italian composer who has written much choral, orchestral and chamber music that is beginning to make its way into northern and western Europe. By their title his "Intermezzo Goldoniani" are intended to fill the pauses in Goldoni's gay Italian comedies and to catch the spirit of them. Schjelderup is seemingly one of the younger Scandinavian composers, whose music Dr. Muck knows exceptionally well, but of whom musical records have not yet taken heed. Ertel, apparently is equally unknown. Boehe is the young composer of Munich, who cultivates highly elaborate, pictorial and narrative music and whose tone-poem, "The Shipwreck of Ulysses," Mr. Gerike played two years ago. Hugo Kaun is a young American composer who has settled in Berlin and whose music has gained a hearing there. In America the Chicago Orchestra has also played it. Szekles is obviously a Bohemian composer, hitherto unknown to concert-rooms on this side of the sea. Humperdinck's operatic, "Das Heirat wider Willen" was first performed in Berlin two years ago, but neither the overture, which Dr. Muck has chosen, nor any other fragment, yet been heard hereabouts. César Franck's "Redemption" in its original form is a "symphonic poem" for orchestra, chorus and solo voices. More probably Dr. Muck intends to play the "new version" of the piece that Franck afterwards rewrote and condensed for orchestra only. It pictures in Franck's familiar mood of mystic exaltation the joy of heaven and earth in the coming of the Saviour. Possibly the telegraph has substituted "Variations" by Reger for "Variations by Noren. If not the latter piece, according to Dr. Muck himself, is to be added to the list. For "revivals," to use the conductor's own word, he has chose, beside Bruckner's symphony, Tschalkovski's "Manfred" symphony and Strauss's "Til Eutenspiegel."

ANOTHER YEAR?

So much for the programmes and the new music of next winter. There remains the ominous sayings of Dr. Muck himself as to his continuance at the head of the Symphony Orchestra beyond next May. The conductor measures his words before he speaks, and especially when he is speaking for publication. Therefore, it is safe to infer that he believes that he cannot remain in Boston after the current musical year. However willing he may be to continue here, however desirous the management of the orchestra to retain him, however eager his public in Boston, in New York and in other cities to keep him, the emperor's consent to a longer stay is essential. Such permission Dr. Muck has not yet received. However, when he first came to Boston last autumn, he had received no leave to continue here for a second season. In due course it was won; and it may yet be won for a third year. Certainly there will be no sparing of effort to gain it.

EIGHT OR EIGHT-FIFTEEN AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Trans. — Sept 16, 07
A Plea for a Later Beginning That Better Suits the Habits of Their Public—The New Members of the Kneisel Quartet—Hall Caine, the New "Christian" and the London Reviewers—News of the Local Theatres—A Future for One-Act Plays

Is there a single good and obvious reason, except the unbroken custom of twenty-six years, why the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra should begin at eight o'clock, instead of the more convenient eight-fifteen? Not one of the concerts of last season continued more than two hours, and most of them ended by half-past nine or a quarter to ten. With a beginning at eight-fifteen scarcely two of them would have lasted beyond ten o'clock, and there is no reason to suppose that Dr. Muck will make any lengthier programmes for the new season than he has in the past. A relatively small part of the audience at the concerts of Saturday evening comes from the remoter suburbs. Ten o'clock is not a late hour at which to ask such hearers to make their way homeward, and, with a beginning at eight-fifteen, they would gain a quarter of an hour in their coming to the concerts, when leeway in time is often more useful and agreeable. As everyone knows, the dinner hour tends to become later and later among that part of the community whence the public of the evening concerts comes. On Saturdays, if it is "going on" to Symphony Hall, it must dine earlier than usual, dine a little hurriedly, or reach the concert too late to hear the first number except through the cracks of the closed doors. No one goes to a concert as cheerfully or as receptively when he or she has made top speed in dressing or at dinner in order to reach it on time. It is a wise manager that humors his public in such things, and while fifteen minutes is little in itself, in that little often lies the difference between comfortable and uncomfortable preparation. Grumbling over too early a beginning has long been a weekly pastime from October through April in the corridors of Symphony Hall.

Thanks to Dr. Muck—and his cigarette—late-comers last winter had the consoling assurance of at least five minutes' leeway. They would be much more consoled did they know that their grace was not dependent upon the rate of combustion in the conductor's cigarette, but upon an official largess of fifteen minutes more. Besides, when the orchestra goes to New York, or Philadelphia, or Chicago, its concerts begin at eight-fifteen and sometimes the programmes are longer than they are in Boston. Wisely it does not disarrange the habits of its hearers in those cities by the bidding of them to concerts at eight o'clock. Its public at home as a rule dines no earlier, and has no shorter journey to make to the concert room. Yet it insists that we must be in our places at eight. In every large American city, except Boston, the established hour for the beginning of concerts is eight-fifteen, and it seems to satisfy audiences and performers equally. In Boston last season, at chamber and other concerts, there was a distinct and welcome tendency toward the later hour. If the Symphony Orchestra were to adopt it for the new season, the change would be definitely accomplished. To be "peculiar" in these things in the Boston of 1907 is also to be a little provincial.

H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

FACT AND FORECAST ABOUT THE NEW SEASON

Trans. — Sept 21, 07
The Usual Arrangements in the Routine of the Concerts—A Considerable Change in the Personnel of the Band and the Reasons for It—A Word About the New Comers and a Roster of the Orchestra—No Programmes as Yet from Dr. Muck—The Changing Policy as to Soloists and the Justification of It—Visions of the Future—Dr. Muck's Continuance Beside last season, the new year of the Symphony Orchestra begins in comparative routine. Last autumn Dr. Muck came from Berlin as a conductor new to Boston, and to all America, whose just reputation in Germany and throughout northern Europe had hardly preceded him. Now his prestige is established, alike in Boston and in every city that the orchestra visits, as one of the ablest of conductors in general, and unquestionably the ablest conductor now at work in America. His talents and the results of them, his traits and his temperament, have all commended him. He has won and held his public alike by the merit of his work and the charm of his personality. A year ago the prices for seats at the concerts were appreciably raised. This autumn there will be no change in the charges then established. Last winter the orchestra made its first Western journey in years. Next January it repeats the venture, and hereafter a "Western trip" is likely to be an annual part of its itinerary. In the announcements of last September the number of assisting singers and virtuosi was materially decreased from that of many preceding years. For the new season, the management of the orchestra continues in the same policy. It also announces the addition of two horn-players to the band, raising the number of that choir to eight, and that of the orchestra to ninety-eight. Deaths, resignations and retirements among the men have brought fourteen other changes, and it is some years since there has been so considerable an alteration in the personnel of the band. Dr. Muck has already sent to Boston the names of the new players that he has chosen for the vacancies. As yet, however, he has sent no programmes, or any list of the new compositions that he intends to include in them. On that score, therefore, the annual announcement is barren.

THE USUAL ARRANGEMENTS.

The twenty-four afternoon concerts of the orchestra in Boston for this, its twenty-seventh year, will begin in Symphony Hall on Friday, Oct. 11, and continue through Friday, May 1, but there will be no concerts on the Fridays of Nov. 8, Dec. 6, Jan. 10, Jan. 31, Feb. 21 and March 20, when the band will be playing in other cities, and on April 17, the Friday of Holy Week. Then, as usual, the afternoon concert will be shifted to Thursday. The twenty-four evening concerts will begin on Saturday, Oct. 12, in Symphony Hall and continue through Saturday, May 2; but there will be no concerts on the Saturdays of Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 1 and 22, and March 21, when the orchestra will be busy outside Boston. Presumably in the course of the winter the band will give its two concerts on Sunday evenings for the increase of its pension fund, and possibly an extra concert or two, when exceptional circumstances, like the visit of an eminent conductor or composer, invite it. Presumably, too, the afternoon concerts will begin as heretofore at 2.30, and the evening concerts at eight. There has been no change, moreover, in the minor rules and regulations that govern them. The prices of seats remain those established last year—$18 and $10—according to the place and plus the premiums of the auction, for the full season. For the afternoon concert, seats at $18 will be sold at Symphony Hall on Monday, Sept. 30, beginning at ten o'clock, and the seats at $10 in the same place and at the same hour on Tuesday, Oct. 1. For the evening concerts, the seats at $18 will be sold in Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 3, beginning at ten o'clock, and the seats at $10 in the same place and at the same hour, on Friday, Oct. 4. On all four days the auction will be conducted precisely as it has been in previous years.

Outside Boston, the orchestra will make its monthly journeys, from November through March, to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. In New York it will give ten concerts, with every likelihood that for them Carnegie Hall will be filled to the last seat, and for the most part by subscription, as is Symphony Hall in Boston. More and more New York speaks and writes of our orchestra as though it were one of its own bands. In each of the other cities named the orchestra will give five concerts, and in all of them an established public awaits it. The Western journey fills the week of Jan. 27, and in the course of it, the band will play in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, and twice in Cincinnati. Chicago, it seems, though the orchestra was enthusiastically received there last winter, has no place in the new itinerary. Nearer home, Dr. Muck and his men will give occasional concerts in Worcester, Providence and other cities of New England, with the usual series at the Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. In all the scheme for the new season provides for a hundred concerts and a few more—a generous year's work, but one that in the past the orchestra has thoroughly accomplished.

THE CHANGES IN THE PERSONNEL

So much for custom and routine. The innovation, so to say, for the new year is the considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra. Two horn-players, as already noted, have been added to it to make the double quartet of these instruments that ultra-modern music of large dimensions oftener and oftener asks and to free the conductor from dependence upon extra men. One of the new players, Karl Schmid of Vienna, becomes the first horn of the band. For the remaining changes, death has taken Mr. Moldauer from the first violins, where he had served almost from the beginnings of the orchestra, and Mr. Frietsche from his place as bass clarinetist. Mr. Hess, the concert master, has leave of absence for a year, to appear as a virtuoso in Germany. Mr. Timothée Adamowski, his companion at the first desk, has left the band to cultivate chamber music, and his brother, Josef, for the same purpose has resigned from the choir of cellos. Mr. Sokoloff, of the first violins, has also resigned to pursue further studies with Mr. Loeffler. Mr. Zach, one of the first violas, pianist as well, when Berlioz or d'Indy added a piano to the orchestra, and player upon the celesta in new music, has been chosen as conductor of the Choral Symphony Society in St. Louis, and in his departure the orchestra has lost one of its most useful men. The other changes from the former personnel have been made—to put the matter bluntly—"for the good of the service."

Dr. Muck came fresh to the orchestra. Naturally he watched his men closely, listened to them intently, estimated their capacity carefully, and tried them both by their individual skill and their worth to their particular choir and to the band as a whole. Instinct, training and experience has made Dr. Muck acute in these things. He has formed his judgments and he has acted accordingly, and in each and every case, hard as it may be for those affected and for their friends to believe, he has a single and wholly sincere motive, to better the quality of the particular choir and raise the general efficiency of the orchestra. Every organized body of ninety odd men tends to fall into routine. It needs on occasion to be scrutinized and sifted. Dr. Muck has accomplished this scrutiny and sifting. As the final authority, responsible for the discipline, the efficiency and the prestige of the orchestra, he has spoken the decisive word. Happily most of the players who have thus been retired and who have served long and well, are enjoying their share of the pension fund, which, by the generosity of the public of the concerts, is now fulfilling its excellent purpose.

Most of the new members of the orchestra will come from Europe, and Dr. Muck has diversified what passes for the leisure of the summer in the discovery and the choice of them—a long and trying task, made the more exacting by the keen competition of the Continental orchestras for able men and their common unwillingness to let their players pass over sea. For example, Dr. Muck believed he had found a violinist to succeed Mr. Adamowski, but the Conservatory at Vienna, which counted him its best teacher of the violin, refused to release him. In Copenhagen Dr. Muck made a second choice, and then sickness deprived him of the expected recruit, and now at last he has found a third fit to take his place among the virtuosos of our orchestra. Dr. Muck knows well the quality of the more distinguished members of the orchestras of Germany, Austria and northern Europe, and from them, testing them by severe standards, he has drawn most of the players that next month come newly to Boston. From the opera house and the orchestral concerts of Stuttgart and from the Festival Theatre at Bayreuth, he has taken the new concert master, Carl Wendling, whom he chose, last spring, as one of the few men particularly fitted for the place. A telegram that reached Boston only yesterday announced that Mr. Czerwony is to succeed Mr. Adamowski, but gave no particulars concerning him. Mr. Theodorowicz, the accomplished violinist, once of the orchestra and long of the Kneisel Quartet, takes Mr. Moldauer's chair. Mr. Ribarsch replaces Mr. Sokoloff, and Mr. Traupe, already of the orchestra, passes to the first violins. The new second violins are Mr. Goldstein and Mr. Rennert, whom Dr. Muck found in Boston. Berlin gave him the cellist, Mr. Kautzenbach, who succeeds Josef Adamowski, and Vienna provided the new double basses, Messrs. Agnesy and Huber. Mr. Zach's successor among the violas is Mr. Scheurer; and Mr. Stumpf is the new bass clarinetist. Mr. Litke, formerly a member of the orchestra, joins the bassoons, and Mr. Helleberg, at need, takes the contra-bassoon. Mr. Helm, the new trumpeter of last spring, remains with the band, and Mr. Lorenz now takes the tuba.

One of the new horn players is still unchosen. With that omission, the roster of the orchestra for the new season will run as follows:

First Violins—Carl Wendling, concertmaster, Mr. Czerwony, O. Roth, D. Kuntz, J. Theodorowicz, W. Kraft, J. Hoffmann, G. Strube, F. Mann, H. Eichheim, Eledler, R. Rissland, A. Bak, A. Ribarsch, W. Traupe, J. C. Mullaly.
Second Violins—C. Barleben, J. Akeroyd, P.

Flumara, W. W. Swornsbourn, H. Tischer-Zeit, H. Goldstein, R. Kurth, S. Goldstein, H. Berger, J. E. Eichler, A. Kuntz, B. Fiedler, B. Rennert, F. Currier.
Violas—Mr. Scheurer, E. Féris, H. Heindl, G. F. Sauer, A. Kolster, F. Zahn, H. Hoyer, M. Kluge, O. H. Krauss, A. Gletzen.
Violoncellos—H. Warnke, J. Keller, A. A. Kautzenbach, E. Loeffler, R. Nagel, H. Heberlein, C. Barth, A. Heindl, A. Hadley, L. Nast.
Basses—K. Keller, M. Kunze, K. Agnesy, T. Seydel, E. Huber, G. Gerhardt, R. Schurig, S. Elkind.
Flutes—A. Maquarre, Paul Fox, A. Brooke, D. Maquarre, G. Longy, G. Sautet, C. Lenom.
English Horn—F. Müller.
Clarinets—Grisez, P. Mimart, A. Vannini.
Bass Clarinet—Mr. Stumpf.
Bassoons—P. Sadoni, E. Regestein, H. Sitke.
Contra-Bassoon—J. Helleberg.
Horns—A. Hackebarth, M. Hess, K. Schmid, H. Lorbeer, J. Phair, F. Hain, C. Schumann.
Trumpets—L. Klopffel, G. Helm, J. F. Mann, C. Merrill.
Trombones—C. Hampe, A. Mausebach, L. S. Kenfield.
Harp—H. Schuecker.
Tuba—H. W. Lorenz.
Tympani—A. Rettberg, F. Kandler.
Drum—C. R. Ludwig.
Cymbals, Triangle, Etc.—T. Sentia, H. Burkhardt, J. F. Dworak.
Librarian—J. Sauerquell

THE PROGRAMMES

Of the programmes for the new season little can now be said. Dr. Muck has sent none as yet to Boston, and he is unlikely to announce any until he arrives here at the beginning of October. He has been diligent in the summer in the hearing of new music at the German festivals. The publishers have piled his table with their newest scores, while composers have still further heaped it with their manuscript. Friends have advised, doubtless, and acquaintances have suggested, but few conductors keep their own counsels more closely or follow them more straightforwardly than Dr. Muck. Unless he has suddenly changed his ways he has sought out by himself such new music as seems to deserve performance, and through the second half of last season he gave ample proof of his open-mindedness. At least the array of possible new compositions is tempting. For the French writers we have still to hear d'Indy's new tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," and not one of Albéric Maignard's applauded symphonies has yet been played in America. We in Boston have heard only one of Mahler's symphonies, and he adds one to their number almost every year. The rising young Germans write. Glazounoff and other prolific Russians are diligent. Sibelius's tone-poems we have still to hear—and the more eagerly for his symphony of last winter. We know nothing of the new generation of composers—Bantock, Holbrooke and the rest—who are emancipating and recreating English music. Josef Suk, the Bohemian, has written a symphony of Death that impressed German audiences last winter. And so forth and so on with other music that is interesting to hear. In the making of his programmes last winter Dr. Muck gave the classical composers ample place on his programmes, and with them and with the ultra-moderns kept the balance true between the old and the new, the familiar and the unfamiliar. Whether the hearer liked or disliked the method and the idiosyncrasies of the conductor's programmes, almost always they were interesting.

THE CHANGING POLICY WITH SOLOISTS

The time has long passed in which the Symphony Orchestra needed the glamor of the name of any singer or virtuoso to swell the audience at its concerts. Instead, the time has come when only singers and virtuosos of the first and of world-wide rank can appear with the orchestra and not bring a sense of incongruity. The wandering violinist, for example, who does not excel, or at least equal, the best of the violinists sitting behind him has no place at the Symphony Concerts. What his audience is accustomed to hear from its own people, so to say, mocks his efforts and leaves it dissatisfied. The days in which a concerto for violoncello, however well played, interests many hearers are passing, as those for concertos for oboes or for flutes passed long ago. The rank and file of touring pianists do not touch the standards of our concerts, and only the pianist of established distinction or of significant and rising individuality accords with his surroundings. The singer, however eminent, has little and ungrateful opportunity at the Symphony Concerts. Her "numbers"—to choose the more numerous sex—are sandwiched, and sometimes stifled, between orchestral pieces. She can sing but two at most. She can avail herself of few of the auxiliary arts that serve her in the opera house and have helped to make her reputation. She is a vocal anomaly in a concert that is primarily and insistently instrumental. To be of the quality and the rank that our concerts demand, she must oftenest come from one or the other of the opera houses of New York, and usually she comes hurriedly. Moreover, in them as everywhere else, the singing-actress is gradually replacing the singer pure and simple, and singing-actresses often have little liking and less aptitude for concerts. The singer displays her full and true powers not at an orchestral concert, but in the opera house or at the song recital. The opera house we lamentably lack, but for that reason it is hardly fair to expect the Symphony Orchestra to deploy the "stars" of Mr. Conried's and Mr. Hammerstein's companies before us. The song recitals we have in plenty.

Out of these conditions and considerations, and out of the increasing preoccupation of the audience with the orchestra and the music that it plays, has come the gradual reduction of the number of singers and virtuosos at the Symphony Concerts and the gradual raising of the standard that governs the choice of them. Through the new season hardly more than twelve of them will appear, and at least two—the new first violins, Mr. Wending and Mr. Czerwonky, will come from the orchestra itself. The other violinist engaged thus far, is Fritz Kreisler, by common agreement the most distinguished of the younger players upon his instrument. Needless to say the pianists chosen comprise Paderewski, Harold Bauer and Teresa Carreño, who revisits America after many years of absence. All three are established among the foremost pianists of our time. From the younger generation in turn come the highly individual Rudolf Ganz to play with the orchestra for the first time in Boston, the rising and interesting Mme. Samaroff, and Mme. Goodson, whose performance of Grieg's concerto last winter was genuinely impressive. With six pianists thus assured, no others are likely to be called. For singers only two are announced, and both are of the first rank, Mme. Melba, who comes in January, and Mme. Schumann-Heink, who has not sung with the Symphony Orchestra for some years. In due course, a "man singer," as the old phrase goes is likely to be engaged from one or the other opera house.

THE FUTURE

For twenty-six years the Symphony Orchestra has given its concerts in Boston. Three weeks from yesterday it begins its twenty-seventh series of them. In all those years, through at least one, if not two, musical generations, the general scheme of the concerts has not materially changed. Yet in that time the whole face of musical conditions in Boston, in America, and in some respects in Europe, has gradually become altered. The "star" conductor has risen and, like the prima donna or the virtuoso, he now wanders up and down the earth, sharing the orchestras of the musical capitals of Europe and America with their regular conductors. In Paris and in London, as well as on occasion in Germany, choral music in its largest forms has begun to have a place in orchestral concerts. The opera has become firmly established in America, though our only opera houses are still in a single city. Meanwhile the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become an established and famous institution—the foremost orchestra in America, ranking with the two or three best orchestras of Europe, and by the testimony of many a practiced and comparing hearer, outranking them. Its position is almost thrilling. It is one of the few things in the Boston of today that a cosmopolitan world knows and praises.

Its possibilities are as thrilling as its position. To set them beside the musical conditions of the hour in America and in Boston in particular is forthwith to dream dreams and to see fair visions. In one of these, the dreamer may find the great conductors of Europe coming to our orchestra for an occasional concert as they go now to M. Colonne's in Paris or to Mr. Wood's in London. In another the visionary fancies that he catches the sound of choral music performed in Symphony Hall by a chorus that matches the orchestra to which it has been joined. Yet again, for roseate and stirring climax, he may see the Symphony Orchestra, its conductor, and the rich, the cultivated, the loyal, the ambitious public of its concerts as the nucleus and the means to the opera house that Boston so much needs if it is to keep its place among musical capitals. For the first time the orchestra has at its head an operatic conductor of high rank and eager ambition. In a year he has found as eager a following. In him, and the possibilities of the band at his command and of the public that he has won, is the hope of opera in Boston. But will Dr. Muck continue at the head of the orchestra after the present season? No one knows. Every effort will be made to persuade him to continue in his post and to adjust conditions in Germany to permit his continuance. The decision will rest with him and with the powers that be in Berlin. His own voice is likely to be the most potent in the matter, and thus far he has given no sign of his plans and purposes beyond May of next year. And yet, and yet—would a conductor have so scrutinized and changed the personnel of his orchestra, so renewed nearly a fifth, and a very important, part of it, and largely sacrificed the leisure of his summer to such work, did he intend to continue here only through a single season? Dr. Muck loves reticence.

H. T. P.

A WORD ABOUT MR. GERICKE IN RETIREMENT

Miss Olive Mead's Impressions of a Summer Visit to Him—Mr. Walkley Finds a Curiosity and Mr. Archer Waxes Indignant—Mr. Loeffler's New Composition for the Symphony Concerts—Bach's "St. John Passion" for Boston—Blanche Bates and "Madame Butterfly" at Special Matinees—Paderewski's American Repertory—Arnold Daly's Experimental Theatre

In the course of the summer Miss Olive Mead, the violinist and the leader of the Olive Mead String Quartet, paid a visit to Mr. Gericke in his retirement in Austria, and now on her return she brings the first semi-public news of him since he left the Symphony Orchestra and Boston. Nominally, Mr. Gericke is living at Vienna, but before he settled there last autumn, he lingered for some weeks in Paris and for some months in Switzerland. At mid-winter, again, seeking a milder sky, he spent three months in Venice. He returned to Vienna in the spring but with the summer he took a house in the little village of Schwanberg in Styria near his birthplace, Gratz, and it was there that Miss Mead visited him. He has other journeys in mind, and one in particular that is likely to bring him back to Boston—for pleasure and not for work—late next spring or early next autumn. Meantime he keeps himself informed as to things American, musical and other, by a New York newspaper, by an industrious correspondence with the friends of his private life, and by the reports of his American acquaintance, when they seek him out or chance upon him in Vienna. He lived too long in America and he entered too deeply into its musical life to forget. He is trying, he likes to say, to be a Viennese again, but he can only be a Viennese with an American past.

Since Mr. Gericke's return to Europe he has sought no work and done none. After the exacting years with our Symphony Orchestra, he is content with leisure. If he is amusing himself with composition—one of the occasional pastimes of his holidays here—he tells no one. He goes comparatively seldom to concerts, and he is impatient of the extreme conservatism, not to say routine, of orchestral programmes in Vienna beside the freshness and the catholicity of those to which he accustomed us in his later years in Boston. He can hear no music by the newer French composers in Vienna, he complains, and their names, as he found, were barely known there. He is invited to hear Tchaikovsky's symphonies and tone-poems as to a new thing! "Salome" he has heard, and each time with rising admiration. Now, indeed, he cultivates music in his own house, rather than in the concert-room, and he gains more pleasure from his own playing of new music and of old than from a following of the beaten paths of the orchestras and the opera house of Vienna. There must be something "much worth while" to tempt him to the concert-room or the theatre. Otherwise he has fallen readily enough, especially in the routine of life, into the ways of Vienna again.

H. T. P.

Here in Boston

The schedule already made for the Symphony Orchestra for the new season comprises a hundred and more concerts. It will give the usual forty-eight in Boston—twenty-four on Friday afternoons from Oct. 11 through May 1, and twenty-four on Saturday evenings from Oct. 12 through May 2; the usual ten in New York during the weeks ending Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22 and March 21, and the usual five in the same weeks in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, respectively. During the week of Jan. 27 the orchestra will make a Western trip, giving concerts in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. Here in New England the list includes six concerts in Cambridge and three each in Providence and Worcester, with the probability of occasional concerts in Northampton, Fitchburg and other cities. At home, besides, there will be two concerts for the Pension Fund of the orchestra, and possibly an extra concert, like that for Saint-Saëns last year, with Mahler conducting.

FOR SALE—One Symphony Ticket for 24 Friday Afternoon Rehearsals; Row K, near centre; best location in house. Address M.R.R., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o.4

CONCERT-MASTER OF SYMPHONY IS

*Annul
Sept 26. 07* HERE

Distinguished Violinist and Personal Choice of Dr. Karl Muck as Successor to Prof. Hess Comes to Take First Place in Orchestra.

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert-master of the Symphony Orchestra and successor to Professor Willy Hess, arrived in Boston last evening in company with C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who had gone on to New York to meet him. Mr. Wendling sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friederich der Grosse, and landed in Hoboken yesterday morning.

Mr. Wendling is a tall, well-made and good looking man, who speaks most excellent English. He is young, only 32, but has had a most distinguished career and much is expected of him, all the more since he is the personal choice of Dr. Karl Muck. He is an Alsatian, having been born in Strassburg in 1875. After a course of study in the Strassburg conservatory he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three and a half years. Returning to Strassburg he taught for a year in the conservatory and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert-master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert-master in the Royal Theater there, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on leave of absence.

Since 1903 he has been concert-master of the Wagner festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert-master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent Garden, and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert-master at Covent Garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera.

Mr. Wendling is married, but his family has not accompanied him to this country. He will live for the winter at Hemenway Chambers.

CARL WENDLING,
CONCERT-MASTER OF SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An unusual number of new faces will be seen in the Boston Symphony orchestra next season. The year's leave of absence given to the concert-master Prof Willy Hess, and the resignation of Mr Timothee Adamowski, will bring two new men to the first desk of the violins. In Prof Hess' place will be Earl Wendling, concert master of the Court theatre of Stuttgart and of the Bayreuth festival theatre. In Mr Adamowski's place will be Mr Julius Thornberg of Copenhagen. The vacancy in the first violins caused by the death of Mr Arnold Moldauer will be filled by Mr Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra several seasons ago to be second violin of the Kneisel quartet.

A new viola will share the first desk of that section of the orchestra with Mr Emile Ferir, in place of Mr Max Zach who has been appointed conductor of the St Louis choral symphony society. There will be a new bass clarinet in place of Mr Frietsche, who died last spring, a new bassoon, two new horns, this giving the orchestra a full complement of eight, and a new tuba. There will be other minor changes in the string choir. Sept. 8, 1907

NEW CONCERT-MASTER ARRIVES.

*Globe
Sept 26. 07* Carl Wendling Comes from Royal Theatre in Stuttgart to Join Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARL WENDLING.

Carl Wendling of Stuttgart, the new concert master of the Symphony orchestra and successor to Prof Willy Hess, arrived in Boston last evening in company with C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, who had gone on to New York to meet him. Mr Wendling sailed from Bremen on the 14th on the Friederich der Grosse and landed in Hoboken yesterday morning. With him from Germany came Robert Siebeck, a pupil.

Dr. Muck (on the Right) at Bayreuth. His Companion Is Rudolf Berger, a Baritone at the Royal Opera House of Berlin.

Mr Wendling is a tall, well-made and good-looking man who speaks most excellent English. He is young, only 32, but has had a most distinguished career and much is expected of him, all the more since he is the personal choice of Dr Karl Muck. He is an Alsatian, having been born in Strassburg in 1875.

After a course of study in the Strassburg conservatory he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for 3½ years. Returning to Strassburg, he taught for a year in the conservatory and in 1899 he went to Meiningen, where he was concert master of the celebrated Meiningen orchestra under Steinbach for four years. From Meiningen he went to Stuttgart as concert master in the Royal theatre, which position he now holds, as he is in this country on leave of absence.

Since 1903 he has been concert master of the Wagner festival performances in Bayreuth. In 1903 Hans Richter summoned him to London to be concert master of the special performances of the "Ring" at Covent garden and in 1904 and 1905 he was concert master at Covent garden under Richter at all the performances of German opera.

Mr Wendling is married, but his family has not accompanied him to this country.

A new musical comedy has just been completed by Andre Macquarre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Quincy Kilby, well known in the theatrical world of Boston. M. Macquarre has just completed his ninth season as the first flute player of the Symphony Orchestra and has already gained repute as a composer. Several of his compositions have been played at the "Pop" concerts. Trans. May 25, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A VARIEGATED GRIST OF SMALL THINGS

Hats and the Symphony Rehearsals: A Cry from a Cave-Dweller—Mr. Hammerstein Throws Out a Hint to Boston—A Novel Venture in Travesty in London—An Undiscovered Tale of Irving—The Ballad of Singers Nine—Fate, Prices and Mr. Caruso Trans. Oct. 4, 1907

To the Editor of the Transcript:

There are some of us purchasing tickets for the Symphony Rehearsals who "view with alarm" the great size and flaring shapes of the ladies' hats of this autumn. Unless the custom changes and the ladies remove their hats in the afternoon as they do at the theatres, and as they do on Saturday evenings at the Symphony Concerts, many of us are likely to lose all view of the players and soloists, and also to find the music muffled and dull in the little caves made for us by the almost overlapping pieces of headgear around.

Does not the city ordinance quoted in the programme book apply at Symphony Hall on afternoons as it does at the theatres, and even here in the evening? The manager should make a public request to fit the case and should announce a change for this season. Will not the ladies themselves see the matter in the right light, and show the same consideration of others that prevails elsewhere and at other times? Will not you, Mr. Editor, take up the subject? Believe me, there is great need of moving in the matter. It has been bad enough in past years, but this year it seems that we men and all short people are likely to listen to our music from beneath a sort of thatched roof.

B. G.

[The autumn fashions and the longstanding customs of the Symphony Rehearsals justify our correspondent's alarms. Year after year and week after week the programme book admonishes all who read it to remove their hats. But it is an old story that when custom and admonition clash the latter usually falls. Annually "the cave dwellers" of the afternoon concerts send us these letters of complaint and protest; annually the management points to the warning of the programme book—and then from October to May the floor of Symphony Hall wears its thick and variegated thatch of flowers, feathers and velvets. It is pleasant to behold from above. It changes gratefully with the seasons, but we have the word of B. G. and many another that those who sit beneath it are insensible to all these charms. They cry to the ladies, they entreat them not to be like Keats's damsel, who was as merciless as she was fair, and we are glad to give room to the prayer.

H. T. P.]

THE CLERK OF THE DAY

The Symphony season looms radiant upon our happy horizon, and already I hear the audience tuning up for its habitual protest, youngsters clamoring for the classics, old Bostonians clamoring for things new and strange. Having heard classics from their youth up, our elders—not so very elder, all of them, either—crave fresh sensations.

This is rough on the classics. Worse, it makes a wishbone of the conductor, who would fain please all his passengers at once and who runs some risk of ending by pleasing none. For he naturally heeds most graciously the demands of old Bostonians, who are n't so tickled with the Boomerang-lungen Suite of Rigajigdinbangsky when they hear it, while the young in years and the young in Bostonianism find themselves thereby deprived of more nutritious musical pabulum.

As a solution of this melancholy problem, I advocate the deportation of old Bostonians. The plan may sound a bit savage, but the more you reflect upon it the more you will appreciate the immense national benefits it would yield. Think how Keokuk, Oshkosh, Kankakee, and the other benighted cities of our continent would forthwith begin to exude sweetness and irradiate light! To each would come a contingent of old Bostonians, bringing along the precious things of culture. This town would of course suffer in certain respects by the absence of its best people, but whose would have a Renaissance must pay the price. Europe paid for hers with the fall of Constantinople. Trans. Oct. 8, 07

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

First Rehearsal and Concert Next Week.

Next week brings the first of the symphony concerts, the rehearsal beginning at 2.30 o'clock on Friday afternoon and the concert at 8 o'clock on Saturday evening. With an auction sale which showed as gratifying results as that of last year, with the brightest of prospects in all the cities the orchestra will visit, there seems to be no doubt that the coming season will be one of the best in the history of the organization.

Many new faces will be seen, and it is the belief that the orchestra has been materially strengthened by the changes. Much is expected of the new concertmaster, Mr. Wendling, for he has brought to America a fine reputation. Of Mr. Czerwonky, also, gratifying reports have come from abroad and later in the season an opportunity will be given the patrons of the concerts to hear his as a soloist. As last year, Dr. Muck begins his season conservatively and classically. Bach, Mozart and Beethoven are the great names on the first program, which is as follows:

J. S. Bach.....Suite in D major
W. A. Mozart.....Symphony in G minor
L. von Beethoven.....Symphony, No. 6 "Pastoral"

NIKISCH STORY ABSURD

Absolutely No Negotiations to Secure Him for the Symphony Orchestra in 1908

It would seem that the Musical Courier of New York will be wasting good printers' ink as far as its story to appear in today's issue and alleging that Arthur Nikisch is to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1908 is concerned. The story was taken up by at least one New York paper this morning and found its way into the columns of two morning papers here. It was in detail that after months of negotiation Mr. Nikisch, who is now conductor of the orchestra and the opera in Leipzig, had been induced to return to Boston to succeed Dr. Carl Muck, beginning Oct. 8, 1908. It was said that Mr. Nikisch has signified his acceptance of an offer through a cable despatch.

Major Henry Lee Higginson, who ought to know, was seen this morning. He glanced at the copy of the story, shook his head grimly, and announced tersely but meaningfully that the story was an absolute falsehood. No negotiations with Mr. Nikisch have been made, and no thought of any has arisen. "I dare say Nikisch would like to come, but," and Major Higginson made a gesture with his left hand which said as plainly as words, "We are not looking for Mr. Nikisch, and we don't need him."

This denial, from an authoritative source, puts a quietus on the second report of this nature, the first being that which came from Europe several months ago to the effect that Mr. Nikisch had refused a salary of $50,000 a year and a life insurance policy for $125,000 to come to Boston for a term of years. As a matter of fact Mr. Nikisch left a reputation, in this city at least, for being recklessly regardless of monetary inducements.

NIKISCH WILL NOT CONDUCT.

Maj Higginson Says That Dr Karl Muck Has Been Engaged to Lead Symphony Next Year.

If Maj Henry L. Higginson knows anything of the situation in regard to next year's conductor for the Symphony orchestra, and he stands in a position where he must know more of it than any other man, Dr Muck will continue to lead the orchestra, and not Arthur Nikisch, present conductor of the orchestra and opera at Leipzig. The report of a change which would place Nikisch at the head of the Boston orchestra had its inception in New York, where it was said negotiations had been under way for some months with the end in view that Dr Muck would be replaced.

Maj Higginson, who is in a position to know, when seen by a reporter, said with emphasis: "It's a lie, that's all there is to it. I never heard that Mr Nikisch was coming here. It's a lie. All arrangements have been made with Dr Karl Muck to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra next year."

Later he said in reply to like inquiries: "I dare say Nikisch would like to come, but—" and Maj Higginson made a gesture with his left hand which said as plainly as words, "We are not looking for Mr Nikisch, and we don't need him."

This is the second rumor that has received a quietus from Maj Higginson in regard to the possible coming of Nikisch to this country. The first, started some months ago, was to the effect that the great conductor had received an offer of $50,000 a year and an insurance policy of $125,000 for a term of years. Maj Higginson's announcement is considered by all as authoritative.

DR. MUCK GIVES OUT SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Muck, accompanied by Manager Ellis, arrived in Boston last evening from New York. They sailed from Bremen, Sept. 24, on the Kronprinz Wilhelm and arrived in New York late on Tuesday night, 12 hours behind schedule time.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Muck express themselves as being very glad to get back to this city. As to whether this will be his last year here, he can say nothing now, as no plans have been made for beyond this season. As is generally known, last winter Mr. Higginson secured Emperor William's consent to a year's extension of the leave of absence given to Dr. Muck in 1906. Whether this can again be extended or some other arrangement made by which he will stay in Boston, the coming winter will tell.

In the 15 pieces of luggage that came over with them was a large packing case filled with new music. In other words, this contains the novelties of the season. Not a small part of Dr. Muck's vacation was given to reading new scores and some very interesting things are looked for.

Dr. Muck announces these programmes for the first six concerts:

First Concert—J. S. Bach: Suite in D major. Mozart: Symphony in G minor. Beethoven: Symphony No. 6 (Pastorale).

Second Concert—d'Indy: Wallenstein Symphony. Liszt: Concerto for pianoforte in A major. Wagner: Kaisermarsch.

Soloist—Rudolf Ganz.

Third Concert—R. Schumann: Overture "Geneveva." Brahms: Concerto for violin. Mendelssohn: Symphony in A minor.

Soloist—Carl Wendling.

Fourth Concert—Bruckner: Symphony No. 9. Beethoven: Overture "Leonore No. 1."

Soloist—Mme. Schumann Heink.

Fifth Concert—Jitzner: Overture "Christelfein." Rubinstein: Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, No. 4. Brahms: Symphony in D major.

Soloist—Mr. Paderewski.

Sixth Concert—Lalo: Overture "Le roi d'Ye." Loeffler: Orchesteretucke. Rezhicok: Adagio and Scherzo-Finale. Chabrier: Espano.

Successor for Adamowski.

BOSTON, May 11.—A successor to Timothee Adamowski at the first desk of the first violins of the Symphony Orchestra has been chosen. He is Julius Stwertka of the Opera House at Vienna. There for some years Mr. Stwertka has shared the first desk in the orchestra with Arnold Rose, the noted violinist. Mr. Rose has been absent often from Vienna on the tours with his string quartet, and then Mr. Stwertka has replaced him as the concert master of the band. Mr. Stwertka comes to Boston in September, joins the orchestra at the beginning of October and through the season he will share the first desk with Mr. Wandling, the new concert master.

Incoming steamers are fast bringing the new players who will join the Symphony Orchestra next Monday. Mr. Czerwony, who replaces Mr. Adamowski at the first desk of the violins; Mr. Scheurer, the successor to Mr. Zach, among the violas; Mr. Kautzenbach, the new 'cellist; Mr. Schmid, the new horn-player, and Mr. Agnesy for the double-basses, all reached New York on Tuesday and are now in Boston.

In the course of his holiday last summer, Dr. Muck paid a visit to Cosima Wagner at Baireuth. He found her in fairly good health in spite of her years and labors, but now compelled to court it, so to say, by life in the open air and long walks.

WILLY HESS GETS LEAVE.

Concert Master Will Visit Europe—Karl Wendling Takes Place.

Mr. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at his own urgent request, has been released from active duty. He has made this request that he may benefit his health by a sojourn in Europe and incidentally accept certain important engagements as a virtuoso in European countries.

His three years in Boston have entailed constant and arduous work. Mr. Hess will sail with his family for Germany next month.

His successor for the season of 1907-08 will be Mr. Karl Wendling of Stuttgart, who is the concert master of the Court Orchestra of that city, both in the opera house and in the symphony concerts. He is also the leader of a string quartet. His reputation as a concert master is more than local, in fact he is ranked among the leading men that occupy similar positions in European cities, and he has served as concert master at Bayreuth. Mr. Wendling has obtained leave of absence for one year. He will arrive in Boston next fall.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE AUCTION SALES OF SEASON TICKETS FOR THE PUBLIC REHEARSALS AND CONCERTS WILL BE HELD AT SYMPHONY HALL ON MONDAY AND TUESDAY, SEPT. 30 AND OCT. 1, (REHEARSALS), THURSDAY AND FRIDAY, OCT. 3 AND 4 (CONCERTS), BEGINNING AT 10 O'CLOCK EACH MORNING.

MF(A)

s 23

Symphony Tickets

Orders for season tickets are respectfully solicited, and all such will be executed with utmost care and for a small commission. Diagram of Symphony Hall and all information sent on request.

CONNELLY & BURKE

ADAMS HOUSE PHONE OX. 942

MWF(A)

s 23

HIGHEST PREMIUM WAS $80

Sale of Seats for Public Performances of Boston Symphony Orchestra Opened at Symphony Hall—Last Year Top Price Was $83 Trans. Sept. 30, 1907

At today's sale of tickets for the public performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, $80 was the highest premium paid for seats, as against $83 paid last year at the corresponding sale, the opening of the series of auction sales for the public rehearsals and regular concerts. This forenoon throngs of music lovers were attracted to Symphony Hall, ladies predominating over men in the matter of numbers. One found there many of the same people who year after year attend these annual sales and some of whom never have missed a season of these concerts. This is the twenty-seventh year of this organization's history and the seats placed on sale today were those for the public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, beginning Oct. 11 and continuing weekly, with one or two exceptions when the orchestra is elsewhere. The stated, or regular, price of the tickets sold today is $18, and all prices bid today were added to that amount, as is the custom.

Bidding this year seemed to lack the spirit which has marked other seasons and competition was in many instances less general and was confined frequently to only two bidders.

Beginning with Row A, the first four seats here sold at a premium of $5 and the next two seats brought $10 premium, and then followed premiums of $12.50, $9.50 and on up to more than $20 in this first row. Row B for the most part brought a little higher prices, with bids often beginning at $10. When the middle of Row C was reached the ticket brokers, who were all there in front, as usual, to look after orders placed with them, began to get active, and $15 would be the start. Seats in this third row sold all the way from $12.50 as the lowest to $32.50 as the highest premiums. In Row D the brokers also were active and alert, the first sales being at $14, with Mr. Herrick as the taker, and just beyond, toward the centre, Mr. Wadsworth bought several good seats at about $22 and $23. Directly in the centre bids began at $25 and with sharp competition between Mr. Herrick and another bidder seats 19 and 20 sold for $51. The next pair went for $39 premium. Mr. Herrick bought several hereabout.

Row E brought out spirited competition, with prices beginning at $23 for the first seats and reaching $36.50 for seats in the centre of the row. This row averaged higher than any preceding ones. In F the sales ranged from $18.50 up to $41 and again Mr. Herrick was the buyer of the choicest positions, as he was in the next row, G, where was keen eagerness over several seats. Bids were many for seats directly in the middle, and sales were as high as $48. Later, when No. 29 was reached, the entering bid was $25 and immediately this was raised $10 to $35, and the sale was made at $44. The next adjoining seats, beginning at the same bid of $25, went for $29, and equally good seats, too.

In reaching row H, the auctioneer secured $62 premium for seats 16, 17, 18 and 19, in the centre, bought by Mr. Pratt, who secured the next four at $41, while $44 was paid by Mr. Herrick for the next four seats in order. In row I, premiums ran from $23 up to $51, Mr. Pratt taking many of the best places, as did Mr. Wadsworth. A sale at $62 was reached again in row J, in which $23 was the lowest price.

In row K numbers 1 and 2 sold at $25 and nothing was below this, and then for seats 14, 15, 16 and 17, $75 was paid, which makes the buyer's four seats cost $372, or $93 apiece. Further back $80 premium was paid, or $98 in all. Last year, it is recalled, the top price at the first sale of the series was $83, which seat numbered 19, row I, brought. Other seats in row K sold today for $59, $57, and less. After this the bidding was only of normal character, row L ranging from $30 to $52, with spirited bidding at around $44 and $46.

When row M was up, the auctioneer was about to close out a sale on a bid of $41, with no one seemingly willing to give the extra half-dollar he was trying to get, when up piped a resonant voice, a woman's with a bid of $43, which caused a laugh, since the auctioneer was almost begging for $41.50. Later, when a sale of seats at $46 had been closed, the same voice called out a bid of $47, which also amused the throng of buyers and gave a bit of variety to the monotony of the sale.

The sale will be continued Tuesday, when the $10 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be offered, and on Thursday and Friday, when the $18 and $10 seats respectively for the regular Saturday evening concerts will go on sale.

SINGLE SYMPHONY SEAT BRINGS $98

Eighty-Dollar Premium Paid for Friday Afternoon—Others Sold High.

A single seat for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra was sold yesterday at auction for $98, while a block of four seats in row K bordering on the centre aisle brought $93 apiece, or a total of $372 for the four.

All the $18 seats for the Friday rehearsals were sold, the auction beginning at 10 A. M. and lasting till long after sunset.

The highest bid of $80, to which must be added the regular $18 price of the seat, was made soon after lunch in the early afternoon. The lowest bid was $5 for a single seat in the front row on the orchestra floor.

During the whole day the bidding was sharp, even sharper than last year, according to Manager Ellis. The interest in the bidding lasted till the last sale was made, and at closing time there were more people wanting to purchase seats than in any previous year.

In all 1652 seats were disposed of, the larger part of the orchestra floor and the balconies bringing premiums ranging from $20 to $50. The seats in the centre of the house brought fancy prices, while those in the first few rows and those in the rear under the balcony brought the lowest prices.

At 10 this morning the sale of $10 seats for Friday rehearsals will begin. There are 412 of these.

On Thursday the $18 and $10 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold.

Though there was a good sprinkling of the members of the most exclusive families present yesterday, the greater part of the business was transacted by the brokerage firms. Herrick, Wadsworth, Herne, Pratt, Burke & Connelly were all represented and between them bought many of the best seats.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE BRINGS GOOD PRICES

Journal — Oct. 1, 1907

Judging by the avidity with which seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra were snapped up at the opening auction yesterday in Symphony Hall, the second sale of the chairs today will bring some lofty figures. A block of four seats brought $372 yesterday. Already, the ticket brokers say, last year's record-breaking premiums have been eclipsed. In all parts of the house there has been an average increase of at least 10 per cent., and in some of the choicer sections it has soared 20 per cent. above the high water mark of last season.

In order to discourage speculators, no patron is permitted to buy more than four tickets. The "upset" price of each seat is $10. The auctioneer will mount his platform at 10 o'clock this morning. In the hour between 10 and 11 o'clock yesterday the first five rows were all disposed of, which is an indication of the zest with which the Symphony lovers of Boston are entering into the competition for good seating accommodations, even at the rehearsals. One broker said yesterday that seats which he bought last year for $68 cost $80 this year.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is expected to land in New York this morning, and will probably come directly to Boston, arriving here this evening. As last year, he will live at the Empire Hotel, in Commonwealth avenue.

MORE HIGH PRICES FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Journal — Oct. 2, 1907

The annual auction sale of the $10 seats for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday was fraught with disappointments for the premiums which the seats brought were so high as to be far beyond the reach of many that have been purchasers in the past. The women, music teachers and school teachers and the like who had scraped together from their earnings what they supposed would be a sufficient sum for the purchase of seats, comprised the largest percentage of the disappointed ones, although there were many men who did not feel that they could pay the high premiums and went away from the sale without purchasing tickets.

The highest premiums were brought by the $10 balcony tickets, the most desirable ones bringing $34.50 above the advertised price. Others brought $27.50, $24.50 and so on down to the poorer seats, but even there the price was above the average and the smallest premiums taken was for the last seat sold on the floor, $13.

HIGHEST PRICE WAS $36.50

Spirited Bidding for Symphony Rehearsal $10 Seats, with Lowest-Price Places Disposed Of at $13 Bonus

Trans. — Oct. 1, 1907

High prices prevailed at the sale of the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsals this morning. There was a large crowd of Symphony patrons on hand, people doubtless who have made it a point of attending the rehearsals for many years past, and at intervals there was considerable spirited bidding, especially when choice seats were put up. The ticket brokers were on hand, including C. J. Connelly, who bought a number of the floor and balcony seats. The highest price of the day was $36.50, which was paid for three seats in the balcony. From that figure the price was scaled down until $13 was reached. These prices compare most favorably with those of last year, when the highest price paid was $26.50 and the lowest $16.

The seats on the floor disposed of today were all under the balcony—eight full rows and one broken row of six seats on each side at the extreme rear. The highest price for these seats was $27, which was paid for several groups in rows KK and LL. From that figure the price was gradually shaved until the fifth row (OO) was reached, where good places were secured for from $22 to $18. In the sixth row (PP) the highest price obtained was $19, which was paid for two end seats next to the side aisle, and the lowest price was $15 for a single seat. In row QQ, the seventh, the prices averaged $6 and for row RR about the same. In the broken row, the very rear sittings, prices of $14, $13.50 and $13 were paid.

When Auctioneer Jackson entered upon the sale of the rear balcony seats there was a revival of enthusiasm and several of the well-known brokers were the purchasers of a number of the choice places. The first seats disposed of were on the extreme right in row E and brought $24.50 each for two. As the sittings toward the centre were reached the price advanced until three in the centre were disposed of at $36 each. The next highest price in this row was $34, which was paid for two end seats on the left of the aisle. One end seat brought $32, while the lowest price obtained by Mr. Jackson for sittings in the same row was $24. For the seats in this front row there was perhaps the most spirited bidding during the entire forenoon and many an anxious Symphony patron listened to the mention of what to her were almost prohibitive prices.

For places in row F the prices ranged from $28 for two centre seats down to $23 which was paid for three seats on the extreme right. For row G the highest price obtained was $25 for a single seat and in row H, the last full row, the highest price was $26, which was paid

Bidding this year seemed to lack the spirit which has marked other seasons and competition was in many instances less general and was confined frequently to only two bidders.

Beginning with Row A, the first four seats here sold at a premium of $5 and the next two seats brought $10 premium, and then followed premiums of $12.50, $9.50 and on up to more than $20 in this first row. Row B for the most part brought a little higher prices, with bids often beginning at $10. When the middle of Row C was reached the ticket brokers, who were all there in front, as usual, to look after orders placed with them, began to get active, and $15 would be the start. Seats in this third row sold all the way from $12.50 as the lowest to $32.50 as the highest premiums. In Row D the brokers also were active and alert, the first sales being at $14, with Mr. Herrick as the taker, and just beyond, toward the centre, Mr. Wadsworth bought several good seats at about $22 and $23. Directly in the centre bids began at $25 and with sharp competition between Mr. Herrick and another bidder seats 19 and 20 sold for $51. The next pair went for $39 premium. Mr. Herrick bought several hereabout.

Row E brought out spirited competition, with prices beginning at $23 for the first seats and reaching $36.50 for seats in the centre of the row. This row averaged higher than any preceding ones. In F the sales ranged from $18.50 up to $41 and again Mr. Herrick was the buyer of the choicest positions, as he was in the next row, G, where was keen eagerness over several seats. Bids were many for seats directly in the middle, and sales were as high as $48. Later, when No. 29 was reached, the entering bid was $25 and immediately this was raised $10 to $35, and the sale was made at $44. The next adjoining seats, beginning at the same bid of $25, went for $29, and equally good seats, too.

In reaching row H, the auctioneer secured $62 premium for seats 16, 17, 18 and 19, in the centre, bought by Mr. Pratt, who secured the next four at $41, while $44 was paid by Mr. Herrick for the next four seats in order. In row I, premiums ran from $23 up to $51, Mr. Pratt taking many of the best places, as did Mr. Wadsworth. A sale at $62 was reached again in row J, in which $23 was the lowest price.

In row K numbers 1 and 2 sold at $25 and nothing was below this, and then for seats 14, 15, 16 and 17, $75 was paid, which makes the buyer's four seats cost $372, or $93 apiece. Further back $80 premium was paid, or $98 in all. Last year, it is recalled, the top price at the first sale of the series was $83, which seat numbered 19, row I, brought. Other seats in row K sold today for $59, $57, and less. After this the bidding was only of normal character, row L ranging from $30 to $52, with spirited bidding at around $44 and $46.

When row M was up, the auctioneer was about to close out a sale on a bid of $41, with no one seemingly willing to give the extra half-dollar he was trying to get, when up piped a resonant voice, a woman's with a bid of $43, which caused a laugh, since the auctioneer was almost begging for $41.50. Later, when a sale of seats at $46 had been closed, the same voice called out a bid of $47, which also amused the throng of buyers and gave a bit of variety to the monotony of the sale.

The sale will be continued Tuesday, when the $10 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be offered, and on Thursday and Friday, when the $18 and $10 seats respectively for the regular Saturday evening concerts will go on sale.

SINGLE SYMPHONY SEAT BRINGS $98

Eighty-Dollar Premium Paid for Friday Afternoon—Others Sold High.

A single seat for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra was sold yesterday at auction for $98, while a block of four seats in row K bordering on the centre aisle brought $93 apiece, or a total of $372 for the four.

All the $18 seats for the Friday rehearsals were sold, the auction beginning at 10 A. M. and lasting till long after sunset.

The highest bid of $80, to which must be added the regular $18 price of the seat, was made soon after lunch in the early afternoon. The lowest bid was $5 for a single seat in the front row on the orchestra floor.

During the whole day the bidding was sharp, even sharper than last year, according to Manager Ellis. The interest in the bidding lasted till the last sale was made, and at closing time there were more people wanting to purchase seats than in any previous year.

In all 1652 seats were disposed of, the larger part of the orchestra floor and the balconies bringing premiums ranging from $20 to $50. The seats in the centre of the house brought fancy prices, while those in the first few rows and those in the rear under the balcony brought the lowest prices.

At 10 this morning the sale of $10 seats for Friday rehearsals will begin. There are 412 of these.

On Thursday the $18 and $10 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold.

Though there was a good sprinkling of the members of the most exclusive families present yesterday, the greater part of the business was transacted by the brokerage firms. Herrick, Wadsworth, Herne, Pratt, Burke & Connelly were all represented and between them bought many of the best seats.

SYMPHONY SEAT SALE BRINGS GOOD PRICES

Journal — Oct. 1, 1907
Judging by the avidity with which seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra were snapped up at the opening auction yesterday in Symphony Hall, the second sale of the chairs today will bring some lofty figures. A block of four seats brought $372 yesterday. Already, the ticket brokers say, last year's record-breaking premiums have been eclipsed. In all parts of the house there has been an average increase of at least 10 per cent., and in some of the choicer sections it has soared 20 per cent. above the high water mark of last season.

In order to discourage speculators, no patron is permitted to buy more than four tickets. The "upset" price of each seat is $10. The auctioneer will mount his platform at 10 o'clock this morning. In the hour between 10 and 11 o'clock yesterday the first five rows were all disposed of, which is an indication of the zest with which the Symphony lovers of Boston are entering into the competition for good seating accommodations, even at the rehearsals. One broker said yesterday that seats which he bought last year for $68 cost $80 this year.

Dr. Muck, the conductor of the orchestra, is expected to land in New York this morning, and will probably come directly to Boston, arriving here this evening. As last year, he will live at the Empire Hotel, in Commonwealth avenue.

MORE HIGH PRICES FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Journal — Oct. 2, 1907

The annual auction sale of the $10 seats for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday was fraught with disappointments for the premiums which the seats brought were so high as to be far beyond the reach of many that have been purchasers in the past. The women, music teachers and school teachers and the like who had scraped together from their earnings what they supposed would be a sufficient sum for the purchase of seats, comprised the largest percentage of the disappointed ones, although there were many men who did not feel that they could pay the high premiums and went away from the sale without purchasing tickets.

The highest premiums were brought by the $10 balcony tickets, the most desirable ones bringing $34.50 above the advertised price. Others brought $27.50, $24.50 and so on down to the poorer seats, but even there the price was above the average and the smallest premiums taken was for the last seat sold on the floor, $13.

HIGHEST PRICE WAS $36.50

Spirited Bidding for Symphony Rehearsal $10 Seats, with Lowest-Price Places Disposed Of at $13 Bonus

Trans. — Oct. 1, 1907
High prices prevailed at the sale of the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon Symphony rehearsals this morning. There was a large crowd of Symphony patrons on hand, people doubtless who have made it a point of attending the rehearsals for many years past, and at intervals there was considerable spirited bidding, especially when choice seats were put up. The ticket brokers were on hand, including C. J. Connelly, who bought a number of the floor and balcony seats. The highest price of the day was $36.50, which was paid for three seats in the balcony. From that figure the price was scaled down until $13 was reached. These prices compare most favorably with those of last year, when the highest price paid was $26.50 and the lowest $16.

The seats on the floor disposed of today were all under the balcony—eight full rows and one broken row of six seats on each side at the extreme rear. The highest price for these seats was $27, which was paid for several groups in rows KK and LL. From that figure the price was gradually shaved until the fifth row (OO) was reached, when good places were secured for from $22 to $18. In the sixth row (PP) the highest price obtained was $19, which was paid for two end seats next to the side aisle, and the lowest price was $15 for a single seat. In row QQ, the seventh, the prices averaged $6 and for row RR about the same. In the broken row, the very rear sittings, prices of $14, $13.50 and $13 were paid.

When Auctioneer Jackson entered upon the sale of the rear balcony seats there was a revival of enthusiasm and several of the well-known brokers were the purchasers of a number of the choice places. The first seats disposed of were on the extreme right in row E and brought $24.50 each for two. As the sittings toward the centre were reached the price advanced until three in the centre were disposed of at $36 each. The next highest price in this row was $34, which was paid for two end seats on the left of the aisle. One end seat brought $32, while the lowest price obtained by Mr. Jackson for sittings in the same row was $24. For the seats in this front row there was perhaps the most spirited bidding during the entire forenoon and many an anxious Symphony patron listened to the mention of what to her were almost prohibitive prices.

For places in row F the prices ranged from $28 for two centre seats down to $23 which was paid for three seats on the extreme right. For row G the highest price obtained was $25 for a single seat and in row H, the last full row, the highest price was $26, which was paid for one seat on one side of the aisle and for two directly across the same aisle. The six seats at the extreme rear of the hall on the right were sold for $20.50 and $20 while the corresponding seats on the left brought $21.50, $21, and $20.50. Altogether the sale was very satisfactory to both the auctioneer and the symphony management.

PREMIUMS $2.50 TO $55

Excellent Prices Paid for Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prices ranged all the way from $2.50 as the minimum to $55 as the maximum premium paid at today's sale of the higher-priced seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The smaller figure was paid for seats Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 in Row D, on the righthand side of Symphony Hall, and for seat No. 17 in Row S, an end centre aisle seat, $55 was paid, the buyer taking only one ticket. The attendance today was excellent, and, as usual, ladies predominated in the gathering and took a more active part in the bidding than sometimes. The bidding became more general than at Monday's sale of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals and was not so frequently confined to a sparring between merely two bidders.

For the most part, excellent prices were obtained perhaps a little above the average paid at last year's sale, yet it was easily possible to secure fine seats in desirable parts of the hall at most reasonable premiums. No one ever expects to see as high prices paid for the series of twenty-four Saturday evening concerts as for the corresponding series of Friday afternoon rehearsals, therefore the same seats sold for the afternoon course in nearly every instance brought on Monday far higher prices than those at which people secured the same seats today. There was not, on Monday, for example, any sale made at as low a premium as $2.50 in row D, where $14 premium was paid for the seats going today at $2.50, and on Monday the highest price paid in this row was $51, whereas today it was much below this figure.

The sale opened with seats A 1, 2, 3 and 4 going at $4.50 and from this prices moved upward a little to $9. Row K aroused some interest because on Monday the first seats sold at $25 (today the same seats brought only $9.50 and $9) and Nos. 14, 15, 16 and 17 (an end seat, centre) sold for $75 premium, while today Nos. 14, 15 and 16 went at $14, and No. 17 at $26, brokers taking them.

The prices in Row L began at $9 and did not get above $19.50, at which price a broker secured four seats in the centre. A woman shouted her bid of half-a-dollar better, but the auctioneer did not hear her cry of $20 in time, as he frankly acknowledged when she challenged the sale at $19.50. But just beyond, in the same row, she secured four equally good seats for which she had to pay only $16.50 and those around her appeared to feel as satisfied as did the buyer at her getting her places cheaper, after all.

In R the premiums began at $9.50 and ran up to $35.50 for the centre aisle end seat. It was in row R on Monday that the highest premium, which was $80, was paid by a prominent broker for seats which someone particularly desired. In row S, in which the high price of $55 was reached today, the minimum premium was $9.

The sale then went on briskly with prices about as they averaged in the rows previously sold. By noon the auctioneer had sold out more than twice the number of rows he was able to reach up to that hour on Monday. And from then on he kept the sale going rapidly. Most of the bids today were on a fifty-cent raise, as compared with a dollar at the sale of rehearsal seats. The lower-cost tickets for the Saturday evening concerts, the face value of which is $10, go on sale at Symphony Hall on Friday morning at ten o'clock.

WOMEN ACTIVE BIDDERS.

Higher-Priced Seats for Symphony Series Bring Premiums Ranging from $2.50 to $55.

The sale of the higher priced seats for the Saturday night concerts of the Symphony orchestra, yesterday, brought premiums which ranged from $2.50 to $55. A large number of women took an active part in the bidding.

For the most part excellent prices were obtained, averaging a little above those paid last year, but it was possible to secure good seats at reasonable premiums.

The $10 tickets for the Saturday night concerts will be sold this morning at the hall at 10 o'clock.

* * *

(6299.) The Boston Athenæum has an incomplete set of Symphony Orchestra programmes. Has anyone a complete set?

C. K. B.

[The following reply to the above query is from the Boston Public Library: "We have in the Brown collection a complete set of the Boston Symphony programmes, 1881 to 1906, compiled with indexes, comments and clippings from newspapers, by Ailen A. Brown, twenty-five volumes, M. 125. 5. There is in the fine arts department an incomplete file from 1886 to 1906, without comments, *8057. 38. This latter set contains the programmes as printed, while Mr. Brown uses only the one page giving the programme of the concert."]

Symphony Tickets
Connelly & Burke ADAMS HOUSE
31(A) 47

Hande (P. Hale) ap/ 4.07 THE ORCH
KARL MUCK is to stay for another year with the Boston Symphony orchestra, by special permission of the German Emperor.

Music lovers in Boston and throughout the United States heaved a sigh of relief when the announcement came, for much in the future of the Symphony depended upon Dr. Muck's continuance in the capacity of conductor.

It was significant that Kaiser Wilhelm was persuaded to allow the imperial orchestra to go another year without its director only when he was informed that the Boston Symphony orchestra was maintained, not for profit, but for the benefit of musical culture. It showed what a strong hold music has upon the German heart, and how much the head of the German Empire has its advancement in mind.

Incidentally, it was one of the most diplomatic and graceful things the Kaiser ever did. From every portion of the United States has come praise of this act of international courtesy, an act that has so important a bearing on musical culture in America.

For what would Boston, or the United States, do without the Symphony orchestra? And what would the Symphony do at the present time without Dr. Karl Muck? The Boston Symphony orchestra is a national institution now, as well as being the pride of Bostonians and New Englanders. It is a national institution, in a class by itself in America, and on a plane with the best of the old world orchestras; and at the same time it is a glorious movement to the culture and munificence of one man, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, of Boston.

Most millionaires have a hobby. With one it is horse racing, with another yachting, another may go in for art galleries, or a man may have a passion for libraries; some, it is whispered, make stock gambling their play and work and whole life. To Maj. Higginson the Boston Symphony orchestra is yacht, library, art gallery, avocation.

The Symphony had its birth at a critical time in the history of music in Boston. The death knell of the Harvard Musical Association of that day had sounded. A newly formed Philharmonic Society existed, which supported an orchestra, but, though it was maintained upon as adequate a basis as the circumstances warranted or allowed, it was leagues behind the musical organization which in his travels abroad, in Vienna and Berlin, Henry Lee Higginson had dreamed of establishing in and for Boston. When Maj. Higginson announced his intention of establishing a new orchestra in February of 1881, the Philharmonic Society was glad to retire from the field.

It was to be a new orchestra in a new way, he said. And so it proved. There was at that time in Boston a young baritone singer, Georg Henschel, clever, musical to his finger tips, versatile and a man of some executive ability. To him was confided the task of organizing the Boston Symphony orchestra, though he had had no experience worth mentioning as a conductor. Yet in this pioneer work of organizing, a work of which the difficulties can only be appreciated by those who have had experience of such things, Herschel did wonders. Aided by Maj. Higginson's advice and help, backed by his extensive financial support ton Symphony orchestra.

It was by no means the is today. At that time 12 first and 11 second violin nine double-basses and a and brass-wind players usually possesses. With ized, the first concert of given on Oct. 22, 1881.

ory from that date would be to chestral music in America from a ble plane to the pinnacle reached the first cities in Europe. The under of the Symphony was to pecially to people of small means and so at first the price of the ked at 50 cents, and at the rernoons of the days preceding the ats were sold for 25 cents.

a moment's doubt about the poputs. They became not only popu-er. So great was the competition the choice of places that an aucat the beginning of each season

In spite of some adverse comp. it was necessary, and it in no e popular privileges which the mphony set out to bestow. This a quarter century of triumphant ich the halls where the orchestra
n packed to their capacity.

val, love of music appears to have lass of Boston's population. Not r music lovers attend every conmony, but the audiences that fill ad that too is an outcome of Maj.
rt, are drawn from all strata of ciety. Under its various leaders—en not a few of them—the Boston ured a hold upon the affections of no other similar organization in ned among the people to whom it
The whole of New England takes e in the Symphony; New York is restige before the European musi-uld be of a pet home organization, and even in Canada, the Boston s a unique position in the musical have been founded to provide a with an instrument to show his a that conductor threw up the l from earth, the organization

d. Not so the Boston Symphony.
on a surer basis, and always its been engaged to fill the need the conductors since its inception, and at the head of the organization for rated by several years. Possibly has the critical faculty highly de-leaders have not escaped severe in spite of their undoubted place eir profession and their great repu-

But always they have been held in d and affectionate memory by the

for one seat on one side of the aisle and for two directly across the same aisle. The six seats at the extreme rear of the hall on the right were sold for $20.50 and $20 while the corresponding seats on the left brought $21.50, $21, and $20.50. Altogether the sale was very satisfactory to both the auctioneer and the symphony management.

PREMIUMS $2.50 TO $55

Excellent Prices Paid for Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Prices ranged all the way from $2.50 as the minimum to $55 as the maximum premium paid at today's sale of the higher-priced seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The smaller figure was paid for seats Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 in Row D, on the righthand side of Symphony Hall, and for seat No. 17 in Row S, an end centre aisle seat, $55 was paid, the buyer taking only one ticket. The attendance today was excellent, and, as usual, ladies predominated in the gathering and took a more active part in the bidding than sometimes. The bidding became more general than at Monday's sale of seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals and was not so frequently confined to a sparring between merely two bidders.

For the most part, excellent prices were obtained perhaps a little above the average paid at last year's sale, yet it was easily possible to secure fine seats in desirable parts of the hall at most reasonable premiums. No one ever expects to see as high prices paid for the series of twenty-four Saturday evening concerts as for the corresponding series of Friday afternoon rehearsals, therefore the same seats sold for the afternoon course in nearly every instance brought on Monday far higher prices than those at which people secured the same seats today. There was not, on Monday, for example, any sale made at as low a premium as $2.50 in row D, where $14 premium was paid for the seats going today at $2.50, and on Monday the highest price paid in this row was $51, whereas today it was much below this figure.

The sale opened with seats A 1, 2, 3 and 4 going at $4.50 and from this prices moved upward a little to $9. Row K aroused some interest because on Monday the first seats sold at $25 (today the same seats brought only $9.50 and $9) and Nos. 14, 15, 16 and 17 (an end seat, centre) sold for $75 premium, while today Nos. 14, 15 and 16 went at $14, and No. 17 at $26, brokers taking them.

The prices in Row L began at $9 and did not get above $19.50, at which price a broker secured four seats in the centre. A woman shouted her bid of half-a-dollar better, but the auctioneer did not hear her cry of $20 in time, as he frankly acknowledged when she challenged the sale at $19.50. But just beyond, in the same row, she secured four equally good seats for which she had to pay only $16.50 and those around her appeared to feel as satisfied as did the buyer at her getting her places cheaper, after all.

In R the premiums began at $9.50 and ran up to $35.50 for the centre aisle end seat. It was in row R on Monday that the highest premium, which was $80, was paid by a prominent broker for seats which someone particularly desired. In row S, in which the high price of $55 was reached today, the minimum premium was $9.

The sale then went on briskly with prices about as they averaged in the rows previously sold. By noon the auctioneer had sold out more than twice the number of rows he was able to reach up to that hour on Monday. And from then on he kept the sale going rapidly. Most of the bids today were on a fifty-cent raise, as compared with a dollar at the sale of rehearsal seats. The lower-cost tickets for the Saturday evening concerts, the face value of which is $10, go on sale at Symphony Hall on Friday morning at ten o'clock.

WOMEN ACTIVE BIDDERS.

Higher-Priced Seats for Symphony Series Bring Premiums Ranging from $2.50 to $55.

The sale of the higher priced seats for the Saturday night concerts of the Symphony orchestra, yesterday, brought premiums which ranged from $2.50 to $55. A large number of women took an active part in the bidding.

For the most part excellent prices were obtained, averaging a little above those paid last year, but it was possible to secure good seats at reasonable premiums.

The $10 tickets for the Saturday night concerts will be sold this morning at the hall at 10 o'clock.

* * *

(6299.) The Boston Athenæum has an incomplete set of Symphony Orchestra programmes. Has anyone a complete set?

C. K. B.

[The following reply to the above query is from the Boston Public Library: "We have in the Brown collection a complete set of the Boston Symphony programmes, 1881 to 1906, compiled with indexes, comments and clippings from newspapers, by Allen A. Brown, twenty-five volumes, M. 125. 5. There is in the fine arts department an incomplete file from 1886 to 1906, without comments, *8057. 38. This latter set contains the programmes as printed, while Mr. Brown uses only the one page giving the programme of the concert."]

Symphony Tickets

Connelly & Burke ADAMS HOUSE 31(A) must have the Mexicans. At $40 for a d sombrero. sandals the to the wide relief to the derby the fus nothing of Muck'sse big white

It wvalue of the suadedher to cling year w that tland the man tained, a than a few culture, demonstrated upon thrants. The the Ger handy, but Incide her keeps his and grae by him on every pol have seen of this ang up their so impoare at their America.

For w the ranches without of their hats. the Sympir hats ex- Karl Mud the West.

national br of the in- of BostonCampbell as tional ins in the Cap- and on ans ago. Capt. chestras; ranger com- ment to be-down drab Maj. Hen in his high-

Most m wearing his horse racy little cap- go in for of admission sion for libom and was gambling t m, where he

Maj. Higgiroin' to turn yacht, libra stranger to yact, libra with this

The Symphonously. 'No the history rules of the the Harvard scounded. Ad kept his listed, which d with the isted, which carrying his was maintais afterward circumstanceave his hat behind the n going to take abroad, in V he asked. had dreamed ever get it When Maj. to carry my go, and if establishing a know what Philharmonic ton Post.

ARDS.

It was to aid a barber. said. And so mon tradition Boston a yo was created clever, music man of some beard as a the task of dged, 'by my chestra, thou ed assurance mentioning as e. The beard of organizing, toward sign of only be appre ever rudely ence of such thood assailed is espec cases of swollen chaly d Tartar supplies stances of rheum Free sa of Rhe McKesson (Sole a

Mai. Higginso

RH

Six M

Th

Leading magazine, mining, c

It give camps, j and the b

It also tem whe quickly s vestment

It will pendent, pants.

If you any inve once wit lishers.

PE

develop FREE 24 Eas

C

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

or MY

Trial b or lossi where a free. tial. Harris

Symphony Hall.

REASON 1907-08

To trace its history from that date would be to trace the rise of orchestral music in America from a comparatively humble plane to the pinnacle reached by the orchestra of the first cities in Europe. The intention of the founder of the Symphony was to make it minister specially to people of small means but musical tastes, and so at first the price of the best places was fixed at 50 cents, and at the rehearsals on the afternoons of the days preceding the regular concerts, seats were sold for 25 cents.

There was never a moment's doubt about the popularity of the concerts. They became not only popular, but fashionable. So great was the competition among people for the choice of places that an auction sale was held at the beginning of each season for the best seats. In spite of some adverse comment upon this step, it was necessary, and it in no way restricted the popular privileges which the founder of the Symphony set out to bestow. This has been proved in a quarter century of triumphant achievement, in which the halls where the orchestra performed have been packed to their capacity.

During this interval, love of music appears to have permeated every class of Boston's population. Not only do the regular music lovers attend every concert of the Symphony, but the audiences that fill Symphony Hall, and that too is an outcome of Maj. Higginson's support, are drawn from all strata of Greater Boston society. Under its various leaders—and there have been not a few of them—the Boston Symphony has secured a hold upon the affections of Bostonians that no other similar organization in America has attained among the people to whom it looks for support. The whole of New England takes a proprietary pride in the Symphony; New York is as jealous of its prestige before the European musical world as it could be of a pet home organization, west and south and even in Canada, the Boston Symphony occupies a unique position in the musical world.

Some orchestras have been founded to provide a famous conductor with an instrument to show his genius, and when that conductor threw up the project or passed from earth, the organization promptly disbanded. Not so the Boston Symphony. It was established on a surer basis, and always its conductors have been engaged to fill the need the orchestra created.

It has had five conductors since its inception, and one of them was at the head of the organization for two periods, separated by several years. Possibly the Boston public has the critical faculty highly developed, for these leaders have not escaped severe criticism at times, in spite of their undoubted place at the head of their profession and their great reputations abroad. But always they have been held in affectionate regard and affectionate memory by the extensive financial support ton Symphony orchestra.

It was by no means the is today. At that time 12 first and 11 second violin nine double-basses and al and brass-wind players usually possesses. With ized, the first concert of given on Oct. 22, 1881.

of the musical public, and each was left upon the institution he was called to... was Henschel, who was the pioneer in grown fragrant with much culture. After Wilhelm Gericke, whom Maj. Higginson Vienna as Hans Richter's colleague at opera, and as conductor of the famous friends of Music. To him, the strong, imperious master of his craft, the Boston Symphony owes much of its solidarity.

He found it a loosely organized body of musicians, almost without discipline, carrying upon its pay roll many veterans and incompetents who had come to regard this material evidence of Maj. Higginson's generosity as a snug harbor for the rest of life. Gericke went at his task with the alertness, the determination and the perfect knowledge of what was required that distinguished him as a conductor. His rigorous discipline, he achieved that mobility so necessary in an organization of this kind; he imparted to its work brilliancy, plasticity, beauty of effect. And, wonder of wonders, in spite of the primitive process he found necessary, perhaps even because that and the improvement in the personnel of the orchestra, he created an esprit de corps which has not only shown no indication of dying out, but, under his successor, burns as brightly as ever.

America, and American life proved too strenuous for Gericke, and he retired after the season of '88-'89, to return to his beloved Vienna. To succeed him came Arthur Nikisch, conductor at the Neuse Theatre of Leipzig, a young man who at that time was just coming into the fame that later fell to him so generously. Nikisch had more originality and daring to the square inch in his makeup than any three conductors in the public eye, and he was one of the most intensely subjective of the modern school of conductors.

It was only natural that about such a personality the critical public of Boston should be split into factions. Yet in the three years during which he conducted the Symphony he continued to maintain it at the high standard of excellence to which Gericke had brought it.

In 1893, Nikisch's contract was cancelled. Immediately Maj. Higginson, through his agents, began negotiating for Dr. Hans Richter. This giant of the musical world had had troubles of his own in the intriguing court circles of the Austrian capital, and was disgusted with the way in which the Imperial Opera at Vienna was managed. He expressed willingness to come to Boston to conduct the Symphony, and actually signed a contract with Maj. Higginson. But the Austrian authorities awoke to the fact that they were about to lose him.

As a salve to his feelings, Richter got a decoration and an appointment to the post of Hofkapellmeister at the opera on the death of Hellmesberger. So did the great Richter calmly ignore his American contract and stay in Vienna. Emil Paur had followed Nikisch as conductor at the Leipzig Opera, and he now stepped to the front of the Boston Symphony.

His sway endured for five years—a vigorous, somewhat strenuous sway. In 1898 he was succeeded by Gericke, who returned to Boston to find that his hosts of admirers and friends had kept a warm place the active and Pittsburg Sym- e deeds of gallantry of the orches- sed by the granting ear Dr. Karl awarding of these tor. 45 years, including of the royal Indian campaigns, the service of in war, the Philip was necessary the Boxer troubles accomplished e numerous engagements shared with allant deeds which the important the medal of brav stands high in s went entirely unilly reached Bos- oreigner, the Amerd him as one of ot do an act ophony has ever try and win the lumps not only f British soldier, Madrid, London, n a vain effort to been praised by oss. Such was nial accuracy and Lord Roberts' son his noble and Africa in an effor the young officer of the orchestra. ant deed. Out of ericans to refer to won the medal off virtuosi. That is Pre under the ran ambitious "lions" of ie, of performing were the delight of won them the orchestra meant a of the otherbor, were proud to through now and organization under Kneisel, Loeffler.

wild birds love to sing
Cherokee roses blo
air is full of spring,
If I know the hearts of ch glad when they are
If I'm just as young and the gladdest little ta
If I know the haunts of y their language and th An the children run to r it matter if I'm gray

I don't hardly think it m think it does at all,
So when May has come give out the old time
That all children know for, the long call the
And we're going way out
the country breezes
And we're going to swi and we're going to s
And we'll mock the glad just every bird that
And the fathers and the come with each lump
If they'll just be glad a won't matter if they
—J. M. Lewis in H

his technical aced h
th JECTIVES

little irrepressible, and cosmo out he seems to leads up to possibilities of "new, novel as he bobs up horse ballet, and new com- lands, prese
rable the fancy trained tho the year—ar us adjectives ing floral w n the Barnum zog school, c those who at display of the big show and control.
have no rea- A circus v
while waiting be a sad aff that signal- scriptions as eant. In the comments v
the printed wofully unper and delight-

SFTH R

week. Of course, the chief players, such as the first violin or the concert master, the first cellist or the first performers on the other instruments, get much more, up to $5000 a year, with engagements of several years. Not a few receive weekly salaries of various amounts for periods of time beyond the regular season, sometimes for practically the whole year. The conductors themselves are said to have received salaries running from $8000 to $10,000 per year.

With the idea of making the Symphony a perfectly organized orchestra, the members devote their whole energy to its work. But as a season of 29 weeks' salary is insufficient to support the rank and file, the "Pops" of the early summer were instituted, for its founder has always aimed at making it possible for the players to devote all their time, and talents to the Symphony. The "Pops" last for eight weeks after the close of the winter season and are one of the greatest musical attractions Boston possesses.

To eke out the remaining period of enforced idleness, some of the members of the Symphony teach and some join other orchestras for brief intervals. But first, last and all the time, it is the Boston Symphony in which their whole hearts are centred and toward the efficiency of which they bend all their talents and energies.

The Musical Union was a spectre at one time that threatened to create havoc with the Symphony. Maj. Higginson himself took a broad view of the problem. He did not forbid the members of the Symphony from belonging to a union, but he absolutely prohibited the idea that any union could make a "closed shop" of the orchestra. While he believes in unions, he stated plainly that, should the union attempt to dictate to the Boston Symphony orchestra or to interfere in any way with its management or the freedom of its members, he would immediately pay off all hands and disband the organization on the spot. This attitude was prolific of excellent results. All the members of the Symphony who belonged to the union resigned from it, and the situation was relieved of the threatened embarrassment.

It is ruled on the same lines of discipline that any modern orchestra or opera company is guided by—fines for being late at rehearsals, heavier fines for lateness at concerts, and for non-attendance heavier punishment still. These penalties, being, however, solely for the purpose of discipline, are very seldom exacted, and, as has been said by one member, "the contract is much more severe than Mr. Higginson is."

And of the generous founder of the Boston Symphony, what can be said, to adequately express what he has done for the advancement of music in America? Soldier—he bears the scar of a sabre wound received in the civil war to this day—patriot, financier and backer of many gigantic industrial enterprises, a man of letters, a musician and an unostentatious philanthropist. The gods were kind to Henry Lee Higginson, and he made noble use of the advantages of birth, talent, wealth and position that were given him.

III.

OS

ORCHESTRA.

aductor.

2, AT 8 P.M.

finished).

DEN."

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Leonore" No. 1.

Soloist:

Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

of the musical public upon the institution.

was Henschel, who grown fragrant with Wilhelm Gericke, who Vienna as Hans Richter, opera, and as conductor of Music. To superior master of his Symphony owes much of its solid

He found it a loosely organized almost without discipline, carrying many veterans and incompetents regard this material evidence of generosity as a snug harbor for Gericke went at his task with the termination and the perfect knowledge required that distinguished him as rigorous discipline, he achieved the necessary in an organization of this to its work brilliancy, plasticity. And, wonder of wonders, in spite of process he found necessary, perhaps that and the improvement in the orchestra, he created an esprit de corps not only shown no indication of under his successor, burns as bright

America and American life prepared for Gericke, and he retired after that to return to his beloved Vienna, came Arthur Nikisch, conductor of Leipzig, a young man who just coming into the fame that he generously, Nikisch had more originality in the square inch in his market conductors in the public eye, and most intensely subjective of the conductors.

It was only natural that about the critical public of Boston should follow. Yet in the three years during which he conducted the Symphony he continued at the high standard of excellence had brought it.

In 1893, Nikisch's contract was dissolved. Maj. Higginson, through negotiating for Dr. Hans Richter, musical world had had troubles. Intriguing court circles of the Austrian Emperor, who was disgusted with the way in which the Opera at Vienna was managed. He came to Boston to conduct and actually signed a contract with the Boston Symphony. But the Austrian authorities, aware that they were about to lose him.

As a salve to his feelings, Richter was appointed to the post of concertmaster at the death of Gericke. So did the great Richter calmly resign his contract and stay in Vienna. He followed Nikisch as conductor at the death of Gericke and he now stepped to the front of the Symphony.

His sway endured for five years, somewhat strenuous sway. In 1898 he Gericke, who returned to Boston hosts of admirers and friends had in their hearts for him. Faur went to Pittsburgh, where he is now conducting the Pittsburgh Symphony. Gericke continued as conductor of the orchestra until 1906, and in June of that year Dr. Karl Muck of Berlin was engaged as conductor.

Dr. Muck was one of the conductors of the royal opera at Berlin, and as such was in the service of the German Emperor, from whom it was necessary to obtain a leave of absence. This was accomplished only with great difficulty, for Dr. Muck shared with Richard Strauss the direction of all the important productions of the Berlin opera and stands high in the Kaiser's favor. However, he finally reached Boston, and Boston has come to regard him as one of the greatest conductors the Symphony has ever boasted. Dr. Muck has achieved triumphs not only in Berlin, but in St. Petersburg, Madrid, London, Vienna and other capitals, and has been praised by the best critics for "the phenomenal accuracy and versatility of his knowledge and his noble and objective artistry."

So much for the conductors of the Boston Symphony. A word about the personnel of the orchestra. It has long been the custom of Americans to refer to the Boston Symphony as a band of virtuosi. That is what it is, in fact. Young and ambitious "lions" of the Conservatory orchestra, that were the delight of Berlioz in Paris, to whom the orchestra meant a field for hard and energetic labor, were proud to come to Boston to join this organization under Gericke and his successors. Kneisel, Loeffler, Svecenski, Roth, Glese, the Adamowskis, Schuecker, Pourtau, Longy—those were names to conjure with in the musical world, and they were the names of players in the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Next to the conductor himself, the man who has most to do with the efficiency of an orchestra is the concert master. The French call him the chef d'attaque. He may be described as the go-between for orchestra and conductor, the prime minister of the autocratic head of the organization. Often his duties are of the most onerous and responsible description.

When anything goes wrong, it is the concert master who gets the blame; when things go with smooth success, it is the conductor upon whose head the laurel wreaths are placed. He carries out in the practical workings the directions of the conductor. If the conductor wants certain changes in the phrasing or accentuation, it falls to the concert master to arrange the changes. He must see to all the instruments and have a care that they are in tune with one another before rehearsals and concerts; he acts as mediator and pacificator when a misunderstanding arises between conductor and members of the orchestra; he is, in fact, the helmsman acting under the captain's orders and the first mate and the chief engineer combined.

Fortunate has it been for the Boston Symphony that for this important post it has had two such men as Franz Kneisel and Prof. Willy Hess. The latter is the present concert master, and his vigorous person ality, his talents as a musician and his technical accomplishment have enabled him to carry out the best traditions of his office in the economy of the Symphony.

There are now, when all the players are in requisition—which, of course, they are only in the most modern compositions—about 90 men, namely, 16 first and 14 second violins, 10 violas, 10 cellos, eight double-basses, four flutes, three oboes, one English horn, three clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons, one contra-bassoon, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones and one player each of the harp, tuba, timpani, bass drum, cymbals, triangle and tambour.

Of the players themselves, the rank and file, they are principally drawn from great European orchestras. They are male without exception, and female players, however talented, have never been regularly engaged for the Symphony. The players are of German, French, Austrian, Russian and Polish extraction for the most part.

The terms under which they are engaged vary greatly. Annual contracts for the season of 29 weeks, 24 of which are devoted to the Boston concerts and five to travelling, are the general arrangement, and the ordinary salary runs from $30 to $40 per week. Of course, the chief players, such as the first violin or the concert master, the first cellist or the first performers on the other instruments, get much more, up to $5000 a year, with engagements of several years. Not a few receive weekly salaries of various amounts for periods of time beyond the regular season, sometimes for practically the whole year. The conductors themselves are said to have received salaries running from $8000 to $10,000 per year.

With the idea of making the Symphony a perfectly organized orchestra, the members devote their whole energy to its work. But as a season of 29 weeks' salary is insufficient to support the rank and file, the "Pops" of the early summer were instituted, for its founder has always aimed at making it possible for the players to devote all their time and talents to the Symphony. The "Pops" last for eight weeks after the close of the winter season and are one of the greatest musical attractions Boston possesses.

To make out the remaining period of enforced idleness, some of the members of the Symphony teach and some join other orchestras for brief intervals. But first, last and all the time, it is the Boston Symphony in which their whole hearts are centred and toward the efficiency of which they bend all their talents and energies.

The Musical Union was a spectre at one time that threatened to create havoc with the Symphony. Maj. Higginson himself took a broad view of the problem. He did not forbid the members of the Symphony from belonging to a union, but he absolutely prohibited the idea that any union could make a "closed shop" of the orchestra. While he believes in unions, he stated plainly that, should the union attempt to dictate to the Boston Symphony orchestra or to interfere in any way with its management or the freedom of its members, he would immediately pay off all hands and disband the organization on the spot. This attitude was prolific of excellent results. All the members of the Symphony who belonged to the union resigned from it, and the situation was relieved of the threatened embarrassment.

It is ruled on the same lines of discipline that any modern orchestra or opera company is guided by—fines for being late at rehearsals, heavier fines for lateness at concerts, and for non-attendance heavier punishment still. These penalties, being, however, solely for the purpose of discipline, are very seldom exacted, and, as has been said by one member, "the contract is much more severe than Mr. Higginson is."

And of the generous founder of the Boston Symphony, what can be said to adequately express what he has done for the advancement of music in America? Soldier—he bears the scar of a sabre wound received in the civil war to this day—patriot, financier and backer of many gigantic industrial enterprises, a man of letters, a musician and an unostentatious philanthropist. The gods were kind to Henry Lee Higginson, and he made noble use of the advantages of birth, talent, wealth and position that were given him.

III.

OS

ORCHESTRA.

ductor.

2, AT 8 P.M.

(finished).

DEN."

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Leonore" No. 1.

Soloist:

Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

THOUSAND WOMEN UNABLE TO HEAR SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

Globe Oct 14, 1907

Fully 1500 Waited for Hours in the Cold and Dust, the Dense Throng Interfering With Traffic in the Street.

LINE-UP FOR "RUSH SEATS" AT THE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

That the bonuses received this season for seats for the Symphony orchestra rehearsals and concerts were practically prohibitive to the ordinary class of mortals was pretty well shown yesterday, the occasion of the first rehearsal of the 25th season of the orchestra.

All through the four days of the public auction of the seats many sat quietly and when the bids ran fairly low, began to call out their offers, but it was all of no use, for bid after bid above theirs would be received and the seat sold to some other individual.

How dear to the music-loving residents of Boston these rehearsals are, was well illustrated when at 9 o'clock yesterday morning two young women alighted from a car and took seats on the stone steps at the front entrance to Symphony hall. They knew the rehearsal was not to begin until 2:30, but they also realized that if they were to be among those fortunate enough to secure "rush" seats in the upper balcony, they would have to be on hand early.

They had a long and a cold wait before them, but they came well prepared for it and selected the most sunny spot on the steps. With books to assist in killing the time, they waited patiently for the hour when the seats in the upper balcony would be obtainable.

An hour later they were joined by others, women too, who were equally determined to secure seats if patience could purchase them. Still the crowd grew and soon fully 500 persons, almost wholly women, were clustered about the steps and doors. A little while later twice that number could be counted. Many of them had brought camp stools and chairs and presented a most unusual scene as they sat there in the cold wind which swept down from the direction of the baseball grounds, bringing with it plenty of driving dust. But there were few murmurs of discontent.

By noon the crowd numbered fully 1500, in which perhaps 100 men could be made out. They were dotted here and there among the women, who stared at them with wonderment that they should presume to attempt to enter such a "bargain counter" rush. But the men bravely withstood the contemptuous glances and girded themselves for the rush which they knew would come at 1 o'clock.

The crowd was so dense that it was with difficulty that street traffic was kept up. The electric cars were compelled to slow down and in many cases teamsters had to stop and then slowly work their way through the waiting throng. All in the big gathering realized that many would be unable to secure seats and every one endeavored to get as near the doors as possible.

There were many feminine eyes wet with the bitter tears of disappointment when at 1 o'clock the doors were gingerly opened and one by one just 500 persons were allowed to enter and pass up to the upper balcony. Enough others were left on the sidewalk to more than completely fill the second balcony as well, and their expressions of disappointment were comic in some cases and pitiful in others. Of the 500 fortunate who occupied the free seats about one person in every 50 was a man. They were practically all young men, too, musical students mostly.

Then the doors were closed again, and over 1000 disappointed, tired and chilled women and men started back to their homes. Those who had secured admittance to the free seats in the upper balcony had still an hour and a half to wait before conductor Wilhelm Gericke gave the magical sweep of his baton, which sent the first sweet cords from the instruments of the famous musicians who faced him, and the first rehearsal of the season had begun.

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS COMING.

Boston's own orchestra to have world's greatest artists at twelve of its concerts. Boston American Sept. 20, 07 after the end of last season. Mr. Theodorowicz, having left the Kneisel Quartet, will take Mr. Moldauer's place. Mr. Sokoloff, a violinist, who left the orchestra to study with Mr. Looffler, will be succeeded by Mr. Ribarsch of Vienna. Mr. Zach left the viola section to conduct the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The name of

GREAT ARTISTS WILL APPEAR IN BOSTON

Many Changes in Personnel of Symphony Organization Announced.

The auction sale of seats for the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, will begin at Symphony Hall to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. Then the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the $10 seats will be sold. The $18 seats for concerts will be sold on Thursday, beginning at 10 o'clock, and the $10 seats on Friday. The usual rules will govern the sales.

It has been stated in New York that Mr. Nikisch would be Dr. Muck's successor for the season of 1908-09, but no plans whatever have been made for that season. Dr. Muck may be induced to stay, but whether he will or not time alone can tell.

The new men of the orchestra will be as follows: Carl Wendling of Stuttgart will take the place of Willy Hess, who has leave of absence for a year. Mr. Wendling has been the concert master at the Court Theatre of Stuttgart and for several years the concert master at the Wagner festivals at Bayreuth, where Dr. Muck became acquainted with him. Julius Thornberg of Copenhagen will take the position of second concert master which was vacated by T. Adamowski's resignation. Mr. Moldauer, one of the best of the violins, and Mr. Frietsche, the bass clarinet, died the new viola player has not yet been announced.

Arthur Kautzenbach of Berlin will take the place in the 'cello section made vacant by the resignation of J. Adamowski. A. Goldstein, whose father was for many years a member of the orchestra, and Mr. Rennert of Boston will join the second violins. Mr. Traupe will leave the second violins to play with the first. The two new double bass players will be Messrs. Agnesy and Huber of Vienna. Mr. Litke, a former member of the orchestra, will return from New York, to be the second bassoonist.

There will be two new horns, so that there will be eight in all. The new first horn is Mr. K. Schmid of Vienna. Mr. Lorenz of Boston will be the tuba player. There will be two changes in the battery. In all there will be 16 new members, and the list will include 98 names instead of 96. It is gratifying to know that the Pension Fund will be of service to those who have earned retirement and rest.

The plans of the management call for at least twelve soloists this season, and the management has endeavored to secure artists of the highest grade. There will be two, possibly three, singers. Mme. Melba will sing after the holidays. Mme. Schumann-Heink has been engaged. Among the pianists will be Meses. Teresa Carreno, Katharine Goodson, Olga Samarooff and Messrs. Bauer and Paderewski. There will be no doubt about Mr. Paderewski's appearance. He will sail for this country in about three weeks to be here until the first of May. It is doubtful whether his new symphony will be ready for performance by the orchestra. Among the violinists will be Messrs. Kreisler, Wendling and Thornberg.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS BRILLIANTLY

Orchestra Plays Superbly in a Program of Unusual
Attraction. Oct 13/07

APPLAUSE GREETS DR. MUCK

Society, Resplendent in Magnificent Gowns, Present in Great Numbers.

The initial of the twenty-seventh season of Symphony concerts last night proved an attraction of magnitude for music-loving society, which filled Symphony Hall to its utmost capacity.

Dr. Muck's reappearance was greeted with loud and prolonged applause. The programme consisted of Bach's Suite in D major, No. 3 for orchestra; Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's Symphony in M major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.

Orchestra Is Superb.

The fullness of tone and the spontaneity of the orchestra was most appreciated in Beethoven's symphony, holding the audience at almost breathless attention.

Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, whose husband is always to the fore in things musical, was among the early arrivals and was gowned as usual in black silk.

No less than half a dozen old rose costumes were worn, giving a pretty touch of color to the otherwise neutral background. The brilliant shade worn by Barbara Higginson was distinctive and made her the most conspicuous figure in the centre of the house.

Mrs. Muck Listens Attentively.

Mrs. Arthur Ware wore the most superb costume seen at any function this season—a delicate shade of lavender voile finished with strappings of a deeper tone and adorned about the bodice with much rare lace, and Mrs. Francis L. Higginson's gray chiffon satin was a close second.

Mrs. Leverett Tuckerman, in a black and white creation, was most charming to look at, and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers was gorgeous in purple voile. One of the smartest, best looking and best gowned woman was Mrs. Francis Amory in black lace, accompanied by her daughter, Mary Josephine, who was charming in a white cloth costume.

Mrs. Muck, who is one of the most appreciative listeners, was with a party of friends and looked very attractive in a gown of dark gray chiffon made over a lighter shade of brown satin.

Miss Barbara Burr in a creation of pale pink liberty and lace was the beauty of the evening. She has only recently returned from a round of visits with her numerous friends at Lenox and the mountain resorts.

One of the all-white figures was Miss Julia Tuckerman. Mrs. F. Murray Forbes, with her beautiful silver hair and handsome gown, was one of the most distinguished women present. She was accompanied by her daughter Mary.

Mrs. George Amory was with her daughter Constance, who is soon to marry Mr. Wadsworth, and who never looked lovelier than in her gown of mauve chiffon.

Mrs. Samuel Wolcott was among the younger matrons present and wore a creation of pink chiffon and silk trimmed white lace.

Mrs. Stevenson was perfect in dark blue chiffon cloth, while Miss Molly Eliot was stately and sweet in white lace.

Mrs. Gardner Is Absent.

Marion Fenno, the dainty daughter of the L. Carteret Fennos, was piquant in pale green silk and white lace, while her mother was a stately figure in gray chiffon.

Rosamond Dixey, very quietly gowned in mauve cloth, was with her mother, who was all in black.

Mrs. Bayard Thayer who has often been called the most beautiful woman in Boston, was superb in gray and white striped chiffon.

Mrs. John L. Gardner, who has taken two seats in the first balcony for the season, was among the very few who did not put in an appearance.

SYMPHONY AUDIENCE AGAIN GREETED DR. MUCK

NEW FACES SEEN IN ORCHESTRA AT FIRST "RE-HEARSAL" OF THE SEASON.

By Wilder D. Quint

At Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the 27th season of Boston's great and superb orchestra opened with the first of the so-called "rehearsals." The word is time-honored misnomer, for in every respect these Friday afternoon offerings are as much concerts as those of Saturday evening. Imagine the excitement among the fair beings who make up the great bulk of "rehearsal" audiences, if Dr. Muck should suddenly command his men to cease playing for instruction in some fine point of interpretation, or should play some one movement of a symphony over three or four times!

But if the afternoon concerts differ in no essential from those of the night, not so the listeners. The "rehearsal crowd," is notoriously chilly, and so it happened that when Dr. Muck appeared from out the familiar doorway and walked to his undecorated music-stand, the applause that greeted him was decorous; nothing more. Tonight it will probably be tumultuous, at least if the cordial way in which leave was taken of the conductor at the final concert of last season counts for anything in the way of prophecy.

Change in the Personnel.

But even apart from Dr. Muck, the first thing that comes home to the habitual symphony-goer is the change in the personnel of the orchestra. Not since the days of the early 80s, when Gericke so ruthlessly weeded out the men selected by Henschel, has there been such an alteration in a single summer.

There are strangers scattered about in all departments of the band. The front desk of the first violins is entirely new, Hess and the long-familiar Adamowski being replaced by Wendling and Czerwonky. From this same section death has taken Moldauer and to it has returned Theodorowicz after several years with the Kneisel quartet. Zach is missed from the violas and Joseph Adamowski from the 'cellos. There are two new horn players and various other pilgrims from abroad, all of whom may reasonably be supposed to be of fine and acceptable calibre. Men and times change, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be trusted to go on its way without shadow of turning.

Nor has Dr. Muck changed. He last year won the reputation of being a great conductor, and a poor maker of programs. Both elements stood out in yesterday's concert. Its composition was of the one style sort that offered little variety and finally became cloyingly monotonous. A Bach suite, a Mozart symphony and a Beethoven symphony; those were the ingredients. Contrast, which makes even a mediocre concert sometimes interesting, was almost entirely absent. Nor could it be said that the program was "educational in showing the development of music, for the Mozart symphony which came in the middle is greater in every respect—in inspiration, in beauty, in emotion and in workmanship—than the jolly Beethoven pastoral that followed it.

Karl Muck, Symphony Leader.

Much Beautiful Playing.

But there was much beautiful playing during the afternoon, and some admirably strong and poetic interpretation. The familiar Bach suite in D major, a swollen affair at best, when played by a big modern orchestra, went well enough (though it has been played with more precision and finish at these concerts) and it gave us a small opportunity to hear Mr. Wendling, the new concert-master. His style is broad and his tone rich, but appears to be less pure and lovely than that of either Hess or Kneisel. However, of his calibre we can judge better later on.

Dr. Muck read, and the men played the Mozart G minor symphony with a passionate fervor that made it immensely effective. It was modernized, yet not vulgarized; colored with no little freedom, yet never abused. There was less of the elegance of the salon than usual, and the greatness of the composer suffered nothing thereby. The playing was for the most part superfine in quality, although the horns in their passage at the end of the andante were a trifle uncertain and ragged.

The rollicking Beethoven "Pastoral" symphony, a tour de force of joy which once, however, comes perilously near to depicting a snooze by the brookside, was given in virile and breezy style that doubtless delighted the nature-lovers present. "Pleasant thoughts that awaken on arriving in the country," is Beethoven's own tag for the opening movement. Change the "in" to "from" and you have a very excellent sentiment for the entire concert. There were evidences that many listeners had just reached town, and certainly Dr. Muck's choice of subjects aroused pleasant thoughts, if nothing else.

FINAL SYMPHONY SALE

Trans. Oct. 4, 1907
Lower-Priced Seats for the Saturday Evening Concerts Bring Good Premiums, as Have Previous Sales This Week

Today brought to a close the series of sales by auction of seats for the performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming fall and winter, and the four days' sale has resulted in excellent premiums paid by music lovers for coveted seats in Symphony Hall. The final sale held at this hall this forenoon was attended by many people, despite the bad weather. Seats on sale today were the lower cost ones, the face value of which is $10, for the series of twenty-four Saturday evening concerts.

Opening sales were made in row K K on the floor with premiums ranging from $10 up to $15, and by the time R R was reached one could get places for as low as $6.50 and $7, also, in the few seats in row S S, tucked away in the extreme right and left corners of the hall, from which, however, one can hear very well. The premium of $15 was therefore the highest paid today for the floor seats.

In the first balcony, seats in the rear rows sold at prices ranging from $7, as the minimum, to $14.50 as the maximum premium. These are all excellent seats and command an unbroken view of the stage. Seats directly in front of them, the face value of which is $18 instead of $10, brought relatively higher premiums at yesterday's sale, yet are probably no better situated for the hearing of music.

The two rows of side seats in the second balcony on the right of the hall sold at premiums ranging from $10 to $20.50 for the front row and at prices averaging about $10 premium for the second row in this part of the hall. Directly across in the left of the second balcony front seats brought as high as $21, the highest price today, and many sold for around $15 and $17. In the second row, side, the prices ran from $8.50 up and many seats went at that price and at about $10.

The sale did not occupy as much time as previous sales this week and, unlike other days, was confined merely to a morning session. Good prices have been obtained at the four days' sales and they compare very favorably with those of other years. This is the second year that the face value of seats, to which all premiums are added, have been $18 and $10, as against the prices of previous seasons, $12 and $7.50, respectively.

FOR SALE

One season Symphony ticket for Saturday evenings, on floor. Address D.D.M., Boston Transcript (A):

FOR SALE—BELOW COST

Three seats in 1st row, right, first balcony, for Saturday Symphony concerts. Address P.H.F., Boston Transcript. (A):

AFTER FILLING ORDERS WE HAVE A FEW

Symphony Tickets

For Sale
Connelly & Burke
ADAMS HOUSE Phone Ox. 942-41330
(A)

SYMPHONY TICKETS

For Sale. WADSWORTH, 40 State, Room 47. Telephone Main 4684-1. (A):

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Two season tickets for Saturday evenings for sale. Floor, K, $30 each. Address H. P. V., Boston Transcript. (A)

For Sale—Two Symphony Concert Seats

For alternate Saturdays, A, 30-31, first balcony left; price $18 each. Address J.B.R., Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY

Very desirable locations, afternoon and evening. HARDING, 70 Kilby St. (A)3t: o 5

FOR SALE—One Symphony Ticket for 24 Friday Afternoon Rehearsals; Row K, near centre; best location in house. Address M.R.R., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o 4

SYMPHONY

TICKETS FOR SALE. WADSWORTH, 40 State street, Room 47. Telephone Main 4684-1. 3t(A): o 8

SYMPHONY

Very desirable locations, afternoon and evening. HARDING, 70 Kilby St. (A)3t: o 5

FOR SALE—Two choice SYMPHONY TICKETS in E for sale for Saturday evening concerts. Address at once F.G.R., Boston Transcript. (A)

SYMPHONY TICKETS—Wanted to exchange two end seats in Row CC for two seats in Row X, Saturday concerts. Address TREIBER, 16 Everett avenue, Dorchester. (A):

SANDERS THEATRE, Cambridge

THURSDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 24, Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, March 12, April 23, at 8.

SIX CONCERTS Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS AT $5 EACH OPENS AT KENT'S UNIVERSITY BOOK STORE, HARVARD SQUARE, CAMBRIDGE, SATURDAY MORNING, OCT. 19.
(A)

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Two season tickets for Saturday evenings for sale. Floor, K, $30 each. Address H. P. V., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o 11

WANTED—TWO SYMPHONY TICKETS

For alternate Friday rehearsals; will pay reasonable premium. B.V.T., Boston Transcript. (A):

MANY NEW FACES IN THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck Receives an Ovation at the First of the Season's Concerts.

Journal — Oct. 14, 1907

Seldom have so many new faces been seen in the Symphony Orchestra as were on view Saturday night, at the first concert of the season. To be sure, Dr. Muck has returned to make light of last year's announcement that his first season would be his last here. Now he says that this season will undoubtedly be his last, but the desire—the determination, if it may so be called—to have him stay may again overcome foreign or imperial obstacles. Apparently, much depends upon the inclination of the excellent conductor himself. Anyhow, there he was, Saturday night, as buoyant, dignified and commanding as ever—a conductor to the manner born; and the audience was manifestly delighted to see him again.

Seldom has more curiosity been shown over the members of the famous band than at this first concert of 1907-8. Around the conductor was a group of newcomers. In the place of Professor Willy Hess, last year's concert master, sat Karl Wendling, a young man from the Stuttgart Court Theater, who, if he ever ventures down State street, will surely be mistaken for Mr. Lawson. In the place of Timothee Adamowski, next to the concert master, was seated the boyish figure of Julius Thornberg, lately of Copenhagen.

There were other new faces in both the string and wood chairs, making this first concert a notable one in the history of the orchestra. Mr. Zach, one of the veterans, left Boston yesterday for St. Louis, where he is to conduct the Choral Symphony Society. The three numbers, Bach's Suite in D major, Mozart's G minor Symphony and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, were all old acquaintances.

Prudence dictated that the orchestra should not be too ambitious thus early in the season. Yet, notwithstanding an unevenness that will probably disappear in another concert or two, Saturday night's performance was admirable. In the Bach number Mr. Wendling had a small opportunity to show his mettle. It but served as a card of introduction.

Every seat in the big auditorium was taken. The audience was most applaudive during the performance of the Bach dances.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

J. S. BACH,

SUITE No. 3, in D major, for ORCHESTRA.

- I. Overture.
- II. Air.
- III. Gavotte No. 1, Gavotte No. 2.
- IV. Bourrée.
- V. Gigue.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in G minor (K. 550).

- I. Allegro molto.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral, op. 68.

- I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country. Allegro, ma non troppo.
- II. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
- III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunder-storm; Tempest: Allegro.
- IV. Shepherd's song; Glad some and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the Beethoven Symphony.

MANY NEW FACES IN THE SYMPHONY

Dr. Karl Muck Receives an Ovation at the First of the Season's Concerts.

Journal — Oct. 14, 1907

Seldom have so many new faces been seen in the Symphony Orchestra as were on view Saturday night, at the first concert of the season. To be sure, Dr. Muck has returned to make light of last year's announcement that his first season would be his last here. Now he says that this season will undoubtedly be his last, but the desire—the determination, if it may so be called—to have him stay may again overcome foreign or imperial obstacles. Apparently, much depends upon the inclination of the excellent conductor himself. Anyhow, there he was, Saturday night, as buoyant, dignified and commanding as ever—a conductor to the manner born; and the audience was manifestly delighted to see him again.

Seldom has more curiosity been shown over the members of the famous band than at this first concert of 1907-8. Around the conductor was a group of newcomers. In the place of Professor Willy Hess, last year's concert master, sat Karl Wendling, a young man from the Stuttgart Court Theater, who, if he ever ventures down State street, will surely be mistaken for Mr. Lawson. In the place of Timothee Adamowski, next to the concert master, was seated the boyish figure of Julius Thornberg, lately of Copenhagen.

There were other new faces in both the string and wood chairs, making this first concert a notable one in the history of the orchestra. Mr. Zach, one of the veterans, left Boston yesterday for St. Louis, where he is to conduct the Choral Symphony Society. The three numbers, Bach's Suite in D major, Mozart's G minor Symphony and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, were all old acquaintances.

Prudence dictated that the orchestra should not be too ambitious thus early in the season. Yet, notwithstanding an unevenness that will probably disappear in another concert or two, Saturday night's performance was admirable. In the Bach number Mr. Wendling had a small opportunity to show his mettle. It but served as a card of introduction.

Every seat in the big auditorium was taken. The audience was most applaudive during the performance of the Bach dances.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

J. S. BACH,

SUITE No. 3, in D major, for ORCHESTRA.

- I. Overture.
- II. Air.
- III. Gavotte No. 1, Gavotte No. 2.
- IV. Bourrée.
- V. Gigue.

MOZART,

SYMPHONY in G minor (K. 550).

- I. Allegro molto.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral, op. 68.

- I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country. Allegro, ma non troppo.
- II. Scene by the brook-side: Andante molto moto.
- III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d' allegro. Thunder-storm; Tempest: Allegro.
- IV. Shepherd's song; Glad some and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the Beethoven Symphony.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Adv: Programme. Oct 14. 07

Bach—Suite in D minor.
Mozart—Symphony in G minor.
Beethoven—Pastoral Symphony.

There was a sound of symphony by night. The Bay State's capital had gathered then. Her critics and her music-friends, and bright. The lamps shone o'er wise women and lank men. And Dr. Muck beat happily, and when Music arose with all its mingled sweets, People forgot the higher price of seats, And each felt glad that he had come again.

If there was not much novelty in the programme there certainly was enough in the orchestra. The Adamowskis had left an aching void that could scarcely be filled to the immediate satisfaction of Bostonians, but the advent of Mr. Wendling, the new "concert-meister" successfully covered the Hessian retreat. There were not only many new faces in the ranks, but some of the old ones were found in new places. There had been several changes made in the seating of the men, of the advantage of which we shall be able to judge later on. Dr. Muck is evidently desirous of leaving his mark on the orchestra, of adding new life to its membership and eliminating all traces of fossilization.

Nevertheless the ensemble of the opening concert was not so smooth as it has been heretofore. There were many points of individual excellence, the bassoon, the oboe and the first horn all made a good record in the pastoral symphony, but the violin tones were rough and the brasses at times noisy and not perfectly together. Something like this is to be expected of an orchestra that has been partially made over, and we expect these faults to disappear very soon, but they were in evidence in the dainty Mozart symphony and in the Bach Overture.

Bach's Suite made a good opening of the season, better than that "Dedication of the House" overture with which Henschel used to begin the series. Possibly Wagner's "Greeting to the Hall" would make an appropriate number for a first concert. "Dich theure Halle" would appeal to many who had bought high-priced season tickets.

We recall the Bach Suite being applauded to the echo when it was last performed here. The monotony of key hampers the work somewhat, but its clear melodies and noble counterpoint overcome this defect. The final Gigue might have been more rollicking.

The gem of the concert seemed to be the G minor symphony, for this is Mozart's best orchestral work. It may not be as ambitious as his "Jupiter Symphony," but it is infinitely sweeter, more spontaneous and poetic. Dr. Muck did not individualize the work, but read it in a strong and manly fashion, which however did not obscure its pathos and delicacy. The finale was particularly strong, its contrasts being very effectively made.

The Pastoral does not seem to grow upon us. It is an uneven symphony. Its first movement is filled with good intellectual development and does not attempt the landscape-painting which fills the next two movements. The work is interesting historically, since it shows how "programme-music" began, for, although there were definite pictures attempted in instrumental music before Beethoven, this is the first important effort to make it speak a definite language.

Yet some of the touches seem archaic. That poultry trio of nightingale, quail (without toast) and cuckoo, has been obliterated by the bleating of Richard Strauss' sheep ("Don Quixote") and the whinneys of Wagner's race-horses in "Die Walkure." The second movement, "The Brook," is prolix. Beethoven must have had Tennyson's brook in his mind—"Men may come and men may go, but I go on forever!" Yet some good musicians (Mr. Gericke for example) consider this part the gem of the symphony.

The thunder-storm is one of the great instances of tone-painting and was an epoch-making movement when it appeared. Wagner, St. Saens, Berlioz, Rossini, Verdi, and a host of others have since tried their hand at tempest-making without having surpassed this spell of bad weather. Some may object that the lightning comes after the thunder in this, or that there is not even an umbrella-motive in its measures, but it remains one of the strong pictures in the musical art-gallery.

If Dr. Muck did not attain the standard in the Bach Suite which Boston has had in past performances, he certainly excelled in this storm movement. It was, all in all, the best performance of this number that we can recall. The wind piped on the piccolo, the rain fell on the violins, the tumult grew on the trombones, and it was in every way an exciting bit of modern music executed in a modern manner.

Per contra the Thanksgiving at the end fell off a trifle, and was, like the beginning of the concert, somewhat rough, with poor ensemble and tone-quality. We repeat that this is to be condoned in a first concert of the season, and that the conductor ought to be allowed time to get his new material into shape; for our orchestra is fast becoming like the boy's jack-knife, which first received a new blade and afterwards a new handle. Is it our old orchestra? Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Two season tickets for Saturday evenings for sale. Floor, K, $30 each. Address H. P. V., Boston Transcript. 2t(A) o 11

WANTED—TWO SYMPHONY TICKETS

For alternate Friday rehearsals; will pay reasonable premium. B.V.T., Boston Transcript. (A):

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

From

Oct 14. 07

AN AGREEABLE BEGINNING OF THE NEW SEASON

Bach, Mozart and Beethoven Make the First Programme and the Performance Renews and Confirms Some of the Best Traits of the Orchestra and the Conductor—The "Pastoral" Symphony Dramatized—A Warm Welcome for Dr. Muck and an Untoward Incident—Concerts Next Week—The Kneise! Series—Other Musical News

The twenty-seventh series of Symphony Concerts and the second year of Dr. Muck's conductorship began yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall; while for the first time within recent memory there had been a considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra. The audience, as usual, filled the hall to the last seat, and rustled with pleasant interest in itself and its own whereabouts, as the way is at the first concert of a new season. It amused itself also with a scrutiny of the new faces in the front rank of the band (and perhaps with recollections of the old), and it received the conductor warmly, as warmth goes at an afternoon concert, when he came first to his place. Its applause was much less hearty as one item on the programme followed another, and towards the end came unexpected signs of the presence of a new public impatient under a succession of suite, symphony, and symphony, and plainly unaccustomed to the unwritten code of the afternoon concerts. All who frequent them know that departures are sometimes many at each pause toward the end of the concerts. They were unusually so yesterday, and for the first time in two years of experience, they continued while the orchestra was actually playing. The departing brushed through long rows of occupied seats, rustled down the aisles, swung the doors audibly. Such an incident, with its disregard of the rest of the audience, is novel at the Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck did not hide his just irritation, and resentful looks and words were many. The concert was indeed long—a full two hours; the pieces were familiar classics, but the performance of all three was stimulating pleasure, and through it all played some of the most admirable qualities of Dr. Muck's conducting. The three pieces were:

Bach: Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra.
Mozart: Symphony in G minor (K. 559).
Beethoven: Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.

It is a new and a stirring sensation to hear the orchestra again after its five months of silence. The ear of memory is not the ear of the body, and the liveliest recollection may not summon the full measure of the splendors and the subtleties of which the band is capable. Subtleties were fewer, yesterday, than they sometimes are; but splendors were many. From beginning to end of the concert, from the new first violins through the new double-basses, the orchestra was alertly alive. It sprang to its work, to its music, to its conductor's will. So far as a single concert may disclose, the new players—or, perhaps, the causes that have brought some of them to their new posts—are a distinctly animating force. The new fire, elasticity and responsiveness, the larger intensity and the larger power that Dr. Muck has been cultivating in the orchestra were in full and free, but never uncontrolled or unproportioned, play. The rich sonority of tone at the beginning of Bach's suite was thrilling. The glorified dance-tunes with which it ends went in lusty life. The brightness of the tone in the first and the last movements of Mozart's symphony flashed on the ear as warm, clear light upon the eye. The pulsing voice of the orchestra in Mozart's and equally in Beethoven's andante lifted either to pure song, seemingly upspringing from itself. Beethoven's symphony began in a warm sonority that was orchestral tone spontaneous, alive, elastic. At the end the band sang with full-throated breadth. Throughout the string choir played with a glowing vivacity and responsiveness that gave its brilliance new animation and suppleness. The voices of the wind choir kept their familiar, pure and sensitive beauty, and their old artistry in the weaving of instrumental detail. The band has played with a more chiselled smoothness, and a more edgeless euphony. It has been in rehearsal only a week, and the fulness of some of its qualities only time and association may bring. The pleasure of yesterday was the new or the seemingly new vivacity and elasticity of its tone, the songful quality with which it intensified it, and the ordered and responsive power with which it gave it eloquence. Clearly Dr. Muck is printing himself upon the orchestra. It plays now in his image and in the image of no other conductor.

The subtlety of the afternoon—and it was not a subtlety so clear and keen was the impression of it—was the distinctive and sympathetic quality of tone that Dr. Muck and his men brought to each of the three pieces. Their voice with Bach's suite was not their voice with Mozart's symphony. Their voice with Beethoven was not their voice with either of the other two. They spoke in the "overture" that begins the suite, with a sturdy, square-toed pomp of tone; they sang the succeeding air with a large and easy simplicity; and lusty and hearty were the succeeding dances. The suite was indeed the music of the robust old Cantor—a large two-fisted man in spite of all the pedants and the idealists—as Cothen and Leipzig and other German towns knew him when he walked their streets. The conductor and the band passed to Mozart's symphony and straightway the lusty largeness of their striding tone vanished. Through all the symphony it was of a lighter body and of a finer suppleness. It was clear brightness through the opening allegro; it flowed serenely through the song of the andante or it fluttered in the fragments of it. Elegance was its trait in the graces of the scherzo, and it was vivacity itself in the finale. Again it had taken body, shape, color, voice, from the intrinsic and distinctive qualities of the music and so expressed and differentiated it. Then Beethoven, and with him, as Dr. Muck and his men played the "Pastoral" symphony, came a larger, deeper, richer, warmer-colored tone. It was eloquent in itself; it was emotionally expressive; a touch of exaltation amplified it. Once more the tone was of the matter and the manner of the music. Once again Dr. Muck had confirmed one of the most admirable and unobtrusive of his abilities—that by which he differentiates each piece from all the rest, isolates its essentials, like a musical chemist, and plays it, so to say, in itself and its own kind.

Throughout, indeed, in another respect this same quality had been in notable play. The rediscovery of Bach is a pastime that is now nearly two hundred years old, and each rediscoverer in the joy of his "find" will have it that Bach always and everywhere is emotional in the modern sense. Yet he did much sturdy music-making for no other purpose than to exercise his calling and make his living. No doubt a man of his lusty temperament got some emotions out of the process and the feeling that was in him for his work went into the fruit of it. All that, however, does not make this particular suite in D and much other of Bach's music emotional as we of 1907 understand the word, and it is stupid to try to twist it so. Dr. Muck's poised intelligence easily avoided this pitfall. He played the suite no less sturdily than, with any modern orchestra, it seems to have been written. Almost as many will have Mozart emotional in the modern sense as well; but if ever there was a child of his time it was he, and the eighteenth century was not emotional as the nineteenth and the twentieth are. Mozart had a temperament, as the sedate and the sprightly of Vienna and Salzburg have recorded of him in many another thing than music. When he wrote, he had feeling for his work and presumably the process stirred him. But try to clothe his music with our self-conscious, sharp-edged, uneasy emotions and forthwith it is distorted, dulled, stiffened. Again Dr. Muck's keen responsiveness to the underlying spirit, the essential and peculiar characteristics kept Mozart's symphony Mozart's.

Then, when the conductor came to Beethoven and the "Pastoral" symphony, he could be as eloquent, as emotional, as dramatic even, as he would. The music invites it, the response of his audience is equally quick and full. And yesterday Dr. Muck did more than make the symphony musically eloquent. He fairly dramatized it. The dramatic thrill, the emotional vivacity that he gave the first movement were like a new sensation. Perhaps he gained it by a brisk and sharp pace and accent at which some purists will quarrel, as they will with the slow pace and long accents of the succeeding andante, but it gave an irresistible animation to the one, and the voice of mounting human song to the other. The same dramatizing quality in conducting and in performance made the scherzo humanly and humorously alive. The storm was more vivid than many an overwrought "tone picture" of yesterday, and the finale, again with the appropriate dramatic sense, swelled richly and deeply to its close. "The Pastoral" is the most human of Beethoven's symphonies; Dr. Muck and his men dramatized its humanity, and at every turn the music seemed to justify them. It is hard to recall when it has seemed so to sound with its own voice. H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT BELOW STANDARD

First Programme of 27th Season Made up of Familiar Compositions.

Herald Oct. 12, 1907
By PHILIP HALE.

The first concert of the 27th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Suite in D major, No. 3, for orchestra.... Bach Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
"Pastoral" symphony, No. 6.....Beethoven

Dr. Muck was welcomed heartily, and there was liberal applause after various movements of the three familiar compositions. It may also be said that the applause was at times generous, for the performance as a whole was below the standard of the orchestra in the matter of euphony and also of precision.

It is not necessary at this time to inquire too anxiously into the causes of the falling off in quality of tone, in decision of attack and in finesse of ensemble. There are several new players; the former members have been scattered through the summer; there has been little time for rigorous rehearsal. The compositions by Bach and Mozart are admirably suited to the purpose of exhibiting as in white light any shortcomings ings in essentials of perfect ensemble. That there was too often an absence of precision might perhaps have been expected in view of the circumstances, but that there should have been so often a lack of the delightful tonal quality, the euphony that has made this orchestra distinguished above other orchestras, was indeed a surprise. It is enough to repeat that the concert was the first of the season, and that there had not been sufficient rehearsal.

New Members Men of Pith.

For, however desirous Dr. Muck may be to obtain dramatic contrasts, however zealous he may be in his striving after forcible accentuation, he has shown in the past his care for quality and proportion of tone. The new members of the orchestra are said to be men of pith, and as soon as all the players are accustomed to each other and earnest individualities are blended in ensemble, there will be no doubt a full display of the qualities that have long set this orchestra apart from others and won for it the highest praise.

The works chosen for performance are familiar to all. A certain rigidity in the singing of the Bach aria arose probably from fear of falling into the slough of sentimentalism. The feature of Mozart's symphony last night was Dr. Muck's interpretation of the minuet, which was unusually effective, as was in a little less degree his reading of the andante. His conception of the "Pastoral" was sane and fresh, but in all the works performed, as I have said, the orchestra was not heard in its old-time tonal beauty or splendor.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: "Wallenstein," trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, Vincent d'Indy; Liszt's concerto in A major for pianoforte (Mr. Rudolph Ganz, pianist); Wagner's "Emperor's" march. The trilogy of d'Indy is one of the early works of this distinguished composer. It was begun in 1873 and completed about 1881. One of the movements was played in Paris as early as 1874, but the trilogy as a whole was not performed till 1885. The three movements are entitled: "Wallenstein's Camp"; "Max and Thekla"; "The Death of Wallenstein." Mr. Seidl brought out the trilogy in New York in 1888.

MUSIC LOVERS LONG IN LINE

Stand Many Hours to Get Symphony Seats.

Millinery Display is Feature of

First Rehearsal.

New Members of Orchestra Able Musicians.

Globe Oct. 12, 1907
The broad steps of Symphony hall, Huntington av side, were for several hours yesterday banked with fall millinery of many shades, surmounting dainty tailor makes, and all in honor of the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 27th season.

The profusion of living decorations extended south along the sidewalk as far as the children's hospital, and was for the most part resplendent in autumnal brilliancy, excepting where the somber black of masculine dress refused absolutely to blend itself into the general color scheme.

No season's opening is complete without the throng of waiters. It is they who think that time is money, but also that the gain is theirs when, after the exercise of much patience, they are admitted—at least 505 are admitted—to the upper balcony for just 25 cents.

At 9:30 yesterday morning the economical enthusiasts began forming a line and as the minutes grew to hours had increased it to wide proportions. It was a great day to be outdoors. The sun was friendly and made everybody feel better by its warm smiles.

There were jolly girls, fresh from the conservatory—music conservatory, of course, though they bloomed like roses—serious-minded teachers, studious musicians, demure maiden ladies, placid mothers and grave-looking men of all ages.

Jostling? Not a bit of it. There was much conversation, but all allegretto. It might have provided a theme for a good composer. At any rate it was pleasant to hear. Music cases—rolls are tabooed—violin boxes, textbooks, shopping bags, some candy boxes and a good supply of newspapers were also in line and helped to add interest to the attractive picture.

Just at 1:30 the big center door was swung open and slowly and decorously the crowd filed into the hall. It was like a primary school at the close of the morning recess; no noise, no shoving and no rush. It seemed that each was willing to take the place that the right of possession gave and there was not a single effort to break the regularity and evenness of the procession. There were men on hand to prevent just that thing, but they really didn't have much to do.

At 1:42 the man at the door had counted the 505th admission and the 506th in line, with at least 100 more in the rear, was turned away.

Subscribers and holders of tickets for that particular rehearsal did not begin to arrive much before 2 o'clock. However, all who had planned to be there had reached their seats before the doors were closed, and the concert was begun at 2:30.

There were a few vacant seats. It wasn't because they hadn't been sold. O, no, the people who have subscribed for them haven't come back to town yet, but they will probably be there next time.

The "regulars" were there. Some had their old seats and some didn't. They looked about, each to see one another and to reassure themselves that another season was to be auspiciously opened, not exactly because they were there, but because the "atmosphere" was quite the same.

It seems that the appeal that the women in the audience refrain from wearing large hats has had some effect. The number of "obstructionists" yesterday was comparatively small. Of course there was no end of hats, but fortunately these were no larger than the prevailing style demands. One man who has been attending rehearsals for many years, commented upon that fact, and felt that it should be duly recognized by the press.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, received much applause when he came forward to take up his baton. No one has ever said that the handclapping at a Friday afternoon rehearsal was "thunderous." Yesterday it was just the same as ever, and there was no record of anyone splitting a glove.

There have been changes in the personnel of the orchestra. The permanent addition of two men to complete the double quartet of horns has been brought about, and 14 new men to fill the places of others have been engaged, making actually 16 changes.

The new members are nearly all from abroad, and are Dr. Muck's personal choice. This gives one the right to assume that they are men of highest ability. In fact, it was proved yesterday afternoon.

Carl Wendling, formerly concert master of the Court theatre of Stuttgart and of the Wagner festival theatre of Bayreuth, has succeeded Mr. Hess as concert master. He is regarded as one of the very few great concert masters of the world.

NOVEL THING AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans. Oct. 14, 1907
The Curious Change in the Performance of Mozart's Symphony on Saturday Evening—The Perils of Excess of Zeal in a Highly-Strung Orchestra at the Beginning of a New Season—Another Complaint About the Disturbers of the Afternoon Concert—George Ade Makes a Play for Crane as "The Father of the Boys"—Three Forthcoming Programmes in Boston—A Revival of "The Soudan"—Arthur Symons Writes a Tragedy for Miss Marlowe—Other News of the Day

If the first pair of Symphony concerts is prophetic of the whole series, it will not lack incident. Friday afternoon brought the unusual episode of the disturbing departures of which a correspondent makes renewed and righteous complaint in the letter printed below; while on Saturday came a very singular proof that the orchestra may be one thing one day; another another, and even something very different from what it has been within long memory. The evening began according to the routine of the first concert of a new season. The conductor's stand was trimmed with greenery and decked at one corner with a welcoming bunch of flowers. The audience, in which it was good to see new and young faces among the ranks of old subscribers in their old places, received Dr. Muck with long, sincere and hearty applause. The conductor turned to his men, and together they proceeded with Bach's suite in D major much in the fashion in which they had played it on Friday though with a rough touch, now and then, in playing of the band that afterward seemed like ominous suggestion.

Mozart's symphony in G-minor followed, and those in the house who had heard the same orchestra play the same music under the same conductor on Friday afternoon could scarcely believe the evidence of their ears. Gone were the clear brightness and the fine suppleness of the tone that the players then gave to the symphony. Gone were the light precision of the opening allegro; the serene phrasing of the andante; the vivacious grace of the scherzo; the clear elasticity of the finale. On Friday, the playing of the symphony seemed to renew the fine perceptions and the continent imagination with which Dr. Muck had played Mozart's music last year. Again he had caught the substance and the form, the essence and the spirit of it and his men had responded to him.

As it seemed on Saturday, they intended to respond, but sheer over-zeal, with the nervousness of new associations and new conditions defeated their excellent will. In their eagerness for sonority and accent, they made their tone heavy and even rude. In their desire for the telling phrase, they lost roundness and elegance and left sharp and uneven edges. What should have been fine emphases turned blunt; what should have been clear brightness turned thick and cloudy. The peculiar loveliness and the peculiar charm of Mozart had vanished. His music—of all music—actually sounded heavy footed and viscous. On Friday, the symphony had been much that Mozart should be. On Saturday it was as much what he should never be. Not within memory has the orchestra played—to use a harsh but not unjustified word—so clumsily. Plainly it was out of hand, and once out of hand, it is the thoroughbred, be it horse or orchestra, that runs farthest and longest.

There seemed a hint of all these things in Dr. Muck's face when he acknowledged the rather perfunctory applause that followed the symphony; and certainly there was a consequence of it when in the symphony by Beethoven that ended the concert, the conductor fairly plunged and pointed at two erring players. Throughout "the Pastoral" indeed the orchestra was plainly ill at ease, and though it played it admirably, it hardly summoned the fine freedom and the full eloquence that had dramatized the music the day before. When Mr. Weingartner was in America two years ago, he liked to talk at his ease of what he called the psychology of orchestras of virtuosi like ours. They were as sensitively, and nervously strung, he liked to say, as singers or pianists of the first rank—and as changeably. Some day he would write a pamphlet about it and prove his theory with the results of much observation. He ought to have at least a footnote for the episode of Saturday night.

H. T. P.

Speed Mania at the Symphony Rehearsal

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Would it be possible to erect solid barriers of some sort in Symphony Hall, to prevent a repetition of the cattle-like stampede toward the close of the rehearsal last Friday afternoon? The clatter of hoofs was most distressing to the music-loving portion of the audience, who evidently thought they had a right to listen undisturbed to the divine harmonies of that wonderful concert. The pearls cast so lavishly by Dr. Muck and his superlative orchestra were trampled insolently under foot; and by no means the least part of the torture of the appreciative members of the audience was the shame that such talents should be openly insulted in our formerly decent town of Boston.

The comments of the musical critic of the Transcript in his article of Saturday will probably not be read by the—the—persons who deadened the music by their hoof-beats, in some cases so heavy as to actually shake the floor. Why do such people go to the concerts? Is it to show themselves at a fashionable function? If this is all, why cannot they leave in the intermission? Much of the noisy rush was so near the close of the rehearsal as to lead one to suppose that the malefactors were actuated merely by the desire to "get ahead of" their law-abiding fellow creatures. Were they rushing for their automobiles, therein to spread fresh distress among outdoor victims of their speed mania? A HUMILIATED BOSTONIAN

Oct. 14, 1907.

Concerts Next Week

For the second pair of Symphony concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck has put the first new composition of the season on his programme—d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein." The music is new to Boston, but in itself it is twenty or thirty years old. Mr. d'Indy wrote the second part of it in 1874, and ten years later revised it and made it a section of the trilogy. Schiller's three classic Germany plays, "Wallenstein's Camp," "Die Piccolomini," and "Wallenstein's Death," suggested the music; for d'Indy was more a romancist in those days than he is now. The first and the third parts of the music bear Schiller's titles; the second part is labelled "Max and Thecla," with "Die Piccolomini" for a sub-title. The three pieces are opulently and amply scored and representative melodies bind them together against the background of Schiller's plays which the composer assumes in the minds of his hearers. The other numbers of the programme are Wagner's thunderous "Kaisermarsch" in its orchestral arrangement and Liszt's concerto in A major for piano and orchestra—the less familiar of the composer's two concertos, and the one that Mr. Apthorp once happily characterized as "The Life and Adventures of a Melody." Next week Mr. Rudolph Ganz, one of the most interesting and distinctive of the younger pianists, will play the piano part, appearing for the first times with the Symphony Orchestra.

FOR SALE TO RENT Symphony Tickets
Connolly & Burke ADAMS HOUSE tc(A) 014

Mrs. Karl Muck,

Guests of honor at Professional Women's Club reception yesterday.

13-25
55

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

D'INDY,

"Wallenstein," TRILOGY, after the Dramatic Poem
of Schiller, op. 12.

I. Wallenstein's Camp.

II. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).

III. The Death of Wallenstein.

(First time in Boston.)

LISZT,

CONCERTO in A major, No. 2, for PIANOFORTE.

WAGNER,

THE EMPEROR'S MARCH.

Soloist:

Mr. RUDOLPH GANZ.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

RUDOLPH GANZ, PIANIST WHO WILL GIVE A RECITAL ON WEDNESDAY

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

D'INDY,

"Wallenstein," TRILOGY, after the Dramatic Poem
of Schiller, op. 12.

I. Wallenstein's Camp.

II. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).

III. The Death of Wallenstein.

(First time in Boston.)

LISZT,

CONCERTO in A major, No. 2, for PIANOFORTE.

WAGNER,

THE EMPEROR'S MARCH.

Soloist:

Mr. RUDOLPH GANZ.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

Court Violinist Here to Play; All His Fingers Insured!

Herald Sept 23, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Trans: ——— Oct 19, 07

The Moral of the Incidents of Last Week

—D'Indy's "Wallenstein" for the First Time—Interesting and Significant Music

—Mr. Ganz's Playing

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon seemed the moral of those of last week and of their incidents. Not within recollection have departures from an afternoon concert been so few, and they were noiseless. Nearly the whole audience stayed to the end, and all of it listened with steady interest. Throughout, indeed, it seemed highly pleased. Rarely has unfamiliar music received more applause at an afternoon performance than did Mr. d'Indy's "Wallenstein." The vivid "tone-picture" of Wallenstein's camp in the first movement gave easy pleasure in its brightness, variety and animation; but there were equal interest and applause for the graver episodes of the loves of Max and Thecla and of Wallenstein's death that followed. Indeed, the audience was warmer toward Mr. d'Indy's trilogy than it was to Rudolph Ganz, the pianist of the day and to Liszt's second concerto—"The Life and Adventures of a Melody." Mr. Ganz played it with an unusually just mingling of delicacy and brilliance. He did not refine away the kaleidoscopic brightness and changefulness of the music, nor did he harden it into the metallic glint of a mere show piece. The beauty and the smoothness of his tone saved him from the one pitfall, and the air of magical improvisation that he gave to his playing saved him from the other. He tempered the unabateable brilliance of the concerto with truly poetic imagination, and the result seemed close to the matter and the manner of Liszt's music. Yet the applause might have been heartier.

As for the orchestra, the strange mischances of last Saturday had seemingly left little trace behind. True, such music as Mr. d'Indy's or Liszt's might often hide many of the shortcomings that Mozart's a week ago had left naked to the world. But, time and again, in both the trilogy and the concerto, the orchestra recalled its familiar beauty, mellowness and delicacy of tone, its fineness of shading and its nicety of euphony. Clearly, Dr. Muck had been watchful of quality and adjustment of tone, and as clearly his men were surer of themselves and of the new conditions of their playing. In the main the band renewed its finer qualities and kept its new largeness and elasticity of eloquent voice. In detail the programme was:

D'Indy: "Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, op. 12. First time in Boston.

Liszt: Concerto in A major, No. 2, for Piano-forte. (Mr. Ganz.)

Wagner: The Emperor's March.

It was hard to listen to Mr. d'Indy's "Wallenstein"—the youthful d'Indy of the seventies—and not try to find in it appropriate tokens of the d'Indy of today. They were not lacking, and they were interesting to discover and to hear. Even in those days of mature youth he toiled incessantly at his music until he had brought it as closely to his ideal as he might, and he spent seven years in the writing of "Wallenstein." So early he had begun to be resourceful and imaginative in the development and the transformation of melodies, making them serve his poetic or dramatic purpose, yet respecting them musically. Already he was skilled in the use of the orchestra and sensitive to the expressive possibilities of each group of instruments. He had begun to make form primarily the vehicle for the ideas, the emotions, the imaginings that he would convey; yet nowhere is the structure or the substance of "Wallenstein" uncertain or vague. Youthful music, as the trilogy is, it is also music of a mature and reflective youth, and often in it are tokens of the large eloquence, the grave intensity of idea and expressiveness, the characteristic exaltation of the d'Indy that we know in his music today. The depth of feeling and of expression that was to come speaks in the second part of the trilogy; and the sombre fatefulness and mystery of the music of "Wallenstein's Death" is almost of the d'Indy of full maturity. In those days, however, he looked more willingly, perhaps more sympathetically, on the lightness, brightness and even the rudeness of life, and in the same mood he made "tone-pictures," as the musical dialect runs nowadays, of them.

From beginning to end, "Wallenstein" is programme music in its larger and more imaginative sense. It implies in its hearers some acquaintance with the three plays of Schiller on which it is based, and some sympathy with the mood of them. Musically, sundry characterizing motives, like that which figures the might of Wallenstein himself, binds them together, while out of their transformations, interplay and contrast spring equally the musical and the dramatic content of the trilogy. The first part, "Wallenstein's Camp," is tone-picturing and nothing else. The soldiers and the camp-followers are in rude play or in rude dance. The Capuchin monk preaches his sermon on the bassoons and in fugue. In other instruments the soldiers mock and confound him. They sweep into their tumult. Enter Wallenstein and the motive that typifies his might and power subdues all the rest. The camp bows to his master. Throughout it is elastic, highly colored, warmly pictorial, genuinely romantic music. The second part of the trilogy sings the traits and the loves of Max, the son of Piccolomini, and Thecla, the daughter of Wallenstein. Now the music has the air of the youth, and now the tenderness of the girl. Again the note of oncoming and oppressing fate, struck even in the scene of the camp overshadows it. Or again through it struggles the characteristic melody of Wallenstein weighing down an demibittering the passion of the lovers. The end is piteous, lamenting. The fate that pursues Wallenstein has caught and slain the lovers as well. The music is searching and poignant; the fire and prue intensity of Mr. d'Indy is in it. It makes the passionate sang and the piteous dirge of the lovers. It continues the note of fate. Each resonance of the composer—melody, instrumentation, trans-formation, modulation serves single-heart-edly his poetic and ramatic ends. In the final part fate strides. It rises out of ominous orchestral forebodings; it cuts its way through orchestral tumults; it recalls haunting memories; it descends upon Wal-lenstein and chushes him. Again the music goes out in piteous lament as into dark-ness. And steadily it has held its sombre and mysterious eloquence. H. T. P.

D'INDY'S "WALLENSTEIN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two things made Saturday night's Symphony concert memorable. One was the first performance here of the trilogy, "Wallenstein," by D'Indy. The other was the splendid example of piano playing given by Rudolph Ganz in Liszt's Concerto in A major, No. 2.

It shows the conservatism, if you please, of Symphony program-makers that the "Wallenstein" should have taken nearly twenty years to reach Boston. In its complete form, the trilogy was played in Paris, and also in New York, in 1888. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," had also been heard in the West before we heard it here last week. The work is based on Schiller's tragedy, dealing with the career of the Duke of Friedland, most famous of the Imperial generals in the Thirty Years' War, who dreamt of re-suscitating the Byzantine empire and who was assassinated after the Em-peror of whom he wished to make an-other Alexander the Great had jeal-ously deposed him on the charge of treason.

Impressive Performance.

The "Camp" movement is a vivid picture of soldiery made bolsterous by success and confidence. The second movement, "Max and Thekla," being largely a description of a love scene, is softer in mood, and, though D'Indy carefully eschews all sentimental out-bursts, nevertheless the result, as a whole, is quite entrancing. The third movement, "The Death of Wallenstein," brings back the camp, with its rest-lessness and wildness, and the death of the hero is rather suggested than de-scribed.

The performance by the orchestra of the trilogy was impressive through-out: whether in the din of the camp or in the calmer, sweeter passages of the romantic second movement, fine style and keen sympathy were always present. At the close of the work the players, as well as Dr. Muck himself, were compelled to bow to the enthusi-asm of the audience.

"Riotous" Liszt Concerto.

The concerto that Mr. Ganz chose for the evening abounds in almost in-surmountable difficulties; it is one long, brilliant improvisation or rhapsody, de-manding perfect mastery of rhythm and technique; and, at the same time, an imagination equal to giving color to the constantly shifting themes. "Never," it has been said of the concerto, "has even Liszt rioted more unreservedly in fitful orgies of flashing color. Mr. Ganz's performance was worthy of the work. Not only did the young Swiss artist meet every demand, but he gave signs of a reserve that was hardly less im-pressive than the actual performance itself. His was a brilliant feat in every respect.

To close the concert the orchestra gave Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" in per-fect form. It was a glorious night for both soloist and orchestra.

The program of this week's concert is as follows: Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," Brahms' Concerto in D major, for violin and orchestra; and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. Mr. Wendling, the new concert master, will make his first appearance as a soloist.

SYMPHONY PLAYS D'INDY WORK WELL

"Wallenstein's Camp," an Early Trilogy, in Orchestra's Best Manner.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall was as follows:

"Wallenstein," Trilogy.....D'Indy
Concerto in A major for piano.....Liszt
The Emperor's March.....Wagner

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" was played for the first time in this city, yet it is one of the composer's earliest compositions, and Mr. Seidl brought out the whole trilogy in New York nearly 20 years ago.

When d'Indy began to compose his tribute to Schiller—this was in 1873—he was under the influence of German masters. When his overture to "The Piccolomini" now in a greatly revised form, the second movement of the tril-ogy, was first played in Paris, it was thought to be too Schumannesque, and it may interest some to know that in 1873 d'Indy became acquainted with Brahms' "German Requiem," which impressed him so deeply that he made a pilgrimage and finally found Brahms who happened to be in a churlish mood; as though "No Frenchmen need apply" were his vacation motto. (Later Brahms was a warm admirer of Bizet.) D'Indy was then, perhaps, Germanized rather than d'Indyized. He was an eager reader of Goethe, Schiller, Uhland, E. T. A. Hoffman, but especially of Schiller, whose "Song of the Bell" tempted him to the composition that took the prize of-fered by the city of Paris. He felt the quality in Schiller that Coleridge de-scribed as "hearty." And in the "Wallen-stein" dramas he saw at once the mate-rial for three symphonic poems. "Wallen-stein's Camp" naturally suggested de-scriptive music, which might serve as a contrast to the love music of Max and Thekla and to the death and the apotheo-sis of the hero.

"The Camp" Most Popular.

"Wallenstein's Camp" is the movement that has evidently been the most popu-lar of the three, but in poetic and dra-matic matter and also in the form of expression it is inferior to the other two movements. It is plausibly ani-mated, there are sharply contrasted episodes, but the themes themselves are not salient. The development is gener-ally conventional and the pages are not always firmly knit together. The Ca-paucin's Sermon is only solemnly hu-morous, humorous in answer to expecta-tion. Yet there are interesting moments in the movement, and there are in-stances of ingenious and brilliant in-strumentation.

The music for Max and Thekla might be music for any lovers whose passion is cooled by death. If the chief themes be, as some say, typical of the two characters, it would seem as though d'Indy had been more fortunate in his portraiture of Thekla, though her theme is still more effectively used in the final movement, where the "thought of Thekla" is the episode in which emo-tion rises to its height, as far as this composition is concerned. D'Indy is al-most never sensuous, and even in his comparatively youthful music there is meditative devotion rather than sensu-ous rhapsody. The close of this move-ment is beautiful in its simplicity, in its tragic reserve.

The opening of "The Death of Wal-lenstein" may or may not have the as-trological import that Imbert attrib-uted to it—"strange chords charac-terize the influence of the stars on human destiny." We all know that Wallenstein was a devout astrologer, but whether these chords are astro-logical or not, does not matter; they are wondrously impressive and they prepare the hearer for the tragic end-ing. Let each reader of Schiller's tragedy find what he can in d'Indy's music, which is without a programme: as absolute music, the movement would be equally eloquent. As I have said, the reappearance of Thekla's theme is finely imagined. The apotheo-sis is unusually stirring, and the ending is dignified, heroic, without vulgar pomp and ceremony.

Performance Creditable.

It is a pleasure to add that the per-formance was generally worthy of the orchestra in its best estate, in matters of technical detail, in euphony, in rhet-orical spirit. The music was evidently appreciated and enjoyed. The applause was hearty after each movement, and at the end Dr. Muck was recalled.

Dr. Muck is to be thanked for mak-ing us acquainted with the chief work of d'Indy's earlier period. The trilogy does not reveal the great master who wrote the superb second symphony or the dazzling "Istar" variations, though there are occasional hints at his coming, but it is a serious composition that shows the purity and nobility of his artistic aim, an aim from which he has never swerved either in concert hall or opera house. It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will soon let us hear d'Indy's latest works, "The Summer Day on the Mountain" and "Souvenirs."

The other feature of the concert was the excellent performance of Liszt's concerto, the second one, which was long a stumbling block, both to pian-ists and hearers. But that which in Liszt's lifetime was to his contempo-raries foolishness is now accepted as a corner-stone and many have built on it. The performance of Mr. Ganz was fleet and brilliant. His force was sufficient and sound did not degener-ate into noise. The one phrase that is often sentimentalized was played with true sentiment. The whole perform-ance was that of a virtuoso-musician.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: Schumann's overture to "Genoveva"; Brahms' violin concerto; Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, "Scotch." Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his first appearance as a soloist in the United States.

A NOTE ON D'INDY'S "WALLEN-STEIN"

The Music of His Youth That Is to Be Played for the First Times Here at the Next Symphony Concerts—A Romantic d'Indy—Wisdom as It Flies—Mr. Belasco Opens His New Theatre in New York
—Augustus Thomas Writes a New Play for John Mason—Antoine's Blow at a Cherished Tradition—Musical News of the Hour Trans. Oct. 17, 1907

Mr. d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallen-stein," which Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra are to play for the first times in Boston at the concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, belongs to an earlier time than does most of his music that our audiences have heard, and to an unfamiliar aspect of his temperament and talents. The com-poser was a mature youth of twenty-three when he began the music in 1874; he was barely thirty when he completed it in 1880; and for much of the intervening time he was still pursuing his studies at the Con-servatory and with César Franck. In those days, too, he journeyed much into Ger-many; sought the acquaintance of Liszt and of Brahms; heard Wagner's operas at Bayreuth, when they were new and strange; pondered long over Schumann; read and re-read the romantic, fateful and shadowy tragedies and tales of Schiller and his kind; and gazed intently at the pictures of the German artists of the middle ages. Mr. d'Indy's temperament was deeply and so-berly romantic in those years, as it is, with an added austerity even now. Schumann and Wagner stirred him musically. Schiller and Goethe penetrated and seized his imagination. He loved exaltation and mystery, as he loves them still; but he courted as well a romantic vigor and picturesqueness that have turned graver with the advancing years. Comparatively concrete ideas and impressions kindled him then as abstract moods and imaginings wake in him now in his music.

With d'Indy so minded and so occupied, it is easy to see how Schiller's three plays of "Wallenstein's Camp," "Die Piccolomini," and "Wallenstein's Death" stirred his imagination to music. His first composition to come to actual performance was an overture to "Die Piccolomini," which he afterwards remodelled generally and rewrote minutely to make the second part of the trilogy. There it is re-named "Max and Thecla," after the son of Octavio Piccolomini and the daughter of Wallenstein, whose hapless love—since they are the children of bitter and pursuing enemies—makes the lyric and the gentle episode in Schiller's plays. In the same fashion, Mr. d'Indy has made it the contrasting portion of his musical trilogy, between his "tone-picturing" of "Wallenstein's Camp"—the first part—and the tragic close in "Wallenstein's Death." Max is young, high-hearted, ardent, alike in his devotion to Thecla, to Wallenstein and to his father. From the father he learns Wallenstein's treachery, struggles not to believe; and when he must believe, struggles again with Wallenstein's appeals for silence. To and fro in this tragedy goes his love for Thecla, and it is easy to believe that behind d'Indy's music lies the scene in "Die Piccolomini" in which they open their tortured hearts to each other.

For the tragic aspect of his symphonic drama, Mr. d'Indy has sought, seemingly, the march of destiny upon Wallenstein to his ruin, and he would put into his music something of the might of the man, as Schiller conceives him, and of the fateful mystery of his fall. The third part of the music runs in such mood of oncoming and irresistible fate. Equally over against it and the lyric episode of Max and Thecla stands the richly colored, changeful and animated music that would catch the atmosphere of "Wallenstein's Camp." It is romantic, almost chivalrous, writing and in it Mr. d'Indy is already imaginative and resourceful in illusive instrumental colors. In the scene of Max and Thecla play the characteristic depth and sincerity of pure emotion that were to flower in his later work; while in the final episode is not a little of the large and austere power, the deep and mysterious voice, of the second symphony or of "The Stranger," his music-drama that we in America have still to know. "Wallenstein," however, belongs to the seventies, and then even for Mr. d'Indy, Wagner was near, new and overshadowing. No wonder that sometimes he has written in the idiom of Balreuth.

Concerts Next Week

The novel interest in the third pair of Symphony Concerts, at Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, lies in the first appearance here as a soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Hitherto only the brief passages for solo violin in Bach's suite in D major, played at the first pair of concerts, have given any hint of Mr. Wendling's individual qualities. They promised well and his high reputation in Germany and elsewhere in Europe has already preceded him. He has worked at Covent Garden under Richter—a keen chooser of able men; he has been the concert master of the orchestra at Beireuth; and he came to Boston from the orchestra of the Court Opera and the Court Concerts at Stuttgart. As a virtuoso, he has played as well in many German cities. Clearly Mr. Wendling has not hesitated to test his powers to the utmost before his new public; for he has chosen Brahms's concerto for violin and orchestra as his solo piece—music that exacts not only the amplest technical resources, but deep understanding and large and lofty expression from the players. The other numbers of the programme are Schumann's overture to his romantic opera, "Genoveva," familiar by many repetitions at the Symphony Concerts, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. For the first time in it, since Dr. Muck came to Boston, he will be conducting a symphony by Mendelssohn, and it is some years since this particular symphony has been played here.

The Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its series of concerts in Cambridge, on Thursday evening next, at eight o'clock, in the Sanders Theatre. Dr. Muck will conduct; there will be no assisting soloist; and the programme is slightly abridged from that of the first pair of concerts in Boston—the overture from Bach's suite in D major, Mozart's symphony in G minor; and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

/ / + / /

MUSICAL MATTERS

Rudolph Ganz, Soloist,
at the Symphony.

Recitals by Sembrich, Samaroff,
Kreisler and Others.

Other Events of the Near Future—Gossip.

The program for the second of the season's Symphony concerts included the D'Indy trilogy "Wallenstein," after Schiller's dramatic poem; Liszt's a major piano concerto, Rudolph Ganz, soloist, and Wagner's "Emperor's March." The trilogy, which was performed in New York some nine years ago, was given for the first time in this city and it would have been welcome ere this, for it is a work of splendid contrasts, the instrumentation is elaborate and suggests vividly incidents in Schiller's poem. The thematic material is abundant and in many instances a single instrument is used with marked effect in illustrating episodes that later on are developed in larger musical form. The first movement is supposed to depict life in camp and in the ever-changing keys are found lively dance tunes, with here and there a whiff of "Venusburg" airs; satirical measures by woodwinds, the beautiful "Wallenstein" motif and a musical riot by the full orchestra. This part was given with fine animation and brilliancy, the strange modulations and key variations being managed smoothly and the parts allotted the woodwinds showing up in good rhythm and harmony.

In the second part the premonitions of the tragedy are admirably worked out, and the horn playing was very beautiful and then came a fine bit of work between the violin and cello, followed by strings and clarinet in a love motif. The somber finale dwindling to pianissimo, was very effective. The confusion of camp and Wallenstein's death made up the last movement, which, from the continuously abrupt deviations from the key, is hardly as satisfying as the earlier movements, although colored and orchestrated in a masterly manner. The whole work was intensely interesting, and in the interpretation there were but few moments when the orchestra displayed any lack of unanimity in ensemble playing.

Mr. Ganz, who appeared as soloist in the Liszt A major concerto for piano, won high favor last season with the orchestra and at his several recitals. His performance of the Liszt piece was admirable throughout. He showed a thorough understanding and an evident sympathy for his work, and with the prime object to give a faithful interpretation of the master's composition. His display of technical ability was sufficient to make the cadenza and supplementary measures brilliant and dashing, and with the exception of a bit of uncertainty twixt piano and orchestra at the close of the movement the soloist and associate players were in perfect accord. Mr. Ganz was very cordially received. Later in the season he will be heard here in recital and concert. The "Emperor's March" was performed by Dr. Muck's men in the proper spirit, as was to be expected.

The novelty of this week's concert will be the appearance as soloist of Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Mr. Wendling will play Brahms' concerto for the violin. The other two works on the program are Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From Mr. Elson's Criticism in the Daily Advertiser.)

Programme.

There was a sound of symphony by night. The Bay State's capital had gathered then Her critics and her music-friends, and bright The lamps shone o'er wise women and lank men And Dr. Muck beat happily, and when Music arose with all its mingled sweets, People forgot the higher price of seats, And each felt glad that he had come again.

If there was not much novelty in the programme there certainly was enough in the orchestra. The Adamowskis had left an aching void that could scarcely be filled to the immediate satisfaction of Bostonians, but the advent of Mr. Wendling, the new "concert-meister" successfully covered the Hessian retreat. There were not only many new faces in the ranks, but some of the old ones were found in new places. There had been several changes made in the seating of the men, of the advantage of which we shall be able to judge later on. Dr. Muck is evidently desirous of leaving his mark on the orchestra, of adding new life to its membership and eliminating all traces of fossilization.

Nevertheless the ensemble of the opening concert was not so smooth as it has been heretofore. There were many points of individual excellence, the bassoon, the oboe and the first horn all made a good record in the pastoral symphony, but the violin tones were rough and the brasses at times noisy and not perfectly together. Something like this is to be expected of an orchestra that has been partially made over, and we expect these faults to disappear very soon, but they were in evidence in the dainty Mozart symphony and in the Bach Overture.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Advt. PROGRAMME. Oct 21. 07
D'Indy—"Wallenstein." Symphonic Trilogy.
Liszt—Piano Concerto in A major.
Soloist, Mr. Rudolph Ganz.
Wagner—Kaiser Marsch.

Dr. Muck still carries out his plan of "unity of programme." If the first concert was all ultra-classical, the second was of the "left centre," that is it was moderately radical throughout. One may call D'Indy of the extreme school, but that is not the D'Indy of this trilogy, who is a man still upon the broad highway of proper modern music. "Wallenstein" is a very different thing from that bitter symphony which the composer inflicted upon us a year ago. We can dimly recall the "Wallenstein" symphony by Rheinberger, with its conventional rolls of drums and succession of military effects. This work is much more subjective and deals far more with emotions than with portrayal of objects. There is much virility in each of the movements, and this was transmitted by Dr. Muck with praiseworthy fire and emphasis.

One instance of the subjective character of the trilogy may be found in the suggestion of the Capucin's sermon, with its grotesque garnishings of Latin, its attack on Wallenstein, its interruption by the angered soldiers and the priest's protection by the Croats. This is not pictured by a single instrument harassed by a group of others, as Strauss might have given it, but is given by a group of bassoons in contrapuntal elaboration. This bassoon fugue (or exposition) is almost a new tonal effect. Its parody on other instruments is graphic enough. It was finely read by Dr. Muck and splendidly played.

The love scene of Thekla and Max was romantic and easily comprehended music. The contrast of the themes was remarkably effective. The Death of Wallenstein was presented in a movement full of dignity and sorrow. This finale is one that will bear repeated hearing. Its beauties are not wholly revealed at a glance. In its close D'Indy has anticipated Tschalkowsky and the end of the "Sinfonie Pathétique." But there were other resemblances, one of which almost seemed plagiarism. The "Flying Dutchman" of Wagner came sailing in most vehemently toward the Coda.

It is possible that we over-rate this trilogy because of its contrast with the later works of D'Indy, but we feel that there is something sterling in this early composition and that it will repay study. That it has not as marked an individuality as D'Indy's later works is undoubtedly true, and it is just possible that D'Indy is meeting with shipwreck in determining to be original or die, and will achieve the latter part of "Aut Caesar, aut Nullus," in his latest cerebral music.

The audience applauded the work and its strong performance very liberally, recalling Dr. Muck at its close and paying a tribute to the orchestra, which arose in response to the enthusiasm.

The soloist of the concert, Mr. Rudolph Ganz, came in the next number.

One was tempted to exclaim with the Ghost, in "Hamlet,"—"Liszt, Liszt, Oh Liszt!"—in admiration of the beautiful concerto which came after the symphonic trilogy. Liszt has as brilliant an orchestration as any of the moderns except Strauss; he has as intellectual a degree of figure development as anyone short of Brahms, and he does not merely juggle with figures but evolves a coherent and beautiful series of transformation, not assassinating melody during the process.

Liszt's concerto in A is much more poetic than the more frequently performed concerto in E flat. The composer himself greatly preferred it to the other work and was piqued by the fact that even his pupils always chose the E flat concerto for public performance. But it is not given to every pianist to grasp the subtlety of this work. The great artist so recently deceased, Alfred Reisenauer, was one of the best interpreters of this composition, and we recall a performance by Prof. Baermann that was also superb. But the general public will never become as enthusiastic over this concerto as they do at a showy performance of its predecessor.

Mr. Ganz evidently understands the work and braves the artistic abnegation involved in choosing and playing it. Yet the task was lightened by the fact that the much more intricate "Wallenstein" came before the concerto. At the beginning we found the orchestral support rather coarse and the pianist was forced into crashing to keep in balance. But this defect soon disappeared and the absolute charm of Liszt, in melody, harmony, figure treatment and orchestration, was revealed.

Mr. Ganz was virile in almost every part of the work. He did not sentimentalize even a single measure. His wrist action in octave and chord work was exciting. The climaxes were well worked up, particularly the finale. Perhaps a less fiery interpretation would have been better, for, in spite of its rather free form, this concerto is not a Rhapsody, such as the E flat concerto certainly is. Mr. Ganz was heartily applauded and recalled twice at the close of his performance.

Once in a while Dr. Muck (always a great conductor) flashes forth as an absolute genius. He did this last season with the Brahms symphony in C minor, making a familiar work seem almost new by his interpretation. At this concert he gave the old "Kaiser Marsch" of Wagner in a style that made us believe that we had never heard it before. It is not a great composition, but for a little while Dr. Muck made us believe that it was the voice of a whole nation.

How the grand theme of the war-cry of the Reformation—"Ein Feste Burg ist unser Gott,"—rang out! What a glorious organ climax came at the end! And when one heard the trombones and trumpets thunder out the grand old Lutheran phrases, one could not but smile to think of Mendelssohn tootling out that same melody as a flute solo in his "Reformation Symphony."

The musicians seemed to catch some of the conductor's fiery intensity. Had it been pushed any further it would have become necessary to play a hose on the trumpeters lest a conflagration should start and consume the entire orchestra.

"The Emperor's March?" Judging by the uproar the emperor must have marched on the corns of all Germany.

Louis C. Elson.

AFTER-THOUGHTS UPON THE SYMPHONY CONCERT Oct 21. 07

Again, at the Symphony Concert on Saturday evening, Mr. d'Indy's "Wallenstein" was warmly received, and at the end of the tone-poem—for such the trilogy really is—the applause was so insistent that Dr. Muck beckoned the band to its feet. The conductor and his men had been on their mettle to wipe out the lingering recollection of the strange mischances of the week before; the audience had been as keen to hear how the orchestra would play; and its just pleasure spoke in a just reward. Seldom indeed has Dr. Muck's standard for the orchestra been clearer than it was in the concerts of Friday and Saturday. He would give the band the precision and the smoothness of execution, the transparent beauty and the suave euphony of tone, the sense of detail, proportion, and delicate adjustment that have long distinguished it and that, as the event proved, have not been lost or materially diminished in the recent changes in the personnel of the orchestra. At the same time he would give its playing an elasticity of rhythm, a springiness of pace, a dramatic accent, a more sonorous eloquence, and a warmer vitality than it has always had in the past. As Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" proved, he has no fear of masses of sonorous but ordered tone. In the finale of Liszt's second concerto, the orchestra glowed with vitality. Often in the more declamatory passages of Mr. d'Indy's trilogy—and the music is as declamatory as the plays of Schiller that suggested it—the band was stirring eloquent. Yet, as often, in both pieces, its more adroit and delicate qualities were in as admirable play. Two pitfalls hedge these qualities about—the pitfall of a merely finicking finesse that seeks and is content with little things only; and the pitfall of monotonously polished mezzotint, like that, for example, of the accomplished Parisian orchestras. By the equal pursuit of elasticity and fervor, accent and sonority, Dr. Muck avoids these perils, yet runs into no excesses of blatant sound and mere rhetorical fury. As the orchestra played on Friday and Saturday, its old and its new qualities were in very just balance.

Ours are not the first audiences that have found more pleasure in Mr. d'Indy's musical picturing of "Wallenstein's Camp" than in the two graver parts of the trilogy. In the twenty years in which the whole piece has stood in the orchestral repertory, the music of the camp has been played ten times, where the rest has been played once. The tone-picturing does summon the picture. Romantic robustness, variety and glamor are in the music. Its frank vivacity and vigor, its tangibility, so to say, are in sharp contrast to the music of the d'Indy of today, preoccupied with more spirited and reflective things and striving to bring them to finely touched expression. It is declamatory and rhetorical music, but the declaration and the rhetoric are ample, ardent, sincere. Even in the picture of the camp, it strikes, with the entrance of Wallenstein, an heroic and a chivalrous note that runs deeper and fuller as the trilogy advances. It returns, with youthful fire in it, in the music of Max over against Thekla's wistful and brooding song.

It rings deep and grave through Wallenstein's struggle with fate, and when he falls it still glorifies him. More than a hint of the rugged loftiness of some of Mr. d'Indy's maturer music is in it. Recall as well the mournful tenderness of Thekla's song and the ominous and fateful beginning of the final movement, and there are other links still. Even the d'Indy of the seventies, with Wagner's music and Schiller's poetry ringing in his ears and the dusky splendors of German romanticism touching his imagination, is d'Indy still. Now, however, he gives his heroic, romantic, chivalrous vein to the stage, as in "Fervaal" and "The Stranger," and not to the concert-room. If only we in America heard French operas!

Mr. Joseffy, if we are not mistaken, used on occasion to play Liszt's concerto in A major and over-refine it into a tony, crystalline thing, all delicate lights and shadows, glints and facets. Twenty other pianists in their time have made it crackle and rattle with the hard metallic brilliancy of their playing. With Mr. Joseffy, the music had a still, small voice; with the other pianists, it volleyed and thundered. Equally with the one and the others, it was not the music that Liszt had seemingly written. Now, Mr. Ganz, who played the concerto again on Saturday night, is of that young and rising group of pianists that seek a persuasive justness of understanding and expression. They try to conceive music as the composer conceived, to enter into its characteristic qualities, and to let those qualities express themselves through their playing of it. In a sense they play impersonally, because they do not obtrude themselves between the composer and his hearers. Very honestly they are all for the music in hand; their technique and their temperament are its service. Yet in another sense this sincere self-subordination, this eagerness for the just and full expression of the music and nothing else, makes their playing very personal.

On Saturday, as on Friday, Mr. Ganz seemed to gain this golden mean. Never was his playing loud or blatant; yet through the finale it had a stirring impetuosity of pace and mood; and it was as changeful in body and in quality as the music itself. He made the music flash back its own brilliance. He gave its characteristic effect of a shower of tones with high lights streaming through them. The music kept its air of magnificent improvisation. Elsewhere in the concerto Liszt sings in wistful and melancholy song, and there again Mr. Ganz's playing was singularly just. He did not languish through the shifting harmonies; yet in his tone was the melancholy of the song. The music is of a sober beauty, that is rare and fascinating in Liszt. The tone was its clear reflection.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post BY OLIN DOWNES Oct 20 1907

The programme of the second Symphony concert consisted of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, after Schiller's dramatic poem; Liszt's A major piano concerto, and Wagner's "Kaiser March." Rudolph Ganz was soloist.

It might well be asked why Dr. Muck, in his zealous search for novelties during the past summer, should elect to give us a specimen of D'Indy's early and immature period in preference to such a work as the "Jour d'ete dans La Montagne." The latter composition has not been heard in this city; it represents the composer's latest development, and would go farther toward gratifying the curiosity of many interested ones who heard the B flat symphony two years ago than the "Wallenstein" Trilogy.

As might be expected, there is weakness of invention, development that is often labored and thin spun. We hear the voices of other gods with remarkable frequency. Wagner and Schumann predominate, especially the first, from the "Dutchman" to the "Ring des Nibelungen." There is occasional sensuousness that, strangely enough, reminds one of Tschalkowsky.

With all its deficiencies, however, this music has some vital qualities. A certain freshness of treatment, an original point of view exists throughout. It is unquestionably the work of one saturated with thoughts of Schiller's great drama. The composer displays an acute feeling for the sonorities and bewildering tone refractions of the modern orchestra.

The opening section, "Wallenstein's Camp," is more freely and spontaneously sketched than the others. There is more of what is called, in the drama, action. The themes are well contrasted and the rhythms are exciting. The thematic material is commonplace at times, but it is a breezy picture.

The music of Max and Thekla ("The Piccolomini") hardly breathes passion, or, when it does, is not the voice of D'Indy. One thinks more of the underlying motifs of the plot, of the fate that shall soon overtake the pair. In this movement there is some very beautiful scoring for the woodwind.

The last section, "The Death of Wallenstein," is effective, pompous, and rather theatrical. One wishes here, however, that the composer, who writes in rather conventional strains, had, instead, endeavored to portray the last tremendous moments of Schiller's drama. Here, and in the preceding movement, it is as though he were constrained by a too definite programme in mind.

Mr. Ganz deserves thanks for giving the unique A major concerto. One cannot help feeling that to the audiences of tomorrow this concerto will appeal even more than its universally popular companion in E flat. Those who so readily join the hue and cry concerning Liszt's lack of creative originality should carefully scan this score, which fairly bristles with extraordinary conceptions. They will find ideas, both melodic and orchestral, which are the germs of the most potent forces in the music of today. What magic in the endless transformations of that languorous opening theme; what sweeping, cyclonic power in the working up of the climaxes, and what superb deviltry in the finale! A fiery imagination, an untamable fantasy, and things undreamt of in the philosophy of any but Franz Liszt! More than any biography is this music a revelation of its author's personality.

Mr. Ganz gave such an interpretation of the work as we have grown to expect from him. Few pianists of today uphold a higher standard to the rising generation. It was not always the rhapsodic Hungarian we listened to; the improvisatory character of the music was sometimes formalized. But if there was less of oratory, of swooning passion, of exotic color, the work, on the other hand, was presented in a strongly coherent manner, in well defined outlines. One readily grasped the tenor of its ways, and that is no small thing to say of a performance of the A major concerto. Mr. Ganz's tempi were his own, but they were always consistent. He commenced the finale with extreme rapidity, but broadened out considerably at the last. He was deservedly applauded and repeatedly recalled.

There is an inexorable logic in the operation of the law of demand and supply, and therefore there must be some justice in the regular turning up of the Kaiser March on our programmes. It is no doubt convenient padding, but we could well spare it. The performance was appropriately noisy, drastic, obstreperous.

The performances, as a whole, were brilliant and far superior to last week's. The augmented brass choir showed to advantage in D'Indy's work, as indeed did the whole orchestra, though its tone was often rough.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT NOTABLE

Boston American Oct 20 1907

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Finely Rendered Before Large and Distinguished Audience.

There was a general outpouring of smart society last night for the second Symphony concert. The programme, which was far more interesting than that of last week, consisted of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, Op. 12. Litz: Concerto in A Major, No. 2 forp pianoforte, and Wagner's "The Emperor's March."

The three episodes in the drama of Schiller—Wallenstein's Camp, Max and Thekla and the Death of Wallenstein—are painted by D'Indy with marvellous vividness, which the orchestra under Dr. Muck's careful guidance portrayed with an intensity and finesse most gratifying. After the slow valse in the first part comes the savage dance with its determined rythm, the sermon of the Capuchin father given to the bassoon, the theme of Wallenstein energetically illustrated by the trombones, and then the final tumult in which are heard a few notes of Wallenstein's theme thrown out by the trumpets amid the fortissimmi of the orchestra. In the love episode between Max and Thekla in the second part the voice of the orchestra was lifted in pure, tender, interpretation tones—the plaintive wail of the violins and the lamentation of the horns being filled with musical eloquence.

The third part, Wallenstein's death, has a slow and ominous introduction and ends with the beginning used as a foundation. Rudolph Ganz, the soloist was heartily welcomed and after his masterful interpretation of Litz's concerto was encored again and again. He displayed almost a contempt for the limitations of the piano and brought out the light and brilliancy of the theme with the skill of a magician.

"The Emperor's March," which closed the programme was played with all the dash and spontaneity for which it calls.

Among the women in the audience was Mrs. John L. Gardner who with Mr. Proctor occupied seats in the first balcony, and who wore a most becoming gown of black satin with yoke of white lace, and a blue velvet hat trimmed with blue plumes and a light gray veil. Mrs. Henry L. Gigginson was also in black.

Mrs. Charles Storrow, with her beautiful silver hair and handsome gray silk gown was one of the most distinguished women present, and looked remarkably well after her summer in Norway.

Mrs. Frank Macomber was charming in black crepe de chene, and Barbara Higginson was superb in white lace, trimmed with touches of coral pink.

Mrs. F. L. Higginson looked very attractive in gray voile, and Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Jr., of London, was in dark gray chiffon, trimmed with bands of light blue silk.

In Mr. Gericke's days as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, the violin players, first and second, bowed as nearly uniformly as possible. Mr. Gericke was not the martinet on this score that some of the elder conductors—Theodore Thomas, for example—were; but he liked the bowing to be as uniform as the men could conveniently make it, and he accustomed the eyes of his audiences to the sight of the bows rising and falling symmetrically over the thirty violins. Now Dr. Muck, like most of the younger conductors, cares nothing for this uniformity. The violinists may bow as they please, so long as they get the results that he desires. The change in their methods has been particularly obvious this season, and it has provoked more or less comment. Here, accordingly, is Dr. Muck's statement of his faith in the matter: "I do not want my violins to bow together. When they do, it is beautiful to see, but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone, and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. The men are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion."

mmme.

"Christ-Elflein."

for PIANOFORTE in D minor, No. 4.

in D major No. 2.

ist:

REWSKI.

19 47

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE to "Genoveva," op. 81.

BRAHMS,

CONCERTO in D major, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA,
op. 77.

I. Allegro non troppo

II. Adagio.

III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

MENDELSSOHN,

SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch." op. 56.

I. Andante con moto; Allegro un poco agitato.

II. Vivace non troppo.

III. Adagio.

IV. Allegro vivacissimo; Allegro maestoso assai.

In compliance with the intention of the composer, the four movements of the Symphony will be played consecutively without pause.

Soloist:

Mr. CARL WENDLING.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MENDELSSOHN, BRAHMS AND A NEW VIOLINIST

Mendelssohn as the Bellini of Symphonists, and a Performance That Made His "Scotch" Symphony Alive Again—The New Concertmaster Makes His Debut as a Solo Violinist

Dr. Muck made his first venture here with a symphony by Mendelssohn, "The Scotch"; Mr. Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra, played the solo part in Brahms's concerto for violin—the third year in succession in which it has stood on its programmes; and Schumann's overture that survives from his forgotten opera of "Genoveva" rounded out the afternoon with still another sort of romantic music at the Symphony Concert of yesterday. From beginning to end the audience was interested and pleased and testified to its pleasure. As Mendelssohn wished, and as his first audience of sixty-five years ago resented, the symphony was played without pause, and the four movements fill forty minutes. It is the custom to lament the decay of attention nowadays, and to compare that faculty in audiences of the present day unfavorably with the receptive capacity of our forefathers. Yet there was not a sign of restlessness through the performance of the "Scotch" symphony yesterday and scarcely an audible departure, while Mendelssohn's hearers half a century ago complained bitterly of the tax that the "Scotch" symphony laid upon their attention. Thus did we of 1907 vindicate our feeble selves, and thus did Mendelssohn's design justify itself, until some cynic whisper hinted that his music is mere pastime nowadays, whereas it was a strenuous thing in the fifties; or even that it was Dr. Muck who was re-animating the symphony until it might defy the years that it has lived and the time that it consumes. The obvious retort was the clapping at the end, when usually there is more thought of motors than of finales. Warmer still was the applause of his hearers for Mr. Wendling. Clearly they heard him gladly; clearly they liked the smooth, sure rectitude with which he played the concerto; and clearly the sober but vital beauty with which Dr. Muck, as he has done often with Brahms, was reclothing the music, stirred the listeners recalled Mr. Wendling many times, and his frank pleasure in the cordiality of his new public was as unforced as his playing. The warm romance of Schumann's overture won hearty response as well, and the whole concert, for the first time this season, took an air of easy and spontaneous enjoyment. Even the orchestra had its smiling fun in the sparkling swiftness with which Dr. Muck sped it through the scherzo of the symphony. From first to last, moreover, the men were in form again—their old form and their new. In detail the programme ran:

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Brahms: Concerto in D major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77.
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "The Scotch," Op. 56.

Does Mendelssohn seem a little the Bellini of symphonists nowadays? It is as easy to point mockery and poke disdain at "The Scotch," or "The Italian" or "The Reformation" among symphonies as it is at "Norma" or "Sonnambula" or "Puritani" among operas. And the notion is not wholly fanciful of a certain likeness in aim, quality and achievement in the music of the German and the Sicilian. Each, for example, brought their music to what seems, in these days of jagged tonal edges and broken imaginative suggestion, very complete and rounded expression. Mendelssohn labored long at the "Scotch" Symphony. The fear that his purpose might elude him haunted his mind. Yet heard in 1907, the music seems to accomplish its aim with a persuasive nicety of precision. A week ago, at the Castle Square, the music of "Sonnambula" gave this same impression of suave exactness. Mendelssohn and Bellini were alike fastidious in all they wrote, perhaps to the gentility that is the iconoclasts' contemptuous epithet for them both. Equally they loved the murmur of the delicate, edgeless, perfectly rounded phrase. It is an abiding virtue of their music, and in such elegant perfection is quite half its expressiveness. Each could court at need a pensive and gentle melancholy or a light and sparkling animation. Each was a man of sensibility, as the novelists and essayists liked to say in those days; and their fancies played about little imaginings and moods beside those of "Zarathustra" or "Tristan." Each was a gentleman of an excessively elegant world and wrote as such, and it is not quite clear yet whether that quality is of much worth in music-making. No one much liked to have Wagner about, and to dine with Richard Strauss has been accounted tribulation in Berlin.

Moreover, Mendelssohn with his symphonies and Bellini with his operas are alike in their requirement of very perfect and very sympathetic performance if their music is to keep its characteristic and insinuating qualities. Its polished completeness in its own kind demands as polished and complete an artistry in those that perform it. The orchestra that undertakes "The Scotch" must have the same nice precision in its playing as must the singers in their song when they undertake "Sonnambula." The orchestra must be as capable as the singers of a clear and edgeless tone that shall be suavity, sparkle or gentle brooding. Both must turn the polished and flawless phrase, and both must have an unobtrusive air of delicate fastidiousness. Yet no more in music than in man do these qualities connote dullness, and if a performance of "The Scotch" symphony or of "Sonnambula" is dull, by so much, does it lack essential virtues. The sparkle of Mendelssohn's scherzo, for example, in the symphony is playful fancy and light animation themselves, and the finale is more truly spirited than some of the laborious strivings of the hour. Spirit, after all, implies ease. The pensive Mendelssohn or the pensive Bellini is far from dull. Their elegiac phrases have a poetic, even an emotional, accent of their own. Witness the melancholy mood that ebbs and flows through the first movement of "The Scotch" or the mournful note of the cantilena and the shadowy instrumental half-tints in the slow movement. Because Mendelssohn's symphony came to precisely this complete and characteristic performance at the hands of Dr. Muck and his men yesterday it was alive again, and with its own enduring and persuasive life. Mendelssohn no less than Bellini may find his voice—or, rather, voices—sixty years after, and they are ingratiating.

Mr. Wendling's performance of the solo part in Brahms's concerto confirmed him as a skilled violinist, an accomplished musician, an able concert-master, but not a fascinating or a stirring virtuoso. It is as easy to decry the virtuoso, especially in perverse mood, as it is Mendelssohn or Bellini. But the virtuoso in his best estate is such because he has a fascination, an individuality, a transmuting and a rhapsodic quality in his playing that distinguishes him from the accomplished, the musicianly, the altogether sane and sensible violinist or pianist. Now it was precisely these virtuoso traits that Mr. Wendling's playing lacked. It never quite fascinated, it never quite stirred; it never brought the sense of a penetrating personality. It had duly, surely, and unobtrusively the technical virtues of the skilled violinist; it had as well the finer qualities of the intelligent and the discerning musician. Mr. Wendling's tone was clear, warm, undulating and sensitive. Admirable were his continent understanding and his continent expression of his music. Clearly he would be and often he was the voice of Brahms, but since that voice must speak through the violinist it should take individual color and quality from him. Yet it seldom did. Presumably the music was stirring him with the clear emotion that is in Brahms in spite or because of his sobriety. Yet it was hard to feel it in the playing. The individual, the rhapsodic, the transmuting note that are the marks of the born and practised virtuoso were not in Mr. Wendling. The lack of them makes him the abler concert-master, but the less interesting virtuoso. Dr. Muck had more of them, for again he was calling forth, as he did in the symphony last year, the under-glow and the under-fervor that Brahms, even in a concerto, has in his music. H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

For the second time, at the fourth pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck will prove his own faith, and test his audiences, in the music of Bruckner. It was the composer's seventh symphony that he played last year. Now he has chosen the three completed movements of the ninth symphony (in D minor) upon which he was working at his death. For it, following the example of Beethoven, he designed a choral finale, but he could never bring the design to execution. "I undertook a stiff task," he said. "I should not have done it at my age and in my weak condition. If I never finish it, then my 'Te Deum' may be used as a finale. I have nearly finished three movements. This work belongs to my Lord God." The other orchestral number is the first "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. Between the two Mme. Schumann-Heink, the eminent contralto, who has been too long absent from the Symphony Concerts, will sing three of Schubert's masterpieces—"The Young Nun," as scored for orchestra by Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," as scored by Mottl, and "The Erl-King," as scored by Berlioz—an interesting and rather unusual group, as such things go at the Symphony Concerts.

FAMILIAR WORKS AT THIRD SYMPHONY

Schumann and Mendelssohn on Last Evening's Programme Under Dr. Muck.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:
Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Concerto for violin and orchestra...Brahms
Symphony in A minor, "Scotch".....Mendelssohn

This programme contained two works written by romanticists who were eager to gain fame on the operatic stage and were by nature without stage instinct. Their genius was lyrical, rather than dramatic. Schumann was conspicuous for his dreamy or dark self-introspection, his confidential disclosures of moods within him, his yearnings dashed with melancholy. Mendelssohn was distinguished for a certain elegance in thought and expression, a smoothly flowing sentiment, an unimpeachable workmanship in detail.

Schumann after pondering several operatic subjects—among them the story of Abelard and Heloise and that of Sakuntala—chose a libretto ill-suited to the stage. Mendelssohn, having found fault, having sneered at the subjects of several successful operas, possibly because they were successful, worked on an opera which had no dramatic interest. Schumann's "Genoveva" had no life. The fragments of Mendelssohn's "Lorelei" shows how unfitted he was to his self-imposed task.

Yet Schumann in his overture to "Manfred" and, though in a less degree, in his overture to "Genoveva," expressed himself with dramatic force, and Mendelssohn, as a musical landscapist, as the painter in tones of Fingal's Cave and of Scottish scenes, recalled in the symphony in A minor, was occasionally dramatic by force of suggestion. And it should be remembered that this forcible expression and this heightened fervor are shown in each instance in absolute music, for the overture is practically without an opera today and the symphony is without a programme.

It is not unlikely that Schumann in his best estate could have written an overture to "Abelard and Heloise," but an opera by him thus entitled, with music that would accentuate the tragic fate of the subtle dialectician, and the burning passion of Heloise, faithfully passionate until death cooled her, was no more possible than an opera by Mendelssohn which should treat of Rizzio and Mary Stuart, who haunted Holyrood when the composer visited the palace, and found there, according to his own account, the beginning of the "Scotch" symphony.

The Playing of the Overture.

There have been more stirring performances of Schumann's overture than that of last night. The reading was characterized by fineness of detail and care for proportion rather than by sweep of excitement and passionate agitation. The horns in the famous measures were wanting in quality and in true vigor. On the other hand the introductory section of the overture was read and played impressively.

The symphony has aged much more than the overture. This was to have been expected, for Schumann was the more poetic soul, and at the same time more daring in his rhythmic and harmonic experiments. Some of the mannerisms of Mendelssohn, those that gave him distinction in his day and were applauded, now seem intolerable. How sick the hearer grows, for example, of the motive in E minor in the first movement, and yet what motive could be more characteristically Mendelssohnian? How formal, how cut-and-dried is the apotheosis, even though the horns are urged to their utmost and beyond! Yet here and there are delightful passages. The very opening measures still have mood. They put the hearer in an alien land with its own atmosphere, a land of leaden skies and mists and legends.

The scherzo is still a tour de force. It is music of a kind in which Mendelssohn shone to his full advantage, and here there is a racial character that puts it apart from his other scherzos, whether for orchestra or piano. The performance of the symphony, which was played, according to the composer's wishes, without waits between the movements, gave much pleasure.

Mr. Wendling Appears as Soloist.

Mr. Wendling, the new concert master, played for the first time in the United States as a solo performer. He chose an eminently serious work, the concerto by Johannes Brahms, and thus made his appeal to confirmed Brahmsites rather than to the general public. Nor was he disturbed by the fate of Miss Maud MacCarthy, who became so addicted to this concerto that she played it here at a symphony concert for two successive seasons, and in consequence she now proposes to devote the rest of her life to theosophic study and contemplation.

The last violinist to perform the concerto at a Symphony concert was Mr. Hugo Heermann, who played it two seasons ago, not one season ago as was stated in the programme book. His performance was like the reading of the eminent tragedian in "Great Expectations"; it was "massive and concrete."

Mr. Andreas Moser, who wrote a fulsome eulogy of Joachim and had much to do with the latter's treatise on violin playing, thinks poorly of the modern Franco-Belgian school of violinists, because, forsooth, as he insists, they have wholly lost the art of singing a melody. Thus does Mr. Moser erase the name of Ysaye from the list of the truly distinguished. I mention this because Ysaye said that he had studied Brahms' concerto with the utmost attention, but, finding only few passages that are singable, he did not add it to his repertory. I mention it also because if Moser's statement is prejudiced and absurd, that of Ysaye is by far too sweeping, for this concerto is not wholly without song passages for the solo violin.

Any violinist choosing Brahms' concerto cannot hope to captivate an audience by sensuous or even by any deeply emotional appeal. A well-grounded virtuoso who is not by nature an emotional person might well be tempted to play the concerto in the hope that his substantial qualities of mechanism and his skill in disguising the inherently rebellious attitude of the music toward the instrument, might win respectful recognition.

Then there is the singular belief in some quarters that the music of Brahms makes strong demands on the intellectual equipment of interpreter and hearer, so that there are some who listen eagerly to the more abstruse compositions of this master and plume themselves upon their enjoyment. They look down on the more "popular" of Brahms' works, as the second and third symphonies, the songs and some of the chamber music, and palpitate over that which is cryptic, a word that, in this instance, is synonymous with dull. And this some of them do when they are not wholly sure whether there should or should not be an apostrophe before the "s" in the composer's name.

Mr. Wendling is not a violinist of such commanding qualities or of such compelling magnetism as to make his performance of the concerto engrossing. Such a performance, it is true, might be magnificent, but it would not be Brahms. Mr. Wendling, however, gave a thoughtful, clear musical interpretation, one that was calculated to set forth the work itself rather than the interpreter, and thus he played in the spirit of the music itself. Other qualities of the violinist's art may be displayed by him on some more markedly virtuoso occasion. It is enough to say that he played as a musician and as an experienced and sound violinist. He was warmly welcomed and heartily applauded.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Carl Wendling Soloist
at the Symphony.

Olga Samaroff and Leland Hall to Give Recitals This Week.

Handel and Haydn Fund
—Current Gossip.

The third Symphony program introduced as soloist Mr Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra, in Brahms' D-major concerto for violin and orchestra. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony completed the program. The Brahms number is not specially popular with violinists, for it is not a show piece, despite its brilliant passage work in the final movement, and it appeals mainly to the artist of serious purpose rather than to the performer whose dazzling technique must be given plenty of latitude for display. And Mr Wendling appears to be an earnest, skilled and modest exponent of the composer's intent, and in his interpretation of the Brahms piece he shown great delicacy of expression, fine technical equipment and a quality of tone that, while not big, was sweet and appealing.

The unaccompanied cadenza was deftly executed. The second movement lacked in sonority of tone in the forte parts, but the melodies were very sweetly sung. In the demands of the third movement Mr Wendling's execution was sufficient to surmount all difficulties of bowing and fingering, and this part of his work gave special delight to his auditors, who recalled him several times at the conclusion of his playing.

The somber "Genoveva" music is quite familiar to patrons of these concerts, and as Dr Muck introduced no radical departure from the usual interpretation Schumann's somewhat heavy composition may be considered as having been well performed in traditional style. The hunting calls by the horns and the delightful themes given the wood winds were some of the enlivening episodes that deserve mention.

The orchestra played admirably all the concerto music, although at times a diminution in volume of tone would have been better for the soloist. The "Scotch" symphony was given without a long break between the movements, but the welding together of the four parts did not seem to make the work unduly extended, for the performance was spirited, generally smooth in ensemble and of a character calculated to arouse enthusiasm.

Of course the "Scotch" atmosphere of the trippingly quaint second and fourth parts was, as usual, the best appreciated. And the clarinets and other woodwinds did their work splendidly in the dance measures. In the finale the well-known staccato measures for horns, violas and bassoons were given with resonant and well-contrasted effect and the close of the movement, with the possible exception of too much stress in the brass group, went with commendable vigor and precision.

This week's program will present Mme Schumann-Heink as soloist. She will sing three of Schubert's great songs, "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Franz Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottl, and "The Erlking," orchestrated by Berlioz. The other selections will be Bruckner's ninth symphony, which he left unfinished, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 1.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the third Symphony concert of the season the following programme was given:

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Violin Concerto in D major.....Brahms
Symphony No. 3, "Scotch," in A minor.....Mendelssohn

Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert master, was soloist. The Genoveva overture is a characteristically imaginative work, though by no means one of Schumann's strongest. Brahms' concerto shows us the composer in his most tranquil—his enemies would say somnolent—frame of mind. Then Mendelssohn's supremely symmetrical symphony—who could take offence at it? This programme had admirable unity, but it lacked stimulating contrast.

It is hard to conceive of a more appreciative, truly Schumannesque reading of the overture than that given by Dr. Muck on this occasion. The introduction, in particular, was wonderfully played. Each instrument spoke with a supremely appealing voice, and all united in a perfect ensemble to give a peculiar poignancy to those brooding measures. It was a most imaginative and refined interpretation throughout. It might be added that Dr. Muck, with all his objectivism, rarely displays a more acute sense of the intentions of a composer than when conducting a Schumann composition. He is one of the very few who can handle thick and frequently clumsy scores in such a way that we really hear, with our ears as well as our minds, the effects that the composer was striving after.

The nobility of the Brahms concerto becomes more evident with each successive performance. If ever music breathed the exalted peace and the exuberant underlying energy of nature, this work does. Mr. Wendling, who was not always technically secure, interpreted the concerto as an artist feeling the highest reverence toward his art.

His performance was broad, sane and manly; it was also characterized by the utmost fidelity to the spirit of the music. Wendling was heartily applauded as he made his final bow.

The performance of the "Scotch" symphony was a brilliant and traditional one, with the exception of the scherzo, which was taken at an entirely too rapid tempo, with a fine disregard of the direction in the score, "non troppo." This gave rise to several wild scrambles among the horns, though the rest of the orchestra proceeded on their way with joyful virtuosity.

It is true that Mendelssohn was a great man for arpeggios, but in spite of this he did have an idea once in a while. Remarks on the really exquisite beauty of the work would be very trite at this day; but though ultra-moderns may bark, it will be long before the sheer loveliness of most of this music palls. Even the florid adagio, flowing with a felicitous ease that almost provokes a smile, is very charming, if it is provincial. There is an old-fashioned sentimentalism in its lyric measures, a sentimentalism not far from the feelings one might have on taking out some sweet old miniature from a cabinet that still exhales the faint odor of faded rose leaves. Is it entirely to Mendelssohn's discredit that he writes so frankly? Or is it a judgment day crime to compose such a perfect, coherent, inexorably logical opening movement? Let us hope not. True, the finale sounds very thin in these days, and there is a certain smug respectability about the coda which is as the audience's hymn of thanks, "Praise God, now we get out!" All this, and much more! Yet there are very few unprejudiced listeners who will deny that they experience a great deal of fresh pleasure when the Scotch symphony is given, and there can be little question but that the name of now despised Felix Mendelssohn, and his sweet singing, will outlast many of his more ambitious successors.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Oct. 28, 1907
Schumann....."Genoveva" Overture
Brahms.....Violin Concerto
Soloist, Mr. Carl Wendling.
Mendelssohn.....Scotch Symphony

It was a rather tepid concert, that of last Saturday, with little in any of its measures that would cause the pulse to beat quicker or any auditor to become wildly enthusiastic. In this it was in strong contrast with that of the preceding week, which culminated so thrillingly with the Wagner march. The luke-warm character was not the result of the performance, but of the numbers themselves, for their orchestral tints were all more or less subdued and there was nothing of the modern instrumental brilliancy present save in the solo part of the concerto and in the clarinette part of the symphony.

But we have had just these neutral tinted works played better, and read better, in preceding concerts. For once Dr. Muck's unity of programme was somewhat monotonous.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture does not reach the height of his "Manfred," but there are a few measures of brass fanfares that make a good contrast with his constant scoring for the strings. These trumpet and horn and trombone passages were scarcely as effective as they might have been, on this occasion.

Brahms' violin concerto is not as great music as his symphonies or overtures. One feels that it is carefully manufactured, that it is all "regelrecht," but it has scarcely an instant of the abandon of Bruch's G minor concerto or of the majesty of Beethoven's violin concerto.

It is a work demanding a thorough musician for its phrasing (in the solo part) as well as an expert technician. Mr. Wendling combined these qualities in a commendable degree. He reminded more of Kneisel than of Hess in his style of work. There was the Chesterfieldian suavity of the former rather than the fire of the latter in his playing. Perhaps this was due to the character of the composition, but we suspect that it is his natural vein.

Mr. Wendling is evidently a musician from top to toe; his phrasing was sure, his intonation without flaw, his double-stopping (there is much of this in the work) masterly, but his tone was rather light for Symphony Hall. The cadenza of the first movement was filled with embroidery and with double-stopping and had much work in the high positions, but no pizzicato or harmonic work. The clearness of the artist in high position passages must be especially commended.

The defect of the concerto is the extreme length of the first movement. If this part of the work could only be abbreviated the composition might, in spite of its academic character, stand with the three or four world-famous violin concertos. But the two succeeding movements, which are more spontaneous, are neutralized by the prolixity of the opening Allegro.

We found Mr. Wendling charming in the Adagio, in which the delicate beauty of his tone made an excellent impression. Per Contra, his work on the G string, in the finale, was rather light. It was, however, a successful debut; not an exciting triumph such as Kneisel or Hess achieved at their first entrance, nor on the other hand so featureless as the debut of that other concert-master, Arbos, but a worthy exhibition of sterling musicianship which ought to be valuable to the orchestra in all its performances.

"Eheu, Fugaces!" Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor (suggestive of "Cold Scotch and water") is no longer as at-are still a few plums that can be picked out of it. The storm which forms the coda of the first movement, the clarinette theme of the second, the lonely and pensive subordinate theme of the finale, these are still beautiful.

The German critics doubted the "Scotch" character of the work, but these pedantic Teutons fancied that all Scottish music was bounded by the pentatonic scale, our diatonic scale with the fourth and seventh notes omitted. It is true that there are some beautiful Scottish melodies in this primitive scale, as witness "Auld Lang Syne" or "Bonnie Doon," but there are hundreds of more developed melodies in Scotland which are built on other modes.

The Germans love the Scottish music, but seem to be unable to acquire its lilt. Beethoven, Schumann, Franz, Bruch, and others have all been unsuccessful in using Scottish themes or in trying to invent similar ones. The clarinette theme of the Scherzo of this symphony is the only example in the German repertoire of a thoroughly Gaelic melody created by a Teuton.

Dr. Muck omitted the repeat of the exposition, which is quite permissible in these latter days. The repeat is only made to give the auditor a full chance to grasp the themes before they are developed; but the concert-goer of the present can easily remember such an exposition at a single hearing.

The Scherzo was taken too fast. Only in a Strathspey or Reel would a Scottish tune go at the speed at which the chief theme of the movement was taken. The clarinette was well played. It must be remembered that at the time this symphony was written the instrument had not yet been fully understood by composers. The gloom of the lower register (the "Chalumeau") was practically a new tone-color which Weber and Mendelssohn first discovered. Even Beethoven seems to have known nothing of these spectral effects of the instrument. We always consider two symphonies as especially important in clarinette history, the E-flat symphony of Mozart, which first used the clarinette in this orchestral form, and this symphony of Mendelssohn which first demonstrates a knowledge of its tone-color. Mendelssohn even uses an A-clarinette (where the C clarinette would generally have been employed) in order to get the deep hollow tones at their best.

We always thrill responsive to that lonely theme (clarinette again) of the finale. It pictures all the solitude and sombre beauty of the north of Scotland, the bleak moors, the Trossachs, the silent lochs. But nothing can save the kid-gloved and lace-handkerchief sorrow of the Adagio! The man who could pump up even a single tear over its suave measures must be excessively lachrymose, and the Coda of the last movement is about as effective as a negro minstrel song. But after all the bathos of the work is recognized, there is some real pathos left; yet we fear that this symphony is on the direct road to the shelf, although the Scherzo (and possibly the Finale) may remain with us permanently.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BRUCKNER,

SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 9, (Unfinished).

I. Feierlich.

II. Scherzo: Bewegt, lebhaft. Trio: Schnell.

III. Adagio: Sehr langsam.

SCHUBERT,

"THE YOUNG NUN." (with the accompaniment orchestrated by Franz Liszt.)

"DEATH AND THE MAIDEN." (with the accompaniment orchestrated by Felix Mottl.)

"THE ERL-KING." (with the accompaniment orchestrated by Hector Berlioz.)

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Leonore" No. 1, op. 138.

Soloist:

Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

attractive as it used to be in our green-salad days. It is fading fast, but there are still a few plums that can be picked out of it. The storm which forms the coda of the first movement, the clarinette theme of the second, the lonely and pensive subordinate theme of the finale, these are still beautiful.

The German critics doubted the "Scotch" character of the work, but these pedantic Teutons fancied that all Scottish music was bounded by the pentatonic scale, our diatonic scale with the fourth and seventh notes omitted. It is true that there are some beautiful Scottish melodies in this primitive scale, as witness "Auld Lang Syne" or "Bonnie Doon," but there are hundreds of more developed melodies in Scotland which are built on other modes.

The Germans love the Scottish music, but seem to be unable to acquire its lilt. Beethoven, Schumann, Franz, Bruch, and others have all been unsuccessful in using Scottish themes or in trying to invent similar ones. The clarinette theme of the Scherzo of this symphony is the only example in the German repertoire of a thoroughly Gaelic melody created by a Teuton.

Dr. Muck omitted the repeat of the exposition, which is quite permissible in these latter days. The repeat is only made to give the auditor a full chance to grasp the themes before they are developed; but the concert-goer of the present can easily remember such an exposition at a single hearing.

The Scherzo was taken too fast. Only in a Strathspey or Reel would a Scottish tune go at the speed at which the chief theme of the movement was taken. The clarinette was well played. It must be remembered that at the time this symphony was written the instrument had not yet been fully understood by composers. The gloom of the lower register (the "Chalumeau") was practically a new tone-color which Weber and Mendelssohn first discovered. Even Beethoven seems to have known nothing of these spectral effects of the instrument. We always consider two symphonies as especially important in clarinette history, the E-flat symphony of Mozart, which first used the clarinette in this orchestral form, and this symphony of Mendelssohn which first demonstrates a knowledge of its tone-color. Mendelssohn even uses an A-clarinette (where the C clarinette would generally have been employed) in order to get the deep hollow tones at their best.

We always thrill responsive to that lonely theme (clarinette again) of the finale. It pictures all the solitude and sombre beauty of the north of Scotland, the bleak moors, the Trossachs, the silent lochs. But nothing can save the kid-gloved and lace-handkerchief sorrow of the Adagio! The man who could pump up even a single tear over its suave measures must be excessively lachrymose, and the Coda of the last movement is about as effective as a negro minstrel song. But after all the bathos of the work is recognized, there is some real pathos left; yet we fear that this symphony is on the direct road to the shelf, although the Scherzo (and possibly the Finale) may remain with us permanently.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BRUCKNER,

SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 9, (Unfinished).

I. Feierlich.

II. Scherzo: Bewegt, lebhaft. Trio: Schnell.

III. Adagio: Sehr langsam.

SCHUBERT,

"THE YOUNG NUN." (with the accompaniment orchestrated by Franz Liszt.)

"DEATH AND THE MAIDEN." (with the accompaniment orchestrated by Felix Mottl.)

"THE ERL-KING." (with the accompaniment orchestrated by Hector Berlioz.)

BEETHOVEN,

OVERTURE to "Leonore" No. 1, op. 138

Soloist:

Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

COPYRIGHT, 1905, BY SYRON

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR AT MADAME SCHUMANN-HEINK'S

AS A MOTHER Madame Schumann-Heink is a model, and her care of her children is never relaxed. They go to her with all their childish plans and troubles for advice and comfort, and her control over them is absolute; for, although she looks personally after everything in her home from cellar to garret every day with the utmost care, she always has time to spare for them.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT BRUCHNER AGAIN, SCHUBERT AND SCHUMANN-HEINK

Dr. Muck Revives the Unfinished Symphony of the Viennese Composer in a More Successful Venture Than That of Last Year—The Unusual Qualities That Kept the Music Interesting in Spite of the Usual Defects and Limitations—Mme. Schumann-Heink's Singing, Paderevski's and Sembrich's Recital—Other Concerts Next Week

The education of audiences in Bruckner's music makes no faster progress, apparently, in Boston than it does elsewhere. For a decade, at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Paur Gericke pursued the process, fitfully, playing one or another symphony by Bruckner every two years. Dr. Muck is more energetic and persistent. Last winter he put Bruckner's seventh symphony (E major) on one of his programmes, and yesterday he began the afternoon with the three movements that Bruckner completed of a ninth. They are as long, seemingly, as the whole seventh. They continued for a little more than an hour, and the first—let the late-comer beware!—lasts almost thirty minutes. None the less the listeners seemed to hear not only with patience, but with a curiosity that was close to interest, and sometimes to response. The audiences of Friday afternoon have been far more restless at times under some acknowledged masterpiece than they were yesterday under Bruckner's uneven, irritating and debateable symphony. By so much, at least, Dr. Muck may congratulate himself upon the results of his mild crusading for the music of the simple, gentle old man—half the prey of hard circumstance and half unwilling sufferer under his own limitations—whom the conductor in his youth knew and honored. True, the applause at the close of each movement was by no means hearty. Bruckner, however, never mastered the art of unmistakable and inevitable ending. His music only stops. Therefore there was a touch of surprise and unreadiness in each little ripple of applause. Throughout, however, there were no such signs of irritated indifference and impatient weariness as pursued the performance of Bruckner's seventh symphony on a Friday afternoon of last December.

With the coming of Mme. Schumann-Heink, in velvet and plumes that made her look as though she had stepped down from some sumptuous picture, the audience could safely and surely let loose its applause. It welcomed her warmly; it listened with rapt attention; and at the end of the three songs of Schubert that she sang with the orchestra, it recalled her again and again. Her tones were rich, full and warm. She neither exaggerated nor roughened them. The continent surety and roundness of her artistry was not the least part of its mastery. As just and as true was the emotional quality of her singing. The little lyric drama of "The Erlking" is a pitfall of over-emphasis, and the musical and the rhapsodical contrasts of "The Young Nun" have their temptations. Sometimes the sheer vigor of Mme. Schumann-Heink's temperament has made her prey to such allurements. Yesterday, she withstood them. Vivid and poignant often, now large and now adroit, was her coloring of her tones, but everywhere the justness of the expression intensified the emotion it would convey. The sombre pity, the darksome tenderness of the music of Death, in "Death and the Maiden," were in her tones. She maintained the mood that Schubert strikes and holds and leads onward and upward into ecstasy in "The Young Nun" and her "Erlking," was piteous legend told and sung, but not acted beyond the just powers of song, in her tones. The vocal and the emotional attributes of her singing were uncommonly even and satisfying in all three of her songs, and she still stands, when exuberance does not lead her astray, in the ripe and ordered richness of matured art. Her songs and the rest of the programme in detail were:

Bruckner: Symphony in D minor, No. 9 (unfinished).

Schubert: "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Franz Liszt.—"Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottl.—"The Erlking," orchestrated by Hector Berlioz.

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore" No. 1, Op. 138.

Bruckner had no aptitude for titles; and he drew his music from no promptings of the other arts that might have given this or that of his symphonies a name. He labelled only one of them—the fourth (in E-flat major), "The Romantic." Yet in the same vein and as plausibly, the old man, struggling against approaching dissolution as he wrote, might have named the ninth "The Mysterious." Perhaps he did so in his cunning way when he put "feierlich" (solemnly mysterious) over the first and the third movements to suggest the mood of each. For once, seemingly, an insistent mood does run through the music, incapable as Bruckner usually is of sustained thought, emotion, construction and expression. And "feierlich" with its mingled implication of mystery and exaltation does suggest it. The very beginning of the symphony summons it; throughout the first movement it recurs now vague and hesitant, often struggling, but again commanding and poignant. Bruckner keeps it as well through the searching dissonances, the queer harmonies the uncanny figuration of the scherzo. Often there, he writes very innocent music. Again he is as weirdly macabre as though he were a youngster in a Paris attic, eager to find a new shiver and so make an audience heed him. Bruckner, however, thought little of audiences and more probably, he was giving conscious or unconscious play to

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR AT MADAME SCHUMANN-HEINK'S

AS A MOTHER Madame Schumann-Heink is a model, and her care of her children is never relaxed. They go to her with all their childish plans and troubles for advice and comfort, and her control over them is absolute; for, although she looks personally after everything in her home from cellar to garret every day with the utmost care, she always has time to spare for them.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Nov. 2, 1907

BRUCHNER AGAIN, SCHUBERT AND SCHUMANN-HEINK

Dr. Muck Revives the Unfinished Symphony of the Viennese Composer in a More Successful Venture Than That of Last Year—The Unusual Qualities That Kept the Music Interesting in Spite of the Usual Defects and Limitations—Mme. Schumann-Heink's Singing, Paderewski's and Sembrich's Recital—Other Concerts Next Week

The education of audiences in Bruckner's music makes no faster progress, apparently, in Boston than it does elsewhere. For a decade, at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Paur Gericke pursued the process fitfully, playing one or another symphony by Bruckner every two years. Dr. Muck is more energetic and persistent. Last winter he put Bruckner's seventh symphony (E major) on one of his programmes, and yesterday he began the afternoon with the three movements that Bruckner completed of a ninth. They are as long, seemingly, as the whole seventh. They continued for a little more than an hour, and the first—let the late-comer beware!—lasts almost thirty minutes. None the less the listeners seemed to hear not only with patience, but with a curiosity that was close to interest, and sometimes to response. The audiences of Friday afternoon have been far more restless at times under some acknowledged masterpiece than they were yesterday under Bruckner's uneven, irritating and debateable symphony. By so much, at least, Dr. Muck may congratulate himself upon the results of his mild crusading for the music of the simple, gentle old man—half the prey of hard circumstance and half unwilling sufferer under his own limitations—whom the conductor in his youth knew and honored. True, the applause at the close of each movement was by no means hearty. Bruckner, however, never mastered the art of unmistakable and inevitable ending. His music only stops. Therefore there was a touch of surprise and unreadiness in each little ripple of applause. Throughout, however, there were no such signs of irritated indifference and impatient weariness as pursued the performance of Bruckner's seventh symphony on a Friday afternoon of last December.

With the coming of Mme. Schumann-Heink, in velvet and plumes that made her look as though she had stepped down from some sumptuous picture, the audience could safely and surely let loose its applause. It welcomed her warmly; it listened with rapt attention; and at the end of the three songs of Schubert that she sang with the orchestra, it recalled her again and again. Her tones were rich, full and warm. She neither exaggerated nor roughened them. The continent surety and roundness of her artistry was not the least part of its mastery. As just and as true was the emotional quality of her singing. The little lyric drama of "The Erlking" is a pitfall of over-emphasis, and the musical and the rhapsodical contrasts of "The Young Nun" have their temptations. Sometimes the sheer vigor of Mme. Schumann-Heink's temperament has made her prey to such allurements. Yesterday, she withstood them. Vivid and poignant often, now large and now adroit, was her coloring of her tones, but everywhere the justness of the expression intensified the emotion it would convey. The sombre pity, the darksome tenderness of the music of Death, in "Death and the Maiden," were in her tones. She maintained the mood that Schubert strikes and holds and leads onward and upward into ecstasy in "The Young Nun" and her "Erlking" was piteous legend told and sung, but not acted beyond the just powers of song, in her tones. The vocal and the emotional attributes of her singing were uncommonly even and satisfying in all three of her songs, and she still stands, when exuberance does not lead her astray, in the ripe and ordered richness of matured art. Her songs and the rest of the programme in detail were:

Bruckner: Symphony in D minor, No. 9 (unfinished).

Schubert: "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Franz Liszt.—"Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottl.—"The Erlking," orchestrated by Hector Berlioz.

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore" No. 1, Op. 138.

Bruckner had no aptitude for titles; and he drew his music from no promptings of the other arts that might have given this or that of his symphonies a name. He labelled only one of them—the fourth (in E-flat major), "The Romantic." Yet in the same vein and as plausibly, the old man, struggling against approaching dissolution as he wrote, might have named the ninth "The Mysterious." Perhaps he did so in his cunning way when he put "feierlich" (solemnly mysterious) over the first and the third movements to suggest the mood of each. For once, seemingly, an insistent mood does run through the music, incapable as Bruckner usually is of sustained thought, emotion, construction and expression. And "feierlich" with its mingled implication of mystery and exaltation does suggest it. The very beginning of the symphony summons it; throughout the first movement it recurs now vague and hesitant, often struggling, but again commanding and poignant. Bruckner keeps it as well through the searching dissonances, the queer harmonies the uncanny figuration of the scherzo. Often there, he writes very innocent music. Again he is as weirdly macabre as though he were a youngster in a Paris attic, eager to find a new shiver and so make an audience heed him. Bruckner, however, thought little of audiences and more probably, he was giving conscious or unconscious play to the vein of peasant susceptibility to uncanny and beckoning sounds that by his birthright was in him. Thus the scherzo strikes its note of fantastic and fitful mystery; while the final adagio summons the note of a mystery that is deep and awesome. It swells into solemnity as of great and shadowy places and then falls away in to a peaceful and tender close—the mood, though it is expressed in sound, of a still and sheltering place. Was the fourth movement that Bruckner never wrote to be of solemn rejoicing?

For once then, in spite of all the stumblings and lapses of the music, a symphony by Bruckner, incomplete indeed, but still substantial, seemed to have sustained and suggestive mood, and the more for such a responsive and communicative performance as it received from Dr. Muck and his men. Certainly, the stumblings and gropings, the lapses and solecisms, the score of irritating shortcomings that usually beset Bruckner's music, seemed fewer and less trying than they did in the symphony that Dr. Muck chose last year. Equally the passages of noble and almost sustained eloquence, like the intense and solemn climaxes of the first movement; of melodic fascination as in some of the meditative moments between those climaxes; of poignant expressiveness, like the beginning of the adagio; of fantastic imagination, as in parts of the scherzo, and of a grave and ideal beauty, as in many an instant of the close—all these are more numerous and significant than were the similar "purple patches" of the seventh symphony. Time and again, the ninth seems to stir an emotional response and to maintain an absorbing mood that appreciably cloak and lessen the familiar weaknesses and limitations. The music has indeed its empty, dull, irrelevant, confused and perverse moments, but they are less vexing and insistent than they sometimes are. The mood of solemn and exalted mystery with which Bruckner often sought to clothe this last symphony was less labored expression than many another to his pure, detached, idealizing spirit. The common peasant voice, the narrow peasant mind speak less frequently in it. The peasant is indeed in the scherzo, but the imaginative and susceptible peasant. The humbly adoring peasant sings in the finale. In both the idealized Bruckner—Bruckner as at moments he could be and not as he usually was—was writing surprisingly much.

And often in the music there was, or there seemed to be, a shadowy, groping dramatic suggestion, that for an instant gained the vividness and the intensity that Bruckner sought, and then faded and wavered again. This suggestion lay not so much in the melodies or in the development or the decoration of them. It lay, rather, in the instrumental coloring, combinations, contrasts and detail. Many are the measures of a singular beauty or poignancy as so much orchestral sound, and Dr. Muck and his men mellowed the one and heightened the other. Almost always at these moments this undertone of dramatic suggestion recurred. Now, it was the ambition of Bruckner to enrich absolute music on its expressive side with the instrumental significance that Wagner gave his music-dramas. The disciple labored to carry into another field a measure of what the reforming master had done in his own. None the less, he may have forgotten that much of the expressiveness of Wagner's orchestra is due to the printed or audible text, the visible and defined characters, the momentary dramatic action that it is emphasizing or illustrating. A symphony can have no such tangible background to lighten and clarify its instrumental expressiveness. Therefore, when Bruckner tried to attain it in his symphonies, while he did gain new euphony, richness, incisiveness and even an occasional thrill, the result was often groping, confused, vague. He was trying to make his instrumental dramatic when there was no drama. But in the scoring of the ninth symphony there is evasive dramatic suggestion, and frequently. Before it is half done, the listener is ready to believe that the simple-minded Bruckner, consciously or unconsciously, set his themes to playing out some shadowy drama of his imagination, as does admittedly the highly intellectual d'Indy. In his second symphony d'Indy brings such a drama almost to expression. In his ninth symphony, especially in the instrumentation, Bruckner was groping toward a similar goal. The Parisian is, the Viennese was, an idealist, and so perhaps to both came such pure and disembodied visions.

H. T. P.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT AN EVENT

Fine Interpretation Given of Bruckner's Colossal
Symphony.

Herald Nov. 3, 1907
BY PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 9.....Bruckner
"The Young Nephew".....Schubert
"Death and the Maiden".....Schubert
Overture, "Leonore, No. 1".....Beethoven

Both the admirers of Bruckner and those that dislike his music lay stress on the fact that he was a born peasant and was essentially a peasant to the day of his death, although the Rector Magnificus of the University of Vienna bowed before him when he presented him with the honorary degree of doctor. The admirers find in Bruckner's peasanthood his strongest characteristics as a composer; the foes find in this peasanthood his salient faults. The former say that by reason of the simplicity and purity of his character, Bruckner was as Paul caught up in the body or out of the body, they cannot tell, to the third heaven, caught up into paradise where he heard unspeakable words, which it was not lawful for him to utter, but it was allowed him to hint at them in music. The latter insist that his peasant naivete dashed with peasant cunning is revealed in his interminable chatter, in his vague wanderings, in his lack of continuity and cohesion in the expression of thought.

The wretched game of politics is still played with Bruckner. Because he worshipped Wagner and because Brahms, or rather Hanslick, who was to Brahms both elephant and thurifer, was opposed to Wagner, the Wagnerites therefore pitted Bruckner against Brahms, and proclaimed the former the great successor to Beethoven in the field of absolute music. As a matter of fact, Brahms was neither bitterly hostile toward Wagner, nor did he sneer at Bruckner. There was room for both Brahms and Bruckner—except in Vienna, and except in the shaggy breasts of Wagnerites. Hanslick is dead, "the executioner of Bruckner," as William Ritter characterizes him, "the man who derided all the true glories of the music of his time for Brahms' sole benefit," but Hanslick in his life time did not kill Bruckner, who had friendly audiences in Vienna before his death, whose fame has steadily grown. And among those conductors who have been instrumental in spreading Bruckner's glory are Dr. Muck, Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Ferdinand Loewe.

In order to appreciate fully and yet with discrimination the indisputable talent, the irregular, uncontrolled genius of Bruckner, it is not necessary to inquire curiously into Bruckner's peasanthood or into the character of his father and mother. It was the theory of Sainte-Beuve that the superior man is found, at least in part, in his parents, and especially in his mother; but I doubt in this instance whether an intimate acquaintance with Therese, the daughter of the innkeeper and administrator Ferdinand Helm at Neuzeng, would explain the inconsistencies and contradictions in her son's music. She was no doubt a strong, lusty woman, and she bore her husband a dozen children. As for Bruckner being a peasant, poor, now rude in behavior and speech and now almost cringing in his desire to be courteous, shabbily educated, very few of the greatest composers have been born in rooms of purple hangings, very few have been distinguished for the elegance of their manners or the depth and breadth of their general learning.

Bruckner did not live to complete his ninth symphony, which must necessarily be judged as an incomplete work. It was produced here by Mr. Gericke three years ago last April, and, as is, alas, the common rule, it was left severely alone, so that there could be no corroboration or reversal of the first opinion. Works of this importance should be performed at two concerts in immediate succession.

The symphony was conducted last evening by Dr. Muck with firm belief in the composer and with gusto in the accomplishment of a reverential task. In this colossal work are pages of both tender and solemn beauty, of dramatic strength, of wild fancy, of infinite sweep and apocalyptic vision. These pages were read by Dr. Muck with illuminative fervor. Nothing could have been more superb than the establishment of a mood of anticipation until the first and chief theme of the opening movement was thundered out in its full and awful dignity.

Melodic passages were sung, not declaimed; declamatory phrases were read with dramatic intensity. The performance of the scherzo, one of the most remarkable movements in all Bruckner's symphonies, music that is now lightly fantastical and now demoniacal, was one long to be remembered. The reading of the Adagio was highly poetical from the delivery of the opening and poignant theme to the close of quiet grandeur, which has been aptly characterized as the composer's farewell to the world and its pomp and gauds, its vain ambitions and its gnat-like cares.

And yet, in spite of the presence of these inspired pages, in spite of a performance that must long be memorable, there were stretches of waste, there was plodding through sand and desolation. Grant the purely technical interest in Bruckner's treatment of thematic material, it yet remains a fact that his diffuseness, his lack of continuity, his occasionally childish, inconsequential prattle, are revealed in this symphony as in the preceding ones. Only the scherzo is conceived clearly from beginning to end and firmly knit together. Though the faults be serious and grievous in the other movements, especially in the first, they are forgotten afterward in the remembrance of that which is grandly thought and grandly expressed, in the remembrance of pages of wondrous, unearthly beauty.

These features of the work itself and the splendor of the performance were warmly appreciated by the audience.

Mme. Schumann-Heink sang three songs by Schubert, the "Young Nun," with the piano accompaniment instrumented by Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," with Mottl's instrumentation, and "Erking," with Berlioz's instrumentation. These songs at former symphony concerts have been sung with piano accompaniment.

Her singing was distinguished chiefly by her suggestion of widely varying moods; of religious ecstasy, akin to that expressed in Tennyson's exquisite poem that is all white in the exposition of a nun's religious longing; of the impassive yet comforting voice of Death in answer to the fearsome maiden; of the legendary spirit and horror of the Erking. In all this she succeeded, but she was most effective in "Death and the Maiden," which displayed the richness of her voice and did not force her beyond present vocal limitations.

It is said that when Roger, the great French tenor, sang "Erking" he came dangerously near ventriloquism in his effort to present distinctly the three characters in the drama, and only his dramatic genius saved him from being ridiculous. Mme. Schumann-Heink avoided this pit into which many and distinguished singers have fallen, yet her interpretation was dramatic, and it was commendably free from exaggeration. Critics for many years have found fault with Schubert's setting. (Mendelssohn, for instance, in his jaunty, genteel way preferred Reichardt's!)

They have accused Schubert of absurd accentuation, of giving to the Erking incongruously sentimental strains, melodies that would not frighten even the most timid child; of portraying in Italian music an episode of the chilly North. What have they not said? Yet Schubert's song still thrills, for here is the suggestion of night and speed and horror. Loewe's ballad is remarkable, but it is conceived in another manner.

It is all very well to say that the Leonore overture No. 1 is better as a prelude to the opera than No. 3, and that No. 2 is in some respects superior to the most famous of the four overtures. Whenever No. 1, No. 2, or the overture to "Fidelio" is played, the hearer instinctively is reminded of No. 3, and would fain hear it.

NOBLE VOICE FILLS SYMPHONY HALL

Journal

Mme. Schumann-Heink Sings
Schubert's Songs With Orchestra.

Mme. Schumann-Heink's singing was the most enjoyable feature of Saturday night's Symphony concert. The distinguished contralto sang three of Schubert's songs, "The Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden" and "The Erking," all with orchestral accompaniment, and it is safe to say that no other contralto—at least none with whom Bostonians are acquainted—could have sung them with so remarkable a display of art and power. "The Erking" is the best-known of these songs; it is also the most striking. This was the first time, however, that a Symphony audience had heard it with orchestra, and the effect was more thrilling than ever before. Mme. Schumann-Heink was recalled at least half a dozen times; in fact, the enthusiasts that filled the hall would probably have insisted upon a repetition but for the rigid rule against encores.

The first number on the program was Bruckner's Symphony in D minor, No. 9, which the eccentric Austrian composer left unfinished when he died. The symphony was first performed at these concerts in the spring of 1904. At that time it aroused more discussion than enthusiasm. Now on Saturday night the applause was so hearty and prolonged at the end of the first movement that finally Dr. Muck signaled for the members of the orchestra to rise. No doubt some of the applause was intended as a compliment to the admirable work of the orchestra—to the sympathy, fine spirit and loving care the players showed. The second movement made a slighter impression; but after the third movement there was again a vigorous outburst of applause. In this case the plaudits were mostly for the composer, who in the adagio shows not only his "monstrous imagination," as Weingartner called it, but his gift of melody.

The concert closed with a brilliant performance of Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 1.

The orchestra is off on its first tour of the season this week. Next week Paderewski will be the soloist, playing Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, No. 4. The orchestra will play Pfitzner's overture, "Christ-Elflein," for the first time, and Brahms' Symphony in D major, No. 2.

MUSICAL Globe Nov 3, 07 MATTERS

Mme Schumann-Heink
Symphony Soloist.

Recitals This Week by Paderewski and Mme Sembrich.

Other Events of the Near Future—Current Gossip.

The fourth Symphony program began with Bruckner's D minor, or unfinished symphony; then followed a group of Schubert songs, with Mme Schumann-Heink as soloist, and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 1, for the third and last number. The great contralto returns with her voice apparently unimpaired, her vocal style unchanged, and the splendor of tone and power undiminished. She is still prone to exaggeration which at times mars the beauty of her phrasing, but the fervor of her delivery, the glorious warmth of her declamation and the wonderfully rich and resonant quality of her lower tones enthrall her auditors as in the past.

Her selections were "The Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden" and the familiar "Erking." She sang them with excellent contrasting effects, deep expression and tenderness, though less intensity would have made the songs sufficiently dramatic. The rapturous applause that greeted the singer's interpretations attested the well-deserved popularity of the distinguished artist, who was recalled many times to the platform.

The accompaniments to madam's songs were thoroughly good, and on account of her big voice the tonal balances twixt singer and orchestra was preserved unusually well. Dr Muck opened his program with the unfinished symphony by Bruckner, an incomplete and bewildering work filled with cross harmonies, dissonants and puzzling modulations and changes in key.

It is a massive composition that seemingly defies an attempt to unravel its significance, save that it typifies the spirit of unrest, doubt and disappointment of a man whose life is embittered by his misfortunes. In the first part there are climaxes and anticlimaxes in profusion; the full orchestra being given numerous fortissimo episodes, with the brasses prominent in almost every instance. Opposing themes by different groups also are frequent. In the second section the violin parts, which are very difficult in scoring, were admirably brought out, the strange character of this movement making it interesting despite the chaotic nature of the scherzo. The violins, too, were very effective in the figurations of the last movement. But the whole work is so puzzling and formless that it does not appeal to the average concert attendant, and its cool reception by the audience was a repetition of the former one some three years ago. The "Leonore" overture was interpreted in a sympathetic manner and won much applause.

As the orchestra will make its first trip this week there will be no public rehearsal and concert until Nov 15 and 16. Paderewski will be the soloist and play Rubinstein's D minor concerto. The program will open with the overture, "Christ-Elflein," given here for the first time, and close with Brahms' D major symphony.

PADEREWSKI PLAYS AT FIFTH SYMPHONY

Boston American
Great Polish Pianist Applauded to the Echo at Close of Nov 17, 07 Concert.

Every seat in Symphony Hall was occupied last night when Ignaz Paderewski made his appearance as soloist at the fifth of the season's concerts, and highly wrought enthusiasm and expectancy resolved into thundrous applause when the huge audience greeted the great pianist.

Paderewski played Rubenstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The beauty, richness and subtle coloring of his marvelous singing-tone, his sparkling crystalline technique, were never marred by an overforcing of tone. No other pianist seems so possessed of highly magnetic qualities or so surrounded by an atmosphere charged with poetry—romanticism and imagination. Last night, as always, the great artist swayed his audience with an ever varying mood, and at the conclusion he was forced to return a half dozen times. Finally, amid an outburst of shouts and hand-clapping he again seated himself at the piano and played an encore.

The other numbers on the programme were Pfitzner's Overture to "The Little Christ Elf," a Christmas fairy tale by Ilse von Stash, played for the first time in Boston, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.

Listeners of Saturday night, at the Symphony concert, received Bruckner's symphony as attentively and much more warmly than did those of Friday afternoon; but they likewise kept their heartiest and most insistent applause for the singing of Mme. Schumann-Heink. Again she richly earned the many recalls that she received, and recalls that were sincere admiration because, under the rules of the concerts, they could bring no extra pieces. More than on Friday, the song of "The Young Nun" seemed to lie beyond the easy range of her voice and to constrain accordingly the expressiveness of her tones. On the other hand, her singing of "Death and the Maiden" was a little masterpiece in the art of song, alike in the quality of her tone, in the leading of the melody, the adjustment of details, the mingled breadth and fineness of her phrasing, and in the impartment of the mood of the music and of the verse. Throughout a perfect continence ennobled very deep emotion. Indeed the impression of austere tragedy that the song and the singing left behind, almost made "The Erlking" seem musical melodrama. Not within memory has Mme. Schumann-Heink sang in Boston with the full and ordered beauty of tone and the large justice of expression that she showed alike on Friday and on Saturday.

It was indeed an evening of notable performances. Even the waste places in Bruckner's symphony almost blossomed under the playing of Dr. Muck and the band. Time and again, the conductor seemed to begin where the composer had stopped—to bring to full expression what Bruckner believed that he had put into his music, but that he put into it so clumsily, so hiddenly that it needed such penetrating imagination and expressive power as was in Dr. Muck and his men on Saturday to bring it forth. They marshalled Bruckner's climaxes to gradual heights with gathering intensity as well as sonority. They masked and smoothed away his awkwardnesses with beauty of tone. They caught and realized the instrumental poignancies that he heard in vision. They maintained the moods that he by himself could not quite maintain. The increased choir of horns, the changes in the strings justified themselves in the shadowy, tremulous foreboding quality of tone that they gained in the long, expectant, mysterious passages that begin the symphony. The new power of the orchestra spoke in the rising flood of tone with which they brought the principal melody to light. It glowed as Bruckner would have it glow. The sheer virtuosity of the band, more elastic now than it has ever been, played through the scherzo until the music seemed a huge, fantastic improvisation. The beginning of the adagio was moving proof of the new expressive quality in the tone of the strings, and the song of the tubas further on was the deep and serene instrumental voice that Bruckner would draw from them. And so on with detail after detail, even to that wonderful flick of string tone, like a red thread, across the darker voices of the wind choir in the first movement. Throughout the playing was of our new orchestra in its best estate, and it was good to have it go so to other cities.

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

PFITZNER,

OVERTURE to "The Christ-Elf," a Christmas Fairy Tale, by Ilse von Stach, op. 20.
(First time in Boston,)

RUBINSTEIN,

CONCERTO in D minor, No. 4, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 70.
I. Moderato,
II. Moderato assai.
III. Allegro sssai.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

Soloist:

Mr. IGNAZ PADEREWSKI.

The Pianoforte is a Weber.

Nov. 4, 1907
The listeners of Saturday night at the Symphony concert, received Bruckner's symphony as attentively and much more warmly than did those of Friday afternoon; but they likewise kept their heartiest and most insistent applause for the singing of Mme. Schumann-Heink. Again she richly earned the many recalls that she received, and recalls that were sincere admiration because, under the rules of the concerts, they could bring no extra pieces. More than on Friday, the song of "The Young Nun" seemed to lie beyond the easy range of her voice and to constrain accordingly the expressiveness of her tones. On the other hand, her singing of "Death and the Maiden" was a little masterpiece in the art of song, alike in the quality of her tone, in the leading of the melody, the adjustment of details, the mingled breadth and fineness of her phrasing, and in the impartment of the mood of the music and of the verse. Throughout a perfect continence ennobled very deep emotion. Indeed the impression of austere tragedy that the song and the singing left behind, almost made "The Erlking" seem musical melodrama. Not within memory has Mme. Schumann-Heink sang in Boston with the full and ordered beauty of tone and the large justice of expression that she showed alike on Friday and on Saturday.

It was indeed an evening of notable performances. Even the waste places in Bruckner's symphony almost blossomed under the playing of Dr. Muck and the band. Time and again, the conductor seemed to begin where the composer had stopped—to bring to full expression what Bruckner believed that he had put into his music, but that he put into it so clumsily, so hiddenly that it needed such penetrating imagination and expressive power as was in Dr. Muck and his men on Saturday to bring it forth. They marshalled Bruckner's climaxes to gradual heights with gathering intensity as well as sonority. They masked and smoothed away his awkwardnesses with beauty of tone. They caught and realized the instrumental poignancies that he heard in vision. They maintained the moods that he by himself could not quite maintain. The increased choir of horns, the changes in the strings justified themselves in the shadowy, tremulous foreboding quality of tone that they gained in the long, expectant, mysterious passages that begin the symphony. The new power of the orchestra spoke in the rising flood of tone with which they brought the principal melody to light. It glowed as Bruckner would have it glow. The sheer virtuosity of the band, more elastic now than it has ever been, played through the scherzo until the music seemed a huge, fantastic improvisation. The beginning of the adagio was moving proof of the new expressive quality in the tone of the strings, and the song of the tubas further on was the deep and serene instrumental voice that Bruckner would draw from them. And so on with detail after detail, even to that wonderful flick of string tone, like a red thread, across the darker voices of the wind choir in the first movement. Throughout the playing was of our new orchestra in its best estate, and it was good to have it go so to other cities.

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- | | |
|-------------|--|
| PFITZNER, | OVERTURE to "The Christ-Elf," a Christmas Fairy Tale, by Ilse von Stach, op. 20.
(First time in Boston,) |
| RUBINSTEIN, | CONCERTO in D minor, No. 4, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 70.
I. Moderato.
II. Moderato assai.
III. Allegro assai. |
| BRAHMS, | SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito. |

Soloist:

Mr. IGNAZ PADEREWSKI.

The Pianoforte is a Weber.

Half Thousand Music Lovers Wait In Vain To Hear Paderewski

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

PADEREWSKI FIRST, ORCHESTRA

Trans: SECOND Nov. 6, 07

An Audience That Thought Only of the Pianist and Set Rule at Naught—His Playing of Rubinstein's Fourth Concerto—Dr. Muck and the Band Give a Vivid and Vital Performance of Brahms's Second Symphony—Mr. Denghausen's Recital of German Songs—Other Musical News

Once in a long time a singer or a virtuoso, who nominally assists at a Symphony Concert overshadows all else to the audience. It was so—and to the clouding of the first performance of Mr. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter"—when Mme. Melba, in the rich noon of her powers, sang with the orchestra last winter. And it was so—and to the obscuring of a vivid and vital performance of Brahms's second symphony—when Mr. Paderewski played with the orchestra yesterday. Waiting for him the audience took as agreeable pastime the new overture with which Dr. Muck began the concert. A Christmas fairy tale of "The Little Christ-Elf" moved Hans Pfitzner to write it. The peculiar vein of naive German sentimentality, that none but Germans quite feel or understand stirred in it. Up to Heaven went the little Christ-child, even as Humperdinck's angels descend from it in "Hänsel and Gretel." Germans and the rest of the world are equally incorrigible in their moods toward such music, and the slight and passing impression that it made upon its hearers yesterday need not be laid at Mr. Paderewski's door. Still waiting for him, the listeners endured patiently a delay that helped to make the concert nearly two hours and a quarter long. At length he came, duly played a concerto, and then filled the intermission—or rather one intermission—with a solo piece, while rule and precedent against repetitions or additional numbers bent before his willingness and the insistence of the audience. Then, when it was sure that he would play no more—and a very long time, much desultory clapping, and a little irritated hissing were necessary to satisfy a noisy group of music-school children in the second balcony—it was virtually done with the concert. The audience melted at each pause in the symphony, while Dr. Muck watched the departing with a touch of contemptuously tolerant patience. Before the end there were long rifts of empty seats, and very scanty applause rewarded what was a more notable performance of the symphony than Mr. Paderewski happened to give of the concerto.

It is easy to be cynical and censorious over all these episodes, to say that they are not quite in accord with dignity and precedent at the Symphony Concerts and so forth in the alluring vein of superior righteousness. But to look up to the "rush seats" of the second balcony was straightway to be kind. There sat elderly women, not so well-to-do that they could take their pleasure when and how they would. They had waited for hours at the door that they might be sure of their places. Eagerness was written deep on their faces. They had come to hear Mr. Paderewski for the first, perhaps the only time; under the only conditions, as it might be, that they could afford. To have heard him only with the orchestra would have left them half satisfied. They craved him by himself, and before such visible longing and such clear rapture in the satisfaction of it, an "en-core rule" may well break. And among these elderly women were young girls, seizing, too, a first and perhaps the only possible opportunity for them to hear the foremost pianist of our time and to feel the spell of a unique personality. It is good that our Symphony Concerts should have form and rule and dignity. It is as good as well that on occasion they should be humanly disdainful of all three.

The pity was, though these rapt listeners hardly suspected it, that Mr. Paderewski's playing of the concerto sometimes failed to disclose his finest and most distinguishing powers. For some reason, he could hardly summon in the first movement his transparent beauty and iridescence of singing tone; while his articulation lacked the precise yet elastic clearness with which he is wont to play such concise music. The ear missed both the prismatic and the songful quality of his playing. He was gravely, minutely, absorbedly expository. His mood seemed a little constrained; his tone a little pale and lifeless. Happily in the slow movement he was free again. He persuaded its truly lyrical content to speech in the changeful and caressing quality of his tones. He brooded over its gentle melancholy. He led its melodies in shadowy gradations or warm shadings. The whole was softly clear of phrase, and the impression was of pensive song, singing almost to itself. Then, with the contrast of the finale, Mr. Paderewski struck fire, and pianist, conductor and band threw off the music, like so much improvisation, tossed measure by measure to the ears of equally exhilarated hearers. The truest Paderewski of all played the little extra piece—the pianist of the secrets of pellucid tone, winding melody, delicate traceries of ornament and shadowy or streaming harmonic backgrounds. The sensitive felicity of feeling and of expression recalled even the young Paderewski of the nineties and the matured pianist seldom has quite his voice.

It was the turn of Dr. Muck with

...s symphony in D major, the serene symphony, the light symphony, even the Viennese symphony, as the briggish Leipzigers despitely called it. Really it is the symphony of Brahms that gives the quickest and clearest pleasure to its hearers. He has hidden his reflection, and the music seems to spring spontaneously. He labors over no barren places, as though diligence might make them fertile. Sheer freshness of mood has already brought them to blossom. Warmth of spirit has cleared and brightened the instrumental voices, but it is still a Brahmsian voice in its reticence. He will sing, but not passionately in the first and the second movements. He will caper, but not boisterously in the intermezzo. He will rejoice, but not tumultuously, in the finale. The sunny energy of the music is persuasive. There is little scaffolding in tones, and for once charm of instrumental voices hides even that.

And Dr. Muck came to the symphony with a distinctness of comprehension as true and clear as that which he brought to its predecessor last year. At moments he and his men almost made Brahms sound like a deeper-voiced Mozart. Steadily the conductor found the underlying melody and kept it. Steadily he gained from his men a richness of tone that clothed it with a new depth and mellowness. The insistent song of the first movement flowed warmly against its dusky background until both merged in the calm pool of golden tone with which conductor and men brought the first movement to its close. Clear and warm again was the more wandering song of the slow movement—music of Indian summer in mood and expression even if the Brahmsians, who, as a rule, hardly open the windows of their studies, will have it of their conventional spring. The scherzo sounded like a playful and capricious minuet, and Dr. Muck made the little passages that interrupt its flow like little darting claws playing in and out of its grace. The finale leaped to the ear, warm and exultant. The pace, the spirit of the performance gave it a new and strange ardor. Once more, as often in the whole symphony, the conductor seemed to be divining and adding what the reticent Brahms—reticent even in high spirits—would not quite express.

H. T. P.

PADEREWSKI PLAYS AT FIFTH SYMPHONY

An Unsatisfactory Overture by Pfitzner Opened the Programme.

NOTED PIANIST GRANTS AUDIENCE AN ENCORE

Brahms Number to Close, Under
Dr. Muck's Direction,
Is Feature of Concert.

BY PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The Little Christ-Elf"....Pfitzner
Concerto in D minor No. 4 for piano.....Rubinstein

Symphony in D major No. 2.....Brahms

Hans Pfitzner wrote this overture and other music for a Christmas fairy drama by Ilsa von Sach. The play was produced at Munich, the 11th of last December. The overture was performed about three weeks before that, in Berlin. The drama itself was harshly criticised. It was condemned as foolish, affected, sentimental, silly, ridiculous—these were only a few of the adjectives jauntily employed to voice disapprobation.

A composer is not always to be pitied when he sets music to a weak libretto, or writes incidental music for a stupid play. If his music be good, he shines all the more brilliantly. If it be mediocre or poor, he and his friends can shrug shoulders and say, "How could any one be inspired by such a text? The wonder is that the music is as good as it is."

Inasmuch as the overture has been played three or four times in European concert halls without reference to the drama, it may fairly be judged as absolute music, as any overture without a printed or implied argument. We are told that the play and the music were intended to interest children. Any story that really entertains healthy children will also delight healthy grown persons. Sometimes the older ones find a keener delight than the younger; witness two widely dissimilar books, "Alice in Wonderland" and "Gulliver's Travels." But must music be necessarily simple to amuse children? Are they swayed only by marked rhythms and strongly accented tunes?

Whether the themes in Pfitzner's overture are typical of characters or are associated with scenes in the play is immaterial when the music is brought into the concert hall. The opening measures may or may not accompany the final tableau of the drama when angels pray and the Christ child climbs the ladder to heaven. In the concert hall, without an explanatory note of any purpose or wish of the composer, the music is merely music.

Pfitzner, who, now living in Munich, will soon make Strassburg his home, wrote two operas, the later of which "Die Rose vom Liebegartens" (1901), made him a much discussed man. Pages in this opera which are of a deliberately realistic nature provoked the greatest of compliments, a parody. He himself thinks that the world is down on him, that there is a conspiracy to crush him, and when a man thinks this and says this he is in a parlous state.

Surely there is nothing in this overture to awaken jealousy or animosity in the breasts of Pfitzner's contemporaries. If his Scherzo, an early work, or his overture to "Katchaen von Hellbrunn" had been performed last night, we might all recognize him today as a person of importance. The overture to "The Little Christ-Elf" may serve in the theatre. As a concert piece it is of little importance. The themes are childish rather than childlike, and while the structure of the work is clean-cut and decided, there is little beauty of decoration or color. Although the orchestra indicated by Pfitzner is a small one, he nevertheless succeeds at times at being muddy in his coloring, and when this coloring is not muddy it is conventional or drab.

Mr. Paderewski was, of course, welcomed enthusiastically, although the concerto he chose was a familiar virtuoso piece with some pages of amiable sentiment. It seems impossible that 40 years ago this composition raised a storm of abuse in London because, forsooth, it was "chaotic and incomprehensible." Mr. Paderewski is fortunate, or unfortunate, in this, that it makes little difference to the great majority what he does play. The throng submits willingly to his spell after the first leonine attack, nor at a symphony concert is it willing to let the weaver of spells go after a concerto. He must play other pieces, or at least another piece.

So whenever Paderewski appears at a symphony concert, the sane rule forbidding encores is broken and the balance of the programme is destroyed. It was so when he first played here at a symphony concert 16 years ago, and it will be so, undoubtedly, if he should play at one in 1923. It is true that this rule about encores was broken the season before Mr. Paderewski's first appearance, when Mr. de Pachmann aroused so great enthusiasm that he appeased the applauders only by playing three or four pieces.

But let the pianist be Mr. Paderewski, or the singer the angel Israfil, who sings so wildly well that the stars cease their hymns to listen; even then, is a symphony concert the place for an intermezzo in the nature of a recital? In an ideal symphony concert should not a solo be one incidental or necessary to the general scheme of ensemble? And in fairness to all, if one pianist be allowed to add to the programme, why should not another, or a violinist, or a singer, or even a cellist be permitted to add a group of little pieces in answer to the roaring applause?

Mr. Paderewski played the concerto with a verve that is peculiar to him, but his strength and his more engrossing qualities did not prevent much of the concerto from seeming old fashioned, without the grace and perfume that save, even when the substance is clearly of a generation long past. At times Mr. Paderewski forced tone till it lost all quality, but there were noble and tender moments due more to the interpretation than to the music itself. Recalled enthusiastically, he played Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor.

After a display of phenomenal personality and after the excitement of anticipation, realization and tribute, any symphony, however great it may be, or however glorious the performance of it, will suffer. This is inevitable. Yet to some, the symphony of Brahms, one of that master's finest and most musical works, as interpreted by Dr. Muck, was the feature of the concert.

Journal Nov 16, 1907

They say that when Orpheus played he drew trees into line behind him. It's lucky there aren't any trees in the neighborhood of Symphony Hall, for they would have surely fallen into line when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski as soloist, played yesterday afternoon, and the line was quite sufficiently lengthy as it was.

A thousand long, it stretched from the Huntington avenue entrance, a record breaking assembly. Middle aged music teachers with big lunch baskets, pretty misses from the Conservatory esthetically nibbling sweet chocolate, ascetic youths with long locks in frantic imitation of the great artist within the walls, college girls with a History of Sociology carelessly tucked beneath their arms, here and there a stray clerk with a newspaper. And from 7.50 in the morning, when the first lone music lover took up his stand and became the point that ultimately was to be extended into a line, until 1.30 in the afternoon, when the doors were opened, the Symphony Orchestra audience was assembling.

Out of consideration for the music lovers who are not fortunate enough to have a season ticket, the management of the hall allow the general public admission Friday afternoon to the second gallery to the extent of its capacity. No tickets are sold, the public stands in line and has its quarters duly in hand when it passes by the ticket window.

And the whole thing would be very simple but that when a popular program like that of yesterday is on the bills, much more of the general public than can possibly be accommodated desires to be present. The rule of the management is, of necessity, "First come first served." And yesterday, when over 1000 waited for the chance of hearing the first musician of the land, over 500 people waited in vain.

TWO SYMPHONY TICKETS
FOR SALE, for Saturday evening or for entire season. Tel. Cambridge 1498-1.
(A)

MUSICAL MATTERS

Paderewski, Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Plans of the San Carlo Opera Company.

Concerts of Interest in the Near Future.

The fifth Symphony program was of unusual interest, for Paderewski was the soloist, there was a "first time" number and, contrary to custom at these concerts, an encore added to the announced selections. The audience was so demonstrative and insistent at the close of the Rubinstein piano concerto that Paderewski, after returning to the stage many times to bow, seated himself at the instrument and proceeded to upset established rules. And after playing a Liszt-Schubert piece the audience attempted to make him play again. The applause was not stilled until the orchestra came back for the last selection. At the rehearsal the crowd began to gather at 8 o'clock in the morning, and when the doors were opened at 1 o'clock only about half the line could gain admission to the second balcony, 500 seats.

The great D minor concerto as played by the masterly pianist fairly dwarfed the other pieces, which were Hans Pfitzner's overture, "Das Christ-Elflein," and Brahms' second symphony. Paderewski's performance was wonderfully expressive and executed with an enthusiasm and impetuosity that was so dazzling that the delighted auditors fairly showered him with plaudits.

Paderewski's mastery of the piano is so fully recognized and he has so recently displayed his genius at a recital in the same hall that it is needless to analyze or go into detail about his playing with the Symphony orchestra. In the fiery cadenzas and octave runs of the first movement his power and rapidity of execution seemed almost limitless; the romance in F major and the intricacies of the bewildering arpeggios of the second part were exquisite in their treatment, the first because of the delicacy and beautiful cantabile qualities, the second for its brilliancy and crispness.

The last movement was given with a vigor and dash that was astonishing. There were no retards in the immensely difficult double runs, all the figures in the different passage work were cleanly set forth and the overwhelming crash at the close moved the audience to outbursts of applause that demonstrated Paderewski's complete mastery of the big gathering. Then came the scenes mentioned earlier in this notice. The orchestra did noble work, Dr Muck and his players seeming to enjoy the solo work as much as did the audience.

The Pfitzner overture is a gentle and soothing work, without any special characteristics to warrant eulogy. Skillfully orchestrated and played in a sympathetic manner by competent musicians, it made a pleasing impression. The second symphony by Brahms, which has long been a subject of controversy in the musical world, was interpreted in the way that is expected from our orchestra conductor, Muck's reading being potentially illustrated by the players.

There will be two novelties on this week's program. The first is the latest work by Charles Martin Loeffler. It is written for piano and full orchestra, and is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Mr Loeffler, who got his inspiration for this from Virgil's eighth eclogue, made the first sketch of the work seven or eight years ago. Later he wrote it for two pianos, in which form it was once played at Mrs Gardner's. Since then he has made many important changes in it, and developed it for the orchestra. Mr Gebhard will be at the piano.

The other novelty is an "Adagio and Scherzo-Finale" by Reznicek, who is best known in Boston as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana," the overture of which has been played at our symphony concert. The first number will be Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and the final number Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

WHAT MUSIC WILL DO.

When several hundred young women and several scores of young men stand in the chill November air on the hard pavement for five or six hours, as they did yesterday, waiting to occupy the "rush seats" at the Symphony rehearsal, a striking proof is afforded of the truth of the saying, that "man shall not live by bread alone." Those young people are human documents attesting, in this alleged sordid and materialistic age, the power of an ideal. No sacrifice is too great if it secures for them the privilege of hearing exquisite music. No self-denial is too severe if thereby their love of art and their desire for musical culture may be gratified.

The sight of that long line of patient waiters, not intent upon gain or sport or excitement, but upon an ideal, is one of the many hopeful and inspiring phases of our very complex civilization.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Pfitzner.....Overture to "The Christ-elf"
Rubinstein.....Concerto in D minor
Pianist, Ignaz Paderewski.

Brahms.....Second Symphony, D minor

The new overture by Pfitzner did not impress us favorably. It seemed an unsuccessful excursion into the Humperdinckian field of learned musical simplicity. There are themes that ought to sound like simple melodies, but are treated with a sort of pudding counterpoint until they are lost in the mass of tone. There is much fragmentary figure development that leads nowhere in particular. Altogether we cannot think that any reviewer will adopt the "Collier's Weekly" tone and call the composer "Honey Pfitz!"

But at this concert it was the soloist who was to charm the multitude; the orchestra was to be overshadowed for once by that wonderful personality which dominates everything that it comes in contact with. Paderewski!! "Why man, he doth bestride the narrow world like a Colossus!" He started his part of the Rubinstein concerto, not as a pianist, but as a fortissimist. A line from Southey may best describe it—

"Crashing, smashing, dashing and flashing!"

But chiefly the first two. The subordinate theme of the orchestra was almost inaudible beside the piano part. But the heroism of the mood at least fitted the chief theme finely.

In the second movement there was more of the subtler Paderewski. The sweet, caressing tone, the gentle delicacy of the chief theme, were deserving of superlative adjectives. There was a little insecurity in the horn passages in this. The finale went with better balance than the first movement, but the final bravura exceeded the proper powers of the piano. Nevertheless it was all tremendously exciting and the usual public frenzy took place at the close.

All rules are set aside in favor of this phenomenon, and Dr. Muck did what another conductor had done at these concerts long before,—he allowed an encore! Why, after this, Ysaye, or Kreisler, or Melba, should not give encores we cannot explain. The audience, however, were delighted at the innovation and listened to Chopin's B flat minor Scherzo with rapture. It was played with the same excess of power that we criticized at the Paderewski recital. The sinister phrases of the beginning were given with much poetry. Chopin himself said of them—"They should suggest a charnel-house!" But again in the heroic parts the ideal of the performer went beyond the possibilities of hammers and wires. Paderewski here suggested orchestral effects beyond the domain of the piano-forte. Had any lesser pianist played thus it would have been called thumping. Rosenthal has been severely animadverted upon for just such work. "But Quod licet Jovis, non licet"—anybody else. Again the wild applause burst forth and there were even hopes of forcing another solo, but these were unfulfilled.

All this excitement harmed the symphonic part of the concert. We were never less impressed with the tender D major Brahms symphony. Yet it was well enough played; not as finely as we have had it, but still a worthy performance. There was the old-fashioned Brahms exodus at the end of the first movement. We had hoped that Boston had passed this stage of non-appreciation.

But those who stayed to the end were well repaid, for by the time that the finale was reached the effects of the musical champagne had worn off and both orchestra and audience were again in a normal condition.

Dr. Muck gave an excellent reading of the end of the work and here the orchestra played famously. The result was that the phalanx of Brahmsites displayed much enthusiasm and recalled the eminent conductor. Therefore if the proverb—"All's well that ends well"—be applied, the concert was very successful, in spite of its heterogeneous character and its blemishes. Louis C. Elson.

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY TICKET

Inner aisle seat, for Saturday evenings; $31. Tel. West Newton 120. (A):

SYMPHONY

TICKETS FOR SALE. WADSWORTH, 40 State street, Room 47. Telephone Main 4684-1. 5t(A): o 14

SCAB ORCHESTRAS AND OTHERS

[From the New York Sun]

It must be a source of much comfort to the people of Pittsburg to know that their music will continue to be union made. The Pittsburg orchestra can felicitate itself on having created much wider interest by its battle against the open shop than it ever did by its performances of Beethoven's symphonies. Meanwhile the scab orchestra in Boston continues to enjoy the well earned reputation of being the best in this country and in the opinion of some excellent judges the best in the world.

Symphony Tickets

Connelly & Burke ADAMS HOUSE 3t(A): o 7

Symphony Rehearsal Ticket

FOR SALE—Good seat, E. E. Row, floor. Address R.E.M., Boston Transcript. (A):

FOR SALE FOR $28; COST $36.50 One seat in 1st row, right, first balcony, for Saturday Symphony concerts. Address P.H.F., Boston Transcript. (A):

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Very desirable; afternoon and evening. HARDING, 70 Kilby street. MW(A): o 14

Ignace Jan Paderewski.
From a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

LALO,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Le Roi d'Ys."

LOEFFLER,

"PAGAN POEM," (after Virgil). op. 14. for ORCHESTRA, PIANOFORTE, ENGLISH HORN, and three TRUMPETS obligati.
(First performance.)

Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD, Pianist.

REZNICEK,

ADAGIO and SCHERZO-FINALE from SYMPHONIC
SUITE in E minor for Full ORCHESTRA.
(First time in Boston.)

CHABRIER,

RHAPSODY for ORCHESTRA, "España."

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

Ignace Jan Paderewski.
From a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

LALO,

OVERTURE to the Opera "Le Roi d'Ys."

LOEFFLER,

"PAGAN POEM," (after Virgil). op. 14. for ORCHESTRA, PIANOFORTE, ENGLISH HORN, and
three TRUMPETS obligati.
(First performance.)

Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD, Pianist.

REZNICEK,

ADAGIO and SCHERZO-FINALE from SYMPHONIC
SUITE in E minor for Full ORCHESTRA.
(First time in Boston.)

CHABRIER,

RHAPSODY for ORCHESTRA, "España."

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

In the MUSICAL WORLD

Edited by OLIN DOWNES

Post-SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the sixth Symphony rehearsal and concert, was one of unusual interest. It consisted of Lalo's overture to his opera "Le Roi d'Ys"; Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for piano and orchestra, which was given its first public performance; adagio and scherzo-finale from symphonic suite for orchestra in E minor by Reznicek, also performed for the first time; and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana." Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part of the "Pagan Poem."

Lalo's overture impresses as being music essentially for the theatre. It is scenic, graphic, full of telling contrasts and climaxes, and the scoring is always quickly effective. It is not, perhaps, of the greatest inherent worth, but many passages that in the concert room appear empty and noisy would probably be legitimate and entirely in place before the curtain rises. There are exciting pages and he must be unimaginative indeed who, knowing the legend of the Isle of Ys, is not thrilled by them. The music of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was suggested by Virgil's eighth eclogue. The sorceress is weaving spells to reclaim her absent lover. There is a refrain at the end of each verse, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home." The lover ultimately returns.

A review of such a work should not properly be written until after many repeated hearings. We can only, in justice to the reader and musician, give an account of the general impressions of a first performance.

Those who look to find the poem translated line by line into tones will be disappointed. Mr. Loeffler has steered clear of definite, literal programme music, of justifying the erroneous conception of many as to the true function of that style of composition. A few characteristic themes are used and developed, but they are the threads which bind together a composition in very free form. The only theme that is at all explicit is one that is given to three trumpets, and it is associated with the thought of the refrain. This motif is heard three times in the course of the composition as first played by the trumpets behind the scenes, and, at the climax, fortissimo on the stage. If one's ears may be trusted it is constructed of successive naked triads, and produces a marvellously remote, intangible poetic impression. Other than this, there is no attempt to closely follow the verses of the pastoral; the music is a general portrayal of the moods evoked by the poem. • Mr. Loeffler, possibly on account of growing acquaintance with his works, appears to write in a very lucid style in this his latest orchestral composition. He often compasses the unexpected, but seldom the illogical. One follows with confidence in the path of the composer and rarely loses the thread of the narrative.

It is hardly the human enchantress of Virgil's Pastoral that we here deal with. It is not so much Loeffler imbued with Virgil as it is a mood, latent in the composer, that has been aroused by the eclogue. In the opening pages there is a hint of sensuousness, of passion, but the passion, which waxes hot, is cerebral; and as the piece proceeds, it is as if the composer discarded his first thoughts, yielded himself more and more fully to the impulses of a fitful, tense imagination.

Of the distinction and originality of Mr. Loeffler's style, which, though strongly influenced by his French contemporaries, is essentially and entirely his own; and of his supreme mastery of instrumentation, it is hardly necessary to speak. The new composition fairly bristles with the most remarkable instrumental devices.

The title, "Symphonic," applied to the two movements of Reznicek's suite is not very applicable. The phrases are short and rarely of a truly symphonic character. The movements, especially the adagio, might better supply incidental music to some scene than stand by themselves in the concert room. The music has fresh, lyric warmth and there is often good orchestral color; the scherzo is pleasing and characteristic in its rhythms, but the work is probably not one of the composer's ripest.

How Chabrier, a prince of good fellows, must have rejoiced in his "Espana"! Such riotous color and such exuberant rhythm, orchestration as unique as it is unsurpassable, and the fascinating flavor of the themes themselves—it is a pity that there is not more such music. The performance, wherein Dr. Muck took his tempi somewhat differently than last year, was superb and brought a spirited ending to the concert.

"A PAGAN POEM"

MR. LOEFFLER'S NEW ORCHESTRAL

FANTASY Nov 23, 97

A First Performance at the Symphony Concert Yesterday—Music of a Fuller Intensity and of More Human Quality Than the Composer Has Hitherto Written—Its Symphonic Substance and Large Sonority—The Suggestion from Virgil

In itself and to the audience Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" excelled in interest all the rest of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. It was the first new composition for orchestra to come in some years from his endlessly revising and endlessly unsatisfied hands. It seemed the most significant of all the new pieces that Dr. Muck has announced thus far for the current season. The various transformations that it had undergone in the six years through which the composer had worked upon it and in the private performances it had received, had given it an appreciable air of mystery that piqued expectation, while gossip drifting from rehearsals had further heightened curiosity. Music of a larger sonority, ampler design and broader expressiveness ran this gossip—music that "sounded" with a clearer and fuller voice than any that Mr. Loeffler had written hitherto, that was different from all the rest of his pieces for orchestra. Anticipation was proportionately keen, and, for once, in almost every respect it was gratified. A "Pagan Poem" fills twenty-five minutes in performance, and from beginning to end it held the eager interest of the house. With Mr. Heinrich Gebhard taking the piano that Mr. Loeffler has added to the orchestra, with Mr. Longy playing the significant and considerable part for the English Horn, and with conductor and men on their mettle, it was performed (though it spares neither intricacies nor difficulties) with what seemed it full, eloquent and characteristic voice. At the end the applause was spontaneous, general and insistent. First Dr. Muck and then Mr. Gebhard acknowledged it; but it persisted until the composer had risen in his place to receive a just honor. It is the custom to assume the indifference of the audience of Friday afternoon. As the event yesterday proved, it can be alert when a significant piece by one of the most imaginative composers of our time comes to first performance in the city in which he has made his career. Except for momentary record, the other music on the programme may be left for comment at another time. It was in detail:

Lalo: Overture to the opera, "The King of Is". Loeffler: "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil). Op. 14, for orchestra, pianoforte, English Horn, and three Trumpets obbligati. First performance.

Reznicek: Adagio and Scherzo-finale from symphonic suite in E minor for full orchestra. First time in Boston.

Chabrier: Espana, rhapsody for orchestra.

Oftenest in recent years Mr. Loeffler has written with a preceding and stimulating literary suggestion, and for a "Pagan Poem" he found it in the second part of Virgil's eighth Eclogue—in the verses in which the forsaken and longing Thessalian girl plies song and spell to recall to her dear the Daphnis who has strayed away and who comes at the last—a lover again. It is a part only of the Eclogue, the second of the two contrasting love songs sung by the rival shepherds, while the very beasts of the field raised their heads to hear, elate. In no respect, however, has Mr. Loeffler followed the form, the manner or the details of Virgil. The song of the shepherds and of the Latin poet has sketched for him an imaginative episode, the suggestions of which in underlying moods, immediate and changeable feeling and pervasive atmosphere he has cast, as his own fancy responded to them, in the form and the voice of the "tone-poem" of ultra-modern music. The Eclogues of Virgil are highly artificial, delicately polished, subtly mannered poetical miniatures. They affect a simplicity of feeling that is really the sum and the fruit of a super-refined artistry, masking itself in its perfections. They are the verse of the world which was a pure and living thing to Puvis de Chavannes in some of his decorations, but that to Virgil and Theocritus was only the beautifully artificial setting of a beautifully artificial poetic exercise.

Now it is easy to fancy a tone-poem that might seek in form, matter and manner the miniature and polished perfections, the grace of artifice, the naïveté of mood of the classic eclogue. It is a plausible suspicion that Mr. Loeffler had such a poem in mind when he first designed his piece as chamber music for a little band of a dozen instruments. Gradually, it is as plausible to infer, his imagination transformed the suggestions of Virgil's verse into the larger inspiration of a poem in tones unfettered by any thought of the form and manner of the classical eclogue. The recalling spells of Virgil's verse, the grave enchantments, the passion of longing that sped them, the passion of elation that fulfillment brought, had swelled in Mr. Loeffler's imagination seemingly beyond any attempt to write in turn an eclogue in tones. Perforce he must seek the freedom and vividness of the full-throated tone-poem. Virgilian in its piteousness is the song of the English Horn in a "Pagan Poem." The tears of things are as truly and searchingly in it as they are in the Latin verse. In all else, as it seemed at a single hearing, the emotional, pictorial and poetic qualities of the piece are as truly Mr. Loeffler's own as the purely musical traits. He has made but little use of the haunting refrain of the shepherd's song; he has in no wise imitated its formal divisions; and the detail of the dog barking to welcome the returning lover is the only direct translation to which Mr.

Loeffler owns or that the music at once suggests.

The polished artifice of the classical eclogue, tempting as it seems as a musical feat, was then impossible to the intensity of imagination and expression that fifty lines of Virgil's verse had stirred in Mr. Loeffler. No more perhaps, were some of his old methods and characteristics possible to it. Much of his music hitherto has lacked body. It has been of an exceeding fineness, subtlety, and poignancy. It has been sublimated music, taking shape and spirit from a world of its own and luring the hearer into it. Large emotional quality has been wanting. It has had a certain un-human quality. Mr. Loeffler has cultivated the creeping felicities of the remote and the uncanny for their own sake. As it seems to us, though perhaps mistakenly, it is the larger voice, the fuller intensity, the warmer human quality that distinguishes a "Pagan Poem" from all of Mr. Loeffler's music that has preceded it and that may make it highly significant in his career. There was dramatic quality indeed in his "Death of Tintagiles," but it was the dramatic potency of the weird, remote, disembodied Maeterlinckian world of phantoms.

The dramatic quality of a "Pagan Poem," on the other hand, seems intensely human. A passion of longing cries in the music; the enchantments shall work their spell by the passion of desire that is kindling them more than by the sorceress's fires; a passion of exultant possession crowns them at the end. The yearning and the joy have a vital quality that is new to Mr. Loeffler's shadowy music of vision. He touches actual homeliness in the barking dog. Even the sluggishly imaginative listener may hear the music of the spells in a "Pagan Poem." It does not spare Mr. Loeffler's familiar command of uncanny suggestion in tones. The voice of magic is in it, but the voice walls and wails with the intensity of the human desire that in the Thessalian girl was feeding the sorceress's enchantments. The magic is human, vital, not macabre fancy. More: in the very summoning of atmosphere with which a "Pagan Poem" begins, Mr. Loeffler leads his hearers into no world of mist, shadows and phantoms. Sunless it is and gray and cold, for Daphnis, the lover, is gone out of it. Sick of desire is she that dwells in it, for Daphnis comes not. Grave are the spells that shall bring him again. Anxious is the foreboding. But it is still a human world that presently shall stir with the joy of his step. For this new passion, and new humanity, Mr. Loeffler seeks again, as it seemed to us, a larger, intenser and vividder utterance than he has ever sought before. His melodies have a substance that heightens their intensity; fuller-voiced but no less significant is the development of them; his rhythms have a new propulsive power; richer and warmer, but no less felicitous and imaginative, is the instrumental coloring. Hitherto Mr. Loeffler's music has had the voice of a kind of poetic magic. There was a subtle spell in it. The music is poetic still, but now the voice is human and of clear passion.

These new qualities open wide the future of Mr. Loeffler. They are the broadening, the ripening toward the opera that he is eager to undertake. They are the audible and assuring token that he may now achieve it. He has spoken at last with the deep and full note of human passion, with the clear voice of dramatic intensity. That voice is the more potent, that future seems the more believable, because in him is a quality that is rare among the tone-poets of our time, and that some of the younger and more restless of them are prone to neglect. The listener may hear a "Pagan Poem," if he will, as so much "absolute" music. He may know nothing of Virgil's verse. He may be perversely deaf to all the passionate or magical suggestion of the piece, to all the dramatic illusion of it. He may test it by no more than symphonic tests, and he will find it no music of fragmentary and comparatively unrelated phrases, insignificant without the detailed suggestion of a programme, no music of ragged and straying polyphony, or of surface without frame and flesh. He will find it, rather, as closely knit, in all its transformations, as ordered in its structure and progress, as truly symphonic in every respect as though Mr. Loeffler had called it no more than a "Fantasia" and set no verses from Virgil on the fly-leaf of his score. Yet this music, answering all these symphonic tests, has in equal degree every expressive, poetic, delineative and dramatic quality that Mr. Loeffler seemingly would impart to it. It has them the more because by this very symphonic quality he is respectful of form and structure, of orderly progress, of the inherent nature of music and of its limitations on its expressive side. Mr. Loeffler does not wrench or shatter music to his purposes. He moulds it and persuades it to them with a patience and a pains and an ultimate achievement that have the quality of genius in them.

H. T. P.

Symphony Audiences

As the Observer of the Back Row Sees and Studies Them

BY JOHN W. HERBERT

DURING the Symphony season the leader of the orchestra, and the orchestra, get a deal of public advice from the reviewers and the musically inclined, as well as much private criticism from the audience. Now it seems to me that "turn about is fair play," and that the audience ought to get some of the public advice, as well as the private criticism. I am taking this duty upon myself—not from the musician's standpoint, for I am not one, but from the point of the observer who keeps his eyes and ears open, and his other senses keen. Personal criticism and advice is not a gracious task; I will, as all censors do, say: "I am sorry to have to say these things, but you know it is for 'your own good.'

Let me begin in the regular way, too, by a compliment—the Symphony Audience is the best behaved audience that I have ever seen. It is quiet (the sneering say "somnolent"), good looking, well dressed, polite, dignified (again some say "frozen"), well mannered, and it does not "buzz" during the performance. It is prompt. This, however, is unquestionably because it cannot get in till the first pause in the programme. I say unquestionably, because this audience is composed of the very people who come late to the fashionable theatres (if there are such in Boston) and disturb all first acts. The Friday afternoon audience has, or has had in the past (I believe it is amended this year), the so-called selfish habit of keeping on its hats and obstructing the view of the stage. Just why anyone should want to see the stage I cannot understand. It seems to me that it would be far preferable if the stage, at all concerts, were concealed from view. Certainly there is nothing attractive in the sight of the fiddling and blowing orchestra, nor in the movements of most conductors. Some people do agree with me in this (despite its general heresy), but they say "when there is a soloist, surely you want to see?" I differ. In a small hall, where one can really see, it is a pleasure to watch the hands of a pianist, or the movements of a violinist; but in a big hall, seven-eighths of the audience can only see shapes and movements which might be those of wooden automata. And when there is a "singing woman"? Heaven forbid! Then, of all times, is the time not to see. I always feel a profound pity (a shocking waste of the sentiment), for women who have to stand elevated four feet above the audience, alone, with nothing to "hold on to," no way of knowing that their dress "hangs right" (as a matter of fact it usually "kites up" in front), and go through the excessively ugly facial contortions necessary to produce sound enough to fill a large hall. But to return to the Friday "selfishness" of keeping on the hats. It really is not selfish, because for years it has been proved that the very great majority prefer it this way—and the greatest good for the greatest number is an axiom. Many women buy successive hats for this very purpose, and the women who do not care for millinery are so unappreciable, and there are so few men on Fridays, that it seems foolish to insist on the selfishness of this habit—it certainly does not interfere with the hearing of the music.

However, as I seldom go to the afternoon concerts, my observations are not directly made from that audience. The worst general habit that I notice in the evening is the preparations for departure before the concert is over—the very distinct interference with the last minutes, often the most beautiful, of the last piece. My seat is of the raised ones at the back of the floor, so that I have a complete view, and can see the backs of the heads of even those in the front row. There is, when the audience thinks it gets trail of the end, a perceptible swaying and bending, a fluttering and rattling. This general movement and sound is caused by reaching for coats and hats, the scraping of canes, umbrellas and rubbers, the folding of programmes, the raising of arms and the pinning on of hats. This last operation is a weekly joy to me. I suppose women know how funny it is, but as it has to be done they don't mind—any more than men mind their absurd contortions in getting into their coats, and getting them off, when the inner coat often comes halfway, too. But it is funny, the feeling for the old holes, the jabbing for the right bit of hair, the avoidance of combs and pins. When there are from two to six pins to be placed rightly, an infinity of combs to be avoided, and the fact that there is a sensitive scalp somewhere inside, it is not to be wondered that it is a somewhat long and complicated operation. When we are so nearly an ideal audience, why not really be it? Five minutes can make no difference to most of us, especially as the concerts are usually over by ten, and always ought to be; as was proved by the first one this autumn, when nearly everyone was asleep, and got fooled, too; for as a rule we did not know when the concert was over and omitted the premature getting ready. This joke happens more or less frequently, and it always seems to me 'one on' a musical audience."

As to being "somnolent," I think this is an unkind accusation. This perfect "quietude" is the effect of music on many people, and a sign of deep, if not keen, enjoyment. Of course, occasionally you see some one visibly, even audibly, asleep, but it is infrequent—the closed eye is by no means a sign of slumber, some of us "feel" more that way. It is pleasanter to see an alert looking lot of people; and I can't help feeling that when the audience "sits up and takes notice," as it does during Wagner's and Tschalkovski's music, and in some of the "modern" pieces, it is having a better time than during the eighteenth century classics of Bach and others; at any rate, it would be more evident, to "an inhabitant of Mars," or to some New Yorkers.

Some critics object to the promenading during the intermissions, and this seems to me foolish carping. It is a great relief to get up and "stretch your legs," and I don't see any theoretical objections. But I do wish we did it a little better—that is, a little more unconsciously, a little more as if we were used to it. Of course, Boston is not much used to it—it is not done at the theatres, hardly at the opera (even when we have one), and it is more or less new even at the Symphony Concerts. The men naturally do it better than the women, as they are accustomed to it elsewhere, and they have not so many clothes to think of—though many of them do have the appearance of being terribly “dressed up”—as if they would show their friends that they had “just come from a dinner.” When men look this way (it’s not describable, but it’s visible), one fancies a hasty change before the concert; but you never can tell. Let’s be fair—only it’s unfortunate to look this way. At least, the “young man” with “retroussé” trousers, green stockings and bowy low shoes are always a joy.

The women! Well, it may sound unkind, but a large part of them do have the very decided appearance of trying to be unembarrassed, of appearing unconscious; while all the time it is evident that they are frightfully conscious of their clothes, their escorts (to whom they are visibly not listening, though making a brave effort), and of all their unusual surroundings. In other words, the whole atmosphere of the promenade is “provincial,” as a New York woman said to me. At the time, I felt hurt at her tone, and replied that Boston did not pretend to be cosmopolitan. She answered, “Then why try? If they can’t walk round here without thinking that everyone is looking at them, and showing it so plainly, why don’t they sit down and keep quiet, like nice little country girls and boys?” I began to argue, when we saw ahead of us a thickening of the crowd, a sort of standing round in a circle, as if something had happened. When we got nearer we found the ring (it was a pretty well-defined ring) was formed at a decent distance about certain familiar figures in the life of the hour—who happened to be quietly talking to each other.

A few words as to more personal individual things now

“may be applied,
And take them kindly though they touch your pride.”

Remember, when you get ready to go to the concert, that usually people sit behind you; and that they have little else to look at but the backs immediately in front of them. For men, this does not mean much save a clean collar, clean in the back as well as the front, that the tie should be fastened down, and the coat collar and shoulders well brushed—if the clothes fit well, so much the better. But with a woman—what a difference! Her hair is like the capstone of the pyramid, without which all the rest is as nought. To begin with a compliment again—this hair is, as a rule, carefully ordered. Another compliment—I marvel every Saturday night at the amount of time and care expended on the heads in front of me; how well some of the hair is kept in place without visible fastenings; and how well, in other cases, the small amount of hair keeps in place the number of combs and pins with which it is “adorned.” On one head last Saturday I counted seven combs and two ornamental pins, besides countless “invisible” ones. The study of combs, their number, variety, changeableness, style, value and the like, is recommended to the bored. It has saved me from extinction many a time. Hair, too, is a study, and years of careful observation and calculation tell me that two-thirds of the men have conspicuous bald spots—it is really funny to note these semi-luminous discs glowing in rows down the hall; that half the women have dark hair; half the other half, middle colored; half that other half, very light or gray; while the remaining half of that half is divided between noticeably black hair and red hair—and there are a few splendid examples of the gorgeous flaming and the shining golden. Getting these statistics has also saved me many a bad quarter of an hour.

Now as to the women’s neck arrangements—there’s the rub. Most curiously, since these arrangements are purposely elaborate, they are not, as a rule, exactly neat, nor carefully arranged. Of this I have to judge by my immediate neighbor, but I fancy they are a fair sample. Out of the twenty necks near enough for me to see details only five habitually show real perfection of detail. Five I should call slovenly, and the other ten “so-so.” Most of the “chokers” are pinned with two pins—these are seldom in the middle, and almost never directly over the other. A part of the crossed end usually sticks out below the pins, and gives the impression of a rag. It is often frayed, too; and alas! sometimes it is not so fresh on the edges as it might be, as it was once. Another thing, when necklaces and beads are worn, how seldom they join neatly in the back; if they hang all right in the mirror, it seems to be all that most women consider necessary. But to the “behind” observer they seem slovenly. And here, by the way, is a problem—how much nearer women are to barbarism than men. So many women might just have traded with the early African and South Sea explorers, judging by the strings of beads with which they deck themselves! Not real jewels, but just plain beads—or earrings.

And the moral. Let’s all of us, men and women, remember certain little things which count—when people sit behind us.

SYMPHONY GIVES SIXTH CONCERT

Herald — Nov 4, 07
First Performance of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" by Boston Orchestra.

WORK MASTERPIECE OF SONORITY AND FANCY

Illustration of Virgil's Eighth
Eclogue—Remarkable Composition.

BY PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The King of Ys".....Lalo
"Pagan Poem" (after Virgil).....Loeffler Adagio and scherzo finale from suite in E minor.....Reznicek
"Espana".....Chabrier

The concert was one of unusual interest. The passionate and brilliant overture and the dazzling and enchanting rhapsody by Chabrier are well known here, but they are always heard with delight. Both Lalo and Chabrier were composers of striking originality and indisputable talent. The former in face of all sorts of disappointments clung to his ideals. Although Berlioz and Liszt and Wagner had gone before him, he imagined new schemes of orchestration and the gorgeous raiment covered a firm, glowing, palpitating body. It has been said of Chabrier that his "bad taste was exquisite," and this is a clumsy translation of a fine and searching criticism in the original French.

Chabrier was by nature a Pantagruellian. At times in his music he was positively Rabelaisian, as in his "Marche Joyeuse"—Would that Dr. Muck would see fit to perform it here! But in "Gwendoline" he sounded the true note of passion, and in the unfinished "Briseis" he showed again both passionate eloquence and the imagination that reproduces scene and atmosphere with the characters themselves. Some one in New York recently alluded to Chabrier's "Espana" as an elaboration of a waltz by Waldteufel. The remark was absurd. There were the Spanish dance themes, and Chabrier and the waltz-maker used them, each in his own way. The "Espana" of Chabrier is a miracle of color, languor, sensuousness, verve. The workmanship alone shows incredible dexterity.

Although Reznicek's suite was published nearly 25 years ago, the excerpts were played here for the first time. Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was performed for the first time.

The Herald described at length last Sunday the nature of Mr. Loeffler's latest work. It was suggested by the verses in Virgil's eighth eclogue, the verses in which a woman by magic spells and incantations wins back to her arms her lover. An eclogue moved the Frenchman Rabaud to an orchestral work, but it was the first, and the music is appropriately pastoral.

They that are acquainted with Mr. Loeffler's preceding compositions and know the man himself will readily see how the mystery of the incantation, the twining of triple hued threads, the melting of the wax image, the thought of the moon brought down from heaven, and the cold snake burst asunder by witch-singing, of Moeris, the were-wolf, of the ashes thrown into the brook—how these things would appeal to him irresistibly; how the refrain of the amorous sorceress would tempt him to strains that, once heard, would haunt the hearer forever.

In Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" there is, however, no minutiae of macabre. There is no laborious and futile endeavor to suggest by tones and their combinations each strange act and stranger speech of the enchantress. That there should be a refrain was poetically necessary. This of itself might give unity and cohesion and furnish a dramatic climax. The composer himself has said modestly that in one passage the hearer might be reminded of the chase after Moeris who had turned wolf and plunged into the forest, and he might also in another passage remember the barking of Hylax as Daphnis neared the threshold. But with the exception of one chief theme, that of invocation, and of the refrain, there are no typical motives; the themes have only musical significance and the hearer acquainted with Virgil's verses is left to his own interpretation.

Now is there need of "interpretation." This music does not depend at all on literary contents. It is music that of itself is nobly sensuous, keenly emotional, now dolorous in grief, now irresistible in exultation.

Remarkable Work.

In general conception, in breadth and stability of structure, in the inherent beauty and poignancy of the melodic thought, in harmonic and contrapuntal euphony, in sonorous symphonic treatment of the theme, in original and highly poetic orchestral expression, in an imaginative flight that rises far above fantasticality, in the fundamental and abiding qualities that turn what would otherwise be temporarily engrossing into that which survives the passing years, the "Pagan Poem" is not only Mr. Loeffler's masterpiece, it is a work that is remarkable without the limiting thought of period or country.

In no one of his preceding works has Mr. Loeffler shown such mastery of sonorous and expressive counterpoint. Fantastic, beautiful, thrilling, as they were and now are, they fall below the "Pagan Poem" in human adpeal and in splendor of sonority. There need be no curious prying into the "meaning" of this or that page. There is the compelling song of an amorous woman, a song of love, lamentation, entreaty, a song of despair and frenzied rejoicing.

Never before has Mr. Loeffler found such broad and flowing melodies to voice the emotions of a musical character, melodies that ravish the ear and touch the heart. These melodies or sections of them are combined with the utmost skill, with a finesse that removes all thought of deliberate contrivance and gives the impression of inevitableness. It would be a grateful task to particularize some of the enchanting combinations of timbres, but this task must be deferred. The effect of the composition on an audience might be increased if at the very end the few final and orthodox measures were to be cut out and the close made with the furious fanfares of delirious joy.

Dr. Muck, who had given sympathetic and untiring attention to the rehearsal of the work, conducted with even more than his customary fire and poetic feeling, as though inspired with personal devotion to the composer, and the performance of the orchestra, as in the other pieces, was one of uncommon brilliance. Mr. Gebhard played the difficult piano part in a masterly manner, masterly in all respects. His tone was of beautiful quality, his bravura was clear and polished, his grasp of his duties in ensemble was firm, and his musical conception was one of true imagination. Nor should the wondrous playing of the English horn by Mr. Longy, nor the deeds of the three trumpeters be forgotten. The "Pagan Poem" made a deep impression; there was hearty applause for Dr. Muck and the orchestra; Mr. Loeffler was called on more than once to bow in acknowledgment.

There was also warm applause after Lalo's overture, in which Mr. Warnke played fervently the cello solo. The movements by Reznicek suffered by being placed between the music of Loeffler and that of Chabrier. The Adagio is commonplace in sentiment. The Scherzo finale is ingeniously made, and it shows the hand of a practised musician, but, coming after the "Pagan Poem," it recalled the speech of Armado: "The words of Mercury are harsh after the songs of Apollo."

Sixth Symphony Program.

Two novelties were on last week's Symphony program. Charles Martin Loeffler's newly orchestrated "Pagan Poem" and an excerpt from Emil von Reznicek's E minor symphonic suite. The opening number was Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Is," and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody completing the list. Mr. Loeffler's work is based upon some verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil and was originally arranged for piano and small orchestra. Subsequently it was rearranged and still later Mr. Loeffler elaborated his first scheme, and in its larger form it was given its first performance under Dr. Muck's direction at the sixth Symphony rehearsal. Mr. Loeffler's musicianly skill has been shown so frequently in such a wide range of compositions that he is always sure of an audience friendly as well as critical.

Although there may be some difference of opinion about his musical treatment of his various ideas there is no question about his great skill in orchestration, originality in material and its development and in imparting his message in an effective manner. Perhaps not readily understood by the majority; but to the expert and serious student Mr. Loeffler's latest work must make a strong appeal. In weaving the musical love spell of Virgil's heroine Mr. Loeffler offers a fantasy and not a literal illustration of the verses. The appeal of Simaetha to regain the love of Delph's is made the chief theme, and this, with the lesser motifs, intermittent, is manipulated in the instrumentation in many and strange forms and modulations.

A skilful use is made of the invisible trumpets in giving out the music of the sorceress, and through all the piece the piano is used as a portion of the orchestra and not as a solo instrument. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, who played the long piano part without using a score, is to be commended for an admirable performance, and notably so because of having memorized the composition. The form of the work is so irregular that it is difficult to describe, except in a general way. It is a striking example of utilizing the modern orchestra for suggesting tone pictures at once mystical and passionate, and in these respects Mr. Loeffler has again displayed his fine abilities as one of the foremost of our young composers who disdains the trivial in music. A sympathetic interpretation was in order by Mr. Loeffler's old associates, and at the close of the poem Mr. Gebhard and Mr. Loeffler were vehemently applauded and the author bowed his acknowledgments from his seat in the hall.

The adagio and scherzo by Reznicek contains some delightful contrasted motifs in the first part for the cellos, soft and flowing, followed by the violins and woodwinds in strenuous unity. The elaboration of material is in excellent style and in the scherzo there is considerable ingenuity shown in some rhythms which have a peculiar swing. The excerpts are pleasing and they were played smoothly, although the weather conditions bothered the lighter string choirs frequently during the whole program.

Lalo's overture was given with all needed vigor and solemnity, and as this and the two following numbers were in the vein that supplies musical food for thought the merry rhapsody, "Espana," with its brilliant, jingling and vivacious dance measures, seemed to go with unusual dash and verve. 'Twas played charmingly and came as a pleasing contrast to the more decorous and substantial compositions.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist this week, will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espanole," for violin. Ernest Boehe's tone poem, "Taormina," will be given for the first time here, and the program will close with Beethoven's second symphony.

Symphony Plays a Boston Work

"A Pagan Poem," by Charles M. Loeffler, Is Received With Marked Favor.

Interest in Saturday's night's Symphony concert centered in the new work of Boston's most famous composer, Charles Martin Loeffler, whose offering, a composition for orchestra and piano, proved to be dazzlingly brilliant. Of its brilliancy there can be no question. Its mere conception was a brilliant feat of imagination. So, too, was the development of the composer's fantastic ideas. Not less brilliant than the piece itself was the performance by Heinrich Gebhard, the pianist, and the orchestra.

But the result of all this carnival of brilliance was that half the people in the hall were dazzled. They saw and heard—and the glare and glare were too much for them.

The piece, which is called "A Pagan Poem," is a fantasy suggested or inspired by some lines in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil—the lines telling about the sorceress who by magical rites draws back to her from the city an errant lover. The verses bestirred Mr. Loeffler to execute a remarkable flight of fancy. It might be called a polyphonic nightmare but for the dramatic moments in which the invisible trumpets take up the refrain, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home," ending at last in the fanfare performed by the trumpets on the stage—the sorceress' outburst of exultation, "Forbear: from the city—forbear now, my songs—Daphnis comes." Dr. Muck and Mr. Gebhard threw all their spirit and energy into the performance, and, so to speak, burnished the brilliancy. Mr. Gebhard was recalled several times, and finally Mr. Loeffler had to rise twice from his seat in the middle of the floor. Mr. Longy might well have risen also, for his playing of the theme given the English horn was beautiful.

Another work performed for the first time was Reznicek's Adagio and Scherzo-Finale from his symphonic suite in E minor. This novelty seemed trite and conventional alongside the Loeffler piece, yet if it lacked luster to make the majority blink, it offered songs that charmed the ear. The other numbers were Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody. In the former Mr. Warnke gave exquisite pleasure by his performance of the cello theme.

Novelties are common this season. Another, Boehe's tone poem "Taormina," leads this week's program. The Symphony will be Beethoven's second. Mr. Kreisler, the admirable violinist, will be the soloist, and he has chosen to play Lalo's "Symphonie Espanole."

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A SECOND HEARING OF "A PAGAN POEM"

Mr. Loeffler's New Piece at the Symphony Concert of Saturday—The Rest of the Programme—A Conversation Overheard—

Mr. Loeffler's new tone-poem, though the performance of it had not quite the insistent passion of that of Friday, was as warmly received at the Symphony Concert of Saturday night. The audience listened with the alert and rapt stillness that is the finest proof of response, and at the end the applause—even to cries for the composer—was the heartiest a new piece has won here in many a day. At a first hearing the commanding and poignant intensity, the ardent musical and dramatic progress of the whole and the irresistible emotional response to both swept all other impressions before them. They were as puissant at a second hearing, but through them the listener caught in glimpses, as it were, some of the minuter qualities of "A Pagan Poem." Then, for example, it was possible to catch the adroit and imaginative adjustment of the piano part to the whole orchestral fabric, and the more close and suggestive for the new variety of touch and fluidity of tone that Mr. Gebhard brought to the playing of it. Akin were the variety, subtlety, individuality and imaginative significance of the harmonic and the instrumental coloring. Yet these were never finical or labored, forced or obtrusive. They were a part of the large intensity and sonority of the whole—the means to them. More than was possible at the first hearing, the ardor, each in its kind, of the melodies and the controlled passion of invention and of feeling in the play of them thrilled the ear and the fancy. In them, and in the theme of invocation in particular, spoke a new poignancy. More clearly, too, the listeners heard the music of the spells—music of incantation, indeed, but of incantation vital with the passion of the longing enchantress, while the hidden trumpets were verily the voice of the refrain in the heart as well as in the song of the sorceress. And was it mere vagrant fancy to catch in them the Virgilian fall and pathos of

"Ducite ab urbe domum, mea carmina, ducite Daphnim" even though the final trumpet cry of elation for

"Parcite, ab urbe venit, jam parcite, carmina, Daphnis" swells the intensity of the Latin verse a hundred fold. Best of all, the noting of these and many another detail lessened not a whit the large and deep impressions of whole. In "A Pagan Poem" Mr. Loeffler has emerged from the writing of macabre miniatures. He is now a tone-poet of passion and of power, full-voiced at last. The promise and the achievement of "The Death of Tintagiles are fulfilled." The future opens for him—and for us who listen and answer—thrillingly.

Lalo's overture to "The King of Ys"—the overture that bids fair to survive long the opera that it introduces—began the concert. It was played with the clear sense of dramatic significance in its several episodes, with the practised instinct for musical contrast, with the whetting of mind and feeling for the drama that is to come that Dr. Muck—operatic conductor again and perhaps a little longingly—brings to such pieces. In the tone of the orchestra were the sombre coloring and the grim voice of the music, and in the brooding song of the 'cello was a poignancy of expression new in Mr. Warnke's playing. At the end of the concert came the repetition, asked time and again since its success of surprise last April, of Chabrier's blazing, beating frenzy of Spanish dance-tunes, drunk with themselves, "Espana," and audience and players shared the intoxication. Between—the one bare place in the concert—stood the adagio and scherzo-finale of a suite twenty years old by Reznicek, the Germanized Pole. It is the sort of music that is made in the piece in Germany nowadays by any composer who happens to have had training and who cultivate diligence, and then cut into assorted lengths for performance. Dr. Muck cut off two of them and left the listener to wonder whether the third in this particular suite was still more commonplace—the undistinguished prose of music. Reznicek has bidden his orchestra play with "great fire and energy," and it did, but out of the fire came only smoke. Dr. Muck, except with "A Pagan Poem," has not been fortunate with his new pieces this year. The harvest is small, apparently, though the laborers are many.

H. T. P.

At the Symphony Rehearsal

The "rush" audience had settled into the chairs in the second balcony. In the calm that ensued a voice behind me exclaimed:

"My! but I was afraid you could never get here in time, George. You told me I must give the man down at the door a quarter. I did n't have a quarter, and had to go to the store to buy something to get one. This was the cheapest thing I could find. Cute, ain't it?"

"Yes, Minnie, I did n't leave the factory till quarter-past one. We have good seats, though."

"Yes, George. Why, isn't it funny no one's gone in down-stairs?"

"Oh, those are the reserved seats—season tickets you know."

"Oh! Do they come any cheaper by getting a season ticket?"

"No, Minnie; those are the tickets they sell at auction, you know, early in the fall and cost so much."

"George, are these statues all 'round here to represent old musicians?"

"No, Minnie, they are mostly Greek—that one is Apollo. You've heard of Apollo?"

"Ye-es!"

"You see the piano, Minnie? Well, when they play a concerto they push the piano into the middle of the stage. Mr. Gebhard plays the piano part today, but it is n't a solo part. Kreisler, the violinist, plays next week."

"George, how can the audience hear him? I should think the orchestra would drown him."

"Why, no! He plays a solo part—different from the rest."

"Oh! there they come, George! Is that big thing a 'shell-o'?"

"Oh, no! That is a double-bass."

"My! but that must be tiresome business—standing up to play that thing! What's the difference between a first and a second violin?"

"No difference in the instrument; only in the part each plays."

At the end of "A Pagan Poem" Minnie burst forth again.

"That feller can play the piano by himself best, I guess. Why! What's everybody getting up and clapping for?"

A kind young woman turned around and told George that the audience had discovered Mr. Loeffler in the middle aisle.

"Look, Minnie, there he is!"

"Who? What's the fuss anyway?"

"Why, Minnie, it's Mr. 'Loeffler,' the man who wrote the piece they just played."

"My sakes, George! I did n't know anyone here wrote music like that piece."

"Where is your programme?"

"That book? Why, that's the programme for the whole season, ain't it? I thought you said there were only three or four numbers. I've been through the book from beginning to end and I can't find a thing about today."

When the concert came to an end with Chabrier's gorgeous "Espana," Minnie commented, "That was real lively. Say, George, when will you come home?"

"Don't wait supper for me, Minnie, I've got to go back to the factory and stay till 7.30."

"Oh, I could n't wait till then; I'm awful hungry. I haven't had a thing since breakfast George, but a piece of pie!"

SYMPHONY-KREISLER

Evening Tickets, Balcony, For Sale or Rent.
HARDING, 70 Kilby Street.

MW(A): n 25

Symphony Rehearsal Ticket

rear of hall floor; good seat. Address E.T.P.
Boston Transcript. (A):

MUSICAL MATTERS

Paderewski, Soloist at Symphony Concert.

The fifth Symphony program was of unusual interest, for Paderewski was the soloist, there was a "first time" number and, contrary to custom at these concerts, an encore added to the announced selections. The audience was so demonstrative and insistent at the close of the Rubinstein piano concerto that Paderewski, after returning to the stage many times to bow, seated himself at the instrument and proceeded to upset established rules. And after playing a Liszt-Schubert piece the audience attempted to make him play again. The applause was not stilled until the orchestra came back for the last selection. At the rehearsal the crowd began to gather at 8 o'clock in the morning, and when the doors were opened at 1 o'clock only about half the line could gain admission to the second balcony, 500 seats.

The great D minor concerto as played by the masterly pianist fairly dwarfed the other pieces, which were Hans Pfitzner's overture, "Das Christ-Elflein," and Brahms' second symphony. Paderewski's performance was wonderfully expressive and executed with an enthusiasm and impetuosity that was so dazzling that the delighted auditors fairly showered him with plaudits.

Paderewski's mastery of the piano is so fully recognized and he has so recently displayed his genius at a recital in the same hall that it is needless to analyze or go into detail about his playing with the Symphony orchestra. In the fiery cadenzas and octave runs of the first movement his power and rapidity of execution seemed almost limitless; the romance in F major and the intricacies of the bewildering arpeggios of the second part were exquisite in their treatment, the first because of the delicacy and beautiful cantabile qualities, the second for its brilliancy and crispness.

The last movement was given with a vigor and dash that was astonishing. There were no retards in the immensely difficult double runs, all the figures in the different passage work were cleanly set forth and the overwhelming crash at the close moved the audience to outbursts of applause that demonstrated Paderewski's complete mastery of the big gathering. Then came the scenes mentioned earlier in this notice. The orchestra did noble work, Dr. Muck and his players seeming to enjoy the solo work as much as did the audience. The Pfitzner overture is a gentle and soothing work, without any special characteristics to warrant eulogy. Skillfully orchestrated and played in a sympathetic manner by competent musicians, it made a pleasing impression. The second symphony by Brahms, which has long been a subject of controversy in the musical world, was interpreted in the way that is expected from our orchestra conductor, Muck's reading being potently illustrated by the players.

There will be two novelties on this week's program. The first is the latest work by Charles Martin Loeffler. It is written for piano and full orchestra, and is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Mr. Loeffler, who got his inspiration for this from Virgil's eighth eclogue, made the first sketch of the work seven or eight years ago. Later he wrote it for two pianos, in which form it was once played at Mrs. Gardner's. Since then he has made many important changes in it, and developed it for the orchestra. Mr. Gebhard will be at the piano.

The other novelty is an "Adagio and Scherzo-Finale" by Reznicek, who is best known in Boston as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana," the overture of which has been played at our symphony concert. The first number will be Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and the final number Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

SYMPHONY IN GOTHAM.

NEW YORK, Dec. 5.—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert here tonight, during which Paderewski played the "Emperor" piano concerto of Beethoven and the "Genoveva" overture of Schumann. After the performance Dr. Muck was called out half a dozen times.

Here in Boston Sept. 6, 1907

Next week Dr. Muck leaves the little Austrian village of Dobelbad, where he has spent the summer, and goes to Berlin to complete his preparations for his return to Boston at the end of the month. Meanwhile he has been quite as busy as most of us care to be on a holiday with the choice of the new players that are to join the Symphony Orchestra, and with the scrutiny of new music and the study of old.

So far as arrangements have yet gone, these newcomers will be Karl Wendling, who replaces Mr. Hess as concert-master during the latter's year of absence; Julius Thornberg of Copenhagen, who succeeds Mr. Adamowski; J. Theodorowicz, for some years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, who returns to the orchestra to take Mr. Moldauer's vacant place in the first violins; a viola player to succeed Mr. Zach, who becomes a conductor at St. Louis; a bass clarinetist to repair the loss of the late Mr. Frietsche; a new bassoon player; a new tuba player; and two additional horn players to raise that choir from six to eight voices. There is no hint, as yet, in the announcements from the orchestra of the additional harp that it needs as much as the new horns. It is quite true that most European orchestras of its class have eight horns. They also have regularly two harps.

PHOTOGRAPH COPYRIGHT 1905, BY AIME DUPONT

FRITZ KREISLER

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BOEHLE,

TONE POEM, "Taormina." op. 9.
(First time in Boston.)

LALO,

SYMPHONIE ESPAGNOLE, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, op. 21.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Scherzando: Allegro molto.
- IV. Andante.
- V. Rondo: Allegro.

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in D major, No. 2. op. 36.

- I. Adagio: Allegro con brio.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro: Trio.
- IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mr. FRITZ KREISLER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

FRITZ KREISLER

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

BOEHLE.

TONÉ FORM, "Taormina," op. 9:
(First time in Boston.)

LALO,

SYMPHONIE ESPAGNOLE, for Violin and Orchestra, op. 21.

- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Scherzando: Allegro molto
- IV. Andante
- V. Rondo: Allegro

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in D major, No. 2, op. 36.

- I. Adagio: Allegro con brio.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro, Trio
- IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mr. FRITZ KREISLER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

MAJOR HIGGINSON PASSES 73 MARK

Hub Financier and Philanthropist Passes Day Attending to Business.

B Journal — Nov 19 1907

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, financier and philanthropist, yesterday reached the age of 73, but the fact that it was his birthday made no difference with him and he passed the day, as usual, attending to his business routine and only stopping for an occasional handshake of congratulation.

Maj. Higginson was born in New York Nov. 18, 1834. He entered Harvard in 1851, but did not complete the course, and soon afterward was employed in the counting house of S. and E. Austin.

Maj. Higginson gave to Harvard the Union, the immense clubhouse which opens its doors to all Harvard men and in which hangs the Sargent portrait of the donor. Soldiers' Field, the greatest athletic field in the country, is another of his gifts, and is dedicated to comrades of Maj. Higginson who fell in the war. He is a fellow of the college. He is chiefly responsible for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is a trustee of the New England Conservatory of Music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BOEHE'S RESOUNDING AND EMPTY "TAORMINA"

A New Tone-Poem by the Young German Composer That Proves Only One More
Exercise—His Ample and Accomplished
Orchestral Technique—And Why "Taormina"?—The Contrasting Early Beethoven—Kreisler, Lalo and the Voice of the Violin

Journal — Nov. 30, 1907
Ernst Boehe is a young German composer, who has not quite rounded his twenty-seventh year. He dwells at Munich; early he chose the composing of music as a career and already he has written four "Episodes" for orchestra, "From the Voyages of Ulysses," a few songs and sundry other pieces. Two years and a half ago Mr. Gericke put one of the "Episodes"—"Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck"—on the programme of a Symphony Concert. So far as the music left any abiding impression, it was that of fluent progressions, large sonorities, and the play of an ample orchestral technique. It was rhetorical music; steadily it "sounded," but unfortunately it was little else than excited sound. However eloquent his voice, Boehe had not much to say with it. All the suggestions of expository "programmatists" could not make his tone-poem delineative. The ear heard; but answering imagination was still. Nor was the music interesting in itself, except as an example of an advanced exercise in ultra-modern orchestral technique by an accomplished and promising student. It was comforting to know that when Boehe found something to say, he had the resources with which he might say it, but there seemed to be no obvious reason why twenty audiences from Dresden as far as Boston should be convoked as witnesses to what a sportsman might call his "preliminary trials."

"Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" went the way of the forgotten, and when Ernst Boehe's name stood again on the programme of the Symphony concert, yesterday afternoon, it was practically new. Apparently he has paid a visit to Taormina, the agreeable winter residence on the eastern shore of Sicily, sought by British matrons of fixed income and habits and by conscientious German tourists. Taormina is a pleasant place; there indeed the idler may idle and invite his soul in the warm Sicilian sun and the soft Sicilian wind, look up at the cone of Etna, snowy without in spite of the smouldering heats within, and laugh with the smiling ripples of the distant sea. There are the grays of the gnarled olives; there the brown and green of Sicilian rocks and hills. Around in endlessly changing eddies flows the placid Sicilian life, or if weariness come of our own time and folk stand for musing, a few varied pillars and a semi-circle of dismantled seats that once were a Roman theatre. The photograph that summarizes all these things is familiar. Every Mediterranean tourist brings it home. It is even on the cover of Boehe's new tone-poem that Dr. Muck and the orchestra played yesterday for a first hearing, probably, on this side of the sea. For life at Taormina or haunting memories of it seemingly stirred Boehe to the writing of music. Of course he wrote a tone-poem, a longish one, "for grand orchestra" even to bells. On the cover he put the title "Taormina," the picture, and the dedication to his "dear wife." If he had a programme, he gives his hearers no hint of it, and they, as Mr. Newman long since said, have the same right to know it as he to imagine it. If it was essential to him, it is also essential to them. Was he setting down in tones the thoughts, feelings, persistent memories or vagrant impressions that the charm and the associations of Taormina stirred in him? Liszt and d'Indy and twenty other composers have made little musical memoranda of their journeyings, and Elgar wrote a whole overture, "In the South," out of a few weeks in an Italian village. Except for title and picture, again Boehe is mute.

Certainly the music itself in a single hearing gives little clew. It contains Gregorian chants that smack more of Ratisbon and German musical scholarship than of Taormina and pagan and unlettered Sicily. There is long-drawn, expressive, songful melody, a little Italian in its cut and pungency. There are pompous climaxes, grave and darkly colored passages, moments of melodic and instrumental agitation and bells echoing against the Gregorian tunes. What does it all signify? Not much more apparently than did "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" of the much enduring Odysseus. Once more does Boehe demonstrate his command of a sure and sumptuous orchestral technique; once more his music mounts in large progressions to scounding climaxes. The climax dissolves into its thematic and instrumental elements and the process begins again. The whole is ultra modern orchestral pomp and fluency of the sort in which youngsters are becoming as practised nowadays as their composing grandfathers were in counterpoint for counterpoint's sake. With the best will in the world, we could hear nothing in the music but an exercise in orchestral rhetoric upon Gregorian and other melodies. The mood, the imaginings, were orchestral and nothing else. The tone-poem suggested no individual Boehe, recorded no discernible impressions or emotions, bade the listener to no response and had no keen interest as so much music. As for Taormina, Boehe might seemingly have called his tone-poem "Sudbury" or "North Weymouth," had he happened to know those places. But when with the ripening of time, he has something to say how eloquently he can say it!

The contrast of the fest of the programme was two-fold; first, in Beethoven's symphony in D major—the symphony of high spirits, as Berlioz or someone else has called it—and, second, in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, with Mr. Kreisler to take the solo part. Beethoven had something to say in his symphony, though it was only his second, and the matter of his musical speech was so interesting that the listener almost forgot the perfect fitness of its manner. Once more Dr. Muck did his familiar work with a classic. He found the underlying melodies; caught their individual and expressive quality, and set his orchestra to the singing of them in its own warmth of tone, roundness of phrase and euphony of balanced voice. Pace, rhythm, shadings, all gave the symphony a new vitality, a new brightness. It wrought its spell of mood, as movement succeeded movement, because the conductor had caught its large and clear significance and spirit and was imposing them through his men upon his hearers. The voice was the full voice of the music. The conductor was content to find it, set it free, give it life. Dr. Muck has done these things many times with other classic symphonies, but it is good to recall them anew. Perhaps in the sum of his work they make a finer achievement than all his dramatizing of operatic overtures and all the passion and power, suggestion and subtlety that he can give to ultra-modern music. And when Beethoven thus finds his true voice in this second symphony the listener hears with the pure joy, now of spirited, now of musing, now of capricious song, with a whole orchestra, as orchestras went in the those days, for the singer. Alas for young Boeche in such richness, energy, gayety or tenderness! Beethoven had something to say; something that spoke in its own clear beauty of matter and of manner, of substance and form, and that commanded response by its own joyous intensity. Nobody groped for clues. Everything spoke for itself.

Of another sort of contrast was Lalo's "symphony" for violin and orchestra as Mr. Kreisler in particular played his part in it. In a sense Lalo had none too much to say in his piece. His melodies are not intrinsically interesting; his handling of them is not remarkable for fine felicity of invention; his Spanish coloring of the music is no more than a deft and sparkling piquancy. But Lalo knew and loved the violin. He had something of the virtuoso's understanding of it and feeling for it. Thus, he could write music to which the voice of his chosen instrument could give an unforeseen beauty and vitality. The "Spanish Symphony" is one thing as it stands on the printed page; another thing as an ordinary violinist plays it; and yet a third as such a violinist as Mr. Kreisler gives it voice and life. Lalo destined it for Sarasate and often has he played it. Yet it seemed no less destined for Mr. Kreisler. In him, as in Lalo, are deep and fine understanding of the violin, intimate sympathy with it, warm passion for it. Like Lalo, Mr. Kreisler would give it perfect and compelling voice. Thus in the performance of yesterday composer and performer, music and instrument seemed blended in a jointless fusion. Steadily the orchestral background and the orchestral decoration enhanced the beauty, poignancy or vivacity of the violin. In that was the reason for their being. Steadily the melodies bade the violin to varied song and that again was now their clear purpose. No less than the voice is the violin capable of the brilliant ornaments of song, and Mr. Kreisler's playing touched those that Lalo had designed for it with a new sparkle. With an exceeding fineness or an exceeding brightness may the tone of the violin undulate or vibrate to subtle or sharp rhythms. Lalo knew the aptitude of the violin for them; they are in his music; and Mr. Kreisler bade them pulse in his tone. Throughout the "Spanish Symphony" awaits the perfect voice, the changeless intensities, the endless suggestion of the violin, and Mr. Kreisler called them forth. The beloved, the idealized instrument had something to say. H. T. P.

The Symphony Concert

Boeche's new tone-poem, "Taormina," when it was repeated at the Symphony concert of Saturday, disclosed one more virtue besides the expert orchestral technique of the young composer. It can glorify the orchestra that plays it. Had it been a newly discovered masterpiece instead of one of the passing "novelties" of a sterile musical year, Dr. Muck and his men could not have lavished more pains upon it. Boeche's music does "sound," and it "sounded" on Saturday with the new, warm and mellow sonority of the brass choir, with the richness of the sustained tone of the strings in the long ascending sweeps in which much of the music moves and with the suave brightness of the woodwind instruments as Mr. Longy and his companions play them. Perhaps thus "Taormina" justified itself. Tireless and almost endless is Boeche's pursuit of swelling sonorities. The music in itself does not always gain them. The orchestra won them for it and drenched the listeners' ears in the flooding opulence of its tone. To be bathed in it was a new sensation that was almost heady. Boeche suggests very little in his piece of the Taormina with which he has labelled it; but the tone of the orchestra did come like a long day's flood of glowing Sicilian sunshine.

Mr. Kreisler was tonic to the orchestra as well, and when it began Beethoven's symphony in D-major, the string choir in particular seemed still under the spell of his playing. The violinist had played in Lalo's Spanish piece with the exquisite fineness, brightness and undulating quality of tone that he can summon and with as exquisite a sense of rhythm. The string choir of the orchestra had given him the dearest applause an artist may gain—that of his comrades of rank in his own profession. Our violinists indeed had almost escorted him from the stage. When they returned to their places they paid him still finer tribute. Through Beethoven's symphony they seemed, as by spontaneous and common impulse, to seek to play like so many Kreislers. Their tone caught the tingling brightness of his; it reflected like his every fine variation of rhythm; it shared the undulating quality that makes his so sensitive to every slightest curve of the music and so significant to the listener's ear and fancy. The violins, the whole string choir were playing with Kreisler-like passion for the voice of the music and the voice of their instrument. Though Beethoven's full-throated allegro and through the long curves of the soft song of the larghetto, their tone was thrilling to hear.

H. T. P.

In the

MUSICAL WORLD

Edited by

OLIN DOWNES

Post-SYMPHONY CONCERT

At the seventh symphony rehearsal and concert Ernst Boeche's tone poem for orchestra, "Taormina," op. 9, was performed for the first time in this country; Fritz Kreisler played the Lalo "Spanish Symphony," and Beethoven's Second Symphony brought the concert to an end.

Boeche is known in this city by his "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," one of a cycle of four orchestral pieces, "The Voyages of Ulysses," which was given last season. The work did not make a profound impression at the time. It was found to be constructed of thin material and to savor not a little of the external characteristic of Richard Strauss and his ilk. But in spite of certain remarks by the gentlemen of the press, Boeche still lives and labors, and he has made, in our opinion, a very decided advance in the later work just performed. Evidently the tone poem is a form that especially appeals to him, a young composer with the blood of the rising generation in his veins. He has prefixed this score, not with a poem or an argument, but with a picture of the town of Taormina in Sicily, "the town," says the programme book, "known to the ancients as Taormenium; the town on the eastern shore and with the superg view of hills and sea and Etna; the town that knew in turn the rule of Dionysius, Carthaginians, Saracens led by Ibrahim-Ibn-Ahmed, Normans, and still later French invaders." Other inscription is there none, and Boeche thus fulfills the true mission of the tone poem and "programme music"—to communicate to the hearer, who may interpret as he will the general, basic impressions and emotions awakened by the contemplation of a subject, whatever that subject may be.

It is a natural thing that a young composer should look up to and be influenced by his more illustrious contemporaries; it is not strange that he should fall into mannerisms that corrupt, into tricks of speech that hinder vital and original expression. There is still the impression, in listening to this music, of a fondness which is not over-refined for orchestral richness and sonority on its own account; of a love for effects, pure and simple, that has not its origin in any very profound source. But the themes are far more potential. They live and have being. The Gregorian harmonies and the more sensuous song that makes its appearance a little later are strikingly contrasted and developed. The conclusion, with the tolling bells and the ecclesiastical strains merging themselves into the deep vibrations; is a truly suggestive moment.

There are pages of rich promise in this tone poem. The composer seems to be finding his own voice and developing a mastery of large proportions. It is a common fallacy that the tone poem offers an avenue of escape to those whose inspiration and constructive abilities fall them in the more rigid frame of the symphony. As a matter of fact, there is no form in which it is so difficult for the composer to master and weld his imagination, to create a durable masterpiece. Boeche appears to have found a congenial medium of expression and to be happily maturing in his workmanship.

There is little new that can be said

NEW TONE POEM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boeche's "Taormina" Proves to Be Swollen Composition Without Significance.

BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE
BY FRITZ KREISLER

Plays Lalo's Spanish Symphony, Displaying Fine Qualities of Artistry.

By PHILIP HALE.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Tone poem, "Taormina".....Boehe
"Spanish" symphony, for violin and orchestra.....Lalo
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

Boehe's "Taormina" was played in Boston for the first time. The composer was already known to us by his symphonic poem, "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," which was brought out here by Mr. Gericke March 3, 1906. When Boehe composed the latter piece he was about 22 years old, and the sumptuous instrumentation excited the admiration of some, who overlooked the thin, anaemic body thus richly dressed and forgot that Frenchmen of the younger generation learn instrumentation in the nursery.

"Taormina" was composed in 1905-06, and it was produced at Essen in the late fall of last year. The score has no printed programme, not even a motto, but there is a picture of the Sicilian town famous for the view. Did Boehe purpose to put into music his thoughts and feelings excited by the view, or had he in mind the past glory of the town when it was possessed successively by Dionysius, Carthaginians, Saracens, Normans and still later French invaders, as Elgar, in his overture, "In the South," expressed both the joy of life under an Italian sky and remembered the pompous splendor of the ancient Roman rule?

Boehe, as other young German composers, needs a monstrous orchestra. Not content with an enlarged wind choir, he calls for all sorts of pulsatile instruments, from tamtam to tambourine, and there must be bells behind the scenes. Much of the tone-poem is an elaboration of Gregorian songs. That which is ecclesiastical is contrasted with worldly emotion. Is the music supposed to portray in tones a day in Taormina, with religious services and processions, with the outdoor life, with gayety and passion? When the composer announces his title, the hearer has a right to expect music that shall suggest to him Sicilian scenes and life.

A tambourine in the orchestra is not enough in answer to this reasonable expectation. It is not necessary for the composer to take his themes from Sicilian folk tunes, to preserve constantly the rhythms of Sicilian dances. The hearer asks, however, that the music be suggestive of Sicily, or at least Italy. He has a right to expect that Boehe should attempt to do what Berlioz, Charpentier, Tchaikowsky, Richard Strauss have done, sojourning and loving Italy, or what Auber, who would not leave the boulevards of Paris, did in his "Muet de Portici," imagining the Neapolitan sun, street life and reckless gayety.

Is there anything of Sicily in Boehe's "Taormina"? Is there anything in it suggestive of southern life and sentiment? As far as suggestion by melody, rhythm, color is concerned, the tone-poem might as well be entitled Dortmund or Schenectady.

This music is neither pictorial nor decorative. It is certainly not emotional. Take the first long section built chiefly on Gregorian song, and what have we. An opening page of music that has an unusual and agreeable sound. The end has also a pleasant sound, and occasionally between the beginning and the end there are passages that are sonorous, but not so much by reason of skilful polyphony and a fine sense in the blend of timbres as by sheer orchestral weight. The motives that are designed to be emotional have little character or individuality. The treatment of them has seldom true effect. When the composer is terribly in earnest, as in the funeral march section, he is least successful. Notes, notes, notes.

Coleridge has said: "There is a nimety—a too-muchness—in all Germans. It is the national fault." How well this remark applies to Boehe, who spins out his thin thoughts and will not dismiss a mood! A swollen piece, this "Taormina," with its huge orchestra which is never eloquent, never impressive, save by mere force of bulk.

Dr. Muck brought out all that there is in it and by his masterly reading exposed the inherent emptiness. The audience applauded warmly.

Mr. Kreisler gave a very brilliant and also sensuous performance of Lalo's delightful "Spanish" symphony. It was a pleasure to hear him again in a work of long and sustained beauty, in the performance of which he was able to show the many admirable qualities of his rare and indisputable artistry. And what a composition it is for the display of the virtuoso and for the interest, the ravishment of the hearer!

The symphony of Beethoven is an answer to those who insist that the inner emotions of a composer must find a vent in the music composed at the time. Never was Beethoven more wretched physically and mentally than when he wrote this symphony, music that breathes forth serenely, beauty, gayety and courage. It is a good thing to hear even the second symphony of Beethoven after a "Taormina." Like the work of Lalo, it reassures the hearer in the belief that music after all is an art, and that a composer may be inspired.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS SEATS

DD. 19, 20, $40 each; Z 24, 25, $50 each; KK 10, 11, $35 each; Balcony G 12, 13, $34 each. Address J.N.F., Boston Transcript. 4t(A) o 23

SATURDAY EVENING SYMPHONY

Concert Seats For Sale—BB 22, 23, $27 each; D 7, 8, $24 each; II 33, 34, $22 each; G 26, 27, 28, $30 each. Address K.L.T., Boston Transcript. 4t(A) o 23

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Evening, Balcony, very desirable; only $20. Address R.N.O., Boston Transcript. MW(A): o 26

TWO TICKETS WANTED for Sat. evening Symphony Concerts. Side seats in first balcony, or on floor not far back of broad aisle. Price for remainder of season not over $25. Address N.K.P., Boston Transcript. (A):

The Discordant Hats Again

To the Editor of the Transcript:

In utter disregard of the following ordinance, "Every licensee shall not, in his place of amusement, allow any person to wear upon the head a covering which obstructs the view of the exhibition or performance in such place of any person seated in any seat therein provided for spectators, it being understood that a low head covering without projections, which does not obstruct the view, may be worn," many women at the Symphony Rehearsals grow more selfishly inconsiderate each year of others' comfort and rights, and it is well within the bounds of truth to state that not less than nineteen hats in twenty break the above law by "obstructing the view of the performance."

Fashion even offers no excuse for this, for women, if they see fit, can wear hats absolutely inoffensive and unobjectionable, and yet obey the dictates of that inexorable and tyrannical mistress Fashion; and if they cannot be unselfish enough to do so, then it is high time that the ordinance be strictly enforced by the other alternative, the compulsory removal of all hats, thereby affording relief to a public which has been long suffering to the limit of its endurance.

ONE OF MANY VICTIMS

Oct. 19.

KREISLER WINS OVATION AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fritz Kreisler, the renowned violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday night. He took part in the performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra. He was warmly applauded after each movement and at the end of the number was recalled half a dozen times. He drew an unusually large audience and he created unusually fervent enthusiasm.

But it could hardly be otherwise in view of the powerful magnetism and charming style of the young artist—he is only 32 years of age, though already one of the great musical performers of the day. Lalo's work was first played at the Symphony concerts just twenty years ago by Mr. Loeffler, now no longer one of the musical practitioners, but the most notable example of the new school of composers. It is a work that gives the soloist a rare opportunity to display his taste as well as his skill, and Mr. Kreisler's interpretation was well-nigh perfect in every respect. However, the orchestra itself wove a spell hardly less magical with its superb performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony. The band played like a mighty virtuoso.

The novelty of the evening was Boehe's Tone Poem "Taormina." The name is that of a town in Sicily, and the music embodies memories of a visit. It has sadness and gaiety, but over all is a religious cast suggestive of the vesper hour. The chime of bells at the end introduced a picturesque element. The piece was spiritedly played. In fact, the fine performance, aside from the merits of the composition itself, deserved the applause that followed.

The orchestra will be out of town this week. Next week's program offers Bizet's Overture, "Patrie," MacDowell's Suite, op. 42, and Hermann Goetz's Symphony in F major. Journal

Seventh Symphony Program.

Boehe's tone poem, "Taormina," began the seventh Symphony program. Fritz Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, followed as soloist in Lalo's charming "Spanish" symphony and Beethoven's noble second symphony was the final number. Kreisler is one of the few great violinists of the present day, and although a specialist in compositions of the 17th and 18th centuries this does not distract his interest from works of more modern writers. In Lalo's symphony there is such a riot of harmonies for the solo instrument, which is almost constantly in evidence, that it requires unusual physical power as well as artistic skill to cope with the long and intricate score. And to every demand Kreisler is able to respond. But four of the five parts were played, the third movement being omitted.

Kreisler's recent appearances here in recitals have shown his complete mastery of the violin. He is equally "at home" with moderns as with the antiques and in his performance of Lalo's work he gave anew a vivid illustration of his wonderful virtuosity. In the higher realms of his art as in the more showy movements he has shown himself to be one of the foremost exemplars of the possibilities of the violin and extended praise now would be but reiteration of an oft told tale.

In the first movement there was dignity and authority shown in the broad and vital tones of the earlier part. Very beautiful were the singing phrases and caprices of the second part and the andante was played with splendid effect, the florid passages showing up brilliantly by reason of Kreisler's dazzling technique. The finale was even more satisfying than the previous movement, for it showed a sustained power and surety in chord fingering and runs that few violinists are able to maintain. The whole performance was one of great beauty in expression, shading, vigor and delicacy. Hearty applause and many recalls to the platform were given him at the close of his work.

The orchestra association in the Lalo symphony was enough to inspire the soloists, for it was ensemble playing of a high and thoroughly sympathetic nature. Boehe's tone poem is a complicated instrumental affair, the work of a composer who evidently strove for odd combinations, dissonants and queer modulations to make up a musical picture which to him, and probably to some other musical experts, has form and lucidity. So far as the performance went, the orchestra did its part skillfully under Dr Muck's guiding hand. A spirited performance of the Beethoven symphony closed the program.

The orchestra will be away this week on its second tour. The program for Dec 13 and 14 will comprise Bizet's overture, "Patrie"; MacDowell's suite, op. 42, and the F major symphony by Hermann Goetz. State Daily

110

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BIZET,

DRAMATIC OVERTURE, "Patrie." C minor, op. 19

MACDOWELL,

SUITE in A minor, op. 42.

I. In a haunted forest.

II. Summer idyl.

III. In October.

IV. Shepherdess' song.

V. Forest spirits.

HERMANN GÖTZ,

SYMPHONY in F major, op. 9.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.

III. Adagio, ma non troppo lento.

IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

A

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

DR. MUCK'S PROGRAMME OF ROMANTIC MUSIC

Bizet's Overture, "Patrie," MacDowell's Forest Suite and Goetz's Forgotten Symphony—The Contrasting Traits of the Three—Mr. de Pachmann's Recital from Chopin, with the Pianist's Playing at Its Finest and His Pantomime at Its Fullest

Trans. — Dec. 14, 1907

For the eighth pair of concerts this week Dr. Muck has made a programme in which cheerfulness and gayety predominated. Humor, idyllic grace struck the prevailing mood, although the deeper note of tragedy was occasionally present. To be sure, it is said that Bizet's dramatic overture "Patrie" is intended to portray the sufferings, the deeply wounded pride and the patriotic anguish which afflicted France at the outcome of the Franco-Prussian War. So direct and uncompromising was the treatment of the subject that the rumor arose that its title would prevent a wide performance of the work. In content, however, this overture has nothing that seems extravagantly patriotic, it assumes rather the aspect of abstract and universal lamentation, which might be conceivably applicable to many episodes in history. Its grandiose, somewhat melodramatic opening gives way at length to more poignant and specific utterance of grief. Masterly throughout in its thematic development, it astonishes by its fertile resource in treatment, the audacity and variety of its instrumental color. It presents a vivid example of the brilliant school of young composers including Massenet, Guiraud and Godard, who resolutely produced music of a symphonic order at a time when the Parisian public was distinctly antipathetic to such a course. Nevertheless, it was their example which undoubtedly stimulated Saint Saëns to persevere in the same direction, and which has led to such masterly symphonists as Vincent d'Indy, Ernest Chausson and others of less note. In his performance of the overture Dr. Muck did utmost justice to its brilliancy and vivid color, for it strikes that note of operatic contrast and striking effect in which he is most at home. This overture is a remarkable instance of Bizet's precocity, for it was composed at an age when many composers are just emerging from their apprentice stage.

Another youthful work which bears not the faintest trace of immaturity was the MacDowell suite, which has not been played here for twelve years. It was given in its complete form with the movement "In October," which was not published until several years after the rest of the suite. Although in this work spontaneous gayety and humor abound, it contains so many touches of poetic beauty and imaginative vitality that it ranks far above many professedly serious and profound symphonies in which genuine inspiration is deficient. At the same time it bears certain traces of the influence of Raff, more in certain tricks of orchestral style than in musical expression, for MacDowell was already on a distinct path of his own, as his second concerto, the symphonic "Lancelot and Elaine," and many songs and piano pieces abundantly testify. Indeed, it already seems as if this suite were unique in the literature of American music, both in consummate lyrical invention and adroit mastery over delicate combinations of instruments. To a casual eye the score may seem thin, especially in comparison with many recent compositions for a swollen orchestra containing every known instrument, but its effects are cunningly devised and so accurately calculated that there is never a moment when there is not some telling sonority, some poetic or picturesque color. It must be confessed that on the whole the movement "In October" does not seem on so high a level of invention as the other four. By its position among the other movements, the allusion to the "Shepherdess' Song" which follows seems inexplicable. Coming after this latter movement, it would then assume the natural character of a quotation. Yet it would be impossible to place this movement in any other order without distinct detriment to the general effect of the suite. The performance under Dr. Muck gave evidence of careful and painstaking preparation that speaks warmly of his regard and consideration for the music of American composers. In comparison with other performances of this work, it would seem, although memory may be at fault, as if both the "Summer Idyl" and "The Shepherdess' Song" were slightly dragged. As if the tempo, when the composer had presumably indicated it, had been more blithe and care free, with less consideration for "expression." It may well be that this were merely an indication of Dr. Muck's preoccupation with making the most of detail, for the other movements were played with conspicuously fine interpretation of their moods, vivacious and sparkling humor. Indeed, Dr. Muck is to be thanked heartily for having given his public an opportunity to hear again so imaginative and spontaneous a work.

With the Goetz symphony came a third work written in the youth of its composer, for Goetz must have been under twenty-nine, if the date of its first performance be correct, when it was composed. Hermann Goetz presents another instance, all too common in musical history, of unusual and precocious talent cut down at the outset of a promising career. It is not difficult to understand the enthusiasm of which it was the object for many years. If the extravagant utterances of certain ardent eulogists may be safely discounted,

It is nevertheless a work of fertile and brilliant invention, surprising technical attainments, and unforced and pleasing melody. Although unpretentious for the most part, it possesses distinctly the qualities of "art that conceals art." If it departs gratefully and, considering the time, somewhat courageously from the letter of strict form, it convinces the hearer that it has a firm grasp of the spirit. In its several movements, the development is steadily skilful, resourceful in transformations and extensions of theme. To be sure, it is content to pass by the conditions which had obtained in opera, and the symphonic poem at the hands of Wagner and Liszt, for progress had, evidently, no charm for Goetz. But from the standpoint of effect with simple material, bright melody and pleasing substance it possesses a distinctive charm of its own. In the adagio there are more than passing hints of tragedy, an undercurrent of melancholy runs through the entire movement, but the finale resumes the atmosphere of unflagging and spiritual brilliancy that after all dominates the symphony. The performance was superb, and again Dr. Muck is to be thanked for giving an unfamiliar work which assuredly should not be allowed to disappear from our concert repertory.

E. B. H.

CONCERT WITHOUT NOVELTY, SOLOIST

Eighth Symphony Performance Had Restful, Soothing Programme.

STORM INTERFERED WITH ATTENDANCE

Bizet's Overture, MacDowell's Suite in A Minor and Goetz's Symphony Well Played.

Herald BY PHILIP HALE, Dec. 15, 1907

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Our Country".....Bizet
Suite in A minor, No. 1.....MacDowell
Symphony in F major.....Goetz Bizet's overture is seldom played in this country. I recall two performances in Boston. For a few years after the Franco-Prussian war the piece was popular in France, but whether this popularity were due to patriotism or to musical enjoyment would be hard to say. "Patrie" should perhaps be Englished "Fatherland," but as this word is commonly associated with Germany, the translation would here be inappropriate, if not ironical. It is said that the music depicts the woe and agony of conquered France; that it also expresses the belief in her restoration to rank and fame among the nations.

Music in these days is supposed to be capable of expressing everything—except, in some instances, music. Bizet was a true patriot, and he felt the shame and agony of his country. There is no evidence that he had any special programme in his mind. Pachelbel asked him to write an overture for performance and he wrote one, as Massenet wrote at the same time his "Phedre" and Gounod an overture that was not entitled until some time after the performance.

Music Perfunctory.

A Bostonian hearing the "Patrie" overture in 1907 is concerned with it simply as music. Does it interest him? Does it thrill him? Or is the music finely imagined and eloquently expressed?

The overture is not to be ranked with Bizet's best work. The opening arouses anticipation, but the second theme is not a salient one, nor is the treatment of it striking. The lamentation section is not significant, and the final apotheosis while it is sturdy, is not heroic. In spite of what has been said by commentators and biographers concerning Bizet's emotions while he was at work on the overture, the music seems more or less perfunctory. We have heard more stirring performances of it than that of last night.

And here might be a long discussion of the question whether orchestral or vocal music that is deliberately patriotic is often successful and whether it often has any life beyond the occasion that produced it? I refer to works of reasonably long breath, not to patriotic songs, hymns, anthems.

Suite by MacDowell.

While the first suite of MacDowell shows in a certain measure the influence of Raff, his teacher and friend, and also occasionally his admiration for Wagner, it contains much music of the character that individualizes the later music of MacDowell: music that suggests faces and phases of nature, joy in out-of-door life, thoughts of the forest and its mysterious sounds and of its inhabitants that are not seen by grosser eyes.

The Scottish blood in MacDowell, as his wife wrote to the editor of the programme book, had filled his mind with mysticism. The strange people of the woods were known to him, and it is not surprising that today the first and the last movements of the suite are the most striking and imaginative: "In a Haunted Forest" and "Forest Spirits." The other movements contain music that is pretty and some music that is beautiful in an idyllic way. There are buoyant pages in the third movement "In October."

Goetz's Symphony.

The poverty and misery of Goetz's life were perhaps fortunate for his reputation after death. His opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," was named a masterpiece, though I confess I could not find it a sympathetic treatment of Shakespeare's comedy-farce, when I heard the opera in Dresden, nor did the greater part of the music seem operatically effective, without any reference to the manner in which the composer understood the play.

The symphony played last night was also popular for a time; it was even fashionable. Extraordinary things were said in its praise. The symphony has been played here at these concerts five or six times. It is now nearly 40 years old, and the most that can be said of the greater part of it is that it is pleasant music fitted to inspire agreeable contemplation of almost anything while the orchestra is playing.

The Intermezzo has given delight to many, yet it now seems obvious, if not commonplace. The sentiment of the trios is that of the German male quartet hymning the praise of nature, while the landscape is seen from a beer garden with wooden crickets to keep the feet of the women from dampness, and there is knitting, and there is a mighty consumption of veal, sliced and cold, or in the form of a Schnitzel crowned with a dropped egg.

A Sad Fate.

It is a sad fate to be poor and neglected and sick in mind and body. It is perhaps a still sadder fate to be consoled by the thought that the music neglected while the composer is living will rise to immortality after his death. Goetz was an honest musician. The story of his life will excite sympathy when his works are forgotten.

There were very many vacant seats on account of the disagreeable weather, but the spirit of Dr. Muck and his men was not daunted. While the programme was by no means a brilliant one, it was restful and the pieces were for the most part well played.

Dec. 15, 1907 Eighth Symphony Program.

Edward MacDowell was represented on the eighth Symphony program by his interesting suite in A minor for orchestra. Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie," and the symphony in F major by Hermann Goetz were the other selections. Mr MacDowell's sad affliction has recently drawn increased attention to his great abilities as a composer and he is now accorded recognition on many programs, not only in this country but abroad, for the widespread sympathy in his misfortune naturally has had a tendency to bring his works into renewed favor. His suite in A minor is an idyllic five-part composition, the division titles indicating the pastoral nature of the work, which is worked out in such a manner as to make detailed description impossible, the composer not considering the suite as a perfect whole. The titles merely suggest the intent, each one standing isolated, as it were, but harmonious in conjunction.

His instrumentation is skillfully arranged and in each movement Mr MacDowell has introduced beautiful, and many of them quaint, pastoral suggestions for the different choirs of the orchestra. "In a Haunted Forest" has the mysterious significance of the title associated vividly with insistent heavier instruments; the "Summer Idyl" and "In October" are each treated in strongly contrasted styles, yet there are many hints of close relationship. The charm of "The Song of the Shepherdess" is undeniable, for it is melody in exquisite form, and it was played delightfully, and in the "Forest Spirits" the elves, gnomes and pixies are set a-dancing to the queerest rhythms and happy-go-lucky tempos. The performance by the orchestra was one of spirit, charm and finesse and seemed as a sympathetic tribute to one who, as artist and man commands the esteem of all.

Bizet's brilliant and fiery "Patrie" overture was invested with becoming vigor, pomp and variations of fortissimo effects allotted to the different instrumental groups and the Goetz symphony went well throughout, the second movement showing up the excellent qualities of the woodwind and horns in the band.

Dr Muck will be generous in his performance of novelties at this week's concerts since out of four numbers three will be heard in Boston for the first time. Moreover, the patrons of the concerts will have the opportunity to hear as soloist Mr Richard Czerwonky, who shares the first desk in the violins with Mr Wendling, the concert master. Mr Czerwonky will play a concerto for violin by d'Ambrosio, a work which has never been heard in Boston, and it is a question if it has been heard in America.

The first number on the program is the overture to Englebert Humperdinck's latest opera, "Heirat Wider Willen." The other novelty will be a set of pieces for the string orchestra by the Italian Bossi, entitled "Intermezzi Goldoniani." Mozart's D major symphony will close the program.

First SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert was as follows: Overture, "Patrie," Bizet; suite in A minor, op. 42, MacDowell; symphony in F major, op. 9, Goetz.

The overture "Patrie" is music for the holiday, the public square and the brass band. It is a plausible, even "soulful" work of art, it is clearly, brilliantly thought out, both as regards form and instrumentation; it would undoubtedly arouse sympathies and emotions of the many-headed. But how far, how very far, is this from the wonderful orchestral music to "L'Arlesienne"! A pot-boller by comparison.

Between the overture and the Goetz symphony MacDowell's suite stood out, the vital part of the programme. This suite is a series of short, fanciful sketches, headed by the following titles, poetic indications: "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess Song," "Forest Sprites." At once we are transported to another realm where nature, undefiled, reigns supreme, where the poet's fantasy plays free and ed by the tawdry and impure, matting these essences into forms most as impalpable. It is not hard on hearing this music to appreciate the truth of the letter concerning MacDowell which is quoted by the programmatist. Some sentences follow: "Deep in his heart he half believed the old tales of spirits and fairies—of course, not in his ordinary moods, but his imagination often carried him very far, even though he might laugh at himself. He hated cutting down a big tree; it seemed possible that something more than the tree suffered."

These sketches savor more of impromptu inspiration than ambitious design; their basic material is often of slight weight, but what a rich, albeit delicate, imagination glows through the measures, and what exquisite feeling for orchestral colors! Think of the thrilling possibilities of "A Haunted Forest," and the captivating lilt of the "Summer Idyl." "In October" was written some time after the other movements, and added to them after some indecision on the part of the composer. It could not well be spared, for he has caught with rare felicity the sad joyousness, the gray and gold, the vigor of the fresh wind, the sunset glories of the autumn month; and you will not forget the loving musing of the contrasting middle section. "A Shepherdess Song" that is not in 6-8 rhythm and that is not inexorably purposed to suggest knee kilts and panpipes! Oh, joy! Finally, the flittings of merry forest elves. Well, there should be more such music!

How few things escape the scythe of time, and what an intrinsically noble composition the Goetz symphony is! Such a fine sense of proportion, such masterly and free handling of the form are not always found, even among the works of the great ones. Sincerity and humanity—Melody, too, gentlemen of today!—speak from every line, and yet—it is music of another time and another sphere, and many of its beauties fell on deaf ears yesterday.

MUSICAL MATTERS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony Concert. add:
Programme.

Bizet. Dramatic Overture. "Patrie".
MacDowell. Suite in A minor.
Goetz. Symphony in F.

The concert had the distinction of having the smallest audience that we can remember at any of this series. This was probably due partly to the storm, partly to the prevalence of the gripe, partly to the fact that there was no soloist, partly because of an opera troupe being in Boston, and partly to the fact that the numbers were of only tepid interest. It is a pity, however, that the public should grave a soloist at these important concerts; we find a good orchestral programme to be the beau ideal of such occasions.

But it is a question whether this was a good orchestral programme. All the numbers were in the conservative vein. The last two works had a similarity of scoring. Only the overture employed anything like the full modern orchestra and even that work was less developed than is customary in latter-day composition. We love Bizet as having been the most promising of all the modern Frenchmen, a man with red blood in his veins, a composer who would scorn "la Musique cerebrale" which seems to enchain musical France of today. But "Patrie" is not comparable to some of the other works of this genius. It seems to be "made-to-order" music to which Dr. Muck gave a fictitious value by an excellent reading. Anything better executed than the final great crescendo cannot be imagined.

There is a certain military spirit in the work, the themes are well contrasted, and there is some lamentation in its measures, but it is at no time very convincing or inspired.

MacDowell's Suite was the best work of the evening, yet it is not the best orchestral work of the composer. It suggests the "Im Walde" symphony of MacDowell's friend Raff. It begins with a suggestion of Raff's "Frau Holle". The first movement is a picture of a "Haunted Forest". It is evidently haunted by the ghost of a piccolo-player, but has many poetic touches of gloom and mystery. The second movement is a "Summer Idyl", brief and beautiful. MacDowell does not spin out his thoughts to the interminable length of many moderns; when his tale is told he ends, even if, as in this case, the movement be exceptionally brief. The third movement—"October"—is exhilarating and hearty. It is the most original part of the work and there is nothing in the "Im Walde" symphony at all like it. There is brilliant use made of horn and woodwind, in this movement, and these were exceptionally well-played on this occasion. The contrast of the tender subordinate theme against the hearty and high-spirited chief theme is very effective. But again this movement, "October",—is as brief as if it was February. This is, however, a merit, not a defect.

In the next movement, "The Shepherdess Song", one naturally expected to hear much of the instrument of innocence and rusticity,—the oboe,—but the composer has given most of the tone-coloring to the flute, with muted strings and horns. The Finale is entitled "Forest Spirits", which, to a Southerner, would suggest Moonshine Whiskey, but these spirits are of a more ethereal order. Although we cannot avoid noticing the kinship with Raff's sylvan spectres, the touches of ghostly revelry are most poetically made, and the movement sparkles from beginning to end. If we hold the "Indian Suite" above this work we must still consider it one of the noble additions to the American repertoire. There was much applause at the end of each movement of the composition.

What an odd thing it is to notice our well-fed composers of today, in receipt of good incomes and plentiful newspaper notices, writing the most bitter and dissonant music, and to note that the sufferers of bygone times, Schubert with his empty pocket-book, Mozart with his constant disappointments, Goetz exhausted with consumption yet forced to do musical duties for daily bread and medicine, all writing beautiful melodies and bright and hopeful themes. There is not a whiff of the charnel-house in any of their works,—that is left for their well-nurtured successors to portray.

Yet we must confess that Goetz's symphony does not wear as well as we had hoped. It is just possible that it lost some of its effect on this occasion by being played after another work of modest scoring and simple effects. It was an especial flute evening, for Goetz uses the instrument very freely and constantly, while it had been prominent in the MacDowell work as well. This gave a trifle of monotony to the tone-color scheme of the evening, but the flute was exceedingly well-played. The horn too was prominent in the Goetz as in the MacDowell composition, and also deserves commendation.

It is a keen satisfaction to think that Goetz found consolation in tones in the midst of his physical misery. The motto upon the symphony seems to show this. It runs,—

"Within thy heart's still, holy chambers, Seek refuge from the stress of Life."

A sentiment which was shared by Schubert when he wrote his beautiful "An die Musik," in which the verse runs,—

"Oft has a sigh from thy great harp immortal Smoothed out the wrinkles from my troubled brow."

Unlocked for me of Heaven the lofty portal.
Thou Holy Art I thank thee for it now."

If only some of our professional wallers and pessimists in Art could be induced to look on Music in this light we might have some more beautiful compositions in the near future.

Louis C. Elson.

2 SATURDAY SYMPHONY TICKETS for sale for remaining concerts; floor seats; price reasonable. Apply Tel. 822-1 Cambridge, or address M.S.K., Boston Transcript.

ThS(A): mh 12

SYMPHONY TICKETS for sale under cost. Rehearsal $12, Concert $12, one ticket each, for 6 remaining weeks; best location. Address C.F.L., Boston Transcript.

St(A): mh 12

While Puccini, the Italian composer, was visiting New York last winter, he heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra at two of its concerts there. Since he returned to Italy he has been speaking warmly of it, and not long ago in Rome he told an interviewer that "it might well be envied by the most celebrated musical cities in the world." Trans. May 10, 1907

SYMPHONY TICKETS for sale under cost. Rehearsal $12, Concert $12, one ticket each, for 6 remaining weeks; best location. Address C.F.L., Boston Transcript.

St(A): mh 12

The Symphony Concert

The veterans of the Symphony Concerts, who knew them in the old Music Hall, as well as in their present abiding place, could recall no such small audience as that which assembled on Saturday night, while even on Friday afternoon, by unusual exception, only a part of the "rush" seats in the second balcony were sold. Christmas with its preoccupations is at hand, an opera company is visiting us, Saturday evening was stormy, and the programme in itself was not especially tempting. Thus conspiring circumstance left many and long gaps in the audience; the hall was barely half filled; and certainly Dr. Muck in all his experience in America had never before conducted to so small a company. It was a new sensation equally for the men, and it was good to see that the number of their hearers in no way affected either their zeal or their pains. Often, in fact, they and the conductor seemed more interested than did the audience.

The causes were not far to seek. Only an orchestra of Frenchmen under a French conductor playing to a French audience can give the true thrill to Bizet's overture, "Patrie," which began the concert. Our own conductor and our own men played it dramatically enough to our audience, but to all three, with a few exceptions, it was only a warmly-colored concert piece. It was eloquent in the conventional sense, but in a concert in Paris, even after thirty years, each man on the stage brings to it an individual eloquence, and each listener an individual response, that used to make the stuffy air of the old Chatelet Theatre electric. The coolest-blooded foreigner felt the emotional tingle and for the moment there was no other country to the whole audience but the "Patrie" of Bizet. Saturday evening most of us only listened, and we only listened again to Goetz's pretty symphony. True, it was hailed as a masterpiece when it was going the rounds of European concerts in the seventies and eighties, and Mr. Weingartner will still have it so. But there have been so many masterpieces in their day that somehow time—the deliberate, slow-working judge—reduces only to pleasurable prettiness, and Goetz's symphony, even with all the charm Dr. Muck and the band gave to it, seems one of them. It has not exactly faded; it has only lost the factitious glamour that used to hang like a halo about it. MacDowell's early suite—the suite of the woodlands that made the third number of the concert—has better withstood the discriminating years. It is fancifully imagined and fancifully expressed music still, but even so is its idiom quite of our time or of the immortal musical speech that knows no years?

H. T. P.

118

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

- | | |
|----------------|--|
| HUMPERDINCK, | OVERTURE to the Opera "The Forced Marriage."
(First time in Boston.) |
| A. D'AMBROSIO, | CONCERTO in B minor, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA
op. 29.
I. Grandioso, molto moderato e sostenuto; Moderato.
II. Andante; Lento.
III. Finale: Allegro; Presto.
(First time in Boston.) |
| BOSSI, | GOLDONIAN INTERMEZZI, op. 127.
I. Preludio e Minuetto.
II. Gagliardi.
III. Coprifuoco (Curfew).
IV. Minuetto e Musetta
V. Serenatina.
VI. Burlesca.
(First time in Boston.) |
| MOZART, | SYMPHONY in D major, (Köchel 504).
I. Adagio; Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Finale: Presto. |

Soloist:

Mr. RICHARD CZERWONKY.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Symphony Orchestra, at the ninth public rehearsal and concert, gave the following programme: Overture to "The Forced Marriage," Humperdinck; concerto in B-minor for violin and orchestra, op. 29, Alfred d'Ambrosio; "Intermezzi Goldoniani," op. 127, Enrico Bossi; these three pieces were given for the first time in this city, and Mozart's D Major Symphony (Kochel 504) concluded the list. Mr. Richard Czerwonky, who sits at the first desk with Mr. Wendling in the orchestra, was soloist.

Other orchestral compositions by Humperdinck have been given in this city. They have seldom come to stay. This overture to his recently completed opera will probably not outlive its predecessors. It is agreeable sound, but the melodies have little distinction. The phrases are cleverly hung together, there is mastery of form and very vivid instrumentation, but as page follows page there comes over the hearer a growing sensation of shortness of breath, so to speak, on the part of the composer. One longs increasingly for a strong, potential musical thought, for a melody that will carry conviction with it, and this melody does not come.

D'Ambrosio, again, in his violin concerto, does not display remarkable power of invention, though the lack is partly atoned for by a certain constructive facility. The first movement of this concerto is practically built upon one theme, which is announced at the beginning by the orchestra, and is not in itself of great inherent worth. It is brightly handled, however; an ingeniously conceived counter-theme makes brief appearance, and the movement is connected with the slow movement that follows. This section is of a sensuously-lyric character. The finale comes dangerously near triviality. The solo part, in contrast to the majority of modern concertos, is probably a pleasurable task for the player, and Mr. Czerwonky, with a tone that is not over-large, but vibrant and truly expressive, made a very favorable impression by his performance, and acknowledged a number of recalls.

Bossi wrote his "Intermezzi" in honor of the Italian playwright, Carlo Goldoni, who lived during the 18th century. He is said to have written in the old dance forms in order to express appropriately the spirit of the age. These Intermezzi are six in number, "Preludio e Minuetto," "Gagliardi," "Coprifuoco (curfew)," "Minuetto e Musetta," "Serenatina," "Burlesca." They are scored for strings only. The composer writes with a dexterous hand. His melodic material is pleasing and he employs many devices in obtaining the various effects of which a string choir is capable, as the flageolet tones of the 'celli in the dronebass accompaniment of the "Musetta." The gradual development of the first minuet from the more vigorous prelude is a happy thought, and in the trio of the former are a few charming bars for the solo viola, which instrument, by the way, is given an unusually interesting part throughout. The third number presumably refers to the curfew hour. A constantly reiterated note, which to some might suggest the vibration of a bell, is given chiefly to the violas, and it produces a beautiful effect. The "Gagliardi" is sparkling and gay, as the title might presuppose, and is a snappy bit of writing. We might expect a pizzicato accompaniment in the "Serenatina"—which is small, oh, very small—with a pretty little melody floating overhead. The "Burlesca" has real wit and sparkle, and the suite was heartily applauded. The strings distinguished themselves by crisp attacks, unanimity and dynamic balance, and a fine, brilliant quality of tone.

NOVELTIES AT NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Overture to "The Forced Marriage" and Two Other Pieces First Time Here.

ENTERTAINING SUITE

BY BOSSI PERFORMED

Richard Dec 22, 07
Czerwonky, Violinist, Makes His Debut Before Large Boston Audience.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage".....Humperdinck
Concerto in B minor for violin...D'Ambrosio
Goldonian Intermezzi.....Bossi
Symphony in D major (K. 504).....Mozart

The overture, intermezzi and violin concerto were played in Boston for the first time. Mr. Richard Czerwonky, the second concert master of the orchestra, played a solo for the first time in this country.

Humperdinck wrote the overture to "The Forced Marriage," a comic opera based on a play of the elder Dumas, "Les Demoiselles de Saint-Cyr," for the first performance of the opera in Munich. When the opera was produced at Berlin the year before there was no overture. The thematic material of the overture is taken from the opera itself. This material has little that is of musical importance, however well it may be fitted to the situations and business of the stage, nor is the treatment of the material striking in any way.

The overture is manufactured deliberately and carefully. Once or twice in the main body there are hints at romantic pages, but the overture is after all like any of the goods that have been handed over the counter by Humperdinck since his "Haensel Und Gretel," a much overpraised opera, by the way. You see Humperdinck smiling on the customer, doing the overture up neatly, and saying in a smooth voice: "Shall I not send this to your house?" Humperdinck is still reckoned seriously by some as a shining light of the modern German school.

Dr. Muck, a man of remarkably catholic taste, is acquainting us with the later works of this school. Hearing them—the words of Pfitzner, Boehe, Humperdinck, Fried and others—one is tempted to ask whether the Germans are now writing anything but notes; whether there is any composer among them of imagination save Richard Strauss, and he hath a devil, as Henley said of de Maupassant.

Indisputable Talent.

Mr. Czerwonky is a virtuoso of indisputable talent. The concerto by d'Ambrosio is poor stuff even for a virtuoso piece. It is dull and aimless and every now and then you can hear the composer nailing sections together so that the structure will stand. Yet it served in displaying Mr. Czerwonky's full, agreeable and pure tone and his fluent mechanism. It will undoubtedly be a pleasure to hear him in a more serious work. As it is, he made a very favorable impression, and he deserved the applause that was long-continued and not at all perfunctory or merely an exhibition of good nature, as is too often the case at these concerts.

Bossi's Intermezzi are written presumably in the spirit of Goldoni's comedies, and the music is purposely cast in archaic moulds. The opening prelude with minuet is of little consequence, but the Gagliardi that follows is intoxicating in its spirit and boldness. The Curfew is of minor interest, but the Musette in the second minuet is quaint in its burlesque and the minuet is entertaining in the repetition. The little serenade is charming and it is not in conventional form. Mr. Ferir played the solo for the viola d'amore delightfully. The finale, a burlesca, brings a dashing end.

Never Pretentious.

The music of this suite is never pretentious. The composer no doubt would say of the movements: "They are little things"; but these little things are cleverly made and they are effective when they are played as they were last night with beauty of tone, fine sense of proportion and extreme brilliance. It is not surprising then that the suite gave much pleasure. Bossi, though an Italian, has evidently studied the German classics. While there is a suggestion of Bach in the prelude, the suite as a whole shows the influence of Mendelssohn.

The performance of Humperdinck's overture and the accompaniment to the concerto—how pompous is the orchestral introduction of this concerto that leads to nothing!—"In the name of the Prophet—figs!"—these were played brilliantly. Only certain horn and trumpet passages were markedly unsatisfactory. There are eight horns in the orchestra at present—but there is still room for a first horn.

Ninth Symphony Program.

Dr Muck introduced three new pieces to Symphony concert patrons last week, an overture by Humperdinck written for his opera, "The Forced Marriage;" a violin concerto in B minor by D'Ambrosio, and Bossi's "Goldonian" Intermezzi. These were given for the first time in Boston and Mr Richard Czerwonky, second concert master of the orchestra, made his local debut as a soloist in the violin concerto. Mozart's D major symphony closed the program.

The overture is built upon themes from the opera, several of them being rather quaint in treatment, the melody in the early part being admirably arranged for the horns, with interruptions and cross harmonies allotted to the other instruments. There is considerable orchestral figuration and the sombre melody, "The King's Hymn," is a fine example of scoring for the heavier brass choir. A peculiar pianissimo effect is introduced by the strings near the finale in which an agitato movement is worked up with curious effect. The performance was spirited and the style of composition should make it very acceptable to the general public.

Mr. Czerwonky, one of the new members of the orchestra, chose Ambrosio's violin concerto for a debut here as a soloist, and although the work appears to be of uneven merit, the performance by the violinist was highly pleasing and displayed in a commendable light some of the phases of his art. His tone is not big, but it is resonant and sufficient for the concert hall of average size.

His fingering is true, whether single or in chords, and his bowing is even in passage work requiring legato or sustained notes. His lack of power, of course, is specially noticeable when he is playing with an orchestral support, like that of Dr. Muck's forces, but aside from that the young man evidently is an artist worthy his rank in the orchestra.

The concerto is rather monotonous in the first part, which opens forte by the orchestra. Afterward the solo instrument enters with some elaborateness of a theme and continues, moderato, in a plaintive style to the close of the movement. A fitful, intermittent introduction by the brass contingent opens the second movement, which is interrupted by the violin in a gentler form. Then after repetitions of a theme by the different bands, the finale is led up to and finally terminates in a series of rapid, fortissimo passages.

Bossi's intermezzi consist of six musical forms dedicated to the Italian dramatist, Goldoni, famous in the 18th century for his many comedies. The half-dozen pieces are mainly amusing in scope, though great skill in the score is shown by numerous variations and odd combinations for the instruments in ensembles and divided choirs. The second part, with a hop and skip rhythm, the bagpipe and reed effects in the fourth, the dainty guitar serenade that follows, and the ridiculous syncopated hurly-burly measures of the final movement gave the orchestra constant opportunity to show its ability to fairly run the gamut of musical demands. The jolly piece was most heartily applauded and its performance certainly warranted the reception.

In fine contrast was the last number on the program, Mozart's D major symphony, with its charming melodies, dignified and courtly in its irresistible appeal, and interpreted with sympathetic understanding of its manifold beauties.

The organ in Symphony hall is to play an important part in the symphony program this week. During the last few weeks some very important changes have been made in the instrument with the result that it is much more effective for concert purposes than it has ever been in the past. The soloist will be Mr. Wallace Goodrich, and the opening number will be Bach's toccata and fugue in D minor, for the organ.

Mr. Goodrich will also be the organist in Rheinberger's concerto in F major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra. This will be played for the first time at these concerts. The orchestral numbers will be Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras in F, and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption," which will be heard in Boston for the first time.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

YOUTH, A VIOLIN CONCERTO AND
MR. CZERWONKY

Transl. — Dec 21, 07
A New Impression Yesterday Afternoon in the Young Violinist—The Brightness and Charm of His Playing—A New Overture by Humperdinck and Six Pieces by a New Italian Composer, with Mozart for a Foil

Mr. Czerwonky brought a new impression, almost a new sensation, to the Symphony Concert of yesterday. It was that of youth, and youth is a comparatively new and strange thing there. Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings through the winter Symphony Hall is truly the dwelling-place of the middle-aged. Bld a visiting stranger to his first Symphony Concert, and the chances are ten to one that when he recounts his observations, he will call the audience, be it of the afternoon or of the evening, middle-aged. When the orchestra went last winter for the first time in thirteen years to Chicago, two or three of the reviewers, receiving also a first impression, called it middle-aged of aspect. We have chiefly eminent singers and virtuosi for "soloists" nowadays, and they have usually spent their youth in the gaining of the eminence that gives them a place at our concerts. The changes that Dr. Muck has made in the personnel of the band have made it less middle-aged to the eye and the ear, and there is youth still—forty or no forties—in the conductor himself. And yesterday, in Mr. Czerwonky of the first violins, youth came to be the "soloist." The omniscient programme-book averred that he was only one-and-twenty, and doubtless could have documented the fact. Fellow-members of the orchestra inquired eagerly and with a touch of personal liking how "the boy" had played. There was no need of the date and the phrase. Youth spoke unmistakably in Mr. Czerwonky, and equally to the eye and the ear, and the Symphony Concert was fresher and a more human for its presence. It was a novel and pleasurable thing to see his young face with its boyish heap of blonde hair and his youthful carriage. It was better still to watch the blending of youthful diffidence and youthful confidence in him; to see his fine and absorbed ardor in his work—if ever a violinist played for all that was in him it was Mr. Czerwonky yesterday—and good even to hear the little sigh of relief when he had carried himself, evidently as he wished, through two movements of his chosen concerto. As youthfully, bravely and ably he went on to the end, and then his boyish pleasure in the applause that twice and thrice recalled him was as honest and modest as his playing. From the beginning it was impossible to hear him without sympathy. At the end his pleasure was infectious.

And no one but a youth would have chosen the concerto that Mr. Czerwonky chose and played it as he did. A certain d'Ambrosio wrote it who dwells at Nice, after a Parisian schooling, and makes little pieces for the violin, the piano, and even the orchestra with a concerto, as it appears, and a ballet, as the programme-book records, on occasion. Mr. d'Ambrosio has written a sounding concerto. It courts the voice of the violin and it follows the idiom of the instrument. It invites a supple and resourceful but not a showy technique. The composer labels the beginning "Grandioso" and aspires in it to large and sustained utterance. Exaltation of matter or manner is hard to hear in it, but the music "sounds" with ample rhetoric. The concerto proceeds in contemplative, almost melancholy vein, and the slow song of the violin has an amiably pensive charm. Then for foil comes a finale of quicker pace and lighter mood in which there is as amiably rhythmic diversion. A pretty and attractive concerto, a drawing-room concerto, so to say, tempting a young violinist with becoming superficial allurements, and never once leading him beyond his depths. As music it has neither bone nor sinew, but it has a pleasing surface, and Mr. Czerwonky skimmed it as pleasingly. His tone is bright, clear and warm. It flows smoothly to the melodic line; it is supple in arabesque and tracery; it has light and shade and rhythmic sensitiveness. It adjusted itself to the harmonic background. It had an unforced youthful dignity at the beginning; it gained songful quality in the slow movement; and it had a pretty elasticity and sparkle in the finale. Not once did Mr. Czerwonky seek to display his technical resources, yet they served him with variety and surety. He plied them with a youthful intentness; he caught the sentiment of the music eagerly and warmly; and his young absorption in it won the audience to his faith and liking for it. By his playing and personality he made it articulate and agreeable. Enough of the masters of music have written concertos for mature violinists. Mr. d'Ambrosio was written a young concerto, and he was fortunate to have such sympathetic youth as Mr. Czerwonky's to bring it to speech and charm.

Dr. Muck in his turn was fortunate as well in another new piece that was interesting to hear—the overture to the operaticomique, "The Forced Marriage" "Heirat wider-Willen" that Humperdinck made out of the elder Dumas's gay comedy, "The Demoiselles de Sainte Cyr." The opera has hardly lingered in the repertory of the German theatres that have mounted it; and the overture—an after thought—has already become a concert piece. A fresher Humperdinck seems to write in it than we in Boston have heard for long. This time he is not writing an opera of children, witches and fairies out of German folk-lore or contriving a Moorish Rhapsody, or dreaming over the fortunes of royal children to whom fate has been unkind. And for once he does not walk the straight and narrow way of the Wagnerian disciple. The music is still sonorous and warm and rich of instrumental dress, but it sounds with its own voice. Distinctly it is the overture to a light and elegant operatic comedy, graceful, animated, touched now with sentiment and now with ardor, hinting for a moment at shadows and then running away with gayety and high spirits. It had its verve and almost its brilliance as Dr. Muck and his men played it. Distinctly it brought the mood of light and spirited comedy. And whenever Dr. Muck plays an operatic overture, it sounds of the theatre and leads straight toward a rising curtain.

The other new piece—there were three on the programme—came from an unfamiliar hand. Enrico Bossi is an Italian composer, teacher, organist and conductor who seems to bask simultaneously in the favor of court, church, choral societies and conductors. He has written prolifically in many styles and in many forms, and his orchestral and choral pieces—he has forsworn opera since his youth—are one of the fashions of the hour in German concert-rooms. Out of them came the "Intermezzi Goldoniani" played yesterday in all probability for the first time in America. They are not incidental or entracte music for any of Goldoni's comedies, and there is no reason to believe that they have ever been played with them. Rather the moods of the six "intermezzi" are a few of the moods of Goldoni's many pieces. He, for example, could write on occasion with the artificial charm and the aristocratic grace of his own eighteenth century. Accordingly, some of the "intermezzi" follow the old dance forms—a minuet or a galliard. Goldoni, and to this day in the popular theatres of Venice, could be riotously humorous, and Bossi makes a burlesca for ending. Goldoni could play with pretty amorous sentiment, and one intermezzo is a tinkling serenade. Goldoni loved the humors of the people as well as the elegance of their betters, and Bossi sets a musetta a-piping. Bland was Goldoni, and bland often is Bossi's music. And so forth and so on—artificial pieces all, changeful and amusing to hear, going and coming and leaving clearest impression of the aptness with which the conductor and his men played them. They, more than the fecund and playful Bossi, gave them bland elegance or sparkling piquancy or gay fun. Engaging, but a little labored trifter, singularly un-Italian in voice, easily diverting to hear and as easy to forget. Bossi made his music, and were Dr. Muck a less conscientious conductor, dutiful to every sort of piece and every composer that he chooses, it would be easy to suspect that he had placed the spontaneous, the laborless Mozart of the symphony in D major a little maliciously at the Italian's heels. Bossi had been contriving his eighteenth century blandishments and graces, and they were a perfect sham. Now they were the light breath of Mozart's life; he could not help idealizing them; he put them into tones, and lo! they are alive in 1907. H. T. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME. Dec 22, 07

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage."
D'Ambrosio—Violin Concerto, B minor.

Mr. Richard Czerwonky, Soloist.
Bossi—Goldonian Intermezzi for Strings.
Mozart—Symphony in D major.

Oh Humperdinck! Oh Humperdinck!
Your Muse has given out, I think.
'Tis very evident your pate'll
Not make another "Hans and Gretel."

Humperdinck, like Mascagni, is a "single-speech Hamilton". There is nothing in this overture that is as effective as the climax of the Prelude to his own "Haensel and Gretel". Everything is artificial and manufactured without inspiration. There is a strong flavor of "Yankee Doodle" in the second theme, which awakens a languid interest in the American breast. It may be remembered, by the way, that the Germans have a cheap "Gassenhauer" (street melody) that is like our tune, which led to the false statement that it was brought over here by the Hessians during the Revolution. Something very like "Yankee Doodle" was used by Beethoven as the chief theme of the finale of the Ninth symphony. The overture was well played and abundantly applauded, but we hope never to hear its conventionalities again.

Italian instrumental composers are scarce and violin concertos are scarcer, therefore we cordially welcome an Italian who has written a classical concerto. D'Ambrosio's concerto opens with a long "tutti" (orchestra alone) which gives the waiting soloist a good chance to get nervous. But if Mr. Czerwonky got nervous at all he did not show it, for he played with fire and breadth from the very first.

It is quite evident that the new Italians are not going along the thorny path which the latter-day French composers have chosen. There was nothing bitter, ugly or labored in the new concerto. That D'Ambrosio had studied his Wagner was sometimes evident, but no sensible modern can escape from the influence of that great reformer.

The concerto started its soloist with a great deal of difficult double-stopping, which Mr. Czerwonky gave finely. There was some broad work on the G string which also was well executed. The high positions were given with pure intonation and without effort. Throughout the work the soloist displayed pure intonation and a full and sympathetic tone.

The opening Allegro led directly into the Andante, which was full of expression, and both movements had good figure development and were at least interesting. The finale had much work in the high positions, in which Mr. Czerwonky was especially successful. Altogether, the concerto is not going to rank with the Beethoven, Brahms, or Bruch masterpieces, but it deserves to be heard often and to take its place in the standard repertoire. Mr. Czerwonky was much applauded at its close and was recalled three times. The impression he has made as a soloist at his debut is certainly an excellent one.

The programme tended towards the Italian school and after Italla Bassa had had its innings Italla Alta took the bat-on. Bossi is a new composer to us. He is not at all vealy, as his name might suggest. His work is clear, interesting and musicianly. His set of Intermezzi is intended to bring back the time of the charming dramatist, Goldoni, just as Grieg's Suite (also for strings) "Aus Holberg's Zeit" pictures the quaint and playful style of the Norwegian-Danish author, Holberg. Both composers have caught the spirit of the antique days and the playfulness of their subjects.

Dr. Muck took the first Minuet with the stately gravity that becomes the Court dance. Rubinstein once said that Mozart's lofty Minuet in "Don Giovanni" was really a Sarabande, but this classification only showed that he did not comprehend that a true dance minuet and a "Tempo di Minuetto" are two wholly different things. The loftiness of the Minuet is too little understood by conductors and we were glad to find Dr. Muck restoring its dignity.

In every number of the Intermezzi there was the surest and easiest leading of the voices. The elfin trickiness of the Gagliard recalled the fairies in Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-night's Dream Overture." The "Curfew" was somewhat less original, yet still attractive. In the Musette of the second Minuet there was some effective work "Sull Ponticello" (the bow played next to the bridge of the instrument) which gave a quaint squeakiness to the bagpipe effect which is the chief characteristic of the Musette.

The little Serenade gave a splendid solo to the violist, Mr. Ferir, (was it a viola d'amour?) a tender theme being supported entirely by pizzicato effects. There were some strikingly beautiful harmonies in this, one of the best tone-colors of the viola d'amour. Brusque and hearty was the final Burlesca, and all these shifting styles fitted well to represent the moods of the great Italian playwright, for Goldoni was the Moliere of Italy.

One point we note with pleasure in connection with this performance. The strings of the orchestra have again reached their highest standard of brilliancy. Nothing more perfect from a technical point of view could possibly be desired. We are glad to state this since we have not always found the ensemble flawless in some recent concerts. This work became a triumph for the string orchestra, and when the applause rang out, Dr. Muck caused the orchestra to rise and share with him in the popular tribute. It was an ovation for both that was entirely earned.

Here the concert might have stopped. It was now within a few minutes of an hour and a half in length and few cared especially for a Mozart symphony as dessert. There was delicacy of reading and interpretation in the Andante and there was considerable dash in the opening Allegro. But the Finale was tame. It is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, nor good red herring. It is not in the naively genial style of Haydn's endings, nor is it in the resolute and earnest manner of a Beethoven. Mozart has here aimed at dramatic power, and the greatest dramatic power of orchestral scoring of the 18th century becomes very tame beside the whirlwinds in this direction which Strauss, Mahler & Co. have accustomed us to in the 20th century. Its struggles after the intense could not thrill the spoiled musical children of the present age. Louis C. Elson.

NOVELTIES ON THE SYMPHONY'S BILL

Second Concert Master Czerwonky Made His Debut as Soloist at Saturday Night's Concert.

Three of the four numbers on the Symphony program Saturday night were novelties—the overture to Humperdinck's opera, "The Forced Marriage," the Goldonian Intermezzi by Enrico Bossi and Alfred d'Ambrosio's Concerto in B minor, for violin and orchestra. The classical number was Mozart's ever beautiful Symphony in D major.

Richard Czerwonky, the second concert master of the orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in this country in the d'Ambrosio concerto. Mr. Czerwonky, who is 21 years old, played in a lively, graceful and tasteful manner. The concerto itself is not a very impressive work. Of the novelties, indeed, the best impression was made by the Intermezzi by Bossi, who, by the way, is a famous Italian organist. The six little pieces fairly bubbled with beauty. Their delightful spirit infected both orchestra and audience, and so the performance of them proved one of the greatest pleasures of the Symphony season so far. The Humperdinck work realized the most favorable expectations, being sprightly, tuneful and worked out in a masterly fashion. Dr.

Muck read this and the other numbers with characteristic enthusiasm.

An organ solo will be a feature of next Saturday's concert. Wallace Goodrich, one of Boston's leading musicians, will play Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor. There will also be two more novelties on the program, Rheinberger's Concerto for organ, three horns and string orchestra, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem from "The Redemption." The other number will be Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra.

YOUNG VIOLINIST CHARMING AT CONCERT

Bost American—Dec 22, 07
Symphony Orchestra Pleases
With Works of Three of Newer Composers.

Although Symphony Hall was by no means crowded last night when the Symphony Orchestra gave the ninth in its series of concerts, what the audience lacked in size it made up in enthusiasm, and the works of the three comparatively new composers, Humperdinck, Bossi and D'Ambrosio, heard for the first time in Boston, were most cordially welcomed.

The young violinist, Richard Lezerwonky, was soloist of the evening, and his interpretation of D'Ambrosio's concerto in B minor was superb. His beautiful tone, delicate touch, charmingly purring technique and rare command of detailed coloring showed to the best advantage in that composition, and when he had finished the applause was most genuine, recalling him three times.

So young an artist is such a rarity at a Symphony concert that the appearance of the handsome youth with the shock of blonde hair was more or less of a surprise and misgivings as to his ability to reach the Symphony standard were whispered about from one pink tipped ear to another, but the seeming prejudice was short lived and before the first movement had been finished.

Mr. Czerwonky had his audience, and he left, enthralled to the end—and all doubt as to his ability was dispelled.

In Humperdinck's overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage," the orchestra's tone, finish and beauty of ensemble were as fine as ever.

The moods were strikingly and wonderfully contrasted from the beginning of the overture, with a motive typifying the forced marriage to the joyful reconciliation.

Bossi's oldonian Intermezzi op. 127, including the six movements, Preludes e Minuetta, Gagliardi, Coprifuoco, Minuetto e Musetta, Serenatina and Burlesca was proved almost an alarming contrast to the usual music of symphony and received only stunted applause. Coming as a decided relief was Mozart's Symphony in D major and in this the orchestra was again at home, and at its best.

126

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, AT 8 P.M.

Programme.

BACH,

TOCCATA in D minor, (Peters Ed., vol. IV., No. 4)
(First time at these concerts.)

HANDEL,

CONCERTO in F major for STRINGS and TWO WIND
ORCHESTRAS. Arranged by G. F. Kogel.

- I. Pomposo.
 - II. Allegro.
 - III. A tempo ordinario.
 - IV. Largo.
 - V. Allegro.
- (First time in this form in Boston.)

RHEINBERGER,

CONCERTO in F major, for ORGAN, THREE HORNS and STRINGS, op. 137.

- I. Maestoso.
 - II. Andante.
 - III. Finale: Con moto.
- (First time at these concerts.)

CÉSAR FRANCK,

SYMPHONIC PIECE from the Poem-symphony.
"The Redemption."
(First time in Boston.)

Soloist:

Mr. WALLACE GOODRICH.

128 PUB. SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 10th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Toccata for organ in D minor, Bach; concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras, Handel (arr. by G. Kogel); concerto No. I. for organ, three horns and strings, Rheinberger; symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Cesar Franck. Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich was soloist. The numbers on the programme, with the exception of the Handel concerto, two or three movements of which have been given before in a different version, were performed for the first time at these concerts.

Such a programme, devoted to a style of music that we do not hear too much of in these days, was an unusual gratification. The concertos by Handel and Rheinberger, which offered opportunities for the different divisions of the orchestra to display their capabilities, were not the least welcome features of the occasion.

Mr. Goodrich opened the concert auspiciously with the Bach toccata. It hardly seemed, at first—we are speaking of the Friday afternoon rehearsal—as if the newly-renovated organ was strictly on "good behavior," and one felt that Mr. Goodrich, having apprehensions of his own, was proceeding rather gingerly. As he progressed, however, this impression wore off. His solid musical attainments, his skill and fine taste in registration, and the glowing music that he discoursed, gained him warm applause at the conclusion of his performance.

The concerto by Handel is by no means one of the most extraordinary creations of that trenchant composer, but it is lusty, wholesome, open-air music. The five pieces played yesterday are in the nature of short "divertimenti," and they give the impression of having been penned with the haste so characteristic of one of the most rapid music makers of any generation. A fine, healthy vigor courses through the measures, which at their least point never fail to be entertaining. "Pomposo" is not a bad title applied to the first movement, with its vigorous stride. The third, where the wind players gave a wonderful exhibition of their impeccable virtuosity, roused much friendly enthusiasm and the artists were compelled to bow their acknowledgments. They again did so at the conclusion of the last allegro, a piece of breezy, assertive humor which brought an end to a pleasure that we would fain experience more often.

A genuine organ concerto, in the highest sense of the word, is rarely met with. In the composition heard yesterday Rheinberger unites his unusual scholarship and constructive power with dignity and worth of thematic material and a fine sonority in the scoring. It is a great work and would be worthy of the most respectful consideration if only by reason of the masterly handling of the organ in combination with the various groups of instruments. But more, it is sheer music, direct and concise in development, without a weak or extraneous passage in its broadly melodic measures. The impressive motif that opens the first movement is a figure that dominates the composition in a striking manner and which adds to its force and coherence. The festive finale brings to a stirring conclusion a work that is not only excellent organ music but a masterpiece in the form of a concerto. Here Mr. Goodrich played with the utmost enthusiasm and authority. He was ably seconded in his efforts by the orchestra and there was again, to a still greater degree, demonstrative approval of a brilliant interpretation.

The "Redemption" was composed in the period immediately following the Franco-Prussian war. The symphonic piece given yesterday, which divides the work into two parts, was introduced at a later date. The score bears the inscription: "The ages pass. The joy of the world which is transformed by the words of Christ."

There are Wagnerian moments in this excerpt, but the scheme of key color, the instrumentation, the contour of the phrases and the lucid working out of the motifs, above all the subtle, intangible atmosphere that pervades each measure, are all Franck's own and they made a lasting impression.

Franck is said to have lacked dramatic instinct and this is undoubtedly true to a large degree. Such a side, however, must have existed in the character of the man, though by reason of his quiet life translated into fervid mysticism and priestly eloquence. There are passages in many of his works which, if not dramatic in the theatrical sense of the term, are certainly fraught with strong emotional significance, passages where his speech becomes exceedingly poignant and impressive. Recall, for instance, that mighty codon of the last movement of the D minor symphony, where the themes that have been heard before reappear, one by one, in response to the majestic summons of the trombones, and pass by in superb procession, a never-to-be forgotten page. This orchestral interlude from the Redemption, is it not a soul-drama? After pages of supreme beauty, of touching simplicity and naive adoration, that later swells into triumphant praise, the pontifical proclamation by the brass is a searching voice, a moving experience. The music, by virtue of its solid structure and throbbing modern color, came as a worthy sequel to the other numbers of the programme, and it left an ineffaceable memory.

Trans. The Symphony Concert

Mr. Goodrich is too well known in Boston for his manifest abilities as an organizer, as a conductor of orchestras, as the sustainer of so significant an institution as the Choral Art Society, as well as a solid and able teacher to need any characterization of his services to music in Boston and elsewhere. It is doubtful whether in his versatile activity many in the public at large are fully acquainted with his conspicuous skill as a concert organist of serious ideals. Furthermore, those who know his work as organist and choirmaster at Trinity Church have limited opportunity to know the scope and variety of his attainments as an organist in concert pieces. Few also know of the warm and unqualified praise which Charles Marie Widor, himself among the foremost organists of the world and sparing in his commendation, bestowed upon his brilliant pupil. The appearance of Mr. Goodrich, therefore, as soloist at these concerts is in the nature of a welcome treat. The toccata and fugue by Bach, which began the programme, is well known to the frequenters of piano recitals, for it is a favorite opening number in a transcription by Tausig. While one must admire the extreme skill with which its effects are transferred in dazzling brilliance to the specialized technique of the piano, one must at the same time deplore the manifest injury to specific organ effects. It was doubly welcome, therefore, to hear it in its original version. Mr. Goodrich played this classic with dignity, restrained and yet adequate registration, a majestic and implacable rhythm that was a rare pleasure to hear. The superb outlines and the firm architectural structure stood out in clear relief, and the brilliant cadenzas assumed a legitimate and fitting climax which is not always felt in the ingenious transcription by Tausig.

In considering any combination of orchestra and organ, one is always tempted to recall Berlioz's memorable and witty comparison that the relation between the two is that of emperor and pope, each supreme in his field but bound to clash sooner or later. Berlioz, of course, refers to the complete orchestra, and modern composers recognizing the justice of his criticism have limited the orchestra in such a way that it may offer the minimum of antagonizing sonority. Accordingly Rheinberger has wisely scored his accompaniment for strings and three horns. The organ assumes the burden of replacing the customary wind instruments, while the horns for the most part sustain and enrich the sonority of the strings. The time was when Rheinberger was thought to be the coming composer, destined to neutralize the baneful and growing influence of Wagner. His orchestral pieces were given a place upon our programmes, his piano-forte concerto was played by zealous enthusiasts, his chamber music works were eagerly produced as novelties of interest.

129
Little by little his compositions have disappeared from the sheer pressure of more important works. It seems as if his works for organ contain the best of his individuality, the most significant portions of his message. This concerto in F major is contrived with uncommon skill as regards relation between orchestra and organ. One almost forgets Berlioz's aphorism in the rich contrast of sonorities that never seem to jar, the opposition of organ and orchestra is always grateful, frequently ingenious and full of harmonious and often brilliant effect. As regards the composition itself the first movement contains the most abstract beauty in its dignity and oftentimes grandeur of mood. In the slow movement the inspiration seems to flag somewhat, although the opening is full of thoughtful poetry and the coda is distinct in its charm. If on a single hearing the finale seems to approach triviality, an unfitting end for a work of such definite elevation of sentiment, it is brilliant and effective in its workmanship, and the thematic treatment is full of resource. Mr. Goodrich played the concerto with reverent interpretation of the composer's intentions, he built up his climaxes with skilful command of registration; the cadenza lent an appropriate atmosphere of imposing brilliancy befitting a solo instrument. As in the toccata his command of rhythm, his willingness to let the organ speak for itself without attempting a velocity foreign to the nature of the instrument, his delicate intermixture of sonorities with the orchestra, all justify unquestionably the reputation which he has steadily earned as organist. Moreover the choice of this concerto serves to recall to notice a concerto that is a notable addition to a literature that is all too scanty, as well as to convince students and audience alike of the claims which Rheinberger may still have upon the future. It only remains to add that Mr. Goodrich was cordially and appreciatively recalled by an enthusiastic audience.

E. B. H.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Programme with Two Pieces of Organ Music and a Bettered Organ—A Concerto by Handel for the Artistry of the String and Wind Choirs—An Orchestral Fragment by Cesar Franck

Trans. Dec. 28, 1907
Perhaps Dr. Muck "unified" his programme at the Symphony Concert yesterday by its suggestion of the resources and the quality of his orchestra as it now is. For the first time since he has been the conductor, the organ and organ pieces made a considerable part of the concert. Now, the organ at Symphony Hall has long been a law unto itself, and even to the organist who might pluck courage to play it. Of late it has been newly disciplined—"revoiced" is the technical term—and it was as a new and virtuous organ that Mr. Goodrich played yesterday. How well it served his purpose, with what qualities he played, and what of the true traits of organ music are in Bach's Toccata and Rheinberger's concerto, which he chose for his pieces concern a department of music that requires a more special knowledge than that of the general reviewer, and they will be so discussed in this place on Monday. Suffice it for the moment that Mr. Goodrich was warmly applauded; that his playing had unmistakable musical quality, and that the Toccata at least was stirring to hear in the interplay of its sonorous voices.

Five parts of a concerto in F major by Händel for strings and two wind orchestras, and the symphonic fragment from César Franck's orchestral and choral piece, "The Redemption," made the rest of the programme. The concerto consists for the most part of the spirited interplay of melody and figure, and the lusty answering of instruments to instruments that Händel cultivated in such pieces. The easy fertility, the animated invention, and the sure, straightforward stride of the music have kept the concerto fresh and vivid, and the added weight of tone that modern choirs for the strings and the winds gave it, increased its vitality and brought a sonority that, in spite of the purists, might have pleased the superb Händel himself. Equally good to hear were the brilliancy, the precision, the euphony, and the suppleness of the strings of the orchestra. Their tone was clear, warm, and bright; it leapt to the music; it had its very stride and accent, and with it went the beautiful voices of the instruments of the wind choir, as warm, true, supple, and euphonious in their kind. So played, the orchestral dialogue that makes the major part of the concerto was delightfully idiomatic and alternately graceful or brilliant to the ear. It seemed a new variation of the pure pleasure of musical sound, and rightly did Dr. Muck bid Mr. Longy to his feet to receive the applause of the audience.

In the orchestral fragment from César Franck's "Redemption" these and other virtues of the band shone as vividly. It is beautiful music though it does follow the familiar form, methods and voice that Franck was prone to use when he would bring his simple devoutness and his pious exaltation to expression. Once more he seeks and attains luminosity of tone; once more the melodies have clear, soft, rapt voice; once more they mounted with rising and absorbing intensity, until the music is suffused with a singularly simple and deep beauty that is of its own kind and of the unique spirit that imagined and expressed it. It was the first time in which Dr. Muck has conducted music by Franck, and he and his men played it with seemingly very true and fine understanding. They neither exaggerated nor dimmed it. They kept its long, streaming lines; they brought its glamor; and they expressed its pure intensity.

H. T. P.

WHACKS SYMPHONY AUDIENCES

Post ————— Dec 24, 07
"Such Disrespect Not Found in Europe," Says
Dr. Muck

Boston Symphony audiences, who have been called "the best listeners to music in the world," may be surprised to hear that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the orchestra, says that "nowhere in Europe would it be possible to find as disrespectful an audience as that which throngs to Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon."

"LEAVE BEFORE FINISH"

Dr. Muck, who reads but does not speak English, said last night, his wife acting as interpreter, that last Friday he had been forced to stop the orchestra in the middle of a symphony because of the noise that was being made by people leaving their seats before the piece was finished.

"I have conducted in many of the music-loving cities of Europe," continued Dr. Muck, "and never have I played before audiences that persist in leaving their seats before the orchestra finishes, as here in Boston."

"The evening audiences are far superior and have given me little cause of complaint. But the afternoon audiences have been troublesome since the first of the season, and the tumult became so noticeable last Friday that I had to stop the orchestra until the hall was quiet."

SYMPHONY

TICKETS FOR SALE. WADSWORTH, 40 State street, Room 47. Telephone Main 4684-1. 5t(A): o 14

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Two season tickets for Saturday evenings for sale. Floor, K, $30 each. Address H. P. V., Boston Transcript. 2t(A): o 18

An Episode and a Moral

To the Editor of the Transcript:

At last the just and well-merited rebuke has come, too long deferred, and heartily welcomed by the musical portion of the Symphony rehearsal audience. The sharp rap of Dr. Muck's baton, stopping the orchestra, was a rap which struck elsewhere than on the conductor's desk, and let us earnestly hope its effect will be taken to heart by that restless element which, constantly increasing and a source of disturbing annoyance to others, seems unable or unwilling to stay out a concert, whether it ends punctually at four or is prolonged a few minutes. This disturbing departure is most unfair and discourteous to a conductor, and cannot fail to upset his equilibrium, unless he be absolutely phlegmatic and lacking in temperament. If I am not much at fault in memory this untimely exodus occurred in marked degree at Dr. Muck's very first concert, and was certainly not an act of consideration toward a newcomer, nor one calculated to establish his faith in either our musical culture or our courtesy or our consideration.

Dec. 20, 1907

F. S. STURGIS

FINE PROGRAMME AT 10TH SYMPHONY

Organ Music by Bach and Rheinberger Is Played by Goodrich.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Toccata in D minor for organ.....Bach
Concerto for strings and two wind choirs.....Händel

Concerto in F major for organ, strings and three horns.....Rheinberger
Symphonic piece from "The Redemption".....César Franck

Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras was played here under Mr. Nikisch in the Christmas week of 1891. Last night Dr. Muck presented a version of movements of this work arranged and edited by Gustav F. Kogel, but he in turn edited Kogel's arrangement, in some instances returning to Handel's text, as in the Largo, where Kogel had without warrant given certain passages to a solo violin.

Kogel took five of the original eight movements and an unfinished ninth. And five are enough, for as the music was performed last night there was a desire for more of it. The first movement, "Pomposo," recalled Mr. Runciman's admirable characterization, "Mr. George Frideric Handel is by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music." The hearer had the same feeling listening a few years ago to the opening movement of one of Handel's piano suites as played by Mr. Bauer. This pride of wig and clouded cane is peculiar to Handel among all composers.

There is also a massive directness, a haughty sturdiness that we do not find elsewhere. There is sea-coal, beef and ale in this music. Nor do we find in other composers of his period the lovely melodic quality that distinguishes the Largo in this concerto. It is hard to say whether this movement or the preceding one, in which the chief oboe parts were played exceedingly well by Messrs. Longy and Mueller, gave the more pleasure. The whole concerto was played finely and also with amazing gusto. Would that we could hear more of Handel's music! At present he is known in this country as the composer of "The Messiah," the variations entitled "The Harmonious Blacksmith" and the monstrous perversion of a simple operatic air dignified, forsooth, by the title "Handel's Largo."

The Symphonic Piece from Cesar Franck's poem symphony, "The Redemption," was performed here for the first time. It was meet and fitting that it was played in Christmas week, for the motto of the composition is as follows: "The ages pass. The joy of the world transformed and made radiant by the words of Christ." Some of the thematic material is taken from motives that preceded; a Christmas song, the Archangel's air; but the chief theme was found by Franck for this second version of the Symphonic Piece, and the theme is, indeed, of a celestial character, nor was Chabrier extravagant when he called the theme "music itself."

Only the second theme in the slow movement of the Ninth Symphony can be compared with it for its serenity, and yet deep emotion. The other themes in the Symphonic Piece have decided character, and the suggestion of the Angelic Host is almost overpowering in its simple grandeur, but this chief motive slowly elaborated and always wonderfully sonorous is the dominating feature of the composition. In bringing out the full beauty of such music the first problem of all is to take as though instinctively the proper, the only pace for the chief melodic thought. Dr. Muck was singularly fortunate in this, and on this foundation he reared a stately cathedral of tonal devotion.

Mr. Goodrich played the toccata and fugue that is known to concert-goers through Tausig's thunderous transcription for the piano. It is one of the most dramatic of Bach's works, a virtuoso piece after the manner of Buxtehude. The first section has a fine extravagance, and the spirit is demoniacal in its fire and energy. The fugue section is of less sustained interest, and in order to keep the attention of the hearer the pace should be maintained with inexorable rigor. Mr. Goodrich gave an excellent performance, especially of the opening and closing sections.

The fugue might perhaps have been performed with more sustained fury. Mr. Goodrich's registration was judi-ciuous. It was not peevish through an attempt after infinite variety; it was not dry and monotonous through mistaken and ignorant conservatism.

Rheinberger's organ concerto was also played for the first time at these concerts. The composer was unusually successful in this: in the establishment of a blend of his orchestra and the organ which are apt to stand apart, the one distrustful or jealous of the other, or to quarrel openly. Rheinberger is often called a pedant, and it is not to be denied that in his teaching as in much of his music he displayed knowledge rather than inspiration; but with all his narrowness he had a romantic streak in his nature. This is shown in some of his organ sonatas, in the beautifully melancholy little organ fugue written on Fesca's name, and in this concerto, which as performed by Mr. Goodrich and the orchestra gave immediate pleasure and made a marked impression.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Wallace Goodrich the Symphony Soloist.

Paderewski Will Play Tonight at Pension Fund Benefit.

Concert by Longy Club—
Other Events.

The 10th Symphony program was unusually interesting for the organ figured largely in the music, two of the four numbers utilizing the instrument, which was played by Mr. Wallace Goodrich. Two selections were given for the first time at these concerts and two had their "first times" in this city. So all in all Dr. Muck offered Bach, Handel, Rheinberger and Franck in particularly enjoyable forms.

The organ has lately been repaired and its prominence in the program was practically a test of its quality, for the Bach and Rheinberger numbers varied sufficiently in style to enable Mr. Goodrich to exhibit the resources of the instrument quite fully. The different varieties of tone colors were clear and true, the effects of the deep pedal stops were thoroughly good and free from harshness and the many voices of the grand instrument not only sounded sweet, but the prompt and harmonious responses showed the admirable workmanship of the mechanical part of the organ.

Mr. Goodrich is a thorough master of the instrument and being very familiar with this one his interpretations were of a superior order. The dynamic variations and changes of stops were made in a manner unusually quiet and his admirable style of managing pedals and stops showed little of the spasmodic violence so frequently displayed by organists.

The Bach toccata is one of many intermittent little harmonies that call for rapid finger work in the lighter registers. These Mr. Goodrich fingered deftly, handling the changing stops without any fuss. These responses were prompt and the combinations blended perfectly. Of a more exacting nature was the Rheinberger concerto, played with part of the orchestra. In this the tonal pitch of instrument and the orchestra were even throughout.

Against a string orchestra and three horns the organ voices showed up brilliantly, the upper parts with the violins and the heavier voices with the deeper brasses. The grandeur of the first movement was impressively presented, and the florid finale went very smoothly, the big instrument being kept in splendid unison by Mr. Goodrich. The soloist was cordially welcomed, heartily applauded and recalled several times after each selection.

In the Handel concerto, which is rather old-fashioned in form and treatment, the wind orchestras and strings for which it was written are to be credited with admirable work in the elaborate musical conversations that run through the composition. The members of the wind contingents played their difficult running phrases in the third movement so smoothly and in such fine unison that they were marked for special recognition by the audience. Dr. Muck's reading of the "Redemption" poem by Franck was notably dignified and impressive.

This week's program will have for soloist Mme. Teresa Carreno, the celebrated pianist, who has been absent from this country for several years. She will play the D minor concerto by Edward MacDowell, who studied with her at the beginning of his career as a pianist. There will be a novelty number, Hermann Bischoff's E major symphony, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture will close the program.

Wallace Goodrich Star Attraction

Symphony Hall Well Filled With Society People for the Tenth Rehearsal of Orchestra.

Symphony Hall was filled yesterday for the tenth rehearsal of the orchestra, the stellar attraction being Wallace Goodrich, whose handsome wife (nee Boardman) looked very natty in a dark gray tailored gown. Near her sat T. Adamowski, enjoying to the utmost the playing by his former associates. During the intermission many promenaded through the spacious corridors, exchanging season's greetings.

Noticed especially were Mrs. Karl Muck, in dark purple and violet trimmed hat; Mrs. Bryce Allan, in black, her corsage adorned with Parma violets; Mrs. Guy Norman, Mrs. Arthur Welland Blake, Mrs. George Nickerson, in black with deep shoulder cape of seal and wearing a black velvet toque with white feather; Mrs. George Lee, in dark purple velvet; Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, in mode broadcloth and becoming hat; Mrs. Theodore P. Gooding, Mrs. Lizzie Whipple Pierce, Mrs. John Devlin, Mrs. De Ford Bigelow, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, her debutante daughter, Helen; Mr. and Mrs. Francis I. Amory, Miss Mary Shreve Ames, Mrs. S. Huntington Wolcott, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Abby Linnell, Mrs. L. Cartaret Fenno, Mrs. J. Forbes Conant, Miss MacNichol, Miss Forbes, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Mrs. John L. Thorndike and daughter, Olivia; Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. Richard Hamlen Jones with Mrs. Forbes of the Chromatic Club and many more with new faces in evidence, presumably holiday guests of subscribers.

Society will turn out handsomely next week to greet Teresa Carreno, who has many warm friends here to extend social courtesies.

ORGAN MUSIC AT REGULAR CONCERT

Novelties and most acceptable novelties at that were offered at the regular concert by the Symphony Orchestra Saturday night. The big organ was the solo instrument of the evening, and used without the orchestra and with it. Bach's toccata in D minor, the Peters' edition, was the first number. Mr. Goodrich demonstrated his superiority in organ playing by his superb pedal technique, although there might be room for doubt of his judgment in registration. The number was a most welcome variation. Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras (Kogel's arrangement) was the second number. In this, especially in the third movement, the public had opportunity to observe a reason why the orchestra occupies first place among musical organizations. A passage for oboes, a duet seemingly impossible of performance, was played with an artistry and ease that challenged the world and brought forth such applause that Dr. Muck directed the artists, Mr. Longy and Mr. Lenom to acknowledge the demonstration.

Rheinberger's concerto in F for organ, three horns and strings was the third number, played for the first time at a Symphony concert. Mr. Goodrich was a pupil of the author and gave a scholarly interpretation of the work which, by the way, is most fascinating. Franck's symphonic poem, "The Redemption," played for the first time here, closed a most satisfactory concert.

The eleventh concert will be given Jan. 3, with Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. The program will include: Bischoff's symphony in E, its first performance; MacDowell's concerto for piano No. 2, and Dvorak's overture, "Carnival."

MUSICAL MATTERS

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The first of these was the regular concert of Saturday. Yet it was not quite as "regular" as usual, as the following list may show:—

PROGRAMME.

Bach—Toccat for Organ alone. D minor.
Handel—Concerto in F, for strings and two wind orchestras.
Rheinberger—Concerto in F, for Organ, three horns and strings.
Franck—Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption."

Soloist, Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

It will be seen that this was a concert of peculiar, but very successful combinations. The opening number was not orchestral but an organ solo. Mr. Wallace Goodrich was warmly greeted as he came forward to the Console. He immediately justified this reception by giving a very brilliant interpretation of Bach's great Toccata, which has been heard frequently in its piano transcription, which we think only distorts it. Almost all Bostonians know how effective the organ is in Symphony Hall. The brilliant solo with its fugal culmination was only a foretaste of a still better display of the instrument combined with orchestra. At the close of the Toccata, Mr. Goodrich was much applauded and recalled.

His playing of Bach is modern and attractive. In this he follows the French idea. It may seem strange to state but one can often hear Bach played better in Paris than in Germany, because the French do not treat him in a pedantic manner but employ shading and contrasts as in works of the more modern school, in which they are quite right. The Germans often make Bach pedantic and dry in their performance of his works.

Handel's Concerto was a splendid example of the old form. It had been revised twice, once by Kogel and once by Dr. Muck, both times in a faithful spirit, preserving all the old-fashioned pomp and power of the original.

The horns had some fine work to do in the second movement and they were perfect in performance. In this connection it may be remembered that Handel, more than any other composer, was responsible for the introduction of the horn into the English orchestras. The Briton held the horn to be an out-door affair and criticised Handel roundly for using "such a rough instrument" in orchestral works.

The third movement had that troublesome mark—"A Tempo Ordinario". This moderately to be translated as a "Moderato". Dr. Muck took it as an "Allegretto". What a pity it is that Bach and Handel did not avail themselves of the pendulum invention of the Frenchman, Etienne Loulie, and mark their tempi by a string of varying length with a bullet at the end of it, as "Half-notes, 36 inches", "Eighth-notes, 10 inches", etc. It would have saved modern conductors an endless amount of trouble.

134

But this third movement was remarkable for a most brilliant duet for two oboes, so well-played by Messrs. Longy and Mueller that they were obliged to bow their acknowledgments of the appreciation of the audience over and over again.

The finale again gave the horns good opportunities and again they played excellently. The whole work was successful and the old-fashioned style of it was not its least attractive feature.

Another success followed in this very remarkable concert,—an organ concerto of beautiful construction. Organ concertos are rare matters in modern concerts. Few composers can blend the two elements, organ and orchestra, successfully. Guilmant has done so in works which lean somewhat to the sentimental side, but are very deftly made nevertheless. But this concerto of Rheinberger's was sturdy and manly, piquant and well-contrasted. It had an abundance of melody and of course the old conservative avoided modern ugliness and mystification.

It has become the fashion to think of Rheinberger as a manufacturer of "Kapellmeistermusik," artificial compositions in which skill takes the place of poetic inspiration; but the one little part-song, "The Stars are shining in Heaven," might prove abundantly that there was a romantic spot in the professorial heart.

To us this organ concerto was the gem of the concert. The forces were perfectly blended and there was such ease in the leading of the voices, such charm in the melodies and their development, that each movement became a delight, although the dignity of the Andante and the sprightly figure treatment of the Finale were the best portions of the work. In the Andante the horns again did excellent work. Altogether it was a display night for Organ, Horns and Oboes.

Mr. Goodrich was at his very best in the concerto. His registration, his manual and pedal work, the brilliancy of the cadenza, his absolute surety in ensemble effects, all call for hearty and sincere praise. He was recalled twice at the close of the work. Altogether it was the best organ performance we have yet had in Symphony Hall; may there be many more such in the future.

Cesar Franck had his foot upon his native heath in the treatment of the subject of the Redemption. His contrapuntal skill and his piety here went properly hand in hand with a very different result from that spun out of the same theme by the less sincere and less ably Gounod. There was a most ingenious and yet unforced intertwining of figures in this and a lofty climax at the end, when trombones were added with mighty power to the culmination. Yet were shorter. The infinite learning of the composer leads him into prolixity; he squeezes the contrapuntal lemon to the very last drop; so that part of the piece becomes "musician's music" rather than a message to the entire concert public.

LAUD GOODRICH AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston, December 29, 1907
Rendition of Difficult Selections
Wins Approval of Enthusiastic Audience.

Wallace Goodrich, soloist at the tenth Symphony concert last night, was welcomed by a large and enthusiastic audience when he played Bach's Toccata in D minor and Rheinberger's concertos in F major.

Both selections were played with the rare beauty which the artist's unusual gifts of appreciation of moods, tonal sense and imaginative powers impart to his interpretation. Bach's Toccata, which opened the evening's program, was composed while Bach was court organist in Winnar. It was rendered by Mr. Goodrich with a fine sense of all its delicate beauty and in this his splendid technical facility appeared to the very best advantage.

Orchestra Sympathetic.

Handel's Concerto in F major, consisting of five movements, was second on the programme. Dr. Muck's reading of it was characteristically authoritative and convincing and the orchestra responded in true sympathy. It was indeed an inspiring performance.

In his concertos in F major for organ, Rheinberger shows the modernism of composition and the modern capacity of instruments. The first Maestoso is like an intonation of the magnificent and the composer has succeeded in keeping the organ in high relief as a solo instrument, with a light orchestral background. The murmur of strings and horns stand as silhouette in Andante, the second movement, and in this Mr. Goodrich showed his fine mastery on the organ.

Goodrich a Rheinberger Pupil.

Mr. Goodrich studied under Rheinberger in Munich in 1894, and that fact may to some extent account for his happy rendering of the great concert.

Cesar Franck's Symphonic poem from "The Redemption," which followed, had an entirely different message, but was given by the orchestra in the same sincere way, with the same artistic finish.

In this poem the melancholy conditions of Paganism are depicted in the notes of cello and contra basses, where strife after pleasure and vices have put men in a condition of chaos and restlessness. The good tidings of redemption from this state are appropriately heralded by trumpets and bassoon, while the strings give the excited emotions.

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Evening, December 29, 1907, at eight o'clock

CONCERT

BY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

Programme

Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74

- I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegro con grazia
- III. Allegro molto vivace
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro
- II. Adagio un poco moto
- III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo

Soloist, Mr. PADEREWSKI

THE PIANOFORTE IS A WEBER

is scarcely to be translated as a modern "Moderato"; Dr. Muck took it as an "Allegretto". What a pity it is that Bach and Handel did not avail themselves of the pendulum invention of the Frenchman, Etienne Loulie, and mark their tempi by a string of varying length with a bullet at the end of it, as "Half-notes, 36 inches", "Eighth-notes, 10 inches", etc. It would have saved modern conductors an endless amount of trouble.

But this third movement was remarkable for a most brilliant duet for two oboes, so well-played by Messrs. Longy and Mueller that they were obliged to bow their acknowledgments of the appreciation of the audience over and over again.

The finale again gave the horns good opportunities and again they played excellently. The whole work was successful and the old-fashioned style of it was not its least attractive feature.

Another success followed in this very remarkable concert,—an organ concerto of beautiful construction. Organ concertos are rare matters in modern concerts. Few composers can blend the two elements, organ and orchestra, successfully. Guilmant has done so in works which lean somewhat to the sentimental side, but are very deftly made nevertheless. But this concerto of Rheinberger's was sturdy and manly, piquant and well-contrasted. It had an abundance of melody and of course the old conservative avoided modern ugliness and mystification.

It has become the fashion to think of Rheinberger as a manufacturer of "Kapellmeistermusik," artificial compositions in which skill takes the place of poetic inspiration; but the one little part-song, "The Stars are shining in Heaven," might prove abundantly that there was a romantic spot in the professorial heart.

To us this organ concerto was the gem of the concert. The forces were perfectly blended and there was such ease in the leading of the voices, such charm in the melodies and their development, that each movement became a delight, although the dignity of the Andante and the sprightly figure treatment of the Finale were the best portions of the work. In the Andante the horns again did excellent work. Altogether it was a display night for Organ, Horns and Oboes.

Mr. Goodrich was at his very best in the concerto. His registration, his manual and pedal work, the brilliancy of the cadenza, his absolute surety in ensemble effects, all call for hearty and sincere praise. He was recalled twice at the close of the work. Altogether it was the best organ performance we have yet had in Symphony Hall; may there be many more such in the future.

Cesar Franck had his foot upon his native heath in the treatment of the subject of the Redemption. His contrapuntal skill and his piety here went properly hand in hand with a very different result from that spun out of the same theme by the less sincere and less able Gounod. There was a most ingenious and yet unforced intertwining of figures in this and a lofty climax at the end, when trombones were added with mighty power to the culmination. Yet the work would be more attractive if it were shorter. The infinite learning of the composer leads him into prolixity; he squeezes the contrapuntal lemon to the very last drop, so that part of the piece becomes "musician's music" rather than a message to the entire concert public.

LAUD GOODRICH AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston: Concert Dec 29. 07
Rendition of Difficult Selections
Wins Approval of Enthusiastic Audience.

Wallace Goodrich, soloist at the tenth Symphony concert last night, was welcomed by a large and enthusiastic audience when he played Bach's Toccata in D minor and Rheinberger's concertos in F major.

Both selections were played with the rare beauty which the artist's unusual gifts of appreciation of moods, tonal sense and imaginative powers impart to his interpretation. Bach's Toccata, which opened the evening's program, was composed while Bach was court organist in Winnar. It was rendered by Mr. Goodrich with a fine sense of all its delicate beauty and in this his splendid technical facility appeared to the very best advantage.

Orchestra Sympathetic.

Handel's Concerto in F major, consisting of five movements, was second on the programme. Dr. Muck's reading of it was characteristically authoritative and convincing and the orchestra responded in true sympathy. It was indeed an inspiring performance.

In his concertos in F major for organ, Rheinberger shows the modernism of composition and the modern capacity of instruments. The first Maestoso is like an intonation of the magnificent and the composer has succeeded in keeping the organ in high relief as a solo instrument, with a light orchestral background. The murmur of strings and horns stand as silhouette in Andante, the second movement, and in this Mr. Goodrich showed his fine mastery on the organ.

Goodrich a Rheinberger Pupil.

Mr. Goodrich studied under Rheinberger in Munich in 1894, and that fact may to some extent account for his happy rendering of the great concert.

Cesar Franck's Symphonic poem from "The Redemption," which followed, had an entirely different message, but was given by the orchestra in the same sincere way, with the same artistic finish.

In this poem the melancholy conditions of Paganism are depicted in the notes of cello and contra basses, where strife after pleasure and vices have put men in a condition of chaos and restlessness. The good tidings of redemption from this state are appropriately heralded by trumpets and bassoon, while the strings give the excited emotions.

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Evening, December 29, 1907, at eight o'clock

CONCERT

BY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

Programme

Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74

- I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegro con grazia
- III. Allegro molto vivace
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro
- II. Adagio un poco moto
- III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo

Soloist, Mr. PADEREWSKI

THE PIANOFORTE IS A WEBER

is scarcely to be translated as a modern "Moderato"; Dr. Muck took it as an "Allegretto". What a pity it is that Bach and Handel did not avail themselves of the pendulum invention of the Frenchman, Etienne Loulie, and mark their tempi by a string of varying length with a bullet at the end of it, as "Half-notes, 36 inches", "Eighth-notes, 10 inches", etc. It would have saved modern conductors an endless amount of trouble.

But this third movement was remarkable for a most brilliant duet for two oboes, so well-played by Messrs. Longy and Mueller that they were obliged to bow their acknowledgments of the appreciation of the audience over and over again.

The finale again gave the horns good opportunities and again they played excellently. The whole work was successful and the old-fashioned style of it was not its least attractive feature.

Another success followed in this very remarkable concert,—an organ concerto of beautiful construction. Organ concertos are rare matters in modern concerts. Few composers can blend the two elements, organ and orchestra, successfully. Guilmant has done so in works which lean somewhat to the sentimental side, but are very deftly made nevertheless. But this concerto of Rheinberger's was sturdy and manly, piquant and well-contrasted. It had an abundance of melody and of course the old conservative avoided modern ugliness and mystification.

It has become the fashion to think of Rheinberger as a manufacturer of "Kapellmeistermusik," artificial compositions in which skill takes the place of poetic inspiration; but the one little part-song, "The Stars are shining in Heaven," might prove abundantly that there was a romantic spot in the professorial heart.

To us this organ concerto was the gem of the concert. The forces were perfectly blended and there was such ease in the leading of the voices, such charm in the melodies and their development, that each movement became a delight, although the dignity of the Andante and the sprightly figure treatment of the Finale were the best portions of the work. In the Andante the horns again did excellent work. Altogether it was a display night for Organ, Horns and Oboes.

Mr. Goodrich was at his very best in the concerto. His registration, his manual and pedal work, the brilliancy of the cadenza, his absolute surety in ensemble effects, all call for hearty and sincere praise. He was recalled twice at the close of the work. Altogether it was the best organ performance we have yet had in Symphony Hall; may there be many more such in the future.

Cesar Franck had his foot upon his native heath in the treatment of the subject of the Redemption. His contrapuntal skill and his piety here went properly hand in hand with a very different result from that spun out of the same theme by the less sincere and less able Gounod. There was a most ingenious and yet unforced intertwining of figures in this and a lofty climax at the end, when trombones were added with mighty power to the culmination. Yet the work would be more attractive if it were shorter. The infinite learning of the composer leads him into prolixity; he squeezes the contrapuntal lemon to the very last drop, so that part of the piece becomes "musician's music" rather than a message to the entire concert public.

Possibly such a work would gain with the public if they could have the chief figures set forth before their eyes to follow. If the programme-book could add such figures in the case of many works it would be a gain. The Philadelphia Programme book does this a little, the Pittsburgh book somewhat more, but the Cincinnati Symphony Programme Book is a model in this respect, giving only the most salient points, such as can readily be retained in mind by every reader, and printing every important figure and theme. The addition of such figures and themes would not detract in the least degree from the present thoroughly readable programme.

It is its delicate beauty and in this its splendid technical facility appeared to the very best advantage.

Orchestra Sympathetic.

Handel's Concerto in F major, consisting of five movements, was second on the programme. Dr. Muck's reading of it was characteristically authoritative and convincing and the orchestra responded in true sympathy. It was indeed an inspiring performance.

In his concert in F major for organ, Rheinberger shows the modernism of composition and the modern capacity of instruments. The first Maestoso is like an intonation of the magnificent and the composer has succeeded in keeping the organ in high relief as a solo instrument, with a light orchestral background. The murmur of strings and horns stand as silhouette in Andante, the second movement, and in this Mr. Goodrich showed his fine mastery on the organ.

Goodrich a Rheinberger Pupil.

Mr. Goodrich studied under Rheinberger in Munich in 1894, and that fact may to some extent account for his happy rendering of the great concert.

Cesar Franck's Symphonic poem from "The Redemption," which followed, had an entirely different message, but was given by the orchestra in the same sincere way, with the same artistic finish.

In this poem the melancholy conditions of Paganism are depicted in the notes of cello and contra basses, where strife after pleasure and vices have put men in a condition of chaos and restlessness. The good tidings of redemption from this state are appropriately heralded by trumpets and bassoon, while the strings give the excited emotions.

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Evening, December 29, 1907, at eight o'clock

CONCERT

BY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor

IN AID OF ITS

PENSION FUND

Programme

Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B minor, Op. 74

- I. Adagio; Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegro con grazia
- III. Allegro molto vivace
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro
- II. Adagio un poco moto
- III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo

Soloist, Mr. PADEREWSKI

THE PIANOFORTE IS A WEBER

THE MAN WITH THE AUBURN HAIR.

Symphony Hall: Mr. Paderewski

An authoritative performance, the emperor of pianists in the emperor of piano-forte concertos, was the impression left by Mr. Paderewski's playing at the Pension Fund concert last night. He dominated the orchestra; again, he merged his instrument into its mass to emerge triumphantly after the flutes and the cellos had sung their themes. The Beethoven E-flat concerto, a symphony with a solo instrument, covers a range from heroics to lyrics. Its royalty is the magnificent unconcern of the composer in brushing aside all tinsel ornaments and letting it stand forth in its bold, stark outline; and the royalty of its performance last night was of the same spirit.

Restrained to the opening cadenza (furnished as an innovation in his time, by the composer for the express purpose of keeping it in restraint), lyric in the long passages where we look to hear the instrument sound wiry, thunderous in his climaxes, the pianist, as one Olympian understanding another. As far as possible where such a display of artistry and feeling was involved, the performance was almost impersonal in its merging of the player with the thing played. It was altogether the E-flat concerto receiving a full enunciation and little, if any, of the soloist exploiting his powers.

Following the orchestral concert on the printed program came the informal piano-forte recital, which, by appearances, the pianist gracefully consented to carry off at a sitting. The first of the five encore numbers, the Chopin Ballade in A-flat, was a piece of creative imagination taking the Chopin music for a text. To be sure, it had all of the composer in it, but it had considerably more. The same was true of the waltz, the familiar octave étude (which suffered metamorphosis into something rich and strange) and the A-flat polonaise which brought this part of the programme to a climax.

The concert opened with the ever-popular and ever-appealing "Symphony Pathétique" of Tschalkovski, which never fails to throw the web of its Slavic discontent over the more placid Anglo-Saxon, rousing him to wonder whether, after all, things are for the best. At all events, he has to acknowledge that its tempests, its defiance, and its protests are super-personal.

Once more last night the playing of Mr. Paderewski raised the question of an artist dissatisfied with his medium, whose mastery of it only serves to remind him of its limitations. Is dissatisfaction, the sense of limitation, the price that must be paid for complete mastery of an art? To be worthy of the thing desired, we must be able to despise it, are the words of the sage. And what is the case with the pianist? Trans. Dec. 30, 1907

PADEREWSKI HERO AT PENSION FUND CONCERT

Great Pianist Gives Gratuitous Recital After Symphony Orchestra Concert—Organ as Solo Instrument at Regular Performance.

Journal Dec. 30, 1907

The dying year was sent on its way into history by two memorable concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra one, the regular or tenth of the season on Saturday night, another the pension fund concert last night. At the first Wallace Goodrich, organist, was soloist; at the second, I. J. Paderewski, pianist, was the attraction.

The pension fund concert was a rare treat from every point of view. Not only was the artist in the best of humor but the orchestra was in record making mood and the combination of the world's greatest pianist and best orchestra produced a result at once satisfactory and inspiring.

The audience last night in Symphony Hall was limited by the walls of the building. Every seat was occupied when Dr. Muck raised his baton and along the sides on the boundaries patrons stood three deep throughout the evening. The result of the evening is the swelling of the pension fund by exactly $4000.

Pays Own Expenses.

Mr. Paderewski donated his services, paying all of his expenses coming from a middle West tour, the ninety-nine members of the orchestra of course contributing their time and talent and Dr. Muck donating his.

The program was attractive. Tschalkovsky's "Pathetic" symphony and Beethoven's concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat major, "The Emperor." The symphony, as a whole, has been performed more satisfactorily under Mr. Gerlicke, especially in the first, second and last movements, but never before was the allegro molto vivace, the third, played with such nobleness. Its martial message was given with an artistry that commanded attention and commanded everybody to sit up and notice. It showed the extreme virtuosity of the strings, of the entire band for that matter, and Dr. Muck made the men acknowledge the applause, giving them credit.

THE MAN WITH THE AUBURN HAIR.

Symphony Hall: Mr. Paderewski

An authoritative performance, the emperor of pianists in the emperor of piano-forte concertos, was the impression left by Mr. Paderewski's playing at the Pension Fund concert last night. He dominated the orchestra; again, he merged his instrument into its mass to emerge triumphantly after the flutes and the cellos had sung their themes. The Beethoven E-flat concerto, a symphony with a solo instrument, covers a range from heroics to lyrics. Its royalty is the magnificent unconcern of the composer in brushing aside all tinsel ornaments and letting it stand forth in its bold, stark outline; and the royalty of its performance last night was of the same spirit.

Restrained to the opening cadenza (furnished as an innovation in his time, by the composer for the express purpose of keeping it in restraint), lyric in the long passages where we look to hear the instrument sound wiry, thunderous in his climaxes, the pianist, as one Olympian understanding another. As far as possible where such a display of artistry and feeling was involved, the performance was almost impersonal in its merging of the player with the thing played. It was altogether the E-flat concerto receiving a full enunciation and little, if any, of the soloist exploiting his powers.

Following the orchestral concert on the printed program came the informal piano-forte recital, which, by appearances, the pianist gracefully consented to carry off at a sitting. The first of the five encore numbers, the Chopin Ballade in A-flat, was a piece of creative imagination taking the Chopin music for a text. To be sure, it had all of the composer in it, but it had considerably more. The same was true of the waltz, the familiar octave étude (which suffered metamorphosis into something rich and strange) and the A-flat polonaise which brought this part of the programme to a climax.

The concert opened with the ever-popular and ever-appealing "Symphony Pathétique" of Tchaikovsky, which never fails to throw the web of its Slavic discontent over the more placid Anglo-Saxon, rousing him to wonder whether, after all, things are for the best. At all events, he has to acknowledge that its tempests, its defiance, and its protests are super-personal.

Once more last night the playing of Mr. Paderewski raised the question of an artist dissatisfied with his medium, whose mastery of it only serves to remind him of its limitations. Is dissatisfaction, the sense of limitation, the price that must be paid for complete mastery of an art? To be worthy of the thing desired, we must be able to despise it, are the words of the sage. And what is the case with the pianist? Trans. Dec. 30, 1907

PADEREWSKI HERO AT PENSION FUND CONCERT

Great Pianist Gives Gratuitous Recital After Symphony Orchestra Concert—Organ as Solo Instrument at Regular Performance.

Dec. 30, 1907
The dying year was sent on its way into history by two memorable concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra one, the regular or tenth of the season on Saturday night, another the pension fund concert last night. At the first Wallace Goodrich, organist, was soloist; at the second, I. J. Paderewski, pianist, was the attraction.

The pension fund concert was a rare treat from every point of view. Not only was the artist in the best of humor but the orchestra was in record making mood and the combination of the world's greatest pianist and best orchestra produced a result at once satisfactory and inspiring.

The audience last night in Symphony Hall was limited by the walls of the building. Every seat was occupied when Dr. Muck raised his baton and along the sides on the boundaries patrons stood three deep throughout the evening. The result of the evening is the swelling of the pension fund by exactly $4000.

Pays Own Expenses.

Mr. Paderewski donated his services, paying all of his expenses coming from a middle West tour, the ninety-nine members of the orchestra of course contributing their time and talent and Dr. Muck donating his.

The program was attractive. Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony and Beethoven's concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat major, "The Emperor." The symphony, as a whole, has been performed more satisfactorily under Mr. Gerlicke, especially in the first, second and last movements, but never before was the allegro molto vivace, the third, played with such nobleness. Its martial message was given with an artistry that commanded attention and commanded everybody to sit up and notice. It showed the extreme virtuosity of the strings, of the entire band for that matter, and Dr. Muck made the men acknowledge the applause, giving them credit.

Delightfully Informal.

Paderewski was in the best of humor and played the somewhat familiar concerto with the culture of interpretation for which he is justly renowned. He was delightfully informal turning to the audience in the second movement while reciting the theme and bowing graciously to Mr. and Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, who sat near the stage. At the conclusion of the allegro he left the stool and grasped Dr. Muck's hand, shaking it vigorously and bowing to the players. He repeated the act at the conclusion of the concerto. The orchestra remained seated and led the applause, and the artist after a wait returned to the instrument and played Chopin's "Ballade" in A major. Then one of Chopin's mazurkas and the "Etude," op. 25, and finished with the military polonaise in A.

The instrument used did not respond even to his wizard touch with the tone produced at other performances by the master, but any tonal defects were more than covered by the exquisite technique of the performer. Especially noticeable were the shortcomings of the instrument in the forte passages.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first Boston Symphony Pension Fund concert of the season will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, the 29th, at 8:15 o'clock. Mr. Paderewski has volunteered his services to be soloist on this occasion. Mr. Paderewski is redeeming a promise made three years ago. It will be remembered he was to have played at a Pension Fund concert in the spring of 1905, but before the date came he had had his railroad accident and had to cancel everything after that. When he expected to come to America last year to play at a few concerts with the orchestra he said that he would also play at a Pension fund concert, and when he changed his plans and did not come over to America he promised that during the present season he would give his services to the fund.

The first number on the programme will of itself attract many people, as it will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. This will be the only orchestral number. The second number will be Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. After that Mr. Paderewski will play what pleases him. The sale of seats is now in progress at Symphony Hall.

The second of the concerts was given last night in aid of the Pension Fund. The printed list of works was of the shortest.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky.....Symphonie Pathetique
Beethoven.....Piano Concerto in E flat, No. 5
Soloist, Ignaz Paderewski.

Let no one suppose that this was a brief concert because of the brevity of the above list. In the first place the two works above mentioned are each of them long in themselves. In the next place Mr. Paderewski is generous in giving encores and sometimes gives a "Postscript Concert" which is in itself of considerable length. In this case it was devoted to Chopin's compositions.

As everybody, from Dr. Muck and Paderewski down to the cymbal player, volunteered, the concert is not to be reviewed as the regular ones are. Yet even were this not the case the spirit of animadversion would find not a peg to hang a comment upon. The great "Pathetic Symphony" was read and played in a manner that, as is usual with this work, carried the entire audience with its moods. It is a pity that this composition should be allowed to over-shadow some of the earlier symphonies of Tschaikowsky which are musically as great, but the clearness of the story told, and the peculiar sprightliness of the long 5-4 rhythm, will always cause the public to consider the "Pathetic" as the foremost of modern symphonies. The last two movements of this symphony were superbly played and aroused much enthusiasm.

It was noble of Paderewski to donate his valuable services to the aid of his humbler brother-musicians, in this concert, and undoubtedly the great audience present was due chiefly to the fact that this famous pianist was to be heard in his most fitting frame, with a great orchestra and in a musical masterpiece. He merited the laurel wreath which was presented to him amid enthusiastic applause.

After all one must pay constant tribute to the versatility of this artist. There is no pianist alive, but himself, who can give the utmost romance of Chopin, the greatest fire and brilliancy of Liszt, and yet interpret Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto as was done last night. In this work Paderewski never forgot that it was a symphony with a thread of solo running through it. It was ensemble first and foremost, not personal display. But when the work was successfully finished and the pianist recalled with fervor, he became the soloist once more, and added several numbers to the intense delight of the assembled multitude. So that the symphonic programme concluded with a greatly appreciated piano recital. Louis C. Elson.

FOR SALE TO RENT Symphony Tickets

Connelly & Burke ADAMS HOUSE
3t(A) 10

FOR SALE—TWO SYMPHONY TICKETS for Saturday evening concerts in E; aisle seats at $30 each. Address F.G.R., Boston Transcript.

(A)

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Very desirable; afternoon and evening.
HARDING, 70 Kilby street.
(A):

SYMPHONY

TICKETS FOR SALE. WADSWORTH, 40
State street, Room 47. Telephone Main 4684-1.
3t(A): 8

FOR SALE—SYMPHONY TICKET

Saturday evenings; second balcony, centre, E 31; price $11. Apply 4 Wellington Court, Suite 2, 517 Warren street, Roxbury.

PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

Crowds Willing to Stand in Symphony Hall.

Great Artist at His Best and Never in Happier Mood.

globe Dec. 30, 1907

If the city of Boston is lucky to have its Symphony orchestra, then the Symphony orchestra is no less lucky to have the aid of Jan Ignace Paderewski in its pension fund concert. It may have been his presence last night at the piano, or it may have been a real appreciation of the fact that the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," was to be played; at any rate, every seat in the vast hall was sold, and the people stood packed like herding under the balconies.

Paderewski was on the program only to play the piano part in the Beethoven concerto in E flat major (No. 5, opus 73), but this was almost the least of his playing. The piano solo in that work is comparatively simple and not tremendously dramatic or moving; the orchestra, which had been playing with great spirit and fire in the Tschaikowsky symphony, could barely meet the attack of the great virtuoso, so impetuous was he, and the concerto was played magnificently. But then, in response to applause that would not cease, Paderewski generously played a Chopin ballade in A flat, a beautiful mazourka, and thrice more before he finally refused to play again and sent the people home glowing.

The charge that Paderewski has been "banging" lately would have been easily disposed of last night, for never was there more clean-cut, delicate shading. As a matter of fact, most of the "banging" has been due to the position of hearers in the hall, and not to the pianist's methods at all. He was Paderewski still; there was the spell-weaving, the sentimental holding of the phrase, the mannerism, the hypnotic spell; but never was the player in happier mood. His playing of the ballade was beauty itself; one forgot technique, shading, execution, and fell into the spell of Chopin himself. And the first movement of the concerto—how delicate the touch, how bell-like the notes! There was a feeling of tenseness, to be sure; there was suppression, as though the player would be glad to loose his emotion in a flood of sound though forbidden by the score. And the swing and beat of the final movement, the delicious square-cornered, clean harmony of Beethoven, how Paderewski did give it to us without affectation and without pretentiousness!

The Tschaikowsky work was played with incredible force and color; Dr. Muck's reading fairly took one's breath away. The deliciously sweet melody which forms the leading motive in the first movement, the snappy, Slavic march of the third, the storms of the finale, all seemed fresh and new; unheard before, so "vividly" was the symphony played.

As the concerto was finished Dr. Muck and Paderewski shook hands warmly, and a huge wreath of laurel, in the shape of a heart, was brought to the platform for the pianist.

Journal Nov. 18, 1907

Ignaz Paderewski and Dr. Carl Muck shared the honors at the Symphony concert Saturday night. Paderewski played the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. He has played better here; he has been in happier moods than he showed during the performance of the concerto; and he was visibly not at ease, though he sat in his own old-fashioned, red-fringed chair; yet the audience would not let him depart until he had broken the Symphony rule against encores and played the Chopin scherzo in B flat minor. In the scherzo his art was as magical as art can be.

Dr. Muck's reading of the beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 2 was equally as artistic and enjoyable as Paderewski's playing—great and glorious as that was in many moments. The rare pleasure the symphony gave, however, was marred by the departure between the several movements of a part of the audience. The encore Paderewski gave made the concert later than usual, and there are people who, for some reason, will not remain in the hall after 10 o'clock. Dr. Muck witnessed the exodus with a sad expression.

It is regrettable that the symphony was not placed first on the program. Its delights could then have been enjoyed by all. For Dr. Muck must have known that if Paderewski wants to give encores the rule against them will not stop him. He has always been excepted. The people want encores from him.

Merely as a matter of record it may added that the orchestra played for the first time Pfitzner's Overture to "The Little Christ Elf," a Christmas fairy play by Ilse von Stach. The overture made but a slight impression.

The program of this week's concert includes C. M. Loeffler's new concert piece, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), for piano and orchestra. Heinrich Gebhard will play the piano part. Another novelty will be Reznicek's Adagio and Scherzo, Lalo's Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana," will fill out the evening, which, for a change, will be without a symphony.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Handled Dec 30. 07
Paderewski, Generous with Encores, Adds to Pleasing
Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, gave a concert last evening at Symphony Hall in aid of its pension fund. The programme consisted of Tschalkowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5, in E-flat major. Mr. Paderewski gave his services for the occasion, thereby fulfilling an engagement made three years ago, when he was prevented by illness from appearing.

The pension fund concerts always call forth an audience of good size, for the programmes are, as a rule, of popular interest. Many who are not able to subscribe to the regular series of concerts have thus an opportunity to hear the orchestra, and all are interested in the players and the purpose for which these concerts are given. Last evening's audience was of unusual size, every seat and all the standing room being filled.

Any critical comment upon the concert would be out of place, owing to the nature of the occasion, also because there is nothing to be said, at this late day, of programme, players or performance, that has not been said already many times. Nothing less than the excitement attending a performance by Mr. Paderewski would have made a concerto by Beethoven possible after the "Pathetic" symphony; but, as it was, there were, no doubt, many for whom the real entertainment of the evening began with the appearance of the soloist.

The performance of the symphony was a notable feature of the concert, and the audience was quick to feel the poignancy of music and interpretation. The momentary hush at the end of the work before the applause was a greater tribute to the musicians than the applause itself. Dr. Muck was recalled again and again, and twice he called upon the men to rise and share the applause.

The concert, if not strictly a balm to hearts that had been wrung by the symphony, was yet as a soothing application, and only the delightful performance of Mr. Paderewski kept it from being altogether sedative. The enjoyment of the audience would have been as keen had he chosen to play hymns or Czerny studies; for it was the ravishing beauty of tone, the variety, grace and rhythm, the potent and peculiar spell of the pianist, rather than the music, that held his hearers.

Recalled with deafening insistence, Mr. Paderewski was generous with encores, and he played Chopin's Ballade in A-flat, "Butterfly" study, Polonaise in A-flat and other pieces. He was given a huge wreath, which he generously shared, by intimation, with the orchestra.

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HERMANN BISCHOFF, SYMPHONY in E major, op. 16.

- I. Sehr schnell und feurig.
- II. Sehr ruhig und getragen.
- III. Presto; Ruhig.
- IV. Allegro moderato.
(First time in Boston.)

MACDOWELL,

CONCERTO No. 2, in D minor, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 23.

- I. Larghetto calmato.
- II. Presto giocoso.
- III. Largo; Molto allegro.

DVOŘÁK,

OVERTURE, "Carnival." op. 92.

Soloist:

Madame TERESA CARREÑO.

The Pianoforte is an Everett.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Herald — Dec 30. 07
Paderewski, Generous with Encores, Adds to Pleasing
Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, gave a concert last evening at Symphony Hall in aid of its pension fund. The programme consisted of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5, in E-flat major. Mr. Paderewski gave his services for the occasion, thereby fulfilling an engagement made three years ago, when he was prevented by illness from appearing.

The pension fund concerts always call forth an audience of good size, for the programmes are, as a rule, of popular interest. Many who are not able to subscribe to the regular series of concerts have thus an opportunity to hear the orchestra, and all are interested in the players and the purpose for which these concerts are given. Last evening's audience was of unusual size, every seat and all the standing room being filled.

Any critical comment upon the concert would be out of place, owing to the nature of the occasion, also because there is nothing to be said, at this late day, of programme, players or performance, that has not been said already many times. Nothing less than the excitement attending a performance by Mr. Paderewski would have made a concerto by Beethoven possible after the "Pathetic" symphony; but, as it was, there were, no doubt, many for whom the real entertainment of the evening began with the appearance of the soloist.

The performance of the symphony was a notable feature of the concert, and the audience was quick to feel the poignancy of music and interpretation. The momentary hush at the end of the work before the applause was a greater tribute to the musicians than the applause itself. Dr. Muck was recalled again and again, and twice he called upon the men to rise and share the applause.

The concerts, if not strictly a balm to hearts that had been wrung by the symphony, was yet as a soothing application, and only the delightful performance of Mr. Paderewski kept it from being altogether sedative. The enjoyment of the audience would have been as keen had he chosen to play hymns or Czerny studies; for it was the ravishing beauty of tone, the variety, grace and rhythm, the potent and peculiar spell of the pianist, rather than the music, that held his hearers.

Recalled with deafening insistence, Mr. Paderewski was generous with encores, and he played Chopin's Ballade in A flat, "Butterfly" study, Polonaise in A flat and other pieces. He was given a huge wreath, which he generously shared, by intimation, with the orches-

Symphony Hall.

SEASON 1907-08

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Dr. KARL MUCK, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

HERMANN BISCHOFF, SYMPHONY in E major, op. 16.

- I. Sehr schnell und feurig.
- II. Sehr ruhig und getragen.
- III. Presto; Ruhig.
- IV. Allegro moderato.

(First time in Boston.)

MACDOWELL,

CONCERTO No. 2, in D minor, for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, op. 23.

- I. Larghetto calmo.
- II. Presto giocoso.
- III. Largo; Molto allegro.

DVOŘÁK,

OVERTURE, "Carnival." op. 92.

Soloist:

Madame TERESA CARREÑO.

The Pianoforte is an Everett.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.
Hermann Bischoff. Symphony in E major.
MacDowell. Concerto No. 2, in D minor. Piano and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Dvorak. Overture. "Carnaval."

It was a piccolo night! Never did that imp of the orchestra hold such continuous high carnival. The piccolo-player must be nursing his worn-out lungs today. Bischoff's Symphony might almost be called a piccolo concerto. Yet this new composer had a good deal to say for himself in his debut. He has the defect of painting almost everything scarlet, and he has that awful modern fault of length. Tonorrhoea is a new disease which seems to have fastened upon most of the composers of the modern school. Yet almost every one of the latter day composers is as good in scoring as Wagner or Berlioz was. It is a "metier" which Strauss, Mahler, Weingartner, Bischoff, Loeffler, Van der Stucken, in short all the modern men of prominence, possess.

Of course, therefore, Bischoff's symphony was a very heavy and difficult score, and equally of course it was more than an hour long. It began with a picture of dissipation of the bacchanalian type, something that seemed as graphic a picture of German student life as Murger's "Vie de Boheme" of the Quartier Latin of Paris. Spite of its prolixity (it was about half an hour in length) this movement must be called a very successful number. It is a graphic picture, drawn with a sure touch, even if it omitted to portray the "Katzenjammer," the grey misery of the morning after. Almost every measure in it was riotous and exciting, and Bischoff was not ugly or dissonant even in the midst of the tumult; he did not disdain melody nor did he scorn to be intelligible. There are few composers who could have been so long-winded without becoming tiresome. The piccolo began its shrieking almost at once, and kept it up interminably. It was soon evident that the Munich bars do not close at 11 p.m. One could not help wishing that the composer had laid on his scarlet a little less thickly.

The slow movement receded a trifle from the extreme modern vein. It had two frankly melodic themes and there was a convincing vigor in its development and a tranquillity at its end that were peculiarly attractive.

The third movement took the place of a Scherzo, although it was rather grotesque than playful. It was rather "Peer Gynt-y" in its progressions, but not in the least plagiarized; the work is original enough from beginning to end. The omnipresent piccolo, which has been momentarily quiet during the second movement, here renewed its yelling, and there were many orchestral oddities and explosions. The trombones were pushed to the headache point in this movement. The performance of this was so brilliant that Dr. Muck and the orchestra (which rose in response) were applauded most vigorously.

The only bit of moderation in the whole symphony was the tempo mark of the finale,—"Allegro Moderato". Again piccolo, trombones, trumpets, kettle-drums, etc., were let loose; again the whole pepper-box was thrown into the dish to spice it up. We must condemn the length—when will a modern dare to write a symphony as short as Beethoven's eighth again? We can only censure the extreme bolsterousness of the work. Yet with it all we feel that this Bischoff may have something to say later on. He is, to us, more like Mahler than like Richard Strauss. But he is likely to grow yet greater. Parts of this symphony are so frankly "canaille" that their very vulgarity becomes interesting and attractive.

Then came the real triumph of the concert. Teresa Carreno and the MacDowell concerto! There was nothing blatant here, nothing sensational or eccentric. The scoring is for the ordinary orchestra of Beethoven's day (with trombones) the form is clear, and the whole work scarcely as large as Bischoff's first movement. Yet one felt immediately the intrinsic superiority of the school. It also has the advantage of growing continuously stronger to its very end. The contrasts of the concerto are very effective. There was nothing in the entire symphony so beautiful as the subordinate theme of the first movement or the archness and delicacy of the entire second movement of this concerto.

But the most impressive part of the work is the beginning of the finale. Here the first theme (of the opening movement) returns and there is a dramatic sense of brooding and foreboding that becomes doubly pathetic in view of the history of the composer. The breadth of the martial theme of the finale (the "Seitensatz") was enormously impressive (even without any piccolo and "fortississimo" effects) and the final wild rush of piano scales and the abrupt close were exciting and effective.

But it takes a Carreno to bring out the abandon and fire of the work. The overwhelming triumph of Teresa Carreno at this concert is the more remarkable when we remember that we had had the greatest season of piano-playing in Boston's musical history before she came. To give the list of the great pianists who have played in Boston this season would be to publish a short musical directory. Yet the last here became first and the success of the tropical pianist was worthy of her great reputation. She has not lost an iota of the brilliant impetuosity that of old carried her audiences off their feet. She has been called "The Lioness of the Piano," and she deserves the title today more than ever. The concerto became, what it should be, an emotional poem, because of the freedom and elasticity with which she gave it. The great technique of the artist became but the means to an end; one did not think of difficulties, of technical points, but every auditor gave himself up to the charm of the tone-poem. At the close Mme. Carreno was recalled over and over again; we lost the count of the number of her reappearances in response to the interminable applause.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS GIVE 11TH CONCERT

Performance of New Work by Bischoff Is Remarkable for Brilliancy.

COMPOSITION EXAMPLE OF SIN OF "TOO MUCHNESS"

Mme. Carreno Rouses Enthusiasm by Superb Playing of MacDowell Concerto.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in E major, op. 16.....Bischoff
Concerto for piano, D minor.....MacDowell
Overture, "Carnival".....Dvorak

Hermann Bischoff, who lives in Munich, was studying music at the Leipsic Conservatory in a sober, righteous and godly manner, when he heard one day, as the story goes, the symphony in F minor by Richard Strauss. In comparison with the later works of Strauss this symphony in F minor is a smug and orthodox work, but it set Bischoff a-thinking, and he left the conservatory to be in company with Strauss. There were no actual lessons in composition, but there was reading of scores together for three years; there was much talk about music and the true modern expression of musical thoughts.

Bischoff's chief works are "Gewittersegen" for tenor, organ and orchestra (1899); "Pan," an orchestral idyl, inspired by "The Nymphs," a prose poem by Turgenev (1902), and this symphony, which was produced at the 42d convention of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein at Essen in May, 1906.

The symphony was then played from manuscript. The composer revised it thoroughly, and made cuts and alterations, before it was published. He wrote a curiously worded programme in explanation of his music for the first performance. This explanation is not printed in the score.

Motif of Symphony.

Bischoff first lays down the principle that there can be no musical expression which does not find an analogy in the world of facts and events or in the domain of poetic sentiments and sensations. Writing this symphony, he had in mind the story of a dissolute young man, who becomes acquainted with pure happiness in the form of a noble woman, but is not worthy to attain this happiness; he therefore seeks peace in resignation; the ghosts of his misspent youth pursue him like furies; the apparition of pure womanhood quiets the voices of darkness. Man is raised from the muck of life by love for a noble woman.

"If anyone hearing the first movement (this is the only one that has a special programme) should see a vision of dissolute nights, of orgiastic masked balls; if he believes that he hears passionate love murmurings in gardens flooded with moonlight and vocal with the songs of birds, he will then be conscious of what was in the mind of the composer."

Shades of Byron and Berlioz! Here is a belated romanticist in a period of machinery and materialism. The story of the rescue of a youth from the beer halls, the tangle-tangles and the jests of the Fliegende Blaetter of Munich by a star-eyed maiden with sentimental hair, is to be told in music. The first movement, we are assured, contains a vision of "orgiastic masked balls." How far we are from the pious orgies of the muses! This movement should also contain "passionate" but legitimate love-murmuring and songs of birds with the suggestion of moonlit gardens—although gardens of today are thoughtfully provided with electric lights.

Had Definite Programme.

"Peace in resignation" is the motive of the second movement, while ghosts of misspent youth provide a scherzo. But what is the "idea" of the finale? Does the youth never purify himself till he is worthy of the loved one's hand? The finale is in the nature of an apotheosis. Perhaps there is a portrayal of the abandonment of the will, which alone, as certain German and Asiatic philosophers assure us, brings happiness.

It is not necessary to inquire into the measure of Bischoff's success in expressing in tones his story of riotous living, purification, resignation, final conquest over self. Almost every composer has a succession of ideas in his mind which prompt him to paraphrase them in music whether he take the public into his confidence or give out the music as absolute.

We know that Tchaikowsky had a definite programme for his "Pathetic" symphony, but what that programme was he would not tell. Niecks in his recently published book on "Programme Music" thinks it highly probable that Brahms had some argument for each one of his symphonies. Whoever the composer may be, the musical paraphrase of the suggesting ideas is that which should be judged without special reference to the ideas themselves.

Demands Huge Orchestra.

Mr. Bischoff's age is not given in the encyclopaedias, but we know that he was a conservatory student 20 years ago, his photograph represents him as a well nourished, carefully dressed man, well on the sunny side of 40. There is furthermore a youthful spirit in many pages of this symphony. Not only does he demand a huge orchestra to say his say, but he demands time. His first movement is nearly half an hour long and in spite of its length it is the most impressive. It is frankly boisterous and careless in its main idea, that of portraying a reckless life.

144

A line of Walt Whitman might serve as motto: "Onward we move, a gay gang of blackguards, with wild-flapping pennants of joy." In this frank exposition of vulgar pleasure there is a force. There is an exuberance that is not displeasing. Here the composer is spontaneous; here he is himself. He is also himself in the most striking page of the whole work; in the remarkable preparation for the entrance of a sensuous theme given to the cellos, a page of instrumentation that stands out boldly in the whole volume of notes—and this volume is an elephantine folio.

The opening of the second movement has true thoughtfulness and nobility, but after the opening exposition there is a too evident attempts at depth, and the mind of the hearer soon wanders; nor is it brought back to the "resignation" of the youth; or, if it be brought back, there is only resignation on the part of the hearer.

Scherzo Too Long.

Here as in the scherzo the composer is guilty of the fault of nimety, to use a word dear to Coleridge, who attributed this fault to German writers, metaphysicians, poets, dramatists, a word that is synonymous with Artemus Ward's "too muchness." The scherzo has exciting moments, but it is all too long. So, too, the finale might be put into a duck-press. Only the imposing final pages remain in the mind.

As Bischoff is intimate with Richard Strauss, to whom this symphony is dedicated, it might be reasonably expected that his own music would show Strauss' influence. There are pages, especially in the first movement that recall the spirit of Strauss's "Don Juan," the adventurous, freebooting amorist, but the resemblance is chiefly in tricks of expression, as in a matter of horns, a harmonic formula, a flourish of ornamentation. Bischoff is by no means a servile copyist.

These are only impressions of a work that is out of common; a work that, while it is swollen out of due proportion, and is at times bombastic, mere sound and fury, and at other times is dull in spite of its pretentiousness, or, rather, by reason of it, is nevertheless the composition of a man to be reckoned with. His most conspicuous faults are those that come from an abuse of material and from the desire to exhaust every subject, however unimportant it may be.

The harmonic scheme is seldom subtle or refined or ultra-modern. The instrumentation is too often thick, without contrast, without delicacy, without wit. In spite of all these faults which characterize so much of the music of the younger German school, and are seen in a modified form in modern German literature and art, there is true stuff in this symphony.

Revealed All in Music.

The performance was remarkable for elasticity, brilliance and eloquence. Dr. Muck, who had rehearsed with the utmost care and patience, and the orchestra that carried out his wishes with intelligence and verve, are alike to be congratulated. There is no doubt but that everything that is in the music was revealed with the utmost clearness and with the fitting pomp of diction. It is a pity that works which demand so much labor and thought—works as Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and this symphony—I group them here only by reason of the difficulties in execution—are heard as a rule only once in a season. This seems hardly fair to the composer, the audience, the conductor and the orchestra.

Mme. Carreno played MacDowell's concerto superbly, with incomparable rhythmic feeling, dash and demoniacal energy. The concerto itself is one of the composer's most purely individual and romantic works. It is a concerto for a virtuoso who must also be a human being and a bit of a poet. Mme. Carreno is an extraordinary woman, a pianist who is mistress of the grand style; a woman of amazing vitality and personal force; a woman of a singularly romantic life. Her performance last night was extraordinary even for her. The audience, which had received the symphony with favor and appreciated the performance, was enthusiastic over Mme. Carreno, and with great reason.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Teresa Carreno Soloist
at the Symphony.

Bessie Abbott Sings at Today's Popular Concert.

Sousa's Band — Other
Events of the Week.

4 Lake - Jan 3 - 1907
There is no doubt of the regard in which Teresa Carreno is held by the music-loving public of Boston, for the great artist was received with the heartiest kind of welcoming at the last Symphony rehearsal and concert, and she honored her pupil, the American composer, Edward A. MacDowell, by choosing for her piano solo his second concerto, a work that compares favorably with the foremost of modern compositions of its rank.

The program opened with the first performance here of the E major symphony by Hermann Bischoff, a musician but little known, though he doubtless soon will be. One hearing of his symphony practically guarantees that fact. The joyous, fantastic and characteristic "Carneval" overture by Dvorak closed the concert.

Mme. Carreno has changed somewhat in appearance since her visit here several years ago, but there is the same magnetic personality, brilliant smile, animated poise and commanding air of yore, and her art seems as appealing as ever. She has always been an interesting study, for she has a marvelous hold on the feminine heart and combines masculine virility in playing with a tenderness and grace that relieves her dazzling powers from the suggestion of bravado. She is just natural, that's all.

In her interpretation of the concerto she missed no shade of expression and invested the music with all the delicacy and significance that a sympathetic artist could command. The impressive first movement was a fine example of sustained vigor, with brilliancy in intermittent passage work and well-defined themes successfully pitted against the orchestral forces. The performance of the second part was as near perfection in finger work as it seemed possible, delicate, fleet and clear in exploitation, with a pianissimo effect that roused spontaneous outbursts of applause and obliged the wonderful woman to rise and bow several times before resuming her work.

In the closing movement there was shown the same virtuosity, crisp fingering and beautiful melodic quality of tone that characterized her earlier performance. The superb breadth and freedom of her playing and her ease in conquering all technical difficulties made her interpretation memorable. At the end of the concerto she was recalled many times to the platform to acknowledge the applause. The orchestral support left nothing to be desired.

The Bischoff symphony might be called colossal in proportions, for it is elaborate in orchestral construction, immensely difficult for every choir and is more than an hour in length. It is the most difficult new work Dr. Muck has attempted and the rehearsals have been unusually numerous for all parts of the band. The score for the brass part at times verges upon the impossible, not quite though, and every other section is treated in about the same way.

Bischoff had in mind for musical illustration the story of a dissolute youth who, after a life of debauchery and wild revelry, awakens to the sense of a happiness which is denied him. A rake's progress interspersed with poetic visions of pure delights never to reach a realization. As Bischoff dedicated the work to Richard Strauss, the manner of treatment may readily be inferred.

Skilled in the capabilities of the modern orchestra and with an imagination that fairly "rides the whirlwind," the author handled his subject in a strikingly effective way. Not particularly pleasing as a whole, except to the expert in things musical, but showing the great ability of composer in the so-called advanced style of writing, there is a consistent succession of tonal colors representing episodes and sentiments of varying import, and in combinations of the choirs the variety is really perplexing in forms and number. A riot of fancy let loose.

The prominence of the brass contingent is better suited to an open-air performance than in a hall, and fortissimo passages are so frequent that the score, unless heard at a distance, must necessarily sound muddled to those sitting near the heavier instruments. In the second part Bischoff shows he can be melodic, for here two exquisite themes are given to the strings and lighter groups, the working out running along sanely until near the end of the movement; then comes a return to instrumental chaos.

The four divisions bristle with pitfalls for the players, and the general smoothness and coherency of the performances by Dr. Muck's forces shows that constant diligence and rehearsals had accomplished splendid results. The big and rather uninviting work called forth unusual exertions on the part of the conductor, as well as the men. 'Twas no child's play to labor through an hour of Bischoff uncontrolled by a musical leash.

The third trip of the orchestra will be taken this week. The 12th program will comprise Haydn's G major symphony, three German dances by Mozart, first time here, and Beethoven's fourth symphony.

MME. CARRENO FEATURE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT

The splendid art of Mme. Teresa Carreno was the best feature of Saturday night's Symphony concert. Never has this remarkable musician appeared here to better advantage; never has her insight seemed more poetical or her skill more dazzling; yet it was 45 years ago this month that the distinguished Venezuelan first performed in the presence of a Boston audience! There were some people present Saturday night who claimed to have seen her when, as a child of 9, she played in old Music Hall. "I remember," said one man, "that her little feet couldn't touch the pedals." However, there are many infant prodigies, but there is only one Carreno. Certainly her performance of MacDowell's Concerto in D minor at this Symphony concert could not have been excelled by any other pianist whom Bostonians cheer and worship.

It is an interesting circumstance in connection with the performance that MacDowell studied the piano for awhile with Mme. Carreno. Possibly this had something to do with the captivating enthusiasm that she displayed and with her rare demonstration of exquisite delicacy and Samsonian power. The audience recalled her half a dozen times when the concerto was over.

Another very interesting feature of the concert was the performance for the first time here of Bischoff's Symphony in E major. Bischoff, who is a young German composer, somewhat after the manner of Richard Strauss, has explained that this work is intended to represent the life of a man who mispends his youth and becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer fit to enjoy it. This sermon in music was Puritanically long—the performance occupied an hour and a quarter; but the vast stretches of monotonous discourse were relieved by several passages of extraordinary power and beauty. The piece should be heard again to be understood and appreciated. It was excellently played, Dr. Muck conducting with his accustomed care and spirit.

The other number on the program was Dvorak's lively "Carnival" overture. There will be no concert this week. Journal Jan. 6, 1907

BISCHOFF AND CARRENO

A NEW SYMPHONY AND A FAVORITE PIANIST

The Return of Mme. Carreño in MacDowell's Concerto at the Symphony Rehearsal Yesterday—A Charming Work Played with Crisp Brilliance—Bischoff's First Symphony a Work of Tumultuous Cleverness and of Excessive Length—Dr. Muck's Exciting Reading of Dvorak's Carnival Overture

Trans. — Jan. 4, 1908
The Symphony programme for this week indulges Dr. Muck once again in his generous interest in contemporaneous music. Dvorak is the most ancient name upon it. MacDowell—on this programme at least—made his the most distinguished. And the name of Herman Bischoff appears for the first time opposite a symphony—one in E major, Opus 16, that was given the post of honor.

Mr. Bischoff's symphony left two very distinct impressions. One impression was of great charm. The other was of overwhelming length. Little seems to be known anywhere of Herman Bischoff, but from what does happen to be known we learn that this is his first essay in the symphonic form. As such it differs promisingly and flatteringly from the usual first symphony of talented youth. That unescapable affliction upon long-suffering music invariably embodies every excellence that the young learner has got from the books. His work is apt, in consequence, to sound like a card catalogue. Mr. Bischoff's first symphony does not sound that way. Far from it! It sounds like a Congressional Library.

This subtle distinction may savor of flippancy; it is rather a cry of justifiable impatience at Mr. Bischoff's simply inordinate, inexcusable, and defacing length. He has engorged his beautiful work till full seventy minutes are consumed in its playing. Schubert himself has seemed long and over-copious to his most passionate lovers in his fifty-minute Symphony in C, one of the mountain-tops of music. For perhaps thirty—to speak by the clock—Mr. Bischoff entranced his hearers yesterday afternoon, with some of the most spirited and ingenious orchestral writing that has been given us in these latter day times. Then he left them to recall that ancient Eastern potentate and his library of a thousand camel loads.

He was fond of good reading, was that ancient potentate, and he had provided himself with plenty of it. But he read and he read, and yet it seemed that the sands of his life would run out before he had finished his books. He hated to leave behind him so much unlearned wisdom, and he called his wise men and commanded them to condense the wit and learning of these over-many tomes into a space that he could finish in the time that was left him to live. They reduced the library to a hundred camel loads—and the potentate grew older. They brought it down to a hundred ass loads—to forty ass loads—and then to ten. And the potentate grew feeble. Finally they handed him his library, its philosophy, its teachings written in two sentences on a palm leaf fan.

It matters nothing what those two sentences were; but it does matter that Mr. Bischoff has missed setting to his name one of the remarkable achievements of these days by not following something of the same method with his symphony. Such fresh and vigorous themes—always charming scraps of melody—such ingenious invention, such sparkling, hearty, happy spirit do not speak from more than half a dozen modern works. The man who wrote this symphony had something to say, and he knows how to speak. Glittering episode he piles upon episode more glittering. He knows his orchestra. He treads not far in the rear of his acknowledged master, Strauss himself, in the cunning and audacity with which he mixes orchestral color. The stunning effects he obtains he sends out fairly blurring each other in the rapidity of their succession. His scherzo alone contains more cleverness than the complete works of many an honest and respected man. And there is Mr. Bischoff's fearful failing. His ingenuity will know no end. He has written not one symphony, but three. One heard his first half hour with excited surprise, at so much charm and high spirits and devilish cleverness; and heard his last half hour in impatience as fervid, that the maker of so much fine music had not saved half of it to furnish forth the remaining works of his life!

Dr. Muck did for Bischoff what he might and could. He might not, unsanctioned, perform the office of the wise men of the Eastern potentate. But he could and did lend to the music the gorgeous orchestral palette at his command. And they took Mr. Bischoff's periods, every one of them, and sounded each of the many as if it were the final gem upon which all the other thousand waited. It was a remarkable performance, that exhausted the orchestra's bursting treasury of excellences, that exhausted its conductor's skill and mastery with them—and that exhausted the patience of a pre-possessed audience with the gifted and far too generous Mr. Bischoff.

Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, brilliant as it is, and brimming with the wine of high spirits—and after a! holding in all its compass hardly a tithe of Mr. Bischoff's first movement alone!—went far better, went all the better for what had preceded it. How grateful its crisp directness, its definite, secure, unflinching pursuit of the shortest turn of phrase and the courage of its abrupt end! The rehearsal audience decimated itself, as usual, with withdrawal before the last number—and missed one of the most exciting bits of playing that the orchestra has done under Dr. Muck.

Mme. Carreño and MacDowell left but one vivid impression—that of great charm. MacDowell has not touched his uppermost levels in this, his second concerto. Not that his utterance droops in poetic purport; the fault is rather with its technical presentment. He has seemed over-anxious to make his pianoforte the head of his orchestral family. It speaks with mighty authority, with a directness that amounts to epigram. Its phrases, some of them, come off with an emphasis that is almost fierce. And the chorus of orchestral voices that follows and comments upon these pronouncements of the oracle is wavering, insecure, faint and indefinite. Their entrances were almost an intrusion: they came like timid beggars at a feast. And the feast was complete without them—not a merry feast; rather a solemn, jovial one. Forgetful of other company, on his chosen instrument, with the tongue that after all has been most obedient to him, MacDowell was delivering one of those Olympian messages that always come from him when he girds himself to write in the highest forms. He delivered another such in the Eroica Sonata that Mr. Bauer played the other afternoon. This concerto was rather another Eroica Sonata, with asides by an orchestra.

And Mme. Carreño played it with a skill and a divination that rather toyed with its Olympian intentions. That is a large word—Olympian—but none other will suffice for the music and the playing. The mighty difficulties of the piece, its fierce rangings up and down the field of dramatic expression, she gripped and swung till they were as eloquent of her own masterful personality as of MacDowell's masterful message. No other woman now at the piano is so at home as she on the heights of feeling; few of them can scale those heights to her daring level. And no other player, of either sex or of any attainment, could sharpen her glitter in the scherzo of that concerto, titanically disdainful as it is alike of the limitations of the puny pianoforte keyboard, of the limitations of the human finger, and the even more pitiful limitations of musical expression. It is an event in our musical history to welcome back again so gifted a player after her several years of neglect of us. B. K.

MEETS HIS MATCH IN YOUNG Fierce Battle At Lawrence

Teresa Carreño, who comes to Boston as soloist for the Symphony concerts on Jan. 3 and 4, has had an interesting and picturesque career. When she was very young she became an intimate friend of Carlotta Patti, a sister of the great singer, Adeline Patti, so intimate that the two were photographed together. Her musical career began before she was 20 and she has been a favorite ever since. She has been four times wedded, her present husband being Arthur Tagliepetra, a brother of her second husband.

Another stage favorite and one who, although she has been out of the public eye for some years, is still remembered, is Christine Nilsson, who created such a furore when she first appeared in Boston in the early 70s. During the very height of her fame she married Count De Miranda and retired to her native Sweden and left the stage for good. This was more than twenty years ago, but the older followers of the stage still have vivid memories of her as Marguerite in "Faust" and other roles. She is at present seriously ill at her home. Like Miss Carreño, Miss Nilsson made her debut when she was very young—barely 20 years of age. She made her first appearance in London in 1867 and from that memorable night her star was in the ascension. She was also married when young to a Frenchman, Auguste Rouzard, who died in 1882. Five years later she became the Countess de Miranda.

Kitty Blanchard, who in private life is Mrs. McKee Rankin, is another of the old favorites who will never be forgotten. She, too, is ill at her home in New York city, and a few days ago a number of her friends and former admirers turned out at a big benefit performance for her. Among the participants were Novelli, Viola Allen, Cecelia Loftus, Harry Dixey, Kyrie Bellew, Mme. Nazimora, David Warfield and others.

Mrs. Rankin was a member of the first complete American company to appear in London. This was in 1880, the play being the "Danites," by Joaquin Miller. Her two daughters, Gladys, who is the wife of Sidney Drew, and Phyllis, wife of Harry Davenport, have both achieved more or less fame in their mother's chosen profession.

phony in E major. Bischoff, who is a young German composer, somewhat after the manner of Richard Strauss, has explained that this work is intended to represent the life of a man who mis-spends his youth and becomes acquainted with pure happiness when he is no longer fit to enjoy it. This sermon in music was Puritanically long—the performance occupied an hour and a quarter; but the vast stretches of monotonous discourse were relieved by several passages of extraordinary power and beauty. The piece should be heard again to be understood and appreciated. It was excellently played, Dr. Muck conducting with his accustomed care and spirit.

The other number on the program was Dvorak's lively "Carnival" overture. There will be no concert this week. Journal Jan. 6, 1907

BISCHOFF AND CARRENO

A NEW SYMPHONY AND A FAVORITE PIANIST

The Return of Mme. Carreño in MacDowell's Concerto at the Symphony Rehearsal Yesterday—A Charming Work Played with Crisp Brilliance—Bischoff's First Symphony a Work of Tumultuous Cleverness and of Excessive Length—Dr. Muck's Exciting Reading of Dvorak's Carneval Overture

Trans. — Jan. 4, 1908

The Symphony programme for this week indulges Dr. Muck once again in his generous interest in contemporaneous music. Dvorak is the most ancient name upon it. MacDowell—on this programme at least—made his the most distinguished. And the name of Herman Bischoff appears for the first time opposite a symphony—one in E major, Opus 16, that was given the post of honor.

Mr. Bischoff's symphony left two very distinct impressions. One impression was of great charm. The other was of overwhelming length. Little seems to be known anywhere of Herman Bischoff, but from what does happen to be known we learn that this is his first essay in the symphonic form. As such it differs promisingly and flatteringly from the usual first symphony of talented youth. That unescapable inflection upon long-suffering music invariably embodies every excellence that the young learner has got from the books. His work is apt, in consequence, to sound like a card catalogue. Mr. Bischoff's first symphony does not sound that way. Far from it! It sounds like a Congressional Library.

